

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

DR. WILLIAM SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, published in 1860-63, and containing, in its three octavo volumes, nearly 3,200 pages, is a work of acknowledged excellence; but its size, cost, and scholarly character, unfit it for the use of the great mass of those who need a Dictionary of the Bible. The CONCISE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, abridged from the larger work, under Dr. Smith's superintendence, by Mr. William A. Wright (1,039 pp., 8vo, 1865), is well executed in many respects; but it leaves out a large part of the illustrations, references, tables, and some entire articles; frequently presupposes a familiar acquaintance with the Scriptures and with the learned languages; alters, often unsatisfactorily, the pronunciation of hundreds of proper names, and plainly evinces a lack of appreciation of the popular necessities. Dr. Smith's SMALLER DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE (617 pp., crown 8vo, 1866) is characterized, in general, by the same excellences and faults as the Concise Dictionary, and, while it has about twenty valuable maps and plates which are not in either of the other works, it is far from being commensurate with the wants of studious readers of the Bible.

The COMPREHENSIVE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, which is the fruit of three years of editorial labor, is a modified abridgment of Smith's larger Dictionary of the Bible, designed to present the results of modern scholarship in a complete, intelligible, and reliable form for popular use. It aims to be, in all respects, a Standard Dictionary for the People.

The general principles which have guided the Editor in the preparation of the present work are the following:—

I. To make every thing intelligible to those who understand only the English language, and to place them as nearly as possible on a level with the scholars who are familiar with the original languages of the Scriptures.

II. To condense the greatest possible amount of valuable information into one volume of convenient size and moderate cost.

III. To guard against all influences hostile to Christian faith and love.

In carrying out these general principles, the Comprehensive Dictionary is distinguished from Smith's Dictionaries of the Bible, as well as from most others, in respect to—

1. Pronunciation. This Dictionary presents intelligibly and accurately the results of a diligent and extended examination of the principles, analogies, and prevalent usage in this department. In some cases, two different modes of pronunciation are given, each of which has a foundation of authority or of reason to support it. All the words in the vocabulary are pronounced and divided into syllables, and words or parts of words are also respelled whenever this is needed to indicate the pronunciation.

2. Etymology. The derivation and signification of the proper names are systematically given according to the best etymologists.

3. Orthography. The Scriptural names and words in which there are diversities of spelling are inserted in the vocabulary under the different forms which are prevalent, with a reference from the less common to the usual form.

4. Geography. Many important additions and corrections have been made in this department, giving the results of the latest investigations, identifying the ancient sites according to the opinions of the best-informed geographers and travellers, supplying numerous maps, plans, views of places, &c. Among the additions in this volume are the Plan of ancient Antioch in Syria after Müller (from Conybeare & Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul), the Maps of Arabia and Egypt (from Cassell's Bible Dictionary), the Map of the Jordan (from Tristram's Land of Israel), the two maps of Palestine (the first from Smith's Smaller Dictionary, the other from Ayre's Treasury of Bible Knowledge), and the Map of the Countries visited by the Apostle Paul (from the last edition of Kitto's Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature). In most other cases the authorities are given with the map or other important addition.

5. History of Cities and Countries. Many articles in Smith's Dictionaries of the Bible presuppose the reader's access to Smith's Dictionary of Geography, &c., and thus omit important historical facts which the Comprehensive Dictionary briefly supplies.

6. Theology and Church Order. This Dictionary aims, without inculcating either sectarian or latitudinarian views, to assist its readers in ascertaining for themselves the teachings of the Bible in regard to religious doctrines and ecclesiastical organization. It carries into this department of Biblical investigation the feature, which Smith's Dictionary adopts in respect to natural-history terms and some others, of giving the Hebrew and Greek equivalents of the English words with their exact significations and uses.

7. Consistency of the Dictionary with itself. While no important opinion has been suppressed and no real difficulty evaded, great care has been taken to harmonize with the best authorities and with one another, if possible, the oft-conflicting opinions and statements of different writers in Smith's Dictionary, or to provide for each having its own proper influence by inserting cross-references and notes, and often giving the name of the original contributor in connection with his opinion or statement or article.

8. References. The Scripture references of Smith's Dictionary have been diligently collated, often corrected, and in some articles considerably increased in number. The multitude of new cross-references to other articles in this Dictionary will greatly facilitate the finding of the information contained in the work.

9. Additions to the original work. Many new articles have been added, and numerous additions have been made to other articles, in order to give greater value and completeness to this Dictionary. One-third of the cuts and most of the maps are from other sources than Smith's Dictionaries. The additions and modifications in every part of this volume, and on every subject in it, make it, indeed, almost a new work.

10. Authorities. The new matter has been drawn from a wide range of first-class authorities. The title-page and list of abbreviations give the names of a few only out of the more than 200 writers whose productions in various forms have been laid under contribution for the improvement of this Dictionary. Much use has been made, not only of Dictionaries of the Bible, Concordances, Lexicons, Commentaries, Cyclopædias, Books of Travel, and other bound volumes of the highest character, but also of elaborate essays and reviews in various periodicals. Valuable aid in several departments has been received from officers of Yale College. From these and other sources, many of which are mentioned in the body of the work, the Editor has obtained the needed material to make this "A Comprehensive Dictionary of the Bible."

11. Engravings. It is believed that no Dictionary of the Bible is so well illustrated; but its abundant Pictorial Illustrations, as well as its numerous Maps, are intended for instruction and general utility rather than for mere ornament.

12. Typography. The large and open page, legible type, and accurate and beautiful mechanical execution, need no commendation.

To all who have aided him in the prosecution of his labors, and especially to the President and Librarian of Yale College, for the unrestricted use of the College Library, the Editor would return his hearty thanks.

That the preparation and publication of this volume may promote the cause of true religion and sound Biblical learning, is the earnest desire and prayer of

A COMPREHENSIVE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

A

A'a-lar. ADDAN.

Aar'on [air'on] (fr. Heb. = mountaineer? Ges.; enlightened, Fül.), the brother of MOSES and MIRIAM, and son of Amram and Jochebed (Num. xvi. 59, xxxiii. 39). He was three years older than Moses, and probably several years younger than Miriam (Ex. ii. 4, vii. 7). He is first mentioned in Ex. iv. 14, as "Aaron the Levite," who "could speak well." He was apparently, like many eloquent men, impulsive and comparatively unstable, leaning almost wholly on his brother; incapable of that endurance of loneliness and temptation, which is an element of real greatness; but earnest in his devotion to God and man, capable of sacrifice and of discipline by trial, and deservedly styled "the saint of the Lord" (Ps. cri. 16). He was appointed by Jehovah to be the Interpreter and "Mouth" (Ex. iv. 16) of Moses, who was "slow of speech;" and accordingly he was not only the organ of communication with the Israelites and with Pharaoh (Ex. iv. 30, vii. 2), but also the actual instrument of working most of the miracles of the Exodus. (See Ex. vii. 19, &c.) Thus on the way to Mount Sinai, during the battle with Amalek, Aaron with Hur held up the weary hands of Moses, when they were lifted up for the victory of Israel, not in prayer, but to bear the rod of God (Ex. xvii. 9). Through all this period he was subordinate to his brother. At Sinai, Aaron only approaches with Nadab and Abihu, and the seventy elders of Israel, by special command, near enough to see God's glory, but not so as to enter His immediate presence. Left then, on Moses' departure, to guide the people, Aaron fails to withstand the demand of the people for visible "gods to go before them" (see Ex. xxxii.; CALF; IDOLATRY). There can hardly be a stronger contrast with this weakness, and the self-convicted shame of his excuse, than the burning indignation of Moses, and his stern, decisive measures of vengeance, although beneath these lay an ardent affection, which went almost to the verge of presumption in prayer for the people (Ex. xxxii. 19-34), and gained forgiveness for Aaron himself (Deut. ix. 20). Immediately after this great sin, Aaron was consecrated by Moses to the new office of HIGH-PRIEST. The order of God for the consecration is found in Ex. xxix., and the record of its execution in Lev. viii. The solemnity of the office, and its entire dependence for sanctity on the ordinance of God, were vindicated by the death of his sons, Nadab and Abihu, for "offering strange fire" on the altar (Lev. x.). From this time the history of Aaron is almost entirely that of the priesthood, and its chief feature is the great rebellion of KORAH and the Levites against his sacerdotal dignity, united with that of Dathan and Abiram and the Reubenites against the temporal authority of Moses. The true vindication of Aaron's priesthood was, not so much the death of Korah by the fire of the Lord, as the efficacy of his offering of incense to stay the plague, by which he was seen to be accepted as an Intercessor for the people. The blooming of his rod, which followed, was a miraculous sign, visible to all, and capable of preservation, of God's choice of him and his house. The murmuring of Aaron and Miriam against Moses clearly proceeded from Aaron's trust in his priesthood, and Miriam's in her prophetic inspiration, as equal commissions from God (Num. xii. 2). It probably originated mainly with Miriam, and seems to have vanished at once before the declaration of Moses' exaltation above all prophecy and priesthood, except that of One who was to come. Acting with Moses in the guidance of the people, he shared his sin at MERIBAH, and its punishment (Num. xx. 10-12). Aaron's death, at the age of one hundred and twenty-three years (Num. xxxiii. 39), seems to have followed very speedily. It took place on Mount Hor, after the transference of his robes and office to Eleazar, who alone with Moses was present at his death, and performed his burial (Num. xx. 28). This mount is still called the "Mountain of Aaron." The wife of Aaron was ELISHEBA (Ex. vi. 23); and the two sons who survived him were ELEAZAR and ITHAMAR. The high-priesthood descended to the former, and was in his family until the time of ELI, and again from ZADOK onward.

Aar'on-ites [air-] = descendants of AARON (1 Chr. xii. 27, xxvii. 17). PRIEST.

Ab (Heb. father). ABBA; MONTH.

Ab'a-ene (L.; 2 Esd. i. 40) = HABAKKUK.

A-bad'don (Heb. destruction), Rev. ix. 11. APOLLYON.

Ab-a-di'as = OBADIAH, son of Jehiel (1 Esd. viii. 35).

Ab-ag'tha (Heb. fr. Sansc. = given by fortune, Bohlen, Ges.; see BIGTHA), one of the seven eunuchs in the Persian court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Ab'a-na (L. fr. Heb. = AMANA, Ges.), one of the "rivers of DAMASCUS" (2 K. v. 12), probably the modern Barada, the chief river of the city. This clear and limpid stream is the main source of the beauty and fertility of the plain of Damascus. It rises in the Antilibanus, at about twenty-three miles N. W. from the city, after flowing through which, in several distinct streams, it runs across the plain and falls by different branches into the Bahret el-Kibliyeh ("South Lake") and Bahret el-Shurkiyeh ("East Lake"), two of the three lakes or marshes fifteen or twenty miles E. of Damascus (Rbn. iii. 446; Ptr. chs. v. ix.). AMANA; PHARPAR.

Ab'a-rim (Heb. regions beyond, Ges.), a mountain or range of highlands E. of the Jordan, in the land of Moab (Deut. xxxii. 49), facing Jericho, and forming the E. wall of the Jordan valley at that part. Its most elevated spot was "the Mount NEBO, 'head' of 'the' PISGAH," from which Moses viewed the Promised Land before his death (Num. xxvii. 12, xxxiii. 47, 48; Deut. xxxii. 49; probably Jer. xxii. 20, A. V. "passages"). IJE-ABARIM.

Ab'ba (Chal. father = Heb. AB), a term applied to God by the Lord Jesus (Mk. xiv. 36), and by St. Paul (Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6).

Ab'da (fr. Heb. = servant, sc. of God, Ges.). 1. Father of Adoniram (1 K. iv. 6).—2. Son of Shammua (Neh. xi. 17); = Obadiah in 1 Chr. ix. 16.

Ab'de-el (fr. Heb. = servant of God, Ges.), father of Shelemiah (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

Ab'di (Heb. servant of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A Merarite, ancestor of Ethan the singer (1 Chr. vi. 44).—2. A Merarite, father of KISH 4 (2 Chr. xxix. 12).—3. One of the sons of Elam in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 26).

Ab'di-as (2 Esd. i. 39) = OBADIAH.

Ab'di-el (Heb. servant of God, Ges.), a Gadite, son of Guni and father of Ahi (1 Chr. v. 15).

Ab'don (Heb. servile, Ges.). 1. A judge of Israel (Judg. xii. 13, 15), perhaps = Bedan in 1 Sam. xii. 11.—2. Son of Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 23).—3. First-born son of Jehiel, the father of Gibeon (1 Chr. viii. 30, ix. 35, 36).—4. Son of Micah, and a contemporary of Josiah (2 Chr. xxxiv. 20); = Achbor in 2 K. xxii. 12.—5. A city of Asher, given to the Gershonites (Josh. xxi. 30; 1 Chr. vi. 74); = HEBRON 2.

A-bed-ne-go (Chal. servant of Nego, perhaps = the Chal. god Nebo), the Chaldean name given to Daniel's friend Azariah, miraculously saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. i. -iii.). AZARIAH 24.

Ab'el (L. fr. Heb. hebel = breath, vapor, transitoriness; probably so called from the shortness of his life), second son of Adam, murdered by his brother Cain (Gen. iv. 1-16). Jehovah showed respect for Abel's offering, but not for Cain's, because (Heb. xi. 4) Abel "by faith offered a more excellent sacrifice than Cain." The expression "sin," i. e. sin-offering, "lieth at the door" (Gen. iv. 7), seems to imply that the need of sacrifices of blood to obtain forgiveness was already revealed. Rather, "sin" (personified in this address of God to Cain) "lieth" (lit. croucheth, i. e. lieth in wait for thee, like a wild beast) "at the door" (so Ges., Bush, Fbn., &c.). Our Lord spoke of Abel as the first martyr (Mat. xxiii. 35); so did the early church subsequently. A legend connects his name with Abila (ARILENE), near which is his reputed tomb, Nebi Habil = Prophet Abel (Stl. xii. n.).

Ab'el (Heb. meadow, Ges.), the name of several places in Palestine. 1. A'BEL-BETH-MA'A-CHAN [-kah] (Heb. meadow of Beth-Maachah, Fu.), or A'BEL-MA'AM (Heb. Abd on, or meadow of the waters), or simply A'BEL, a town of some importance ("a city and a mother in Israel," 2 Sam. xx. 19), in the extreme N. of Palestine; named with Dan, Cinneroth, Kedesh; early a prey to the invading kings of Syria (1 K. xv. 20; 2 Chr. xvi. 4) and Assyria (2 K. xv. 29). Here Sheba was overtaken and besieged by Joab (2 Sam. xx. 14, 15); and the city was saved by the exercise, on the part of one of its inhabitants, of its proverbial sagacity (18). It was probably at the modern Abil, a village on a hill, one hour N. E. from Hunin (anciently Rehob?) (Rbn. iii. 372; Thn. i. 324).—2. A'BEL-MIZ'RA-IM (Heb. the mourning of Egypt), the name given by the Canaanites to the floor of ATAD (Gen. i. 11).—3. A'BEL-SHITTIM (Heb. meadow of acacias) in the "plains" of Moab; on the low level of the Jordan valley, in distinction from the cultivated "fields" on the upper level of the table-land. Here, their resting-place before crossing the Jordan, Israel "pitched from Beth-jesimoth unto Abel-Shittim" (Num. xxxiii. 49). The place is most frequently called SHITTIM. In the days of Josephus, it was known as Abila, the town embosomed in palms, sixty stadia from the river. Among these palms (so Josephus) Deuteronomy was delivered by Moses. The town and the palms have disappeared; the acacia-groves still remain.—4. A'BEL-ME-HO'LAH (Heb. meadow of the dance), named with Beth-shean and Jokneam (1 K. iv. 12), and therefore in the N. part of the Jordan valley. To "the border of Abel-Meholah" and to Beth-shittah, the routed host fled from Gideon (Judg. vii. 22). Here Elisha was found at his plough by Elijah (1 K. xix. 16-19).—5. A'BEL-CER-AMIM (or A. Crāmim, Heb.; A. V., "the plain of the vineyards"), a place E. of Jordan, beyond Arero, to which Jephthah's pursuit of the Ammonites extended (Judg. xi. 33). An Abel is mentioned by Eusebius at six miles beyond Philadelphia (Rubbah); and another, where are now ruins, more to the N., twelve miles E. from Gadara.—6. "The great 'ABEL,' in the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite" (1 Sam. vi. 18). Probably (comp. ver. 14, 15) for Abel should be read Eben (in Heb.) = "stone." Some, however, suppose the place named Abel from the "mourning" there (ver. 19; comp. Gen. i. 11). The A. V. here inserts "stone of."

A'bez (Heb. tin? Ges.), a town of Issachar, named between Kishion and Remeth (Josh. xix. 20 only).

A'bi (Heb. = ABIJAH, Ges.), mother of king Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 2), called Abijah in 2 Chr. xxix. 1. Her father was Zachariah, or Zechariah.

A-bi'a (fr. Heb. = ABIJAH). 1. Son of Rehoboam; = ABIJAH 1, or ABIJAM (1 Chr. iii. 10; Mat. i. 7).—2. Chief of the eighth course of priests; a descendant of Eleazar (Lk. i. 5); = ABIJAH 3.

A-bi'ah (fr. Heb. = ABIJAH). 1. Son of Becher, Benjamin's son (1 Chr. vii. 8); supposed by Lord A. C. Hervey = APHIAH (?).—2. Wife of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 24).—3. Second son of Samuel, whom together with his eldest son Joel he made judge in Beersheba (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chr. vi. 28). The corruptness of their administration was the reason alleged by the Israelites for demanding a king.

A-bi-ai'ben = ABIEL 2.

A-bi'a-saph or E-bi'a-saph (Heb. whose father [Korah, Num. xvi.] God took away, Sim.; father of gathering, i. e. the gatherer, Fu. and Ges.), the head of a family of the Korhites. In Ex. vi. 24, he appears to be a son of Korah and brother of Assir and Elkanah: in 1 Chr. vi. 23, EBIASAPH (probably = Abiasaph) is son of Elkanah, the son of Asir, the son of Korah (comp. v. 37). The natural inference from this would be that in Ex. vi. 24, "the sons of Korah" = the families into which the house of the Korhites was subdivided (comp. 1 Chr. ix. 19). Among the remarkable descendants of Abiassaph, according to 1 Chr. vi. 33-37, were Samuel the prophet and Elkanah his father (1 Sam. i. 1), and Heman the singer.

A-bi'a-thar (fr. Heb. = whose father survived, sc. deceased mother, Sim.; father of excellence, or of abundance, Fū., Ges.), high-priest of the line of Eli and Ithamar. He was the only one of all the sons of AHIMELECH who escaped the slaughter of his father's house by Saul (1 Sam. xxii.). Abiathar fled to David "with an ephod in his hand," and was thus enabled to inquire of the Lord for him (1 Sam. xxiii. 6, 9, xxx. 7; 2 Sam. ii. 1, v. 19, &c.). The fact of David having been the unwilling cause of the death of all Abiathar's kindred, coupled with his gratitude to Ahimelech, made him a firm and steadfast friend to Abiathar all his life. Abiathar on his part adhered to David in his wanderings, was with him in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 1-3), carried the ark before him to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 11; 1 K. ii. 26), continued faithful to him in Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam. xv. 24-36, xvii. 15-17, xix. 11); and "was afflicted in all wherein David was afflicted." He was also one of David's chief counsellors (1 Chr. xxvii. 34). Abiathar was, however, one of Adonijah's chief partisans, while Zadok was on Solomon's side. For this Abiathar was superseded in the high-priesthood, and banished to his native Anathoth, and his life was spared by Solomon only on the strength of his long and faithful service to David. "Solomon thrust out Abiathar from being priest unto the Lord," and "Zadok the priest did the king put in the room of Abiathar" (1 K. ii. 27, 35). Probably Abiathar did not long survive David, though he is mentioned in 1 K. iv. 4 (comp. ver. 2, and 1 Chr. vi. 10). There are some difficulties connected with Abiathar. (1.) It is difficult to determine the position of Abiathar relatively to Zadok, and to account for the double high-priesthood. Zadok, descended from Eleazar, Aaron's elder son, is first mentioned in 1 Chr. xii. 28, as "a young man mighty of valor," who joined David while he reigned in Hebron. From this time we read, both in Samuel and Chronicles, of "Zadok and Abiathar the priests," Zadok being always named first. And yet Solomon on his accession put Zadok in the room of Abiathar. Perhaps Abiathar was the first, and Zadok the second priest; but from the superior strength of the house of Eleazar, which furnished sixteen out of the twenty-four courses (1 Chr. xxiv.), Zadok acquired considerable influence with David; and this, added to his being the heir of the elder line, and perhaps also to some of the passages being written after Zadok's line were established in the high-priesthood, led to the precedence given him over Abiathar. Possibly jealousy of Zadok inclined Abiathar to join Adonijah's faction. It is remarkable how, first, Saul's cruel slaughter of the priests at Nob, and then the political error of the wise Abiathar, led to the fulfilment of God's denunciation against the house of Eli, as noticed in 1 K. ii. 27. (HIGH-PRIEST.) (2.) In 2 Sam. viii. 17, 1 Chr. xviii. 16, and 1 Chr. xxiv. 3, 6, 31, Ahimelech is substituted for Abiathar, and Ahimelech (Abimelech) the son of Abiathar, instead of Abiathar the son of Ahimelech; yet in 2 Sam. xx. 25, and elsewhere in the O. T., we are uniformly told that Abiathar was priest with Zadok in David's reign, and that he was the son of Ahimelech, and Ahimelech the son of Ahitub. The difficulty is increased by finding Abiathar spoken of as the high-priest in whose time David ate the shewbread, in Mk. ii. 26. However, David's friend was so clearly Abiathar the son of Ahimelech that one can only suppose a clerical error propagated from one passage to another. The mention of Abiathar by our Lord in Mk. ii. 26, might be accounted for, if Abiathar persuaded his father to allow David to have the bread, and if, as is probable, the loaves were Abiathar's (Lev. xxiv. 9), and given by him with his own hand to David. Abiathar might then be spoken of by anticipation as high-priest (so Barnes), or as the same Greek word in the plural is commonly translated "chief-priests" in the N. T., Abiathar may be here designated simply as a chief-priest; compare ANNAS 2 (so Fairbairn).

A'bib. MONTE.

A-bi'dah or A-bi'da (Heb. father of knowledge, i. e. knowing, Ges.), son of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33).

Ab'i-dan (Heb. father of the judge, Ges.), chief of Benjamin at the Exodus (Num. i. 11, ii. 22, vii. 60, 65, x. 24).

A'bi-el (Heb. father of strength, i. e. strong, Ges.).

1. Father of Kish and Ner, and ancestor of Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1), and of Abner (1 Sam. xiv. 51). (NER; SAUL 2.)—2. An Arbathite, one of David's mighty men (1 Chr. xi. 32). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 31, he is called ABI-ALBON, a name of the same meaning.

A-bi-e'zer (Heb. father of help). 1. Eldest son of Gilead, and descendant of Manasseh, and apparently at one time the leading family of the tribe (Josh. xvii. 2; 1 Chr. vii. 18; Num. xxvi. 30, where the name is contracted Jeezer; comp. Judg. vi. 15, 34, viii. 2). The present text of 1 Chr. vii. 18, makes Abiezer a son of Gilead's sister. He was the ancestor of GIDEON.—2. One of David's "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chr. xi. 28, xxvii. 12).

A-bi-ez'rite = descendant of ABIEZER 1 (Judg. vi. 11, 24, viii. 32).

Ab'i-gail [-gal] (fr. Heb. = whose father is exultation, Ges.). 1. The beautiful wife of Nabal, a wealthy owner of goats and sheep in Carmel. When David's messengers were slighted by Nabal, Abigail took the blame upon herself, supplied David and his followers with provisions, and succeeded in appeasing his anger. Ten days after Nabal died, and David sent for Abigail and made her his wife (1 Sam. xxv. 14, &c.). By her he had a son Chileab (2 Sam. iii. 8) or Daniel (1 Chr. iii. 1).—2. A sister of David and of Zeruiah, married to JETHER 3 the Ishmaelite (or Ithra; Israelite in 2 Sam. xvii. 25, is probably a transcriber's error); mother of Amasa (1 Chr. ii. 17). NAHASH 2.

Ab-i-ha'il (fr. Heb. = father of might, i. e. mighty, Ges.; in No. 2 and 4 = father of light, Sim.). 1. Father of Zuriel, chief of the Levitical family of Merari under Moses (Num. iii. 35).—2. Wife of Abishur (1 Chr. ii. 29).—3. Son of Huri of the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 14).—4. Wife of Rehoboam, and daughter, i. e. descendant of Eliab, David's elder brother (2 Chr. xi. 18).—5. Father of Esther and uncle of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 15, ix. 29).

A-bi'hu (Heb. = to whom He [God] is father, Ges.), second son (Num. iii. 2) of Aaron by Elisheba (Ex. vi. 23), who with his father and his brother Nadab and seventy elders of Israel accompanied Moses to the summit of Sinai (Ex. xxiv. 1). Being, together with Nadab, probably while intoxicated (comp. Lev. x. 8-11), guilty of offering strange FIRE (Lev. x. 1) to the Lord, they were both consumed by fire from heaven, and Aaron and his surviving sons were forbidden to mourn for them.

A-bi'had (Heb. whose father is Judah, Ges.; fa- ther [God] is renown, Fū.), son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 3).

A-bi'jah (Heb. whose father is Jehovah, Ges.; = ABIA, ABIAH, &c.). 1. The son and successor of Rehoboam on the throne of Judah (2 Chr. xii. 16); called "ABIJAM" in 1 K., "ABIA" in 1 Chr., &c., "Abijah" in 2 Chr. From 1 K. xv. we learn that Abijah endeavored to recover the kingdom of the Ten Tribes, and made war on Jeroboam; that he walked in all the sins of Rehoboam (idolatry, &c., 1 K. xiv. 23, 24); and that his heart "was not perfect before God as the heart of David his father." In 2 Chr. xiii. his war is more minutely described; he was successful in battle, and took the cities of Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephraim, with their dependent villages. It is also said that his army consisted of 400,000 men, and Jeroboam's of 800,000, of whom 500,000 fell in the action; but Kennicott maintains that our MSS. are frequently incorrect as to numbers, and gives reasons for reducing these to 40,000, 80,000, and 50,000, and Davidson (The Text of the O. T. considered) claims that copyists were led into error by using different modes of marking numbers and confounding the letters by which they were often denoted. (CENSUS.) In 2 Chr. we are told that after his victory Abijah "waxed mighty, and married fourteen wives," whence we may well infer that he was elated with prosperity, and like Solomon fell into wickedness, as described in 1 K. He reigned three years. His mother was MAACHAH or Michaiab, and Abijah was probably descended from David both on his father's and mother's side. (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.)—2. The son of Jeroboam I., king of Israel, in whom alone, of all Jeroboam's house, was found "some good thing toward the Lord God of Israel," and who was therefore, unlike the rest, suffered to go down to the grave in peace. He died in his childhood, just after Jeroboam's wife had been sent in disguise to seek help for him, in his sickness, from the prophet Ahijah, who gave her the above answer (1 K. xiv.).—3. A descendant of Eleazar, who gave his name to the eighth of the twenty-four courses into which the priests were divided by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 10; 2 Chr. viii. 14). The Abijah in Neh. xii. 4, 17, may be a family name, or an individual descendant of this Abijah. (See No. 4.) To the course of Abijah or Abia belonged Zacharias the father of John the Baptist (Lk. i. 5).—4. A priest who with Nehemiah covenanted to walk in God's law (Neh. x. 7); possibly a family name = No. 3.—5. Mother of King Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 1); = ABI.

A-bi'jam (Heb. father of the sea, mariner, Ges.), son and successor of Rehoboam (1 K. xiv. 31, xv. 1, 7, 8); = ABIJAH 1.

Ab'i-la. ABILENE.

Ab-i-le'ne (Gr. fr. Abila, which probably = ABEL, meadow; not from ABEL the martyr), a tetrarchy of which the capital was Abila, a city on the E. slope of Antilibanus, in a district fertilized by the river Barada. (ABANA.) The position of the city is designated by the ancient itineraries as eighteen miles from Damascus, and thirty-eight (or thirty-two) miles from Heliopolis or Baalbec; and its remains have been discovered in a remarkable gorge called the Sûk Wady Barada, where the river breaks down through the mountain toward the plain of Damascus. It is impossible to fix the limits of the Abilene mentioned (Lk. iii. 1) as the tetrarchy of LYSANIAS. Like other districts of the East it doubtless underwent many changes, both of masters and of extent, before it was finally absorbed in the province of Syria.

A-bim'a-el (Heb., prob. = father of Mael, Ges.), a son of Joktan (Gen. x. 28; 1 Chr. i. 22), and probably the progenitor of an Arab tribe, perhaps the Minaei (Bochart). ARABIA.

A-bim'e-lech [-lek] (Heb. father of the king or father-king), the name of several Philistine kings; perhaps a common title of these kings; compare Pharaoh, Cesar, the title Padishah (= father-king) of the Persian kings, &c. In the title of Ps. xxxiv. the name Abimelech is given to the king, called ACHISH in 1 Sam. xxi. 11. 1. A Philistine, king of Gerar (Gen. xx. xxi.), who, exercising the right claimed by Eastern princes, of collecting all the beautiful women of their dominions into their harem (Gen. xii. 15; Esth. ii. 3), sent for and took Sarah. (ABRAHAM.)—2. Another king of Gerar who reproved ISAAC for his deception in relation to Rebekah (Gen. xxvi. 1, &c.).—3. Son of Gideon by his Shechemite concubine (Judg. viii. 31). After his father's death he murdered his seventy brethren, except Jotham the youngest, who concealed himself; and he then persuaded the Shechemites, through the influence of his mother's brethren, to elect him king. (SHECHEM.) When Jotham heard that Abimelech was made king, he addressed to the Shechemites his fable of the trees choosing a king (Judg. ix.). After Abimelech had reigned three years, the citizens of Shechem rebelled. He was absent at the time, but returned and quelled the insurrection. Shortly after he stormed and took Thebez, but was struck on the head by a woman with the fragment of a mill-stone (comp. 2 Sam. xi. 21); and lest he should be said to have died by a woman, he bade his armor-bearer slay him. Thus God avenged the murder of his brethren, and fulfilled Jotham's curse.—4. Son of Abiathar (1 Chr. xviii. 16); = ABIMELECH in 2 Sam. viii. 17. ABIATHAR.

A-bim'a-dab (Heb. father of nobleness, or noble father, Ges.). 1. A Levite of Kirjath-jearim, in whose house the ark remained twenty years (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2; 1 Chr. xiii. 7).—2. Jesse's second son, who followed Saul to his war against the Philistines (1 Sam. xvi. 8, xvii. 13).—3. A son of Saul, slain with his father and brothers on Mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 2).—4. Father of one of Solomon's twelve commissaries, who is called in the margin BEN-ABINADAB (1 K. iv. 11).

Ab'i-ner, a Hebrew form of ABNER (1 Sam. xiv. 50, marg.).

A-bim'e-em (Heb. father of pleasantness, or of grace, Ges.), the father of Batak (Judg. iv. 6, 12; v. 1, 12).

A-bi'ram (Heb. father of altitude, Ges.). 1. A Reubenite, son of Eliab, and conspirator with the Reubenites Dathan and On, and the Levite KORAH, against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi.).—2. Eldest son of HIEL, the Bethelite, who died when his father laid the foundations of Jericho (1 K. xvi. 34).

A-bi'ron = ABIRAM 1 (Ecclus. xlv. 18).

Ab-i-se'i = ABISHUA 2 (2 Esd. i. 2).

Ab'i-shag (Heb. father of error, Ges.), a beautiful Shunammite, taken into David's harem to comfort him in his extreme old age (1 K. i. 1-4). After David's death ADONIJAH induced Bathsheba to ask Solomon to give him Abishag in marriage; but this imprudent petition cost Adonijah his life (1 K. ii. 13, &c.).

A-bish-a-l or A-bi'shal (Heb. father of a gift, Ges.), son, probably eldest son, of David's sister Zeruiah, and brother to Joab and Asahel (1 Chr. ii. 16). He was an early, courageous, and devoted follower of David, and one of his chief officers. He accompanied David in his desperate night expedition to Saul's camp, and was restrained by David from stabbing the sleeping king with his own spear (1 Sam. xxvi. 6-9). He is next mentioned as associated with Joab in pursuing Abner at Gibeon, burying Asahel, and afterward slaying ABNER (2 Sam. ii. 18, 24, iii. 30). In the war against Hanun, Abishai, as second in command, was opposed to the army of the Ammonites before the gates of Rabbah, and drove them before him into the city, while Joab defeated the Syrians (2 Sam. x. 10, 14; 1 Chr. xix. 11, 15). The decisive defeat of the Edomites in the valley of salt (1 Chr. xviii. 12), which brought them to a state of vassalage, was due to Abishai, acting perhaps under the immediate orders of the king (see 2 Sam. viii. 13), or of Joab (Ps. lx. title). He accompanied the king in his flight from Absalom, and was eager to punish the insolence of Shimei (2 Sam. xvi. 9, 12, xix. 21). In the battle in the wood of Ephraim Abishai commanded one-third of the army (2 Sam. xviii. 2, 5, 12). In the absence of Amasa he was summoned to assemble the troops in Jerusalem and pursue after the rebel Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 6, 10). He also rescued David from the gigantic Philistine, Ishbi-benob (2 Sam. xxi. 17). His having successfully fought single-handed against three hundred, won for him a place as captain of the second three of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 20). Of the end of his life we have no record.

A-bish'a-lom (Heb. = ABSALOM), father, or grandfather, of MAACHAH, who was the wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (1 K. xv. 2, 10); called ABSALOM in 2 Chr. xi. 20, 21; probably David's son (see LXX., 2 Sam. xiv. 27).

A-bish'a-a (Heb. father's welfare, Sim.; father or lord of happiness, Fñ.; father of welfare, Ges.). 1. Son of Bela, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 4).—2. Son of Phinehas, and father of Bukki, in the genealogy of the high-priests (1 Chr. vi. 4, 5, 50, 51; Ezr. vii. 4, 5); called in the Apocrypha ABISEI and ABISU. HIGH-RIEST.

Ab'i-shur (Heb. father of the wall, Ges.), son of Shammai (1 Chr. ii. 28, 29).

Ab'i-sum = ABISHUA 2 (1 Esd. viii. 2).

Ab'i-tal (Heb. whose father is the dev., Ges.), one of David's wives (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chr. ii. 3).

Ab'i-tub (Heb. father of goodness, Ges.), son of Shoharaim by Hushim (1 Chr. viii. 11).

A-bi'ud (L. = ABIUD), descendant of Zorobabel in the genealogy of JESUS CHRIST (Mat. i. 13). Lord A. C. Hervey identifies him with HODIAH and JUDA 2, and supposes him the grandson of Zorobabel through his daughter Shelomith.

* Ab'jects (Ps. xxxv. 15), the A. V. translation of the Heb. pl. néchim, which (so Ges.) = smilers, sc. with the tongue, i. e. railers, slanderers; or (so Luther, J. A. Alexander on Ps.) = smitten, sc. in the feet, i. e. the lame, cripples.

Ab-in-tion. PURIFICATION.

Ab'ner (Heb. father of a light = ABINER, Ges.).

1. Son of Ner, Saul's uncle (see SAUL 2), and commander-in-chief of his army (1 Sam. xiv. 50, 51; 1 Chr. xxvi. 28). He conducted David into Saul's presence after the death of Goliath (xvii. 55-57); and afterward accompanied his master when he sought David's life at Hachilah (xxvi. 3-14). After Saul's death, he was the main stay of his family. After the disastrous battle of Mount Gilboa, David was proclaimed king of Judah in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 4), but the rest of the country being apparently in the hands of the Philistines, five years passed before Abner proclaimed ISHBOSHETH king of Israel, at Ma-hanaim. Ishbosheth was generally recognized, except by Judah. War soon broke out between the two rival kings, and a "very sore battle" was fought at Gibeon between the men of Israel under Abner and the men of Judah under Joab. When the army of Ishbosheth was defeated, Joab's swift-footed youngest brother Asahel pursued Abner, and in spite of warning refused to leave him, so that Abner in self-defence killed him. After this the war continued, success inclining more and more to the side of David, till at last the imprudence of Ishbosheth deprived him of the counsels and generalship of the hero, who was the only support of his tottering throne. Abner had married Rizpah, Saul's concubine, and this, according to the views of Oriental courts, might imply a design upon the throne. (ABSALOM; ADONIJAH.) Rightly or wrongly, Ishbosheth so understood it, and reproached Abner with it. Abner, after an indignant reply, opened negotiations with David, by whom he was most favorably received at Hebron. He then undertook to procure his recognition throughout Israel; but after leaving his court for the purpose was enticed back by Joab, and treacherously murdered by him and his brother Abishai, at the gate of the city, partly no doubt, as Joab showed afterward in the case of AMASA, from fear lest so distinguished a convert to their cause should gain too high a place in David's favor, but ostensibly in retaliation for the death of Asahel. This murder caused the greatest sorrow and indignation to David; but, as the assassins were too powerful to be punished, he contented himself with showing every public token of respect to Abner's memory, by following the bier and pouring forth a simple dirge over the slain (2 Sam. iii. 33, 34).—2. The father of Jaasiel, chief of the Benjamites in David's reign (1 Chr. xxvii. 21); probably = No. 1.

* A-bom-i-na-tion, the A. V. translation of several Heb. words (shikkûts, shekets, tô'ebâh, &c.), and of the Gr. bdelugna. "These words describe generally any object of detestation or disgust (Lev. xviii. 22; Deut. vii. 25); and are applied to an impure or detestable action (Ez. xxii. 11, xxxiii. 26; Mal. ii. 11, &c.); to any thing causing a ceremonial pollution (Gen. xliii. 32, xli. 34; Deut. xiv. 3); more especially to idols (Deut. vii. 26; 1 K. xi. 5, 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13, &c.); also to food offered to idols (Zech. ix. 7,) &c. (Kit.). The "abomination of the Egyptians" in Ex. viii. 26, according to some, denotes the cow, which all the Egyptians held sacred; according to others, something in the rites of Hebrew worship, which would be peculiarly offensive to the Egyptians. See the next article.

A-bom-i-na-tion of Des-o-lation, mentioned by our Saviour (Mat. xxiv. 15; Mk. xiii. 14) as a sign of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, with reference to Dan. ix. 27, xi. 31, xii. 11. The Jews considered the prophecy of Daniel as fulfilled in the profanation of the Temple under Antiochus Epiphanes, when the Israelites themselves erected an idolatrous altar upon the sacred altar, and offered sacrifice thereon: this altar is described as "the abomination of desolation" (1 Mc. i. 54, vi. 7). The prophecy, however, referred ultimately to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and consequently "the abomination of desolation" must be something connected with that event. But it is not easy to find one which meets all the requirements of the case: the introduction of the Roman standard into the Temple is not "the abomination of desolation," properly speaking, unless the Jews themselves participated in the worship of them; moreover, this event, as well as several others which have been proposed, e. g. the erection of the statue of Hadrian, &c., fails in regard to the time of occurrence, being subsequent to the destruction of the city. Probably the profanities of the Zealots constituted "the abomination," which was the sign of impending ruin (so Hug, Stier, Alford, &c.). ABOMINATION.

A'bra-ham (Heb. father of a multitude), originally A'bram (Heb. father of elevation), son of TERAH, and brother of Nahor and Haran; the progenitor of the Hebrew nation and of several cognate tribes, "the father of all them that believe" (Rom. iv. 11), and "the Friend of God" (Jas. ii. 23). His history is recorded with much detail in the Scriptures as the very type of a true patriarchal life. (PATRIARCH.) His character is free, simple, and manly; full of hospitality and family affection; truthful to all who were bound to him by their ties, though not untainted with Eastern craft toward aliens; ready for war, but not a professed warrior or plunderer; free and childlike in religion, and gradually educated by God's hand to a sense of its all-absorbing claims. Terah was an idolater (Josh. xxiv. 2). Abram appears as the champion of monotheism, and to him are referred the beginnings of the Mosaic polity.—Abram was probably born when his father was one hundred and thirty years old, the statement in Gen. xi. 26, that Terah was seventy years old, probably referring to his age when his eldest son Haran was born, and both Abram and Nahor being born subsequently (comp. Gen. xi. 26, 32, xii. 4, with Acts vii. 2-4). (CHRONOLOGY.) In obedience to a call of God, Abram, with his father Terah, his wife SARAI, and his nephew Lot, left his native Ur of the Chaldees, and dwelt for a time in Haran, where Terah died. After his father's death, Abram, now seventy-five years old, pursued his course, with Sarai and Lot, to the land of Canaan, whither he was directed by the divine command (Gen. xii. 5), when he received the general promise that he should become the founder of a great nation, and that all the families of the earth should be blessed in him. He passed through the heart of the country by the great highway to Shechem, and pitched his tent at the oak (A. V. "in the plain;" see PLAIN 7) of MOREH (Gen. xii. 6). Here he received in vision from Jehovah the further revelation that this was the land which his descendants should inherit (xii. 7). An altar to Jehovah perpetuated the memory of this divine appearance. The next halting-place of the wanderer was in a strong position on a mountain E. of Bethel, between Bethel and Ai, where another altar was reared (Gen. xii. 8). But the country was suffering from famine, and Abram, like his descendants two centuries later, finding neither pasture for his cattle nor food for his household, journeyed still southward to the rich corn-lands of Egypt. As the caravan approached the entrance to the country, Abram, fearing that the great beauty of Sarai might tempt the powerful monarch of Egypt and expose his own life to peril, adopted a policy which, as on a subsequent occasion, produced the very consequences it was intended to avert. Sarai was to represent herself as his sister, which, as she was probably the daughter of his brother Haran, she might do with some semblance of truth. But her fresh northern beauty excited the admiration of the swarth-skinned Egyptians; the princes of Pharaoh saw her and praised her to the king, and she was taken into the royal harem, while Abram was loaded with munificent presents. But the deception was discovered, and Pharaoh with some indignation dismissed him from the country (xii. 10-20). (GENESIS.) How long Abram remained in Egypt is uncertain. It is supposed that he was there during the sway of the Shepherd kings in Memphis, and that from participating in their war of conquest he acquired the favor of the reigning prince. But this is mere conjecture, and the narrative in Genesis seems to imply that his residence in Egypt was not protracted.—Abram left Egypt with great possessions, and, accompanied by Lot, returned by the S. of Palestine, to his former encampment between Bethel and Ai. The increased wealth of the two kinsmen was the ultimate cause of their separation. The soil was not fertile enough to support them both; their herdsmen quarrelled; and, to avoid dissensions in a country where they were surrounded by enemies, for "the Canaanite and Perizzite were then in the land," Abram proposed that each should follow his own fortune. Lot, eager to quit the nomadic life, chose the fertile plain of the Jordan; while Abram dwelt in tents, a pilgrim in the land of promise. On this occasion the two promises already received were reiterated in one. From the hill-top where he stood he looked N. and S. and E. and W. upon the country hereafter to be peopled by his numerous descendants. After parting from Lot, Abram, strong in numbers and wealth, quitted the hill-fastness between Bethel and Ai, and pitched his tent among the oak-groves (OAK; PLAIN 7) of Mamre, close to Hebron, where he built a third commemorative altar to Jehovah (Gen. xiii.).—The narrative is now interrupted by a remarkable episode in Abram's life, which vividly represents him in the light in which he was regarded by the contemporary chieftains of Canaan. The chiefs of the tribes who peopled the oasis of the Jordan had been subdued in a previous irruption of northern warriors, and for twelve years had been the tributaries of Chedorlaomer, king of Elam. Their rebellion brought down upon Palestine and the neighboring countries a fresh flood of invaders from the N. E., who swept through the regions E. of the Jordan, and, returning, joined battle with the revolted chieftains in the vale of Siddim. The king of Sodom and his confederates were defeated, their cities plundered, and a host of captives accompanied the victorious army of Chedorlaomer. Among them were Lot and his family. Abram, then confederate with Mamre the Amorite and his brethren, heard the tidings from a fugitive, and, hastily arming his trusty servants, started in pursuit. He followed the track of the conquerors to Dan, and in a night-attack completely routed their host, and checked for a time the stream of northern immigration. The captives and plunder were all recovered, and Abram was greeted on his return by the king of Sodom, and by MELCHIZEDEK, king of Salem, priest of the Most High God, who blessed the patriarch, and received from him a tenth of the spoil. In this episode, Abram "the HEBREW" (xiv. 13), appears as a powerful emir with numerous retainers, living on terms of equality with others like himself, who were anxious to court the friendship of so formidable an ally, and combining with the peaceful habits of a pastoral life the same capability for warfare which is characteristic of the Arab race. With great dignity he refuses to enrich himself by the results of his victory, and claims only a share of the booty for his Amorite confederates to whom he apparently extends his protection in return for permission to reside in their territory (Gen. xiv.).—During his residence at Hebron, and apparently while apprehending the vengeance of the powerful king of Elam, the thrice-repeated promise that his descendants should become a mighty nation and possess the land in which he was a stranger, was confirmed with all the solemnity of a religious ceremony. A deep sleep fell upon Abram, and in the horror of great darkness which shrouded him as he watched the sacrifices, the future destinies of his race were symbolized and revealed with greater distinctness than heretofore. Each revelation acquired greater definiteness than the preceding. He is now assured that, though childless, the heir of his wealth and the inheritor of his blessing shall be no adopted stranger, but the issue of his own loins. Ten years had passed since, in obedience to the divine command, he had left his father's house, and the fulfilment of the promise was apparently more distant than at first. But his faith was counted to him for righteousness, and when the lamp of fire had passed between the fragments of the sacrifice, Abram entered into a covenant with Jehovah (Gen. xv.). At the suggestion of Sarai, who despaired of having children of her own, he took as his concubine HAGAR, her Egyptian maid, who bare him ISHMAEL in the eighty-sixth year of his age (Gen. xvi.). But this was not the accomplishment of the promise. Thirteen years elapsed, during which Abram still dwelt in Hebron, when the last step in the revelation was made, that Sarai's son, and not Ishmael, should inherit both the temporal and spiritual blessings. The covenant was renewed, and the rite of circumcision established as its sign. This most important crisis in Abram's life is marked by the significant change of his name to Abraham, while his wife's from Sarai became SARAH. In his ninety-ninth year Abraham was circumcised, in accordance with the divine command, together with Ishmael and all the males of his household, as well the servants born in his house as those purchased from the foreigner (Gen. xvii.). The promise that Sarah should have a son was repeated in the remarkable scene described in ch. xviii. Three men stood before Abraham as he sat in his tent-door in the heat of the day. The patriarch, with true Eastern hospitality, welcomed the strangers, and bade them rest and refresh themselves. The meal ended, they foretold the birth of Isaac and went on their way to Sodom. Abraham accompanied them, and pleaded in vain with Jehovah to avert the vengeance threatened to the devoted cities of the plain (xviii. 17-33).—In remarkable contrast with Abraham's firm faith with regard to the magnificent fortunes of his posterity stands the incident which occurred during his temporary residence among the Philistines in Gerar, whither he had, for some cause, removed after the destruction of Sodom.<sup>1</sup> Sarah's beauty won the admiration of Abimelech, the king of the country; Abraham's temporizing policy produced the same results as before; and the narrative of ch. xx. is nearly a repetition of that in ch. xii. 11-20. Abimelech's dignified rebuke taught him that he was not alone in recognizing a God of justice. It is evident from Gen. xxi. 22-34, that Abraham's prosperity had at this time made him a powerful auxiliary, whom it was advisable for Abimelech to conciliate and court, and his conduct therefore evidences a singular weakness of character in one otherwise so noble and chivalrous.—At length Isaac, the long-looked-for child, was born. His birth was welcomed by all the rejoicings which could greet the advent of one whose future was of such rich promise. Sarah's jealousy, aroused by Ishmael's mockery of Isaac, which perhaps took place at the "great banquet" made by Abraham to celebrate the weaning of her son (Gen. xxi. 9), demanded that, with his mother Hagar, he should be driven out (Gen. xxi. 10). Abraham reluctantly consented, consoled by the fresh promise that Ishmael too should become a great nation. But the severest trial of his faith was yet to come. After another long period (twenty-five years, so Josephus) he receives the strange command to take Isaac, and offer him for a burnt-offering at an appointed place. Such a bidding, in direct opposition to the promptings of nature and the divine mandate against the shedding of human blood, Abraham hesitated not to obey. His faith, hitherto unshaken, supported him in this final trial, "accounting that God was able to raise up his son, even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure" (Heb. xi. 19)—probably the same faith to which our Lord refers, that God promised to be the "God of Isaac" (Gen. xvii. 19), and that he was not a "God of the dead, but of the living." The sacrifice was stayed by the angel of Jehovah, the promise of spiritual blessing for the first time repeated,<sup>1</sup> and Abraham with his son returned to Beersheba, and for a time dwelt there (Gen. xxii.). But we find him in his one hundred and thirty-seventh year again at Hebron, for there Sarah died (comp. Gen. xvii. 17 and xxiii. 1, 2), and was buried in the cave of MACHPELAH, which Abraham purchased of Ephron the Hittite, for the exorbitant price of four hundred shekels of silver. (MONEY.) The grasping character of Ephron and the generosity of Abraham are finely contrasted in Gen. xxiii. In the presence of the elders of Heth, the field of Machpelah, with the cave and trees that were in it, were made sure to Abraham: the first instance on record of a legal conveyance of property. In his one hundred and fortieth year (comp. Gen. xxi. 5 and xxv. 20), Abraham commissioned the steward of his house (ELIEZER 1) to seek a wife for Isaac from the family of his brother Nahor, binding him by the most solemn oath not to contract an alliance with the daughters of the Canaanites among whom he dwelt (Gen. xxiv.). For Abraham's marriage with Keturah and her position, see KETURAH. Her six sons, ZIMRAM, JOKSHAN, MEDAN, MIDIAN, ISHBAK, and SHUAH, became the ancestors of nomadic tribes inhabiting the countries S. and S. E. of Palestine (ARABIA). Her children, like Ishmael, were dismissed with presents, and settled in the East country during Abraham's lifetime, and Isaac was left sole heir of his father's wealth (Gen. xxv. 1-6).—Abraham lived to see the gradual accomplishment of the promise in the birth of his grandchildren Jacob and Esau, and witnessed their growth to manhood (Gen. xxv. 26). His last years appear to have been passed in tranquillity, and at the goodly age of one hundred and seventy-five he was "gathered to his people," and laid beside Sarah in the tomb of Machpelah by his sons Isaac and Ishmael (xxv. 7-10). From his intimate communion with the Almighty, Abraham is distinguished by the high title of the "friend of God" (2 Chr. xx. 7; Is. xli. 8; Jas. ii. 23); and El-Khatil, "the friend," is the appellation by which he is familiarly known in the traditions of the Arabs, who have given the same name to Hebron, the place of his residence.—The legends recorded of him are numerous. According to Josephus he taught the worship of one God to the Chaldeans, and instructed the Egyptians in astronomy and mathematics. The Greek tradition related by Nicolaus of Damascus assigns to him the conquest of that city, and makes him its king for a time (Jos. i. 7, §§ 1, 2). With the help of Ishmael he is said to have rebuilt, for the fourth time, the Kaaba over the sacred black stone of Mecca. The Rabbinical legends tell how Abraham destroyed the idols which his father made and worshipped, and how he was delivered from the fiery furnace into which he was cast by NIMROD.

Abra-ham's Bosom (Lk. xvi. 22). From the custom of reclining on couches at meals, and considering the guest who was next below the master of the house, and thus lay in his bosom, as especially privileged (MEALS), it was natural to speak of being in "Abraham's bosom" in order to convey an idea of one's enjoying the highest felicity and honor in heaven (comp. Mat. viii. 11).

Ab'ram. ABRAHAM.

Ab'rech [-rek] (Heb., prob. fr. Egyptian) = "bow the knee," A. V. (Gen. xli. 43, marg.).

Ab'sa-lom (L. fr. Heb. = father of peace). 1. Third son of David, by Maachab, daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur. He is scarcely mentioned till after David had committed his great crime (2 Sam. xi.), and then appears as the instrument by whom was fulfilled God's threat, that "evil should be raised up against him out of his own house, and that his neighbor should lie with his wives in the sight of the sun" (2 Sam. xii. 11). David's polygamy (MARRIAGE) raised up jealousies and conflicting claims between the sons of different mothers, each apparently living with a separate house and establishment (2 Sam. xiii. 8; xiv. 24; comp. 1 K. vii. 8, &c.). Absalom's sister TAMAR was violated by her half-brother Amnon (2 Sam. xiii.); but the king, though indignant at the crime, would not punish his first-born. Absalom, the natural avenger of such an outrage (comp. Gen. xxxiv.), brooded over the wrong for two years, and then invited all the princes to a sheep-shearing feast at his estate in Baal-hazor. Here he ordered his servants to murder Amnon, and then fled for safety to his grandfather's court at Geshur, where he remained for three years. David was overwhelmed by this accumulation of family sorrows, and thought it impossible to pardon or recall him. But by an artifice of Joab, a woman of Tekoah (2 Sam. xiv.), having persuaded David to prevent the avenger of blood from pursuing a young man who, she said, had slain his brother, induced David to recall Absalom from his banishment; yet David would not see Absalom for two more years, though he allowed him to live in Jerusalem. At last, wearied with delay, and perceiving that his exclusion from court interfered with the ambitious schemes which he was forming, the impetuous young man sent his servants to burn a field of corn near his own, belonging to Joab. Thereupon Joab, probably dreading some further outrage from his violence, brought him to his father, from whom he received the kiss of reconciliation. Absalom now began to prepare for rebellion, urged partly by his restless wickedness, partly perhaps by the fear lest Solomon should obtain the succession, to which he would feel himself entitled as being now David's eldest surviving son, since Chileab was probably dead. It is harder to account for his temporary success, and the imminent danger which befell so powerful a government as his father's. As David grew older he may have become less attentive to individual complaints, and to that personal administration of justice which was one of an Eastern king's chief duties. And now Absalom, by his personal beauty and the luxuriant growth of his hair (2 Sam. xiv. 23, 26), his splendid retinue (xv. 1), and many fair speeches and courtesies, "stole the hearts of the men of Israel" (xv. 2-6). Probably too the great tribe of Judah had taken some offence at David's government, perhaps from finding themselves completely merged in one united Israel; and hoped secretly for preëminence under his son. Absalom selects Hebron, the old capital of Judah (now supplanted by Jerusalem), as the scene of the outbreak; Amasa, his chief captain, and Ahithophel of Giloh his principal counsellor, are both of Judah, and after the rebellion was crushed we see signs of ill-feeling between Judah and the other tribes (xix. 41). The date of Absalom's rebellion, "after forty years," in 2 Sam. xv. 7, it seems better to consider a false reading for "four years" (Jos. vii. 9, § 1, has four years), than to interpret it of the fortieth year of David's reign. The revolt was at first completely successful; David fled over the Jordan to Mahanaim. Absalom occupied Jerusalem, and by the advice of Ahithophel took possession of David's harem, in which he had left ten concubines. This was considered to imply a formal assumption of all David's royal rights (ABNER; ADONIJAH), and was also the fulfilment of Nathan's prophecy (2 Sam. xii. 11). But Ahithophel's vigorous counsels were afterward rejected through the crafty advice of Hushai, who insinuated himself into Absalom's confidence to work his ruin, and Ahithophel himself went home to Giloh, and committed suicide (xvi., xvii.). At last, after being solemnly anointed king at Jerusalem (xix. 10), and lingering there far longer than was expedient, Absalom crossed the Jordan to attack his father, who by this time had rallied round him a considerable force, whereas, had Ahithophel's advice been followed, he would probably have been crushed at once. A decisive battle was fought in the wood of Ephraim. (EPHRAIM, THE WOOD OF.) Here Absalom's forces were totally defeated, and as he himself was escaping, his long hair was entangled in the branches of a terebinth (or oak), where he was left hanging while the mule on which he was riding ran away from under him. He was dispatched by Joab in spite of the prohibition of David, who, when he heard of his death, lamented over him in the pathetic words, "O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee! O Absalom, my son, my son!" He was buried in a great pit in the forest, and the conquerors threw stones over his grave, an old proof of bitter hostility (Josh. vii. 26). The sacred historian contrasts this dishonored burial with the tomb ("Absalom's place") which Absalom had raised in the King's dale (comp. Gen. xiv. 17) for the three sons whom he had lost (comp. 2 Sam. xviii. 18, with xiv. 27), and where he probably had intended that his own remains should be laid. Josephus (vii. 10, § 3) mentions the pillar of Absalom as two stadia ( $\frac{1}{2}$  mile) from Jerusalem. An existing monument in the valley of Jehoshaphat bears the name of the Tomb of Absalom; but the Ionic pillars round its base show that it belongs to a much later period, even if it be a tomb at all. (ABISHALOM; TAMAR 3.)—2. The father of Mattathias (1 Mc. xi. 70) and Jonathan (1 Mc. xiii. 11).

Ab'sa-lon (fr. Heb. = ABSALOM), ambassador from Judas Maccabeus and the Jews to Lysias (2 Mc. xi. 17).

• Ab'shal (Heb. 1 Chr. xix. 11, marg.) = ABISHAI.

A-bu'bus (fr. Gr.), father of the Ptolemy, who was son-in-law and murderer of Simon Maccabeus (1 Mc. xvi. 11, 15).

Ac'a-tan = HAKKATAN (1 Esd. viii. 38).

Ac'cad (Heb. band, i. e. fortress, castle, Ges.), one of the four cities in the land of Shinar, which were the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. x. 10). Its position is quite uncertain. Jerome (Onom.) states the belief of the Jews in his day that Nisibis (now Nisibin) in N. E. Mesopotamia, on the K'habour, was Accad. The theory of Rawlinson is, that "Ak-kad" was the name of the "great primitive Hamite race who inhabited Babylonia from the earliest time." He identifies the city "with a town in Lower Babylonia, called Kinzi Accad in the inscriptions, the site of which is not yet determined." Col. Taylor, Kitto, &c., place Accad, at Akker-koof, about fifty miles N.W. of Babylon, where is a remarkable ancient heap of ruins called "Nimrod's Hill."

Ac'ca-ron. EKRON.

Ac'cho [ak'ko] (Heb. sand heated by the sun, Ges.) = PTOLEMAIS in 1 Mc. and N. T., now called 'Akka, or by Europeans, St. Jean d'Acre, or Acre, the most important seaport town on the coast of Palestine, about thirty miles S. of Tyre, on a slightly projecting headland, at the northern extremity of the spacious bay formed by the bold promontory of Carmel on the opposite side. The hills, which farther N. are close to the sea-shore, recede, and leave round Accho a fertile plain about fifteen miles long and six miles broad, watered by the small river Belus (Nahr Na'

• Akko or Acre — ancient Accho or Ptolemais (from Kitto).

mdn), which discharges itself into the sea close under the walls of the town: to the S. E. is a road to the interior in the direction of Sepphoris. Accho, thus favorably placed in command of the approaches from the N., both by sea and land, has been justly termed the "key of Palestine."—In the division of Canaan, Accho fell to Asaber, but was never wrested from its original inhabitants (Judges i. 81); and hence it is reckoned by the classical writers as a Phœnician city. No further mention is made of it in the O. T., but after the dismemberment of the Macedonian empire it was the most important town on the coast. Along with the rest of Phœnicia it fell to Egypt, and was named Ptolemais, after one of the Ptolemies, probably Soter. In the wars that ensued between Syria and Egypt, it was taken by Antiochus the Great, and attached to his kingdom. When the MACCABEES established themselves in Judea, it became the base of operations against them. Simon drove his enemies back within its walls, but did not take it

(1 Mc. v. 22). When Alexander Balas claimed the Syrian throne, Demetrius offered to Jonathan the possession of Ptolemais and its district (1 Mc. x. 39). At Ptolemais Jonathan afterward had a conference with Alexander and the king of Egypt (x. 59-66), and here also he was subsequently slain (xii. 45-48). On the decay of the Syrian power, Ptolemais became independent. Ultimately it passed into the hands of the Romans, who constructed a military road along the coast, from Berytus to Sepphoris, passing through it, and elevated it to the rank of a colony. Herod's new city of Cesarea, however, far outshone it. The only notice of it in the N. T. is in connection with St. Paul's return from his third missionary journey (Acts xxi. 7). He came from Tyre to Ptolemais by sea (3), stayed one day with the Christian community here, then proceeded, probably by land, to Cesarea (8), and thence to Jerusalem (15-17). It was afterward the seat of a Christian bishopric, was a famous stronghold during the Crusades, was besieged unsuccessfully by Napoleon in 1799, and has since been twice (1832 and 1840) bombarded and laid in ruins. Few remains of antiquity are to be found in the modern town.

Ac'ces, father of John and grandfather of Eupolemus the ambassador from Judas Maccabeus to Rome (1 Mc. viii. 17).

Ac'coz (1 Esd. v. 38). HAKKOZ; KOZ.

* Ac-curs'ed. ANATHEMA; EXCOMMUNICATION.

* Ac-cu-sa'tion. JUDGE; TRIAL; WITNESS.

* Ac-cu'ser. ACCUSATION; SATAN.

Ac-el'da-ma [-sel-] (fr. Chal. = field of blood), the name given by the Jews of Jerusalem to a "field" near Jerusalem purchased by JUDAS ISCARIOT with the money received for the betrayal of Christ, and so called from his violent death (Acts i. 19). In Mat. xxvii. 8, the "field of blood" was purchased by the priests with the thirty pieces of silver, after they had been cast down by Judas, as a burial-place for strangers, the locality being well known at the time as "the POTTER'S FIELD." These accounts have been reconciled by considering "purchased" in Acts i. 18 = gave occasion to purchase, i. e. did that in consequence of which the field was purchased with the money gained by his treachery. For analogous examples in the N. T., see Mat. ii. 16, xxvii. 60; Jn. iv. 1; Acts vii. 21; Rom. xiv. 15; 1 Cor. vii. 16; 1 Tim. iv. 18, &c. The great body of Biblical critics (Kuinoel, Tholuck, Olshausen, Rbn., &c.) adopt this view (Hackett on Acts i. 18). Ecclesiastical tradition has distinguished the field for burying strangers from the place where Judas committed suicide. The traditional position of the latter has been changed at different times; the latest makes the tree of Judas stand near the summit of the "Hill of Evil Counsel" (Stl. 105, 183). It is observable, that the passage in Acts does not state where Judas fell headlong or how he came thus to fall; yet it has been generally supposed that the death took place in the field which was called Aceldama for the double reason that it was bought with the price of our Lord's blood and likewise stained with the blood of Judas. The "field of blood" or Aceldama, described by most travellers, and probably the same with that mentioned by Jerome (Onom.), is on the steep southern face of the valley of Hinnom, near its eastern end, on a narrow plateau, more than half way up the hillside. Its modern name is Hak ed-damm. It is separated by no enclosure; a few venerable olive-trees occupy part of it, and the rest is covered by a ruined square edifice, half built, half excavated, which, perhaps originally a church, was in Maundrell's time in use as a charnel-house. It was believed in the middle ages that the soil of this place rapidly consumed bodies buried in it, and, in consequence either of this or of the sanctity of the spot, great quantities of the earth were taken away; e. g. by the Pisan Crusaders in 1218 for their Campo Santo at Pisa, and by the Empress Helena for that at Rome. Besides the charnel-house above mentioned, there are several large hollows in this immediate neighborhood which may have been caused by such excavations. The formation of the hill is cretaceous, and hence favorable to the rapid decay of animal matter.

A-cha'i-a [pron. a-kay'ya as an Eng. word], (Gr., named fr. the Achaioi or Achai, one of the four ancient Greek races or tribes, said to have descended from Achæus, grandson of Hellen), in the N. T., a Roman province, which included the whole of the Peloponnesus and the greater part of Greece proper with the adjacent islands. Achaia was thus nearly coextensive with the kingdom of modern Greece. The provinces of Achaia and Macedonia comprehended the whole of Greece: hence "Macedonia and Achaia" frequently in the N. T. = all Greece (Acts xviii. 12, 27, xix. 21; Rom. xv. 26, xvi. 5 [the best MSS. here read "Asia"]; 1 Cor. xvi. 15; 2 Cor. i. 1, ix. 2, xi. 10; 1 Th. i. 7, 8). A narrow slip of country on the northern coast of Peloponnesus was originally called Achaia, the cities of which were confederated in an ancient League, which was renewed, B. C. 280, for the purpose of resisting the Macedonians. This League subsequently included other Grecian states, and became the most powerful political body in Greece; and hence the Romans applied the name of Achaia to the Peloponnesus and the S. of Greece, when they took Corinth and destroyed the League, B. C. 146. Under Augustus, B. C. 27, Achaia was assigned to the senate, and was governed by a proconsul. Tiberius, A. D. 16, took it away from the senate, and made it an imperial province governed by a procurator; but Claudius restored it to the senate. Gallio is therefore (Acts xviii. 12) correctly called the "proconsul" (A. V. "deputy") of Achaia. GREECE.

A-cha'i-eus [a-kay'e-kus] (L. fr. Gr. = of Achaia, Achaean), a Christian associated with Stephanas, &c. (1 Cor. xvi. 17, and subscription); probably born and resident in Achaia.

A'chan [kan] (Heb. troubler, = ACHAR, Gcs.), an Israelite of the tribe of Judah, who, when Jericho and all that it contained were devoted to destruction, secreted a portion of the spoil in his tent. For this sin Israel was defeated in the attack upon Ai. When Achan was taken by lot, and his guilt was manifest by his confession and the discovery of the booty, he was stoned to death with his whole family by the people in a valley between Ai and Jericho, and their remains, together with his property, were burnt. From this event the valley received the name of ACHOR. From the similarity of Achan to Achor, Joshua said to Achan, "Why hast thou troubled us? The Lord shall trouble thee this day" (Josh. vii.). Achan's family have been commonly regarded as accomplices in his sin, and therefore justly punished with him; but some regard them as involved in the punishment of Achan through the sanguinary severity of Oriental nations, from which the Israelites were by no means free.

A'char [-kar] = ACHAN (1 Chr. ii. 7).

A'chaz [-kaz] = AHAZ, king of Judah (Mat. i. 9).

Ach'bor [ak-] (Heb. mouse, Ges.) 1. Father of Baalhanan, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 38, 39; 1 Chr. i. 49).—2. Son of Michaiah; probably a court-officer of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 12, 14; Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12); = ABDON in 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20.

A-chi-ach'a-rus [-ke-ak'-], cupbearer and chief minister at the court of Sarchedonus, or Esarhaddon, king of Nineveh, and nephew to TOSRI (Tob. i. 21, 22, ii. 10, xi. 18, xiv. 10). From the mention of Aman in the last passage, it has been conjectured that Achiacharus is but the Jewish name of Mordecai; but the differences between Achiacharus and Mordecai are much more strongly marked than the resemblances.

A-chi'as [-ki-] son of Phinees; high-priest and progenitor of Esdras (2 Esd. i. 2); probably confounded with ACHIAH 2, grandson of Phinehas.

A'chim [-kim] (fr. Heb. = JACHIN), son of Sadoc, and father of Eliud, in our Lord's genealogy (Mat. i. 14).

A'chi-or [-ke-] (fr. Heb. = brother of light), a general of the Ammonites in the army of Holofernes, represented as becoming a proselyte to Judaism (Jd. v. vi. xiv.).

A'chish [-kish] (Heb. angry? Ges.; serpent master or charmer? Fü.), a Philistine king of Gath, son of Maach; called (Ps. xxxiv., title) Abimelech. DAVID twice found a refuge with him when he fled from Saul. On the first occasion, being recognized by the servants of Achish as one celebrated for his victories over the Philistines, he was alarmed for his safety, feigned madness (1 Sam. xxi. 10-13), and fled to the cave of Adullam. On a second occasion David fled to Achish with six hundred men, remained at Gath a year and four months, and received from him the town of Ziklag (xxvii.-xxix.). Whether Achish, to whom Shimei went in disobedience to the commands of Solomon (1 K. ii. 40), be the same person, is uncertain.

Ach'me-tha. ECBATANA.

A'chor [-kor] (Heb. trouble), Val'ley of, the spot at which ACHAN was stoned (Josh. vii. 24, 26), on the northern boundary of Judah (xv. 7; also Is. lxx. 10; Hos. ii. 15).

Ach'sa [ak-] (1 Chr. ii. 49) = ACHSAH.

Ach'sah [ak-] (Heb. ankle-chain, Ges.), daughter of CALEB, the son of Jephunneh. Her father promised her in marriage to whoever should take Debir. OTHNIEL, her uncle or cousin, took that city, and accordingly received the hand of Achsah as his reward. Caleb, at Achsah's request, added to her dowry the upper and lower springs as suitable to her inheritance in a south country (Josh. xv. 15-19; Judg. i. 11-15). Achsah, or ACHSA, is mentioned again as the daughter of Caleb the son of Hezron, in 1 Chr. ii. 49.

Ach'shaph [ak'shaf] (Heb. incantation, fascination, Ges.), a city of Asher, named between Beten and Alammelech (Josh. xix. 25); originally the seat of a Canaanite king (xi. 1, xii. 20); possibly the modern Kesaf, ruins (Rbn. iii. 65) on the N.W. edge of the Huleh (MEROM); more probably (so Mr. Grove) Chai'fa or Haifa, under Mt. Carmel, an important town, but not mentioned in the Scriptures, unless as Achshaph.

Ach'zib [ak-] (Hob. false, Ges.). 1. A city of Judah in the low country (VALLEY 5), named with Keilah and Maresah (Josh. xv. 44; Mic. i. 14); probably = CHEZIB and CHOZEBA. In Mic. i. 14 is a play on the name: "the houses of Achzib shall be (Heb. achzab) a lie."—2. A town of Asher (Josh. xix. 29), from which the Canaanites were not expelled (Judg. i. 31); afterward Ecdippa. It is now a-Zib, a village on the sea-shore at the mouth of the Nahr el-Kurn, two and one-third hours N. of Acre (Rbn. iii. 628). After the return from Babylon Achzib was considered by the Jews as the northern limit of the Holy Land.

Ac'l-pha [as-] (1 Esd. v. 31) = HAKUPHA.

Ac'l-tho [as-] (Jd. viii. 1); probably = ACHITOB or AHITUB.

Ac-ra-bat'ti-me. ARABATTINE; AKRABBIM.

* A'cre. In 1 Sam. xiv. 14, occurs the expression, "within as it were a half-acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough" (marg. "half a furrow of an acre of land"), and in Is. v. 10, we have "ten acres." The Heb. tsemed (here translated "acre") is literally a yoke, and as a measure of land denotes as much as a yoke of oxen can plough in a day (Ges.), i. e. probably about two-thirds of an acre. Comp. L. jugerum.

Acts of the A-pos'tles, a second 'treatise by the author of the third Gospel (LUKE). The identity of the writer of both books is shown by their great similarity in style and idiom, and the usage of particular words and compound forms. It is, at first sight, somewhat surprising that notices of the author are so entirely wanting, not only in the book itself, but also, generally, in the epistles of St. Paul, whom he must have accompanied for some years. But the habit of the apostle with regard to mentioning his companions was very various and uncertain, and no epistles were, strictly speaking, written by him while our writer was in his company, before his Roman imprisonment; for he does not seem to have joined him at Corinth (Acts xviii.), where 1st and 2d Thessalonians were written, nor to have been with him at Ephesus (xix.), whence, perhaps, Galatians was written; nor again to have wintered with him at Corinth (xx. 3) at the time of his writing Romans, and, perhaps, Galatians.—The book commences with an inscription or dedication to THEOPHILUS; but it was evidently intended for the members of the Christian Church, whether Jews or Gentiles; for its contents are of the utmost consequence to the whole Church. They are The fulfilment of the promise of the Father by the descent of the Holy Spirit, and the results of that outpouring, by the dispersion of the Gospel among Jews and Gentiles. Immediately after the Ascension, St. PETER becomes the prime actor under God in founding the Church. He is the centre of the first great group of sayings and doings. He opens the doors to Jews (ii.) and Gentiles (x.). The preparation of Saul of Tarsus for preaching the Gospel to the cultivated Gentile world, the progress, in his hand, of that work, his journeyings, preachings, and perils, his stripes and imprisonments, his testifying in Jerusalem and being brought to testify in Rome,—these are the subjects of the latter half of the book, of which the great central figure is the Apostle PAUL. Probably the book was written at Rome, A. D. 63, about two years after St. Paul's arrival there (xxviii. 30). (LUKE, GOSPEL OF). Had any considerable alteration in the apostle's circumstances taken place before the publication, it would naturally have been noticed. Besides, the arrival in Rome was an important period in the apostle's life: the quiet which succeeded it was favorable to the publication of the historical material collected in Judea, and during the various missionary journeys. Or, taking another and not less probable view, Nero was beginning to undergo that change for the worse, which disgraced the latter portion of his reign, and brought on the bitter persecution of the Christians.—The genuineness of the Acts has ever been recognized in the Church. It is mentioned (Euseb. Hist. Eccles.) among the acknowledged divine writings. It is first directly quoted in the epistles of the churches of Lyons and Vienne to those of Asia and Phrygia (A. D. 177); then repeatedly and expressly by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, &c. It was rejected by the Marcionites (cent. iii.) and Manicheans (cent. iv.) as contradicting some of their notions. In modern Germany Baur and some others have attempted to throw discredit on it; but their view has found no favor. (CANON; GOSPELS; INSPIRATION; JOHN, GOSPEL OF.)—The text of the Acts is very full of various readings; more so than any other book of the N. T. To this several causes may have contributed; e. g. attempts of copyists to assimilate the statements and expressions in this book to those in the Gospels and Epistles, to suit the views of after-times in respect to ecclesiastical order or usage, to save the dignity of the apostles, to produce verbal accordance in different accounts of the same event, &c. There are in this book an unusual number of those remarkable interpolations of considerable length, which are found in the Codex Bezae (D) and its cognates. (NEW TESTAMENT.) Bornemann has published an edition in which these interpolations are inserted in full. But, while some of them appear genuine, the greater part are unmeaning and absurd.

Ac'u-a (1 Esd. v. 30), prob. = AKKUB 3.

Ac'ub (1 Esd. v. 31), prob. = BAKBUK.

Ad'a-dah (Heb. festival, Ges.), a city in the extreme S. of Judah named with Dimonah and Kedesh (Josh. xv. 22); site unknown.

Ad'ah (Heb. ornament, beauty). 1. The first mentioned of the two wives of LAMECH 1, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen. iv. 19).—2. A Hittite, Elon's daughter, one of the three wives of Esau, mother of his first-born son Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 10 ff., 15 ff.); called BASHMEMATH in Gen. xxvi. 34.

Ad-a'l-ah [ah-da'yah] or Ad-a'l'ah (Heb. whom Jehovah has adorned). 1. Maternal grandfather of king Josiah, and native of Boscath in Judah (2 K. xxii. 1).—2. A Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph (1 Chr. vi. 41); = INDO in ver. 21.—3. A Benjamite, son of Shimhi (1 Chr. viii. 21).—4. A priest, son of Jeroham (1 Chr. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 12).—5. Ancestor of Maaseiah, captain under Jehoiada (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).—6. A son of Bani and husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 29); = JEDEUS in Esd. ix. 30.—7. A son of another Bani, or another son (descendant) of the same (see BANI 3), who had also taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 39).—8. A man of Judah, of the line of Pharez, (Neh. xi. 5); perhaps = No. 5.

Ad-a'll-a (L. form of Heb.; fr. Pers. = fire belonging to Ized, or a fire-god, Fū.), a son of Haman (Esth. ix. 8).

Adam (Heb.), the name of the first man, apparently from the ground (Heb. adamah) of which he was formed. The idea of redness of color seems to be inherent in the word. The CREATION of man was the work of the sixth day. It was with reference to him that all things were designed by the Creator. In Gen. i.-x. there appear to be three distinct histories relating more or less to the life of Adam. The 1st (i. 1.-ii. 3) records the creation; the 2d (ii. 4-iv. 26) gives an account of paradise, the original sin of man, and the immediate posterity of Adam; the 3d (v.-ix.) contains mainly the history of Noah, referring it would seem to Adam and his descendants principally in relation to that patriarch. (GENESIS.)—The Mosaic accounts declare Adam created in the image and likeness of God, which probably (so Prof. Leathes, the original author of this article) points to the Divine pattern and archetype after which man's intelligent nature was fashioned; reason, understanding, imagination, volition, &c., being attributes of God. Man alone of the animals of the earth is a spirit, created to reflect God's righteousness and truth and love, and capable of holding direct communion with him. As long as his will moved in harmony with God's will, he fulfilled the purpose of his Creator. When he refused submission to God, he broke the law of his existence and fell. Comp. Gen. ix. 6; 1 Cor. xi. 7; Jas. iii. 9, with Col. iii. 10.—The name Adam was not confined to the father of the human race, but like the Latin homo was applicable to woman as well as man; e. g. Gen. v. 1, 2, "This is the book of the 'history' (A. V. "generations") of Adam in the day that God created 'Adam' (A. V. "man"), in the likeness of God made He him; male and female created He them; and blessed them, and called their name Adam in the day when they were created."—Adam was placed in a garden which the Lord God had planted "eastward in EDEN," "to dress it and to keep it" (Gen. ii.). He was permitted to eat of the fruit of every tree in the garden but one, the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil." What this was, it is impossible to say. Its name seems to indicate that it had the power of bestowing the consciousness of the difference between good and evil; in the ignorance of which man's innocence and happiness consisted. The prohibition to taste the fruit of this tree was enforced by the menace of death. Another tree was called "the tree of life." Some suppose this to have acted as a kind of medicine, and that by the continual use of it our first parents, not created immortal, were preserved from death. (Abp. Whately.) While Adam was in Eden, he exercised the power of naming animals and objects of sense, a faculty which is generally considered as indicating mature and extensive intellectual resources. There being no companion suitable for Adam, the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon him, and took one of his ribs from him, which He fashioned into a woman and brought her to the man (EVE). At this time they were both naked, without the consciousness of shame. The first man is a true man before the Fall, with the powers of a man and the innocence of a child. He is "the figure of Him that was to come," the second Adam, Christ Jesus (Rom. v. 14). By the subtlety of the SERPENT, Eve was beguiled into a violation of the command imposed upon them. She took of the fruit of the forbidden tree and gave it to her husband. Then their eyes were opened, and they knew that they were naked. The Scriptures teach that in consequence of sin Adam and all mankind suffer the death of the body as well as other manifold evil (Gen. iii. 16-19; Rom. v. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 22); yet it is a disputed point among theologians whether this death of the body, &c., which come upon all under an economy of grace and upon Jesus Christ, "the second Adam," properly constitute either wholly or in part the threatened penalty (Gen. ii. 17) of DEATH. The very prohibition to eat of the tree of life after his transgression was probably a manifestation of Divine mercy, because the greatest malediction of all would have been to have the gift of indestructible life superadded to a state of wretchedness and sin.—In the middle ages discussions were raised as to the period of Adam's sinlessness in Eden; Dante supposed Adam to have been in the earthly paradise not more than seven hours; but, of course, all this is conjectural.—Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years. (CHRONOLOGY.) His sons mentioned in Scripture are Cain, Abel, and Seth; it is implied, however, that he had other sons as well as daughters. MAN; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

Ad'ām (Heb. earth; see above; firmness, Fū.), a city on the Jordan "beside Zaretan," in the time of Joshua (Josh. iii. 16). It is not elsewhere mentioned.

Ad'a-mah (Heb. earth, Ges.), "a fenced city" of Naphtali, named between Chinnereth and Ramah (Josh. xix. 36); probably N.W. of the sea of Galilee.

Ad'a-mant, the translation of the Heb. shāmīr in Ez. iii. 9 and Zech. vii. 12. In Jer. xvii. 1, shāmīr is translated "diamond." In these three passages the word = some stone of excessive hardness, and is used metaphorically. Our English adamant is derived from the Greek, and signifies "the unconquerable," in allusion perhaps to the hard nature of the substance indicated, or because it was supposed to be indestructible by fire. The Greek writers generally apply the word to some very hard metal, perhaps steel, though they do also use it for a mineral. In English, adamant sometimes = the diamond,<sup>1</sup> but often any substance of impenetrable hardness. That some hard-cutting stone is intended in the Bible is evident from Jer. xvii. 1:—"The sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond." Since the Hebrews appear to have been unacquainted with the true diamond, it is very probable from Ez. iii. 9 ("adamant harder than flint"), that shāmīr = some variety of corundum, a mineral inferior only to the diamond in hardness. Of this mineral there are two principal groups—the crystalline and the granular; to the crystalline varieties belong the indigo-blue sapphire, the red oriental ruby, the yellow oriental topaz, the green oriental emerald, the violet oriental amethyst, the brown adamantine spar. But the shāmīr or "adamant" of the Scriptures most probably = the granular or massive variety of corundum, known by the name of emery, and extensively used for polishing and cutting gems and other hard substances. The Greek name for the emery-stone or the emery-powder is amyrin or amiris, and the Hebrew lexicographers derive this word from the Hebrew shāmīr. SHAMIR; THORNS.

Ad'a-mi (Heb. human, Ges.), a place on the border of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33); connected by some with the next name (NĒKEB); called in the post-biblical times Damin.

Ad'ar (Heb. Addar = height, top, Fū.), a place on the southern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 3); = HAZAR-ADDAR.

Ad'ar. MONTH.

Ad'a-sa (Gr. = HADASHA, Wr.), a place in Judea, a day's journey from Gazera, and thirty stadia from Bethhoron (Jos. xii. 10, § 5). Here Judas Maccabeus encamped before the battle in which Nicanor was killed (1 Mc. vii. 40, 45).

Ad'be-el (Heb. miracle of God? Ges.), a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chr. i. 29), and probably the progenitor of an Arab tribe.

Ad'dan (Heb. strong, Fū.), a place from which some of the captivity returned with Zerubbabel who could not show their pedigree as Israelites (Ezr. ii. 59); = ADDON (Neb. vii. 61) and AALAR (1 Esd. v. 36). EDEN 2.

Ad'dar (Heb. mighty one, lord, Fu.), son of Bela (1 Chr. viii. 3). ARD.

Ad'der. This is used in the A. V. as the representative of four Hebrew names of poisonous serpents, viz., 'achshub, pelhen, teepha' or triph'oni, and shephiphon. The word "adder" occurs five times in the text of the A. V., viz., Gen. xlix. 17 (marg. arrow-snake); Ps. lviii. 4 (marg. asp), xci. 13 (marg. asp), cxl. 3; Prov. xxiii. 32 (marg. cockatrice);—and three times in the margin, with cockatrice in the text, viz., Is. xi. 8, xiv. 29, lix. 5.—1. 'Achshub is found only in Ps. cxl. 3: "They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adder's poison is under their lips." "Asp" is used in the quotation of this from the LXX. in Rom. iii. 13. The poison of venomous serpents is often employed by the sacred writers figuratively to express the evil tempers of ungodly men. The Jews were probably acquainted with only five or six species of poisonous serpents (SERPENT); and as Pelhen and Shephiphon were probably the Egyptian Cobra and the Horned Viper, 'Achshub may be the Toxica of Egypt and northern Africa, called by naturalists the Echis arenicola. At any rate the Jews were probably acquainted with this species, which is common in Egypt and probably in Syria.—2. Pelhen. (ASP.)—3. Teepha, or Triph'oni, occurs five times in the Hebrew Bible. In Prov. xxiii. 32, it is translated adder (marg. cockatrice), and in the text (see above) of Is. xi. 8, xiv. 29, lix. 5; Jer. viii. 17, it is translated cockatrice. From Jeremiah we learn that it was of a hostile nature, and from the parallelism of Is. xi. 8, it appears that it was considered even more dreadful than the Pelhen. Bochart makes Triph'oni = the Basilisk of the Greeks (the representative of Pelhen [ASP] used by the LXX. in Ps. xci. 13), which was supposed to destroy life, burn up grass, and break stones by the pernicious influence of its breath. Possibly the Triph'onis may be the Algerine adder (Clotho mauritanica), but this is mere conjecture.—4. Shephiphon occurs only in Gen. xlix. 17: "Dan shall be a serpent by the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse-heels, so that his rider shall fall backward." The habit of lurking in the sand and biting at the horse's heels, here alluded to, suits the character of a well-known species of venomous snake, and helps us to identify it with the celebrated horned viper, the asp of Cleopatra (Cerastes Hasselquistii), which is found abundantly in the dry sandy deserts of Egypt, Syria, and Arabia. The Cerastes is extremely venomous; Bruce compelled one to scratch eighteen pigeons upon the thigh as quickly as possible, and they all died nearly in the same interval of time. The species averages from twelve to fifteen inches in length, but is occasionally found larger.

Ad'di (Gr., prob. fr. Heb. = ornament). 1. Son of Cosani, and father of Melchi, in our Lord's genealogy (Lk. iii. 28); probably contracted from ADIEL or ADAIAH.—2. The name occurs in a very corrupt verse (1 Esd. ix. 31); comp. Ezr. x. 30.

Ad'do = INDO (1 Esd. vi. 1).

Ad'don (Heb. strong, Fū.) = ADDAN.

Ad'dus (L. fr. Gr.). 1. Ancestor of a family enumerated among the children of Solomon's servants in 1 Esd. v. 34; not in Ezr. ii. or Neh. vii.—2. Ancestor of a family removed from their priesthood in Ezra's time for being unable to establish their priestly genealogy (1 Esd. v. 38). He is there said to have married Augia, daughter of Berzelus, or Barzillai. In Ezra and Nehemiah he is called BARZILLAI.

Ad'er (Heb. EDER = flock, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Chr. viii. 15).

Ad'da (Gr. fr. Heb.), a town on an eminence overlooking the low country of Judah, fortified by Simon Maccabeus in his wars with Tryphon (1 Mc. xii. 38, xiii. 13); probably = HADID and ADITHAIM.

Ad'del (Heb. = ornament of God, Ges.). 1. A prince of Simeon, participant in the murderous raid upon the shepherds of Gedor in the reign of Hezekiah (1 Chr. iv. 36).—2. A priest, ancestor of Maasai (1 Chr. ix. 12).—3. Ancestor of Azmaveth, David's treasurer (1 Chr. xxvii. 25).

Ad'din (Heb. effeminate, voluptuous, Ges.), ancestor of a family of whom 454 (Ezr. ii. 15), or 655 (Neh. vii. 20), returned with Zerubbabel, and 51 with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 6). They (or one of this name) joined with Nehemiah in a covenant to separate themselves from the heathen (Neh. x. 16).

Ad'dna (Heb. slender, pliant, Ges.; a luxurious, effeminate one, Fū.), a Reubenite chief, one of David's captains beyond the Jordan (1 Chr. xi. 42). According to the A. V. and the Syriac he had the command of thirty men; but the passage should be rendered "and over him were thirty," i. e. the thirty before enumerated were his superiors, just as Benaiah (1 Chr. xxvii.) was "above the thirty."

Ad'd-ne (Heb. = ADINA, Fū.) the Ez'rite, 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. EZNITE; JASHOBEAM.

Ad'd-nus = JAMIN, the Levite (1 Esd. ix. 48).

Ad-d-tha'im (Heb. double ornament, Ges.), a city of Judah, in the low country (VALLEY 5); named, between Sharaïm and Gederah, in Josh. xv. 36 only; probably = HADID and ADIDA.

Ad-ju-ra'tion. EXORCISM; OATH.

Ad'lai (Heb. God's justice, Ges.), ancestor of Shaphat, David's herdsman (1 Chr. xxvii. 29).

Ad'mah (Heb. earth, Ges.; fortress, Fū.), one of the "cities of the plain," always coupled with Zebaim (Gen. x. 19, xiv. 2, 8; Deut. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8). It had a king of its own. SONOM.

Ad'ma-tha or Ad-ma'tha (Heb. fr. Pers. = given by the Highest Being, Fū.), one of the seven princes of Persia (Esth. i. 14).

Ad'na (Heb. pleasure, Ges.). 1. One of the family of Pahath-Moab who married a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 30).—2. A priest, descendant of Harim in the days of high-priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 15).

Ad'nah (Heb. pleasure, Ges.). 1. A Manassite captain who deserted from Saul and joined David on his road to Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 20).—2. The captain over 800,000 men of Judah in Jehoshaphat's army (2 Chr. xvii. 14).

* Ad-do'nal (Heb. pl. of excellence) = LORD.

Ad-don-i-be'zek (Heb. lord of Bezek), the Canaanite king of BEZEK, vanquished by the tribe of Judah (Judg. i. 3-7), who cut off his thumbs and great toes, and brought him prisoner to Jerusalem, where he died. He confessed that he had inflicted the same cruelty upon seventy conquered kings.

Ad-o-ni'jah (fr. Heb., my Lord is Jehovah). 1. The fourth son of David, by Hagith, born at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 4). On the death of his three brothers, Amnon, Chileab, and Absalom, he became eldest son; and when his father was visibly declining, put forward his pretensions to the crown. David had promised Bath-sheba in accordance with the appointment of Jehovah (1 Chr. xxii. 9, 10, xxviii. 5) that Solomon should inherit the succession (1 K. i. 30). Adonijah's cause was espoused by Abiathar and Joab, with many captains of the royal army belonging to the tribe of Judah (comp. 1 K. i. 9 and 25); and these, with all the princes except Solomon, were entertained by Adonijah at a great sacrificial feast held "by the stone ZOHELETH, which is by EN-ROGEL." Nathan and Bath-sheba apprised David of these proceedings, who immediately gave orders that Solomon should be conducted on the royal mule in solemn procession to GHION 2. Here he was anointed and proclaimed king by Zadok, and joyfully recognized by the people. This decisive measure struck terror into the opposite party, and Adonijah fled to the sanctuary, but was pardoned by Solomon on condition that he should "show himself a worthy man," with the threat that "if wickedness were found in him he should die" (i. 52). The death of David quickly followed; and Adonijah begged BATH-SHEBA (QUEEN) to procure Solomon's consent to his marriage with ABISHAG (1 K. i. 3). This was regarded as a fresh attempt on the throne (ABSALOM; ABNER); and therefore Solomon ordered him to be put to death by Benaiah, in accordance with the terms of his previous pardon.—2. A Levite in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 8).—3. A chief who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 16); according to Ges., &c. = ADONIKAM.

Ad-o-ni'kam (Heb. lord of the enemy, Ges.; lord is assisting, Fū.), ancestor of a family of whom 666 or 667 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 13; Neh. vii. 18; 1 Esd. v. 14), others with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 13; 1 Esd. viii. 39); = (so Ges., &c.) ADONIJAH 3.

Ad-o-ni'ram (Heb. lord of altitude, Ges.), by contraction ADORAM, also HADORAM, chief receiver of the tribute during the reigns of David (2 Sam. xx. 24), Solomon (1 K. iv. 6), and Rehoboam (1 K. xii. 18; 2 Chr. xii. 18). This last monarch sent him to collect the tribute from the rebellious Israelites, who stoned him to death.

Ad-don-i-be'zek (Heb. lord of justice), the Amorite king of Jerusalem, who with four other Amorite kings having laid siege to Gibeon, Joshua marched to the relief of his new allies and put the besiegers to flight. The five kings took refuge in a cave at MAK-KEDAH, whence they were taken and slain, their bodies hung on trees, and then buried in the cave (Josh. x. 1-27).

A-dop'tion, an expression metaphorically used by St. Paul in reference to the present and prospective privileges of Christians (Rom. viii. 15, 23; Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 5). He probably alludes to the Roman custom of adoption, by which a person, not having children of his own, might adopt as his son one born of other parents. By it the adopted child was entitled to the name and sacred rites of his new father, and ranked as his heir-at-law: while the adopter was entitled to the property of the son, and exercised toward him all the rights and privileges of a father. In short, the relationship was to all intents and purposes the same as between a real father and son. The selection of a person to be adopted implied a decided preference and love on the part of the adopter: and St. Paul aptly transfers the well-known feelings and customs connected with the act to illustrate the position of the Christianized Jew or Gentile. The Jews themselves had no process of adoption (ESTHER; MOSES): indeed, it would have been inconsistent with the regulations of the Mosaic law affecting the inheritance of property: the instances occasionally adduced as referring to the custom (Gen. xv. 3, xvi. 2, xxx. 5-9) are evidently not cases of adoption proper.

A-de'ra (Gr.), or A'der (L.). ADORAIM.

Ad-o-ra'im (Heb. two mounds, Ges.), a fortified city built by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 9), in Judah, apparently in or near the low country (VALLEY 5), since it is by Josephus almost uniformly coupled with Maresah; probably = Adora or Ador (1 Mc. xiii. 20), unless that be Dor, on the sea-coast below Carmel. Robinson (ii. 215) identifies it with Dura, a large village on a rising ground, 2½ hours W. of Hebron.

A-ds'ram. ADONIRAM.

Ad-o-ra'tion. The acts and postures by which the Hebrews expressed adoration were similar to those still in use among Oriental nations. To rise up and suddenly prostrate the body was the most simple method; but generally the prostration was more formal, the person falling upon the knee and then gradually inclining the body until the forehead touched the ground. Such prostration was usual in the worship of Jehovah (Gen. xvii. 3; Ps. xcv. 6); it was also the formal mode of receiving visitors (Gen. xviii. 2), of doing obeisance to superiors (2 Sam. xiv. 4), and of showing respect to equals (1 K. ii. 19). Occasionally it was repeated three times (1 Sam. xx. 41), and even seven times (Gen. xxxiii. 3). It was accompanied by such acts as a kiss (Ex. xviii. 7), laying hold of the knees or feet of the person to whom the adoration was paid (Mat. xxviii. 9), and kissing the ground on which he stood (Ps. lxxii. 9; Mic. vii. 17). Similar adoration was paid to idols (1 K. xix. 18): sometimes, however, prostration was omitted, and the act consisted simply in kissing the hand to the object of reverence (Job xxxi. 27), and in kissing the statue itself (Hos. xiii. 2). The same customs prevailed in our Saviour's time, as appears not only from their being often practised toward Himself, but also from the parable of the unmerciful servant (Mat. xviii. 26), and from Cornelius's reverence to St. Peter (Acts x. 25), to which the apostle objected, as implying too great honor, especially as coming from a Roman, to whom prostration was not usual. A-dram'me-lech [-lek] (Heb.). 1. An idol worshipped in Samaria by the colonists from Sefarvaim (2 K. xvii. 31) with rites resembling those of Moloch, children being burnt in his honor. Gesenius explains Adrammelech as from Hebrew eder hammelech = splendor of the king. Reland makes the word = fire-king, and regards Adrammelech as the sun-god. Sir H. Rawlinson regards Adrammelech as the male power of the sun, and ANAMMELECH, mentioned with Adrammelech as a companion-god, as the female power of the sun.—2. Son of the Assyrian king Sennacherib, whom Adrammelech, in conjunction with his brother Sharezer, murdered in the temple of Nisroch at Nineveh, after the failure of the Assyrian attack on Jerusalem. The parricides escaped into Armenia (2 K. xix. 37; 2 Chr. xxxii. 21; Is. xxxvii. 38).

Ad-ra-myt'ti-um [ad-dra-mit'te-um] (fr. Gr.; said to have been named from Adramys, brother of Cræsus, king of Lydia), a seaport in the province of ASIA, in the district anciently called Æolis, and also Mysia (see Acts xvi. 7). Adramyttium gave name to a deep gulf on this coast, opposite to the opening of which is the island of Lesbos. (MITTLENE.) St. Paul was never at Adramyttium, except perhaps during his second missionary journey, on his way from Galatia to Troas (Acts xvi.); but his voyage from Cesarea was in a ship belonging to this place (Acts xxvii. 2). Adramyttium was in St. Paul's time a Roman assize-town, and a place of considerable traffic, on the great Roman road between Assos, Troas, and the Hellespont on one side, and Pergamus, Ephesus, and Miletus on the other, and connected by similar roads with the interior of the country. The modern Adramyti is a poor village, but a place of some trade and ship-building.

A'dri-a, more properly A'dri-as (Gr.), probably derived from the town of Adria, near the Po, at first denoted the part of the gulf of Venice which is in that neighborhood, afterward the whole of that gulf. Subsequently it obtained a much wider extension, and in the apostolic age denoted that natural division of the Mediterranean which Humboldt names the Syrtic basin (see Acts xxvii. 17), and which had the coasts of Sicily, Italy, Greece, and Africa for its boundaries. This definition is explicitly given by almost a contemporary of St. Paul, the geographer Ptolemy, who also says that Crete is bounded on the W. by Adria. Later writers state that Malta divides the Adriatic sea from the Tyrrhenian sea, and the isthmus of Corinth the Ægean from the Adriatic. Thus the ship in which Josephus started for Italy about the time of St. Paul's voyage foundered in Adria (Life, 3), and there he was picked up by a ship from Cyrene and taken to Puteoli (see Acts xxviii. 13). The apostle also thus passed through Adria (Acts xxvii. 27) before his shipwreck at Malta.

A'dri-el (Heb. flock of God, Ges.), son of Barzillai the Meholathite, to whom Saul gave his daughter Merab, previously promised to David (1 Sam. xviii. 19). His five sons were among the seven descendants of Saul whom David surrendered to the Gibeonites (2 Sam. xxi. 8). RIZPAH.

Ad'-el (fr. Gr. = ADIEL), an ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1).

A-dul'am (Heb. justice of the people, Sim., Ges.), in the Apocrypha ODOLLAM, a city of Judah in the lowland (VALLEY 5; Josh. xv. 35; comp. Gen. xxxviii. 1, "Judah went down," and Mic. i. 15, where it is named with Maresah and Achzib); the seat of a Canaanite king (Josh. xii. 15), and evidently a place of great antiquity (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12, 20); fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 7), reoccupied by the Jews after their return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 30), and still a city in the time of the Maccabees (2 Mc. xii. 38).—The city of Adullam may have been near Deir Dabbân, five or six miles N. of Eleutheropolis. The limestone cliffs of the whole of that locality are pierced with extensive excavations, some one of which (so Mr. Grove, with Stl., V. de V., &c.) may have been the "cave of Adullam," the refuge of David (1 Sam. xxii. 1; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13; 1 Chr. xi. 15). Monastic tradition (with which Kit., Fbn., Bonar, Ayre, Thn., &c., coincide) places the cave of Adullam at Khureitûn, where is an immense natural cavern in the side of a precipice, about two hours S. E. of Bethlehem (Rbn. i. 481).

A-dul'ter-y. The parties to this crime were a married woman and a man who was not her husband. The toleration of polygamy, indeed, renders it nearly impossible to make criminal a similar offence committed by a married man with a woman not his wife. In the patriarchal period the sanctity of marriage is noticeable from Abraham's fear, not that his wife will be seduced from him, but that he may be killed for her sake, and especially from the scruples ascribed to Pharaoh and Abimelech (Gen. xii., xx.). The woman's punishment, as commonly among Eastern nations, was no doubt capital, and probably death by fire (xxxviii. 24). The Mosaic penalty was that both the guilty parties should be stoned, and it applied as well to the betrothed as to the married woman, provided she were free (Deut. xxii. 22-24). A bondwoman so offending was to be scourged, and the man was to make a trespass offering (Lev. xix. 20-22; PUNISHMENTS).—The system of inheritances, on which the polity of Moses was based, was threatened with confusion by the doubtful offspring caused by this crime, and this secured popular sympathy on the side of morality until a far advanced stage of corruption was reached. Probably, when that territorial basis of polity passed away—as it did after the captivity—and when the marriage tie became a looser bond, public feeling in regard to adultery changed, and the penalty of death was seldom or never inflicted. Thus, in the case of the woman brought to our Lord (Jn. viii. 3-11), it is likely that no one then thought of stoning her in fact, though there remained the written law ready for the cavalier. It is likely also that a divorce, in which the adulteress lost her dower and rights of maintenance, &c., was the usual remedy, suggested by a wish to avoid scandal and the excitement of commiseration for crime. The expression (Mat. i. 19) "to make her a public example," probably means to bring the case before the local Sanhedrim, which was the usual course, but which Joseph did not propose to take, preferring repudiation, because that could be managed privately.—Concerning the famous trial by the WATER OF JEALOUSY (Num. v. 11-31), it has been questioned whether a husband was, in case of certain facts, bound to adopt it. The more likely view is, that it was meant as a relief to the vehemence of Oriental jealousy (so Mr. Hayman). The ancient strictness of the nuptial tie gave room for intense feeling: and in that intensity probably arose this strange custom, which no doubt Moses found prevailing, and which is said to be paralleled by a form of ordeal called the "red water" in western Africa. The forms of Hebrew justice (see Talmud) all tended to limit the application of this test. 1. By prescribing certain facts presumptive of guilt, to be established on oath by two witnesses. 2. By technical rules of evidence which made proof of those presumptive facts difficult. 3. By exempting certain large classes of women (all indeed, except a pure Israelitess married to a pure Israelite, and some even of them) from the liability. 4. By providing that the trial could only be before the great Sanhedrim. 5. By investing it with a ceremonial at once humiliating and intimidating, yet which still harmonized with the spirit of the whole ordeal in Num. v. But, 6. Above all, by the conventional and even mercenary light in which the nuptial contract was latterly regarded.—When adultery ceased to be capital, as no doubt it did, and divorce became a matter of mere convenience, this trial was doubtless discontinued. And when adultery became common, as the Jews themselves confess, it would have been impious to expect the miracle which it supposed. If ever the Sanhedrim were constrained to adopt this trial, no doubt every effort was used, nay, was prescribed to overawe the culprit and induce confession. Besides, however, the intimidation of the woman, the man was likely to be repelled from the public exposure of his suspicions. Divorce was a ready and quiet remedy.—Adultery is also used in the Scriptures in a wider sense to include fornication and all lewdness (Ex. xx. 14; Mat. v. 27, 28; 2 Pet. ii. 14), and often figuratively to denote unfaithfulness to covenant obligations toward God, or IDOLATRY, apostasy, &c. (Jer. iii. 8, 9, comp. 20; Ez. xxiii. 37; Rev. ii. 22, &c.). CONCUBINE; DIVORCE; HARLOT; MARRIAGE.

A-dum'mim, the go'ing up to or of (Heb. ma'alêh 'adummin = the pass of the red); a landmark of the boundary of Benjamin, a rising ground or pass "over against Gilgal," and "on the S. side of the 'torrent'" (Josh. xv. 7, xviii. 17), where is still the road leading up from Jericho and the Jordan to Jerusalem, on the southern face of the gorge of the Wady Kelt. Jerome (Onom.) ascribes the name to the blood shed there by the robbers who infested the pass in his day, as they do still, and as they did in the days of our Lord, of whose parable of the Good Samaritan this is the scene. But the name is probably derived from some ancient tribe of "red men" in the country.

* Ad ver-sa-ry. SATAN; TRIAL; WAR.

* Ad vo-cate (Gr. paraklōtos = called to one's aid, assisting; hence an advocate, a comforter, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) = one who pleads another's cause before a judge; applied to Jesus Christ (1 Jn. ii. 1; JUDGE; TRIAL). The same Greek word is also applied to the Holy Ghost, and translated "Comforter." SPIRIT, THE HOLY.

A-e-di-as (1 Esd. ix. 27), probably a corruption of ELIAH.

* Egypt [ee'jipt] = EGYPT.

Ene-as [ee ne-as; in L. pron. ee-nee'as] = ENEAS.

Enon [ee'non] = ENON.

Era [ee'ra], now written ERA. CHRONOLOGY.

E-thi-o-pi-a [ee-the-o'pe-a] = ETHIOPIA.

Ag-a-bi (1 Esd. v. 30) = HAGAB.

Ag-a-bus (L. fr. Heb. = locust, Drusius; fr. Heb. = to love, Grotius, &c.), a Christian prophet in the apostolic age (Acts xi. 28, xxi. 10). He predicted (Acts xi. 28) a famine in the reign of CLAUDIUS "throughout all the world." This expression may take a narrower or a wider sense, either of which confirms the prediction. As Greek and Roman writers used "the world" of the Greek and the Roman world, so a Jewish writer could use it naturally of the Jewish world or Palestine. Ancient writers give no account of any universal famine in the reign of Claudius, but they speak of several severe famines in particular countries. Josephus (xx. 2, § 5, and 5, § 2) mentions one at that time in Judea, which swept away many of the inhabitants. This probably is the famine to which Agabus refers. It took place (Jos. xx. 5, § 2) when Cuspius Fadus and Tiberius Alexander were procurators; i. e. it may have begun about the close of A. D. 44, and lasted three or four years. Fadus was sent into Judea on the death of Agrippa, which occurred A. D. 44. If we attach the wider sense to "world," the prediction may be of a famine throughout the Roman empire during the reign of Claudius (the year is not specified), not necessarily in all parts at the same time. We find mention of three other famines during this reign: one in Greece, and two in Rome.

Agag (Heb. fr. Ar. root = to burn, Ges.), possibly the title of the kings of Amalek, like Pharaoh of Egypt. One king of this name is mentioned in Num. xxiv. 7, and another in 1 Sam. xv. The latter Saul spared with the best of the spoil, although the Amalekites were by divine command to be extirpated (Ex. xvii. 14; Deut. xxv. 17-19). For this disobedience SAMUEL was commissioned to declare to Saul his rejection, and he himself sent for Agag and cut him in pieces. Haman is called the AGAGRE (Esth. iii. 1, 10, viii. 3, 5). The Jews considered Haman a descendant of Agag, the Amalekite, and hence account for his hatred to their race.

* Ag-ag-lte. AGAG.

Agar = HAGAR.

Ag-gar-ene's [ay-gar-eenz'] (Bar. iii. 23) = HAGARENES.

Ag-ate is mentioned four times in the A. V. (Ex. xxxviii. 19, xxxix. 12; Is. liv. 12; Ez. xxvii. 16). In Ex. where the Heb. word shēbō is used to denote the second stone in the third row of the high-priest's breastplate, commentators are generally agreed that agate is intended; in Isaiah and Ezekiel the Heb. word is cadōd, probably = the ruby (Ges.). In Ez. xxvii. 16, where the text has agate, the margin has chryso-prase. Our English agate derives its name from the river Achates, in Sicily, on the banks of which, according to Theophrastus and Pliny, it was first found; but as agates are met with in almost every country, this stone was doubtless from the earliest times known to the Orientals. It is a variety of quartz with stripes or bands of different colors or shades, and is met with generally in rounded nodules, or in veins in trap-rocks; specimens are often found on the sea-shore, and in the beds of streams, the rocks in which they had been embedded having been decomposed by the elements, when the agates have dropped out.

Age, Old. (For distinctions or exemptions on account of age, see Lev. xxvii. 7; Num. viii. 25.) In early stages of civilization, when experience is the only source of practical knowledge, old age has its special value and honors. Besides, the Jew was taught to consider old age as a reward for piety, and a token of God's favor. In private life the aged were looked up to as the depositaries of knowledge (Job. xv. 10): the young rose up in their presence (Lev. xix. 32): they gave their opinion first (Job xxxii. 4): gray hairs were a "crown of glory" and the "beauty of old men" (Prov. xvi. 31, xx. 29). The attainment of old age was regarded as a special blessing (Job v. 26), not only on account of the prolonged enjoyment of life to the individual, but also because it indicated peaceful and prosperous times (Zech. viii. 4; 1 Mc. xiv. 9; Is. lxv. 20). In public affairs age carried weight with it, especially in the infancy of the state: under Moses the old men or elders acted as the representatives of the people in all matters of difficulty and deliberation, and thus became a class, the title gradually ceasing to convey the notion of age, and being used in an official sense, like the L. Patres (= Fathers, the official title of Roman senators), Senatores (= senators, fr. senex = old), &c. (CONGREGATION; ELDER.) On the description of old age in Eccl. xii. 1-7, see under MEDICINE.

Ag-gee [g as in get] (Heb. fugitive, Ges.), a Hararite, father of SHAMMAH 3 (2 Sam. xxiii. 11).

Ag-g'e-us [g as in get] (1 Esd. vi. 1, vii. 3; 2 Esd. i. 40) = HAGGAI.

* Ag-o-ny (fr. Gr., lit. a contest, struggle for victory, L. & S.), used in 2 Mc. iii. 14, 16, 21, and Lk. xxii. 44, to denote an inward struggle or conflict, extreme mental anguish. GETHSEMANE; JESUS CHRIST; SWEAT, BLOODY.

Ag-ri-cul-ture. This, though prominent in the lives of Adam, Cain, and Noah, was little cared for by the patriarchs; more so, however, by Isaac and Jacob than by Abraham (Gen. xxvi. 12, xxxvii. 7), in whose time, probably, if we except the lower Jordan valley (xiii. 10), there was little regular culture in Canaan. Thus in Gerar and Shechem pastoral wealth apparently predominated (xxxiv. 28). The herdmen strove with Isaac about his wells; about his crops there was no contention (xxvi. 12-22). In Joshua's time (Num. xiii. 23, 24), Canaan was in a much more advanced agricultural state than when Jacob left it (Deut. viii. 8), resulting probably from the severe experience of famines, and the example of Egypt, to which its people were thus led. The pastoral life kept the sacred family distinct from mixture and locally unattached, especially in Egypt.

Afterward agriculture became the basis of the Mosiac commonwealth. It tended to check not only the contaminating influence of foreign nations, which commerce would have favored, but also the freebooting and nomad life, and made a numerous offspring profitable, as it was already honorable by natural sentiment and by law. Taken in connection with the inalienable character of inheritances (HEIR), it gave each man and each family a stake in the soil and nurtured a hardy patriotism. Every family felt its own life with intense keenness, and had its divine tenure to guard from alienation (Lev. xxv. 23). The prohibition of culture in the SABBATICAL YEAR formed, under this aspect, a kind of rent reserved by the Divine Owner. Landmarks were sacred (Deut. xix. 14), and the heritage reverted to the owner in the year of jubilee. (JUBILEE, YEAR OF.)—Agricultural Calendar.—The Jewish calendar, as fixed by the three great FESTIVALS, turned on the seasons of green, ripe, and fully-gathered produce. The year ordinarily consisting of twelve months (MONTH) was divided into six agricultural periods as follows:—

I. SOWING TIME.
Tiari, latter half	{ beginning about autumnal equinox }	} Early rain due.
Marcheshvan
Chisleu, former half
II. UNRIPE TIME.
Chisleu, latter half Tebeth
Sebat, former half
III. COLD SEASON.
Sebat, latter half	{	} Latter rain due.
Adar
(V'cadur)
Nisan, former half
IV. HARVEST TIME.
Nisan, latter half	{ Beginning about ver- nal equinox. Barley green. Passover.
Ijar.
Sivan, former half { Wheat ripe. Pentecost.
V. SUMMER.
Sivan, latter half Tammuz
Ab, former half
VI. SULTRY SEASON.
Ab, latter half
Elul
Tiari, former half		Ingathering of fruits.

Thus the six months from mid Tisri to mid Nisan were mainly occupied with the process of cultivation, and the rest with the gathering of the fruits. The ancient Hebrews had little notion of green or root-crops for fodder. BARLEY supplied food both to man and beast, and "MILLET" was grazed while green, and its ripe grain made into bread. MOWING (Am. vii. 1; Ps. lxxii. 6) and hay-making were familiar processes. (GRASS; HAY.)—Climate and Soil.—A change in the climate of Palestine, caused by increase of population and the clearance of trees, must have taken place before the period of the N. T. A further change caused by the decrease of skilled agricultural labor, e. g. in irrigation and terrace-making, has since ensued. Yet wherever industry is secure, the soil still asserts its old fertility. (For the varieties in climate, soil, surface, &c., see PALESTINE.) Timber.—The Israelites probably found in Canaan a fair proportion of woodland, which their necessities must have led them to reduce (Josh. xvii. 18; FOR-EST). But even in early times timber seems to have been far less used for building material than among Western nations. (ARCHITECTURE.) No store of wood-fuel seems to have been kept: ovens were heated with dung, hay, &c. (Ez. iv. 12, 15; Mat. vi. 30); and, in any case of sacrifice on an emergency, some source of supply is mentioned for the wood (1 Sam. vi. 14; 2 Sam. xxiv. 22; 1 K. xix. 21; comp. Gen. xxii. 3, 6, 7; BREAD; COAL; COOKING, &c.). Rain and Irrigation.—The abundance of water in Palestine, from natural sources, made Canaan a contrast to rainless Egypt (Deut. viii. 7, xi. 8–12). RAIN was commonly expected soon after the autumnal equinox or mid Tisri; and if by the first of Chisleu none had fallen, a fast was proclaimed. (DEW; FAMINE.) The peculiar Egyptian method of irrigation supposed to be alluded to in Deut. xi. 10—"where thou wateredst it with thy foot"—was not unknown, though less prevalent in Palestine. That peculiarity seems to have consisted in making in the fields square shallow beds, like our salt-pans, surrounded by a raised border of earth to keep in the water, which was then turned from one square to another by pushing aside the mud, to open one and close the next with the foot. Others (Niebuhr, Ros., &c.) think Deut. xi. 10 refers to some laborious method of raising water to the level of gardens, &c., by a machine turned by the foot. (See EGYPT.) In Palestine irrigation was essential; and for this the large extent of rocky surface, easily excavated for cisterns and ducts, was most useful. Even the plain of Jericho is watered not by canals from the Jordan, since the river lies below the land, but by rills converging from the mountains. In these features of the country lay its expansive resources to meet the wants of a multiplying population. The lightness of agricultural labor in the plains set free an abundance of hands for terracing and watering; and the result gave the highest stimulus to industry. Crops.—The cereal crops of constant mention are WHEAT and BARLEY, and more rarely RYE (?) and MILLET. The VINE, OLIVE, FIG, CUMMIN, FITCHES (?), BEANS, LENTILES, may also be named among the staple produce. To these, later writers add many garden plants, e. g. kidney-beans, peas, lettuce, endives, leeks, garlics, onions, melons, cucumbers, cabbages, &c. (GARDEN.) The produce which formed Jacob's present would keep, and had been preserved during the famine (Gen. xliii. 11; FLAX).—Ploughing and Sowing.—The plough probably was like the Egyptian, and the ploughing light, usually with one yoke of oxen. Such is still used in Asia Minor, and its parts are shown in fig. 1; a is the pole to which one of the yokes, b, is attached; c, the share; d, the handle; e represents three modes of arming the share; and f is a goad with a scraper at the other end, probably for cleaning the share. (GOAD; HARROW.) Mountains and steep places were hoed. (MATTOCK.) New ground (broken up in the spring and ploughed a second time; see Is. xxviii. 24) and fallows (Jer. iv. 3; Hos. x. 12) were cleared of stones and of thorns (Is. v. 2) early in the year, sowing or gathering from "among thorns" being a proverb for slovenly husbandry (Job v. 5; Prov. xxiv. 30, 31). Sowing often took place without previous ploughing. In highly irrigated spots the seed was trampled in by cattle (Is. xxxii. 20), as in Egypt by goats. Sometimes, however, the sowing was by patches only in well-manured spots, as in fig. 4, from Surenhusius on the Mishna. Where the soil was heavier, the ploughing was best done dry; but the formal routine of heavy Western soils was not the standard of the naturally fine tilth of Palestine generally. Seventy days before the passover was the time prescribed for or damage, is probably ancient (Ru. iii. 4, 7; Is. i. 8).—The rotation of crops, familiar to the Egyptians, was probably known to the Hebrews. Sowing a field with divers seeds was forbidden (Deut. xxii. 9), and minute directions are given by the rabbis for arranging a seeded surface with great variety, as in figs. 5, 6, yet avoiding juxtaposition of different kinds. Three furrows' interval was the prescribed margin. The blank spaces in fig. 5, a and b, represent such margins, tapering to save ground. Wide spaces were often left round vines and olive-trees, and the rest of the ground cropped, as in fig. 7. Reaping and Threshing.—The wheat, &c., was reaped by the SICKLE, or was pulled up by the roots. It was bound in sheaves or heaped, as in fig. 9. The sheaves ly were with a tower and other buildings (Num. xxii. 24; Ps. lxxx. 13; Is. v. 5; Mat. xxi. 33; comp. Judg. vi. 11). Banks of mud from ditches were also used.—Rent, &c.—A tenant might pay a fixed money rent (Cant. viii. 11), or a stipulated share of the fruits (2 Sam. ix. 10; Mat. xxi. 34), one-half, one-known spots (Gen. i. 10, 11; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 18). On these the oxen, &c., forbidden to be muzzled (Deut. xxv. 4), trampled out the grain. At a later time the Jews used a threshing sled, called morag (Is. xli. 15; 2 Sam. xxiv. 22; 1 Chr. xxi. 23), probably resembling the nôreg, still employed in Egypt—a stage with three rollers ridged with iron, which, aided by the driver's weight, crushed out, often injuring, the grain, and cut or tore the STRAW. (CHAFF.) Lighter grains were beaten out with a stick (Is. xxviii. 27). Barley was sometimes soaked and then parched before treading out, which separated the pellicle of the grain. The use of animal manure is proved frequent by such expressions as "Dung upon the face of the earth," &c. (Ps. lxxxiii. 10; 2 K. ix. 37; Jer. viii. 2, &c.; see FORKS). Winnowing.—The "shovel" and "fan" (Is. xxx. 24), the precise difference of which is doubtful, indicate the process of winnowing—an important part of ancient husbandry (Ps. i. 4, xxxv. 5; Job xxi. 18; Is. xvii. 13). Evening was the favorite time (Ru. iii. 2), when there was mostly a breeze. The "fan" (Mat. iii. 12) was perhaps a broad shovel which threw the grain up against the wind. The last process was the shaking in a sieve to separate dirt and refuse (Am. ix. 9; BARN; EGYPT; MILL).—Fields and floors were not commonly enclosed; vineyards most-

Agur (Heb. perhaps = an assembler, one of the assembly, sc. of wise men, Ges.), the son of JAKEH; an unknown Hebrew sage, who uttered or collected the sayings of wisdom recorded in Prov. xxx. Ewald attributes to him the authorship of Prov. xxx. 1-xxxi. 9, in consequence of the similarity of style exhibited in the three sections therein contained, and places him not earlier than the end of the seventh or beginning of the sixth century B. C. The Rabbins, according to Rashi, and Jerome after them, interpreted the name symbolically of Solomon, who "collected understanding" and is elsewhere called "Kohleth" (A. V. "the Preacher"). Bunsen makes Agur an inhabitant of Massa, and probably a descendant of one of the five hundred Simeonites, who drove out the Amalekites from Mt. Seir (1 Chr. iv. 42, 43). Hitzig makes him the son of the Queen of Massa and brother of Lemuel.

A'hab (Heb. father's brother, Ges.). 1. Son of Omri; seventh king of the separate kingdom of Israel (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), and second of his dynasty. The great lesson from his life (1 K. xvi.-xxii.) is the depth of wickedness into which a weak man may fall, even though not devoid of good feelings and amiable impulses, when he abandons himself to the guidance of another person, resolute, unscrupulous, and depraved. The cause of his ruin was his marriage with JEZEBEL, daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre. Ahab's reign was distinguished by the ministry of ELIJAH, who was brought into direct collision with Jezebel when she introduced into Israel on a grand scale the impure worship of BAAL and of Astarte (ASHTORETH; ASHERAH), and proceeded systematically to hunt down and put to death God's prophets (OBADIAH 10). How the worship of God was restored, and the idolatrous priests slain, in consequence of "a sore famine in Samaria," is related under ELIJAH. But heathenism and persecution were not the only crimes into which Jezebel led her yielding husband. One of his chief tastes was for splendid architecture, which he showed by building an ivory house and several cities. (HIEL; JERICHO.) The beautiful city of JEZREEL he adorned with a palace and park for his own residence, though Samaria remained the capital of his kingdom. Desiring to add to his pleasure-grounds there the vineyard of NABOTH, he proposed to buy it or give land in exchange for it; and when this was refused by Naboth, in accordance with the Mosaic law (Lev. xxv. 23), a false accusation of blasphemy was brought against him, and he and his sons were stoned to death. Elijah now declared that the entire extirpation of Ahab's house was appointed for his long course of wickedness, crowned by this atrocious crime. The execution, however, of the sentence was delayed in consequence of Ahab's humbling himself. Ahab was engaged in two defensive campaigns against Ben-hadad II., king of Damascus, and in one offensive. In the first, Ben-hadad laid siege to Samaria; and Ahab, encouraged by God's prophets, made a sudden attack on him whilst in the plenitude of arrogant confidence he was banqueting in his tent with his thirty-two vassal kings. The Syrians were totally routed, and fled to Damascus. Next year Ben-hadad, believing that his failure was owing to some peculiar power of the God of Israel over the hills, invaded Israel by way of APHEK 5. Yet Ahab's victory was so complete that Ben-hadad himself fell into his hands; but was released (contrary to the will of God as announced by a prophet) on condition of restoring all the cities of Israel which he held, and making "streets" for Ahab in Damascus; i. e. admitting into his capital permanent Hebrew officers, in an independent position, with special dwellings for themselves and their retinues, to watch over the commercial and political interests of Ahab and his subjects. A similar privilege had been exacted by Ben-hadad's predecessor from Omri in Samaria. After this great success Ahab enjoyed peace for three years, when, in conjunction with JEHOSEPHAT, king of Judah, he attacked RAMOTH IN GILEAD, which was held by the Syrians, but claimed by Ahab as belonging to Israel. But God's blessing did not rest on the expedition, and Ahab was told by the prophet MICAH that it would fail. For giving this warning Micah was imprisoned; but Ahab was led by it to disguise himself, so as not to offer a conspicuous mark to the archers of Ben-hadad. But he was slain by a "certain man who drew a bow at a venture;" and, though staid up in his chariot for a time, he died toward evening, and his army dispersed. When he was brought to be buried in Samaria, and his chariot was washed in the pool of Samaria (1 K. xxii. 37, 38), the dogs licked up his blood; a partial fulfilment of Elijah's prediction (1 K. xxi. 19), which was more literally accomplished in the case of his son (2 K. ix. 26).—2. A lying prophet, who deceived the captive Israelites in Babylon, and was burnt to death by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxix. 21).

A'ha-rah (Heb. after the brother, Ges.), third son of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 1). AHER; AHIRAM.

A-har'hel (Heb. behind the breastwork, sc. born, Ges.), ancestor of certain families of Judah, apparently descended through Coz from Ashur, the posthumous son of Hezron. The Targum of Rabbi Joseph on Chronicles identifies him with "Hur the first-born of Miriam" (1 Chr. iv. 8).

A'ha-sal (Heb. = AHAZIAH? Ges.; holder, protector, Fü.), a priest, ancestor of Amashai (Neh. xi. 18). JAHERAH.

A-has'bal (Heb. I take refuge with Jehovah, Sim., Ges.; blooming, shining, sc. Jah is, Fü.), father of Eliphelet, David's captain (2 Sam. xxiii. 34); = Ur in 1 Chr. xi. 35.

* A-hash-vo'rosh (Heb.) = AHASUERUS (Ezr. iv. 6, marg.).

A-has-u-e'rus (fr. Heb. Ahashvērōsh [see above] or Achashvērōsh = Sansc. kshatra, "king," = kshēshē in the arrow-headed inscriptions of Persepolis = Gr. Xerxes; see ARTAXERXES), the name of one Median and two Persian kings in the O. T. In the following chronological table of the Medo-Persian kings from Cyaxares to Artaxerxes Longimanus, according to their ordinary classical names, their supposed Scriptural names are added in italics by Bishop Cotton, the original author of this article:—1. Cyaxares, king of Media, and conqueror of Nineveh (son of Phraortes and grandson of Deioces), began to reign B. C. 634; = Ahasuerus. 2. Astyages (his son), last king of Media, B. C. 594; = Darius the Mede. 3. Cyrus (son of his daughter Mandane and Cambyases, a Persian noble), first king of Persia, 559; = Cyrus. 4. Cambyases (his son), 529; = Ahasuerus. 5. A Magian usurper (who personated Smerdis, younger son of Cyrus), 521; = Artaxerxes. 6. Darius Hystaspis (raised to the throne on the overthrow of the Magi), 521; = Darius. 7. Xerxes (his son), 485; = Ahasuerus. 8. Artaxerxes Longimanus (Gr. Artaxerxes Macrocheir) (his son), 495-465; = Artaxerxes.—1. In Dan. ix. 1, Ahasuerus is said to be the father of Darius the Mede. Now Cyaxares almost certainly = Ahasuerus, Grecized into Axares with the prefix Cy- or Kai-, common to the Kaianian dynasty of kings (Malcolm's Persia, ch. iii.); compare Kai Khosroo, the Persian name of Cyrus. DARIUS the Mede was probably Astyages (son of this Cyaxares), perhaps set over Babylon as viceroy by his grandson Cyrus, and allowed to live there in royal state. This first Ahasuerus, then, is Cyaxares, the conqueror of Nineveh. Accordingly Tob. xiv. 15, says that Nineveh was taken by Nabuchodonosor and Assuerus, i. e. Cyaxares.—2. In Ezr. iv. 6, the enemies of the Jews, after the death of Cyrus, desirous to frustrate the building of Jerusalem, send accusations against them to Ahasuerus, king of Persia. This must be Cambyses. For their opposition continued from the time of Cyrus to that of Darius (iv. 5), and Ahasuerus and ARTAXERXES (i. e. Cambyses and the pseudo-Smerdis) reigned between them (iv. 6–24). (But see EZRA, BOOK OF.) Xenophon calls the brother of Cambyses Tanyoxares (i. e. the younger Oxares), whence we infer that the elder Oxares or Axares, or Ahasuerus was Cambyses. His constant wars probably prevented him from interfering in the concerns of the Jews. He was plainly called after his grandfather, who was not a king, and therefore it is very likely that he also assumed the kingly name or title of Axares or Cyaxares, which had been borne by his most illustrious ancestor.—3. The Ahasuerus of Esth. i.–x. Having divorced his queen VASHTI for refusing to appear in public at a banquet, he married four years after, the Jewess ESTHER, cousin and ward of MORDECAI. Five years after this, HAMAN, having been slighted by Mordecai, prevailed upon Ahasuerus to order the destruction of all the Jews in the empire. But before the day appointed for the massacre, Esther and Mordecai destroyed Haman's influence with the king, who put Haman to death, and gave the Jews the right of self-defence. The Jews then killed several thousands of their opponents. Now, from the extent assigned to the Persian empire (Esth. i. 1), "from India even unto Ethiopia," Darius Hystaspis is the earliest king to whom this history can apply, and it is hardly worth while to consider the claims of any after Artaxerxes Longimanus. But Darius's wives were the daughters of Cyrus and Otanes, and he differs from Ahasuerus both in name and character. The character of Artaxerxes Longimanus is also very unlike that of Ahasuerus. Besides, in Ezr. vii. 1–7, 11–26, Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign, issues a decree very favorable to the Jews, and it is unlikely, therefore, that in the 12th (Esth. iii. 7), Haman could speak to him of them as if he knew nothing about them, and persuade him to sentence them to an indiscriminate massacre. Ahasuerus therefore = Xerxes (the names being identical): and this conclusion is fortified by the resemblance of character, and by certain chronological indications. As Xerxes scourged the sea, and put to death the engineers of his bridge because their work was injured by a storm, so Ahasuerus repudiated Vashti because she would not violate the decorum of her sex, and ordered the massacre of the whole Jewish people to gratify Haman. In the third year of the reign of Xerxes was held an assembly to arrange the Grecian war (Hdt. vii. 7 ff.). In the third year of Ahasuerus was held a great feast and assembly in Shushan the palace (Esth. i. 3). In the seventh year of his reign Xerxes returned defeated from Greece, and consoled himself by the pleasures of the harem (Hdt. ix. 108). In the seventh year of his reign (Esth. ii. 16) Ahasuerus replaced Vashti by marrying Esther, one of the fair young virgins sought for the king (ii. 2). The tribute he "laid upon the land and upon the isles of the sea" (x. 1) may well have been the result of the expenditure and ruin of the Grecian expedition.

A-ha'va (Heb. prob. = water, Ges.; river, stream, Fù), a place (Ezr. viii. 15), or a river (viii. 21), on the banks of which Ezra collected the second expedition which returned with him from Babylon to Jerusalem; called THEBAS in 1 Esd. viii. 41, 61. Various have been the conjectures as to its locality; but Rawlinson considers Ahava = AVA and IVAH, the modern Hid, on the Euphrates, due E. of Damascus.

A' haz (Heb. possessor; in the N. T. ACHAZ) 1. The eleventh king of Judah (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), son of Jotham, ascended the throne in his twentieth (some say twenty-fifth; see HEZEKIAH) year (2 K. xvi. 2). At his accession, Rezin, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, were leagued against Judah, and they proceeded to lay siege to Jerusalem. (TABEL.) Upon this ISAIAH gave advice and encouragement to Ahaz, and the allies failed in their attack on Jerusalem (Is. vii.–ix.). But the allies took a vast number of captives, who, however, were restored on the remonstrance of the prophet Oded; and they also inflicted a severe injury on Judah by the capture of ELATH, on the Red Sea; while the Philistines invaded the W. and S. (2 K. xvi.; 2 Chr. xxviii.). Ahaz sought deliverance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who invaded Syria, took Damascus, killed Rezin, and deprived Israel of its northern and trans-Jordanic districts. But Ahaz purchased this help at a costly price: he became tributary to Tiglath-pileser, sent him all the treasures of the Temple and his own palace, and even appeared before him in Damascus as a vassal. He also sought for safety in heathen ceremonies; making his son pass through the fire to Moloch, consulting wizards and necromancers (Is. viii. 19), sacrificing to the Syrian gods, introducing a foreign altar from Damascus, and probably the worship of the heavenly bodies from Assyria and Babylon, as he seems to have set up the horses of the sun mentioned in 2 K. xxiii. 11; and "the altars on the top (or roof) of the upper chamber of Ahaz" (2 K. xxiii. 12) were connected with the adoration of the stars. We see another and blameless result of this intercourse with an astronomical people in the "sundial of Ahaz." (Is. xxxviii. 8; DIAL.) He died after a reign of sixteen years.—2. Son of Micah the grandson of Jonathan through Merib-baal or Mephibosheth (1 Chr. viii. 35, 36, ix. 42).

A-ha-zl'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah sustains). 1. Son of AHAB and JEZEBEL, and eighth king of Israel. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) After the battle of Ramoth in Gilead the Syrians had the command of the country E. of Jordan, and cut off all communication between the Israelites and Moabites, so that the vassal king of Moab refused his yearly tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams with their wool (comp. Is. xvi. 1). Before Ahaziah could enforce his claim, he was seriously injured by a fall through a lattice in his palace at Samaria. In his health he had worshipped his mother's gods, and now he sent to inquire of the oracle of Baal-zebub in the Philistine city of Ekron whether he should recover his health. But Elijah rebuked him for this impiety, and announced to him his approaching death. He reigned two years. For his endeavor to join the king of Judah in trading to Ophir, see JEHOASHAPHAT (1 K. xxii. 49–53; 2 K. i.; 2 Chr. xx. 35–37).—2. Fifth king of Judah (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), son of JEHOASH 2 and Ahab's daughter Athaliah, and therefore nephew of Ahaziah 1. He is called AZARIAH, 2 Chr. xxii. 6, probably by a copyist's error, and JEHOAHAZ, 2 Chr. xxi. 17. 2 K. viii. 26, correctly makes him twenty-two years old at his accession, though 2 Chr. xxii. 2 has his age at that time forty-two; for (2 Chr. xxi. 5, 20) his father Jehoram was forty when he died, so that a transcriber must have made a mistake in the numbers. Ahaziah was an idolater, and allied himself with his uncle JEHORAM 2, king of Israel, against HAZAEL, the new king of Syria. The two kings were, however, defeated at RAMOTH GILEAD, where Jehoram was so severely wounded that he retired to Jezreel to be healed. The revolution carried out in Israel by JEHU under the guidance of Elisha broke out while Ahaziah was visiting his uncle at Jezreel. As Jehu approached the town, Jehoram and Ahaziah went out to meet him; but both the kings were slain. The apparent discrepancy between 2 K. ix. 27-29 and 2 Chr. xxii. 9, Keil (Comm. on 2 K. i. c.) removes thus: When Ahaziah saw Jehoram slain by Jehu, he fled first by the way to the garden-house and escaped to Samaria; but was here, where he had hid himself, taken by Jehu's men who followed him, brought to Jehu, who was still at or near Jezreel, and at his command slain at the hill Gur, beside Ibleam, in his chariot, i. e. mortally wounded with an arrow, so that he, again fleeing, expired at Megiddo; and as a corpse he was carried by his servants to Jerusalem and buried there. The account in 2 Chr. is much curtailed. Ahaziah reigned one year (2 K. viii. 26, ix. 29). The difference between 2 K. viii. 45, "in the twelfth year of Joram," and ix. 29, "in the eleventh year of Joram," is most simply explained by a different computation of the beginning of the years of his reign (Keil).

Ah'ban (Heb. brother of the wise, or brotherly, Ges.), son of Abishur of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 29).

A'her (Heb. after, next, another, Ges.), ancestor of HCSHM (1 Chr. vii. 12); by some translated "another;" not improbably = AHIRAM, AHARAH, AHOAH, EHT.

A'hi (Heb. = AHIAH, Ges.). 1. A Gadite, chief of a family in Bashan (1 Chr. v. 15). The LXX. translates Ahi "brother," the Vulgate "brethren." —2. An Asherite, son of Shamer (1 Chr. vii. 34).

A-hi'ah (fr. Heb. = brother [i. e. friend] of Jehovah, Ges.; = AHIAH). 1. Son of AHITUB 1. He was the Lord's priest in Shiloh, wearing an ephod (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18). There is a difficulty in reconciling the statement in 1 Sam. xiv. 18, concerning the ark being used for inquiring by Ahiah at Saul's bidding, and the statement that they inquired not at the ark in the days of Saul (1 Chr. xiii. 3). But all difficulty will disappear if we apply the expression in 1 Chr. xiii. 3, only to all the latter years of Saul, when the priestly establishment was at Nob, and not at Kirjath-jearim, where the ark was. The narrative in 1 Sam. xiv. is entirely favorable to the mention of the ark (comp. 2 Sam. vi. 3). (GIBEAH 2, 3, 4.) Ahiah probably = AHIMELECH the son of Ahitub. However, Ahimelech may have been, as Gesenius supposes, brother to Ahiah.—2. One of the sons of Shisha, Solomon's scribes (1 K. iv. 3).—3. Son of Bela (1 Chr. viii. 7); = AHOAH.

A-hi'am (Heb. father's brother, Ges.), one of David's thirty valiant men (2 Sam. xxiii. 33; 1 Chr. xi. 35).

A-hi'an (Heb. brotherly, Ges.), a Manassite, son of Shemidah (1 Chr. vii. 19).

A-hi-e'zer (Heb. brother of help, Ges.). 1. Son of Ammishaddai, and chieftain of Dan under Moses (Num. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66, 71, x. 25.—2. A Benja-mite chief of a body of archers that came to David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 8).

A-hi'had (Heb. brother [i. e. friend] of the Jews, Ges.). 1. Son of Shelomi, and prince of Asher; assistant in the division of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 27). —2. (Heb. brother or friend of union, Ges.). A Benjaminite, of the sons of Ehud (1 Chr. viii. 7).

A-hi'jah (fr. Heb. = AHIAH). 1. A prophet of Shiloh (1 K. xiv. 2), hence called the Shilonite (xi. 29), of whom we have two remarkable prophecies extant: the one in 1 K. xi. 31-39, addressed to JEROBOAM, announcing the rending of the ten tribes from Solomon, and the transfer of the kingdom to Jeroboam; the other in 1 K. xiv. 6-16, delivered in the prophet's extreme old age to Jeroboam's wife, in which he foretold the death of Jeroboam's sick son (ABIJAH 2), the destruction of Jeroboam's house on account of the images which he had set up, and the captivity of Israel "beyond the river" Euphrates. Jeroboam's speech concerning Ahijah (1 K. xiv. 2, 3) shows the estimation in which he held his truth and prophetic powers. In 2 Chr. ix. 29, reference is made to a record of Solomon's reign in the "prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite." —2. Father of Baasha, king of Israel (1 K. xv. 27, 38). —3. Son of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 28); in the LXX. translated "his brother." —4. One of David's valiant men, a Pelonite (1 Chr. xi. 36; ELIAM 2). —5. A Levite in David's reign, who was over the treasures of the house of God (1 Chr. xxvi. 20); in the LXX. translated "their brethren." —6. A chief who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 26).

A-hi'kam (Heb. brother of the enemy, Ges.), son of Shaphan the scribe, and an influential officer at the courts of Josiah, and of Jehoiakim. He was one of the delegates sent by Josiah to consult Huldah (2 K. xxii. 12-20; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 20-28). In the reign of Jehoiakim he protected the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xxvi. 24). His son Gedaliah was made governor of Judah by Nebuchadnezzar.

A-hi'lad (Heb. brother of one born, Ges.). 1. Father of Jehoshaphat, the recorder under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 1 K. iv. 3; 1 Chr. xviii. 15). —2. Father of Baana, one of Solomon's commissaries (1 K. iv. 12); = No. 1?

A-him'a-az (Heb. brother of anger, Ges.). 1. Father of Saul's wife, Ahinoam (1 Sam. xiv. 50). —2. Son of the high-priest ZADOK 1, and celebrated for his swiftness of foot. When David fled from Jerusalem, on account of Absalom's rebellion, Zadok and Abiathar, accompanied by their sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan, and HCSHAI, remained behind at his bidding. Ahimaaz and Jonathan stayed outside the walls of the city at EN-ROGEL. A message soon came to them from Zadok and Abiathar through a maid-servant, that Ahithophel had counselled an immediate attack upon David, and that the king must cross the Jordan without delay. They started at once on their errand, but a lad went and told Absalom, who ordered a hot pursuit. In the mean time, they reached BAHURIM, where a woman hid them in a well in the court-yard, and covered the well's mouth with ground or bruised corn. (COURT; WELL.) Absalom's servants coming up searched for them in vain; and as soon as they were gone, Ahimaaz and Jonathan hastened on to David, and told him Ahithophel's counsel. David with his whole company crossed the Jordan that night (2 Sam. xv. 24-37, xvii. 15-22). After Absalom was killed, Ahimaaz was very urgent with Joab to be employed as the messenger to run and carry the tidings to David. Joab at first would not allow him to bear such tidings; but after Cushai had started with the tidings, Ahimaaz was so importunate to be allowed to run too that at length Joab consented. Taking another way by the plain Ahimaaz outran Cushai, and, arriving first, reported to the king the good news of the victory, suppressing his knowledge of Absalom's death, and leaving to Cushai the task of announcing it (2 Sam. xviii. 19-33). This is the last we hear of Ahimaaz. The assertion of Josephus (x. 8, § 6), that he filled the office of high-priest, may be merely an inference from his coming between Zadok and Azariah in the genealogy of the high-priests (1 Chr. vi. 8, 9). From comparing 1 K. iv. 2 with 1 Chr. vi. 10, we should conclude that Ahimaaz died before Zadok, and that Zadok was succeeded by his grandson Azariah.—3. Solomon's son-in-law and commissary in Naphtali; husband of Basmath (1 K. iv. 15).

A-hi'man (Heb. brother of a gift, Ges.). 1. One of the three giant ANAKIM of Hebron (Num. xiii. 22, 33), seen by Caleb and the spies, and afterward slain by the tribe of Judah (Judg. i. 10).—2. A Levite, porter at the king's gate (1 Chr. ix. 17).

A-him'e-lech [-lek] (Heb. brother of the king, Ges.). 1. Son of Abitub (1 Sam. xxii. 11, 12), and high-priest at Nob in the days of Saul. He gave David the shewbread to eat, and the sword of Goliath; and for so doing was, upon the accusation of Doeg the Edomite, put to death with his whole house by Saul's order. Eighty-five (the LXX. read 305) priests were thus cruelly slaughtered; ABIATHAR alone escaped. On Ahimelech's identity with Abiah, see AHAIA 1. On the confusion between Ahimelech and Abiathar in 1 Chr., see ABIATHAR.—2. A Hittite, one of David's companions while he was persecuted by Saul; called in the LXX. Ahimelech (1 Sam. xxvi. 6).

A-hi'moth (Heb. brother of death, Ges.), a Kohathite Levite of the house of the Korhites (1 Chr. vi. 25). = MAHATH in verse 35.

A-hin'a-dab (Heb. liberal or noble brother, Ges.), son of Iddo, and commissary of Solomon in the district of Mahanaim (1 K. iv. 14).

A-hin'o-am (Heb. brother of grace). 1. The daughter of Ahimaaz and wife of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 50).—2. A Jezreelitess, married to DAVID during his wandering life (1 Sam. xxv. 43), with him and his other wife Abigail at the court of Achish (xxvii. 3), taken prisoner with her by the Amalekites at Ziklag (xxx. 5), but rescued by David (18), again mentioned as with him in Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 2); mother of his eldest son Amnon (iii. 2; 1 Chr. iii. 1).

A-hi'o (Heb. brotherly, Ges.). 1. Son of Abinadab, who accompanied the ark when it was brought out of his father's house (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; 1 Chr. xiii. 7).—2. A Benjamite, son of BERIAH 3 (1 Chr. viii. 14).—3. A Benjamite, son of JEHIEL, the father of Gibeon (1 Chr. viii. 31, ix. 37).

A-hi'ra (Heb. brother of evil, Ges.), chief of Naphtali under Moses (Num. i. 15, ii. 29, vii. 78, 83, x. 27).

A-hi'ram (Heb. brother of the high, Ges.), son of Benjamin, and ancestor of the AHIRAMITES (Num. xxvi. 38). In Gen. xvi. 21, for Ahiram appears "Ehi and Rosh," the former being probably the true reading, of which the latter was an easy corruption. AHER.

A-hi'ram-ites = the descendants of AHIRAM (Num. xxvi. 38).

A-his'a-mach [-mak] (Heb. brother of help, Ges.), a Danite, father of Aholiab (Ex. xxxi. 6, xxxv. 24, xxxviii. 23).

A-hish'a-har (Heb. brother of the dawn, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Bilhan (1 Chr. vii. 10).

A-hi'shar (Heb. brother of the singer, or brother of the upright, Ges.), the controller of Solomon's household (1 K. iv. 6).

A-hith'o-phel [-fel] (Heb. brother of folly, Ges.), a native of Giloh, in Judah, and privy councillor of David, whose advice had the authority of a divine oracle (2 Sam. xvi. 23). He was, according to many, the grandfather of BATH-SHEBA. (ELIAM.) Absalom on revolting sent for him, and when David heard that Ahithophel had joined the conspiracy, he prayed Jehovah to turn his counsel to foolishness (xv. 31), alluding possibly to the signification of his name. David's grief at the treachery of his confidential friend found expression in Ps. xli. 9, lv. 12-14. To show to the people that the breach between Absalom and his father was irreparable, Ahithophel persuaded him to take possession of the royal harem (2 Sam. xvi. 21). David, in order to counteract his counsel, sent HUSHAI to Absalom. Ahithophel had recommended an immediate pursuit of David; but Hushai advised delay. When Ahithophel saw that Hushai's advice prevailed, he despaired of success, and returning to his own home, "put his household in order and hanged himself" (xvii. 1-23).

A-hi'tub (Heb. brother or friend of goodness, Ges.). 1. A priest of the house of Eli and family of Ithamar; son of Phinehas, and elder brother of Ichabod, also father of AHIMELECH 1 or AHAIA 1 (1 Sam. xiv. 3, xxii. 9, 11). There is no record that he ever was high-priest.—2. A priest of the house of Eleazar; son of Amariah, and father (or grandfather; see MERAIOTH) of Zadok the high-priest (1 Chr. vi. 7, 8; 2 Sam. viii. 17; Ezr. vii. 2). From 1 Chr. ix. 11, where he is styled "the ruler of the house of God," like the high-priest Azariah (2 Chr. xxxi. 13), it is probable that Ahitub was HIGH-PRIEST. See also Neh. xi. 11. It is difficult to determine the exact time of Ahitub's high-priesthood. If he was father to Zadok he must have been high-priest with Ahimelech; but if grandfather, his age coincided with No. 1.—3. In 1 Chr. vi. 11, 12, a priest or high-priest, son of another Amariah, and father of another Zadok. (ZADOK 2.)

Ah'lab (Heb. fatness, fertility, Ges.), a city of Asher from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Judg. i. 31): supposed by Bertheau = ACH-SHAPH; more probably the place known in later history as Gush Chaleb or Gush Halab (Giscala), identified with the modern village of el-Jish, near Safed, in the hilly country N. W. of the sea of Galilee (Kotinson, ii. 446, iii. 73).

Ah'lah (Heb. = O that! Ges.), daughter of She-shan, and wife of JARHA (1 Chr. ii. 31, 35); foundress of an important branch of the Jerahmeelites (xi. 41).

A-ho'ah (Heb. prob. = AHAIA), son of Bela, the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 4); = AHAIA 3. AHER; AHIRAM; comp. GERA; NAAMAN 2.

A-ho'hite = descendant of AHOAH (2 Sam. xxiii. 9, 28; 1 Chr. xi. 12, 29, xxvii. 4).

A-ho'lah (Heb. [she has] her tent, or her tabernacle, Ges.), a harlot, used by Ezekiel as the symbol of Samaria (Ez. xxiii. 4, 5, 36, 44).

A-ho'il-ab (Heb. tent of his father, Ges.), a Danite of great skill as a weaver and embroiderer, whom Moses appointed with Bezaleel to erect the tabernacle (Ex. xxxi. 6, xxxv. 30, 35, xxxvi. 1, 2, xxxviii. 23).

A-ho'i-bah (Heb. my tabernacle is in her, Ges.), a harlot, used by Ezekiel as the symbol of Judah (Ez. xxiii. 4, 11, 22, 36, 44).

A-hel-i-ba'mah (Heb. tent of the hight, Ges.), one (probably the second) of Esau's three wives; daughter of ANAH, a descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 25), and mother of three of Esau's sons, Jeush, Jaalam, Korah (ver. 5, 14, 18). In Gen. xvi. 34, Aholibamah is called JUDITH, daughter of BEMER, the Hittite. Probably Judith was her proper personal name, and the name Aholibamah which she received as the wife of Esau and foundress of three tribes of his descendants; she is therefore in the narrative called Judith, and in the genealogical table Aholibamah. This is confirmed by the recurrence of the name Aholibamah in the concluding list of the table (Gen. xxxvi. 40-43; see also 1 Chr. i. 51-54), which we must regard as a list of names of places and not of persons. The district named from Aholibamah, or perhaps rather from which she received her married name, was no doubt (as the name indicates) in the heights of the mountains of Edom, probably therefore near Mount Hor and Petra.

A-hu-mal (Heb. brother of [i. e. duelling near] water, Ges.), son of Jahath, and head of a family of Zorathites (1 Chr. iv. 2).

A-hu-zam (Heb. Ahuzzam = their possession, Ges.), son of Ashur, the father of Tekoa, by his wife Naarah (1 Chr. iv. 6).

A-hu-zath (Heb. possession, Ges.), a friend of the Philistine king Abimelech, who accompanied him at his interview with Isaac (Gen. xxvi. 26).

AI (Heb. heap of ruins, Ges.). 1. A royal city (comp. Josh. viii. 23, 29, x. 1, xii. 9) of Canaan, already existing in the time of Abraham (Gen. xii. 8; HAI), and lying E. of Bethel (comp. Josh. xii. 9), and "beside Bethaven" (Josh. vii. 2, viii. 9). The Israelites, after destroying JERICHO, attempted to take AI, but were at first unsuccessful. (ACHAN.) Afterward the city was taken by an ambuscade, and was "utterly destroyed" (Josh. vii. viii. ix. 3, x. 1, 2, xii. 9). However, the name AIATH (probably = AI) was still attached to the locality at the time of Sennacherib's march on Jerusalem (Is. x. 28). The "men of Bethel and AI" (223 in Ezr. ii. 28; 123 in Neh. vii. 32) returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel; and "Michmash, AJJA (probably = AI), and Bethel," with their "daughters," were among the places reoccupied by the Benjamites (Neh. xi. 31). Travellers differ as to the site of the city which Joshua doomed to be a "heap and a desolation forever." Robinson (ii. 573-5) supposes it on a low hill with ruins, about three miles S. S. E. of BETHEL; Van de Velde (ii. 278-9), on an isolated hill with a great heap of stones, about one mile and a half E. S. E. of Bethel. It is the opinion of some that AVIM in Josh. xviii. 23, and GAZA in 1 Chr. vii. 28 are corruptions of AI.—2. A city of the Ammonites, probably attached to Heshbon (Jer. xlix. 3).

Al'ah [like Isaiah] (Heb. = cry, clamor, Ges.). 1. Son of Zibeon, and brother of ANAH (1 Chr. i. 40); taken in Gen. xxxvi. 24, AJAH.—2. Father of Rizpah, the concubine of Saul (2 Sam. iii. 7, xxi. 8, 10, 11).

Al'ath (fr. Heb.), probably = AI (Is. x. 28).

Al'ja (fr. Heb.), probably = AI (Neh. xi. 31).

Ai-ja-lon (fr. Heb. = a place of deer or gazelles = Deerfield, Ges.). 1. A city of the Kohathites (Josh. xxi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 69), originally allotted to Dan (Josh. xix. 42; A. V. "Ajalon"), which tribe, however, could not dispossess the Amorites of the place (Judg. i. 35). Ajalon was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 10) during his conflicts with the new kingdom of Ephraim (1 K. xiv. 30), and we last hear of it as in the hands of the Philistines (2 Chr. xxviii. 18, A. V. "Ajalon"; see also 1 Chr. viii. 13). Being on the frontier of the two kingdoms, Ajalon is spoken of sometimes (1 Chr. vi. 69, comp. with 66) as in Ephraim, and sometimes (2 Chr. xi. 10; 1 Sam. xiv. 31) as in Judah and Benjamin. Ajalon is identified with the modern Yalo, a village a little N. of the Jaffa road, about fourteen miles W. N. W. of Jerusalem, on the side of a long hill which forms the southern boundary of a fine valley of wheat and barley fields. This valley, now Merj Ibn 'Omair, was undoubtedly "the valley of Ajalon" (Josh. x. 12), which witnessed the defeat of the Canaanites by Joshua (Rbn. ii. 253, iii. 145).—2. A place in Zebulun, the burial-place of Elon, one of the judges (Judg. xii. 12).

Al-je-leth Sha'har (fr. Heb. = the hind of the morning dawn), found only in the title of Ps. xxii., and variously interpreted. Some take it for the name of a musical instrument; others suppose it to express allegorically the argument of Ps. xxii.; the Chaldee Paraphrast translates "the power of the continual morning sacrifice," implying a direction to the chief musician respecting the time of chanting the psalm; but the weight of authority predominates in favor of the interpretation which assigns to the phrase the sole purpose of describing to the musician the melody (not now extant, but well known in David's time and afterward) to which the psalm was to be played.

AI'IN (Heb. 'ayin) = an eye, and also, in the simple but vivid imagery of the East, a spring = FOUNTAIN, or natural burst of living water, the well or tank of artificial formation being always designated by the Hebrew words Bê'er and Bôr. Ain oftenest occurs in combination (in the form of En = Heb. 'éyin), as in EN-GEDI, EN-GANNIM, &c. It occurs alone in three cases.—1. One of the landmarks on the eastern boundary of Palestine, as described by Moses (Num. xxxiv. 11), RIBLAH being "on the E. side of the spring" (A. V. "Ain"). This is probably 'Ain el-'Azy, the main source of the Orontes, and a fountain remarkable for its force and magnitude, about nine miles S. W. of the modern Riblah (Rbn. iii. 534; Ptr. ii. 335-6, 358).—2. One of the southernmost cities of Judah (Josh. xv. 32), afterward allotted to Simeon (Josh. xix. 7; 1 Chr. iv. 32), and given to the priests (Josh. xxi. 16). In 1 Chr. vi., ASHAN takes the place of AIN. (EN-RIMMON).—3. The sixteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). NUMBER; WRITING.

* Air, the translation in the A. V. of—1. Hebrew shamayim (= HEAVEN) only in Prov. xxx. 19, and in the phrases "bird of the air" (2 Sam. xxi. 10; Eccl. x. 20), "fowl of the air" (Gen. i. 26 ff., &c.).—2. Hebrew rûah or rûach (Job xli. 14 only); usually translated "breath" (Gen. vi. 17, &c.), "wind" (Gen. viii. 1, &c.) or "spirit" (Gen. i. 2, &c.).—3. Greek ouranos (= HEAVEN), only in the phrases "birds of the air" (Mat. viii. 20, &c.), and "fowls of the air" (Jd. xi. 7; Mat. vi. 26, &c.); in LXX. = No. 1.—4. Greek pneuma (= breath, spirit), once in Wis. v. 11, where "the light air . . . is passed through" by a bird; in LXX. = No. 2.—5. Greek aër (in Homer, &c. = the lower air, atmosphere, the thick air or haze that surrounds the earth; opposed to Greek aithër, i. e. the pure upper air; hence, misty darkness, mist, gloom; in later writers, air, L. & S.), uniformly translated "air" in N. T. (Acts xxii. 28; 1 Cor. ix. 26, xiv. 9; Eph. ii. 2; 1 Th. iv. 17; Rev. ix. 2, xvi. 17), also in Apocrypha (Wis. ii. 3, v. 11, 12, vii. 3, xvii. 10 [Gr. 9]; 2 Mc. v. 2).—"The prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2) = SATAN.

A-l'rus, one of the "servants of the Temple," or Nethinim, whose sons came up with Zerobabel (1 Esd. v. 31); perhaps = REATAH.

A'jah = AJAH 1 (Gen. xxxvi. 24).

Aj'a-lon (Josh. x. 12, xix. 42; 2 Chr. xxviii. 18) = AIJALON 1, the Hebrew being the same in both.

A'kan (Heb. twist, turn, Ges.; criminal, Fū.), son of Ezer, and descendant of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 27); = JAKAN and JAAKAN.

Ak'kub (Heb. insidious, Ges.). 1. A descendant of Zerubbabel and son of Elioenai (1 Chr. iii. 24).—2. A Levite, porter or doorkeeper at the E. gate of the Temple; = DACOB (1 Esd. v. 28). His descendants succeeded to his office, and appear among those who returned from Babylon (1 Chr. ix. 17; Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45, xl. 19, xii. 25).—3. One of the Nethinim, whose family returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 45); probably = ACUA in 1 Esd. v. 30.—4. A Levite who assisted Ezra in expounding the law to the people (Neh. viii. 7); = JACUBUS in 1 Esd. ix. 48.

A-krab'bim (Heb. scorpions, Ges.), the as-cent' of, and the go'ing up to; also "MA'A-LEH-A-CRAB'BIM" (Heb. the scorpion pass). A pass between the S. end of the Dead Sea and Zin, on the southern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 3) and of the Holy Land (Num. xxxiv. 4). Also the northern (?) boundary of the Amorites (Judg. i. 36). Judas Maccabeus gained here a great victory over the Edomites (1 Mc. v. 3; "ARABATTINE"). Perhaps Akrabbim is the steep pass en-Sufah, by which the final step is made from the desert to the level of the actual land of Palestine. (ZEPHATH.) Robinson (ii. 120) identifies Akrabbim with the line of chalk cliffs, seven or eight miles long, and from fifty to one hundred and fifty feet high, which cross the ARABAH in an irregular curve from N. W. to S. E., six or eight miles S. of the Dead Sea. Akrabbim must not be confounded with Akrabattene, a district or toparchy, under the Romans, between Neapolis and Jericho (Jos. B. J. ii. 12, § 4, &c.; Rbn. iii. 296). ARBAT-TIS.

Al'a-bas-ter (Gr. alabastron or alabastrus, originally [so Stephanus] the name of the vessels, of peculiar shape [see cut], in which ointments were kept, hence applied to the material of which the vessels were commonly made) occurs in the N. T. only in the notices of the alabaster-box of ointment with which a woman anointed our Lord when he sat at meat (Mat. xxvi. 7; Mk. xiv. 3; Lk. vii. 37; MARY MAGDALENE). The modern alabaster includes both a granular variety of gypsum and the oriental alabaster. Gypsum is a hydrous sulphate of lime, and forms, when calcined and ground, the well-known plaster of Paris. The oriental alabaster, so much valued on account of its translucency, and for its variety of colored streakings, red, yellow, gray, &c., is a carbonate of lime, known in mineralogy as stalagmite. The ancient alabaster principally, if not solely = the oriental alabaster (Dana). Both these kinds of alabaster, but especially the latter, are and have been long used for various ornamental purposes, such as in the fabrication of vases, boxes, &c. The ancients considered alabaster (carbonate of lime) the best material in which to preserve their ointments. "Unguentis," says Pliny, "keep best in alabaster." In Mk. xiv. 3, the woman who brought "the alabaster-box of ointment of spike-nard" is said to break the box before pouring out the ointment, which probably only means breaking the seal which kept the essence of the perfume from evaporating.

Al'a-meth (Heb. covering, Ges.), a son of Becher, the son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).

A-lam'me-lech [-lek] (Heb. king's oak), a place in Asher, named between Achshaph and Amad (Josh. xix. 26 only); site unknown.

Al'a-moth (Heb.; Ps. xli. title; 1 Chr. xv. 20), supposed by some to be a musical instrument, by others a particular melody (comp. AJJELETH SHAHAR). Gesenius interprets the Hebrew 'al 'alamôth (A. V. "upon Alamoth") to mean after the manner of virgins, i. e. with the female voice = our treble or soprano. So also Prof. J. A. Alexander (on Ps. xli.).

Al'el-mus [-se] (fr. Gr. = valiant, a name, assumed, according to the prevailing fashion, as representing ELIAKIM), a Jewish priest of the Hellenizing party. On the death of Menelaus, Alcimus, though not of the pontifical family, was appointed high-priest by the influence of Lysias, to the exclusion of Onias, the nephew of Menelaus. When Demetrius Soter obtained the kingdom of Syria he paid court to that monarch, who confirmed him in his office, and through his general BACCHIDES established him at Jerusalem. His cruelty, however, was so great that, in spite of the force left in his command, he was unable to withstand the opposition which he provoked, and he again fled to Demetrius, who immediately took measures for his restoration. The first expedition under NICANOR proved unsuccessful; but upon this Bacchides marched a second time into Judea with a large army, routed Judas (MACCABEES), who fell in the battle (161 B. C.), and reinstated Alcimus. After his restoration, Alcimus seems to have attempted to modify the ancient worship, and as he was pulling down "the wall of the inner court of the sanctuary" (i. e. which separated the court of the Gentiles from it) he was "plagued" (by paralysis), and "died at that time," 160 B. C. (1 Mc. vii. ix.; comp. 2 Mc. xiv. xv.).

Al'e-ma (fr. Gr.), a large and strong city in Gilead in the time of the Maccabees (1 Mc. v. 26); site unknown.

Al'e-meth (Heb. covering, Ges.), a Benjamite, descended from Jonathan the son of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 36, ix. 42).

Al'e-meth (Heb. 'Allemeth = concealment, Ges. & Fū.), a city of the priests in Benjamin (1 Chr. vi. 60); = ALMON; probably at 'Almî, a low, naked hill about one mile N. E. of 'Anâta (Anathoth).

* A'leph (fr. Phœnician = ox, Ges.), the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). ALPHA; NUMBER; WRITING.

Al-ex-an'der (L. fr. Gr. Alexandros = the helper of men) III., king of Macedon, surnamed the Great,

"the son of Philip" (1 Mc. i. 1-9, vi. 2) and Olympias, was born at Pella, B. C. 356. On his mother's side he claimed descent fr. Achilles. At an early age he was placed under the care of Aristotle; and while still a youth, he turned the fortune of the day at Chæroneæ, B. C. 338. On the murder of Philip (B. C. 336) Alexander put down the disaffection and hostility by which his throne was menaced. In B. C. 334 he crossed the Hellespont to carry out the plans of his father, and execute the mission of Greece to the civilized world. The battle of the Granicus was followed by the subjugation of western Asia, and the next year the fate of the East was decided at Issus. Tyre and Gaza, the only cities in western Syria which offered Alexander any resistance, were reduced and treated with unusual severity (B. C. 332). Egypt next submitted to him; in B. C. 331 he founded ALEXANDRIA, and finally defeated Darius at Gaugamela; and in B. C. 330 his unhappy rival was murdered by Bessus, satrap of Bactria. The next two years Alexander was consolidating his Persian conquests and reducing Bactria. In B. C. 327 he crossed the Indus, penetrated to the Hydaspes, and was there forced by the discontent of his army to turn West. He reached Susa, B. C. 325, and then proceeded to Babylon, B. C. 324, which he chose as the capital of his empire. There (B. C. 323) he died in the midst of his gigantic plans; and those who inherited his conquests left his designs unachieved and unattempted (comp. Dan. vii. 6, viii. 5, xi. 3).—The famous tradition of Alexander's visit to Jerusalem during his Phenician campaign (Jos. xi. 8, § 1 ff.) has been a fruitful source of controversy. The Jews, it is said, had provoked his anger by refusing to transfer their allegiance to him, and after the reduction of Tyre and Gaza he turned toward Jerusalem. Jaddua (Jaddus) the high-priest (Neh. xii. 11, 22), who had been warned in a dream how to avert the king's anger, calmly awaited his approach, and when he drew near went out to meet him, clad in his robes of hyacinth and gold, and accompanied by a train of priests and citizens arrayed in white. Alexander was so moved by the solemn spectacle that he did reverence to the holy name inscribed upon the tiara of the high-priest; and when Parmenio expressed surprise, he replied that "he had seen the god whom Jaddua represented in a dream at Dium, encouraging him to cross over into Asia, and promising him success." After this, it is said, he visited Jerusalem, offered sacrifice there, heard the prophecies of Daniel which foretold his victory, and conferred important privileges upon the Jews in Judea, Babylonia, and Media, which they enjoyed under his successors. The narrative is repeated in the Talmud and in later Jewish writers. On the other hand, no mention of the event occurs in Arrian, Plutarch, Diodorus, or Curtius. But though the details as given by Josephus may be incorrect, the main fact harmonizes with statements made by Justin and Curtius, and with the subsequent actual possession by the Jews of important privileges; and internal evidence is decidedly in favor of the story even in its details. From policy or conviction Alexander delighted to represent himself as chosen by destiny for the great act which he achieved. The siege of Tyre arose professedly from a religious motive. The battle of Issus was preceded by the visit to Gordium; the invasion of Persia by the pilgrimage to the temple of Ammon. And the silence of the classical historians, who notoriously disregarded and misrepresented the fortunes of the Jews, cannot be conclusive against the occurrence of an event which must have appeared to them trivial or unintelligible. The tradition, whether true or false, presents an important aspect of Alexander's character. Orientalism (ALEXANDRIA) was a necessary deduction from his principles. His final object was to "unite and reconcile the world." The first and most direct consequence of his policy was the weakening of nationalities, and this prepared the way for the dissolution of the old religions. The spread of commerce followed the progress of arms; and the Greek language and literature became practically universal. The Jews were at once most exposed to the powerful influences thus brought to bear upon the East (ANTIOCHUS II.—VII.), and most able to support them. Their powerful hierarchy, their rigid ritualism, and their great doctrine of the unity of God, combined to keep them faithful to the God of their fathers. (DISPERSION, JEWS OF THE.) Alexander's conquest furnished them the occasion and the power of fulfilling their mission to the world.—In the prophetic visions of DANIEL the influence of Alexander is necessarily combined with that of his successors. But some traits of "the first mighty king" (Dan. viii. 21, xi. 3) are given with vigorous distinctness. The he-goat by which he is typified suggests the notions of strength and speed; and the universal extent (Dan. viii. 5, . . . from the west on the face of the whole earth) and marvellous rapidity of his conquests (Dan. i. c., he touched not the ground) are brought forward as the characteristics of his power, which was directed by the strongest personal impetuosity (Dan. viii. 6, in the fury of his power). He ruled with great dominion, and did according to his will (xi. 3), "and there was none that could deliver . . . out of his hand" (viii. 7).

Al-ex-an-der Bal-as (L. Alexander, see above; Balas = lord, fr. Aram.?), according to some, a natural son of ANTIOCHUS IV. EPIPHANES, but more generally regarded as an impostor who falsely assumed the connection. He claimed the throne of Syria, 152 B. C., in opposition to DEMETRIUS SOTER. After landing at Ptolemais Alexander gained the warm support of Jonathan (MACCABEES); and though at first unsuccessful, in 150 B. C. he completely routed the forces of Demetrius, who himself fell in the retreat. Afterward Alexander married Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor; and appointed Jonathan governor of Judea. But after obtaining power he gave himself up to a life of indulgence; and DEMETRIUS NICATOR, son of Demetrius Soter, having landed in Syria 147 B. C., found powerful support. At first Jonathan defeated and slew Apollonius, the governor of Celosyria, who had joined the party of Demetrius, for which exploit he received fresh favors from Alexander; but shortly afterward (B. C. 146) Ptolemy entered Syria with a large force, and after he had placed garrisons in the chief cities on the coast, which received him by Alexander's commands, suddenly pronounced himself in favor of Demetrius, alleging, probably with truth, the existence of a conspiracy against his life. Alexander, who had been forced to leave Antioch, was in Cilicia when he heard of Ptolemy's defection. He hastened to meet him, but was defeated, and fled to Abae in Arabia, where he was murdered, B. C. 146. 1 Mc. x. xi. and Jos. xiii. show clearly the partiality of the Jews for Alexander "as the first that entreated of true peace with them," and the same feeling was exhibited afterward in the zeal with which they supported his son ANTIOCHUS VI.

Al-ex-an'der (L. fr. Gr.; see above), in N. T. 1. Son of Simon the Cyrenian; mentioned with his brother Rufus probably as well known among early Christians (Mk. xv. 21).—2. A kinsman of Annas the high-priest (Acts iv. 6), apparently in some high office; supposed by some = Alexander the Alabarch at Alexandria, brother of Philo Judæus, and an old friend of the Emperor Claudius (Jos. xviii. 8, § 1, xix. 5, § 1).—3. A Jew at Ephesus, put forward during the tumult raised by Demetrius the silversmith (Acts xix. 33), to plead with the mob for the Jews, as being unconnected with the attempt to overthrow the worship of DIANA. Or (so Calvin, &c., suppose) a Jewish convert to Christianity, whom the Jews were willing to expose as a victim to the mob.—4. An Ephesian Christian, reprobated by St. Paul (1 Tim. i. 20) as having made shipwreck concerning the faith. This may be the same with:—5. Alexander, the coppersmith, who had done the apostle many mischiefs, and of whom Timothy was exhorted to beware (2 Tim. iv. 14).

Al-ex-an-dri-a [in L. Al-ex-an-dri'a] (L. fr. Gr.; named fr. ALEXANDER; 3 Mc. iii. 1; Acts xviii. 24), the Hellenic, Roman, and Christian capital of Egypt, was founded by Alexander the Great, B. C. 332, who himself traced the ground-plan of the city, which he designed to make the metropolis of his Western empire. The work thus begun was continued after the death of Alexander by the Ptolemies. Every natural advantage contributed to its prosperity. The climate and site were singularly healthy. The harbors, formed by the island of Pharos on which was the magnificent light-house, one of the seven wonders of the ancient world, and the headland Lochias, were safe and commodious, alike for commerce and for war; and the Lake Marcotis was an inland haven for the merchandise of Egypt and India. Under the despotism of the later Ptolemies the trade of Alexandria declined, but its population and wealth were enormous. After the victory of Augustus (B. C. 31) it suffered for its attachment to the cause of Antony; but its importance as one of the chief corn-ports of Rome<sup>1</sup> secured for it the general favor of the first emperors. In later times the seditious tumults for which the Alexandrians had always been notorious, desolated the city, and religious feuds aggravated the popular distress. Yet even thus, though Alexandria suffered greatly from constant dissensions and the weakness of the Byzantine court, the splendor of "the great city of the West" amazed Amrou, its Arab conqueror (A. D. 640); and after centuries of Mohammedan misrule and the loss of trade consequent on the discovery of the route to India by the Cape of Good Hope, it promises again to justify the wisdom of its founder.—The population of Alexandria was mixed from the first; and this fact formed the groundwork of the Alexandrian character. The three regions into which the city was divided (Regio Judæorum, Eruchium, Rhacotis) corresponded to the three chief classes of its inhabitants, Jews, Greeks, Egyptians; but it had also representatives of almost every nation. According to Josephus, Alexander himself assigned to the Jews a place in his new city; "and they obtained equal privileges with the Macedonians," in consideration "of their services against the Egyptians." Ptolemy I., after the capture of Jerusalem, removed a considerable number of its citizens to Alexandria. Many others followed of their own accord; and all received the full Macedonian franchise, as men of known and tried fidelity. The numbers and importance of the Egyptian Jews rapidly increased under the Ptolemies. Philo estimates them in his time at little less than a million; and adds, that two of the five districts of Alexandria were called "Jewish districts;" and that many Jews lived scattered in the remaining three. Julius Cesar and Augustus confirmed to them their previous privileges, and they retained them, with various interruptions, during the tumults and persecutions of later reigns. They were represented, at least from the time of Cleopatra to the reign of Claudius, by their own officer (called "ethnarch," "alabarch," &c.), and Augustus appointed a council (i. e. Sanhedrim) "to superintend the affairs of the Jews" according to their own laws. The establishment of Christianity altered the civil position of the Jews, but they maintained their relative prosperity, and when Alexandria was taken by Amrou, forty thousand tributary Jews were reckoned among the marvels of the city.—For some time the Jews both in Alexandria and Jerusalem were subject to the civil power of the first Ptolemies, and acknowledged the high-priest as their religious head. The persecution of Ptolemy Philopator (217 B. C.; Maccabees, 3d Book of) first alienated the Jews of Palestine, who from that time were connected with Syria (Antiochus III.); and the same policy which alienated them, gave unity and decision to the Jews of Alexandria. The Septuagint translation, and the temple of Leontopolis (161 B. C.; Onias 5), widened the breach thus opened. Yet at the beginning of the Christian era the Egyptian Jews still paid the contributions to the temple-service. Jerusalem was still the Holy City, and the Alexandrians had a synagogue there (Acts vi. 9). The internal administration of the Alexandrian church was independent of the Sanhedrim at Jerusalem; but respect survived submission.—The religion and philosophy of Alexandria, however, combined with other causes to produce there a distinct form of the Jewish character and faith, of which Philo is the most distinguished representative. (WISDOM OF SOLOMON.) Alexander the Great symbolized the spirit with which he wished to animate his new capital by founding a temple of Isis side by side with the temples of the Grecian gods. The creeds of the East and West were to coexist in friendly union; and afterward the mixed worship of Serapis was characteristic of the Greek kingdom of Egypt. The monarchs who favored the worship of Serapis founded and embellished the museum and the celebrated Library; and part of the Library was in the temple of Serapis. The Egyptian Jews imbibed the spirit which prevailed around them. ARISTOBULUS I and other Jews wrote in Greek. The histories of the O. T. were adapted to classical models. The precepts of Leviticus were versified, and the Exodus was dramatized. Aristobulus endeavored to show that the Pentateuch was the real source of Greek philosophy, and it became a chief object of Jewish speculation to trace out the subtle analogies between these. The facts of the Scriptures were supposed to be essentially symbolic, and the language a veil over the truths there contained. Thus the Supreme Being might be withdrawn from immediate contact with the world, and the Biblical narratives might be applied to the phenomena of the soul. In the time of Philo (B. C. 20—A. C. 50) the theological and interpretative systems of the Alexandrian Jews, both of which have an important bearing upon the Apostolic writings, were evidently fixed even in many of their details. This Alexandrian teaching powerfully furthered the reception of Apostolic truth, while the doctrine of the Word (Memra) and the system of mystical interpretation, which, through the influence of Greek literature and philosophy grew up within the Rabbinic schools of Palestine, had a closer connection with the expression of this truth in the language of St. John and the "allegories" of St. Paul. Philo's phraseology is strikingly like that of St. John, while the idea is dissimilar. Thus he represents the Logos (= Word) as divine, at one time as the reason of God in which the archetypal ideas of things exist, at another as the Word of God by which He makes Himself known to the outward world; but he nowhere realizes the notion of one who is at once Revealer and the Revelation. The allegoric method of Philo also prepared for the spiritual interpretation of the Scriptures, but did not anticipate it. While Philo regarded that which was positive in Judaism as the mere symbol of abstract truths, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, it appears as the shadow of blessings realized (x. 1) in a personal Saviour. The speculative doctrines which thus worked for the general reception of Christian doctrine were also embodied in a form of society which was afterward transferred to the Christian church. Numerous bodies of ascetics (Therapeutæ), especially near Lake Mareotis, devoted themselves to discipline and study, allying society and labor, and often forgetting, it is said, the simplest wants of nature in contemplating the hidden wisdom of the Scriptures. Eusebius (H. E. ii. 16) even claimed them as Christians; and some of the forms of monasticism were evidently modelled after the Therapeutæ. According to the common legend St. Mark first "preached the Gospel in Egypt, and founded the first church in Alexandria." At the be ginning of the second century the number of Christians at Alexandria must have been very large, and the great leaders of Gnosticism who arose there (Basilides, Valentinus) exhibit an exaggeration of the tendency of the church. APOLLOS, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen have been among the distinguished Christians born at Alexandria. The Bishop (afterward Patriarch) of Alexandria had for ages great influence in the Christian Church. NEW TESTAMENT; OLD TESTAMENT.

Al-ex-an'dri-ans. 1. The Greek inhabitants of Alexandria (3 Mc. ii. 30, iii. 21).—2. The Jewish colonists of that city, who were admitted to the privileges of citizenship, and had a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 9). ALEXANDRIA.

Al'gum or Al'mug (both Heb. Trees; the former occurring in 2 Chr. ii. 8, ix. 10, 11, the latter in 1 K. x. 11, 12. These words are undoubtedly identical. From 1 K. x. 11, 12; 2 Chr. ix. 10, 11, we learn that these trees were brought in great plenty from Ophir, together with gold and precious stones, by the fleet of Hiram, for Solomon's Temple and house, and for the construction of musical instruments. In 2 Chr. ii. 8, Solomon is represented as desiring Hiram to send him "cedar-trees, fir-trees, and alnum-trees out of Lebanon." From 1 K. it seems clear that the alnum-trees came from Ophir; and as it is improbable that Lebanon should also have been a locality for them, the passage which appears to ascribe the growth of them to Lebanon (so Mr. Houghton) must be an interpolation of some transcriber, or else it must bear a different interpretation. Perhaps the wood had been brought from Ophir to Lebanon, and Solomon instructed Hiram to send on to Jerusalem the timber imported from Ophir that was lying at the port of Tyre, with the cedars which had been cut in Mount Lebanon. The alnum or alnum tree may have been the red sandal-wood (Pterocarpus santalinus). This tree is a native of India and Ceylon. The wood is very heavy, hard, and fine grained, and of a beautiful garnet color. Dr. Royle (in Kit.) favors the white sandal-wood (Santalum album). This tree grows in the mountainous parts of the coast of Malabar, &c., and is deliciously fragrant in the parts near the root. It is much used in the manufacture of work-boxes, cabinets, and other ornaments, and by the Chinese as incense.

Al'lah = ALYAH.

Al'lan = ALVAN.

Al'len (ale'yen). STRANGER.

Al'le-go-ry, a figure of speech, defined by Bishop Marsh, in accordance with its etymology, as "a representation of one thing which is intended to excite the representation of another thing;" the first representation being consistent with itself, but requiring, or capable of admitting, a moral or spiritual interpretation over and above its literal sense. An allegory has been considered by some as a lengthened or sustained metaphor, or a continuation of metaphors, as by Cicero, thus standing in the same relation to metaphor as parable to simile; but the interpretation of allegory differs from that of metaphor, in having to do not with words but things. In every allegory there is a twofold sense: the immediate or historic, which is understood from the words, and the ultimate or allegorical, which is concerned with the things signified by the words. Thus in Gal. iv. 24, the apostle gives an allegorical interpretation to the historical narrative of Hagar and Sarah; not treating that narrative as an allegory in itself, as our A. V. would lead us to suppose, but drawing from it a deeper sense than is conveyed by the immediate representation. For an example of pure allegory, see Lk. xv. 11-32; for examples of mixed allegory (i. e. with more or less of application), see Ps. lxxx.; Jn. xv. 1-8.

Al-le-lu'ia [-yah] (L. from Heb.; Rev. xix. 1 ff.)= HALLELUJAH.

Al-li'an-ces. The Israelites in Palestine at first formed no connections with the surrounding nations. (GIBEONITES; NETHINIM.) But under the kings they were brought more into contact with foreigners (compare also ABRAHAM, ISAAC, JACOB.) Solomon concluded two important commercial treaties: (1.) with Hiram, king of Tyre, originally to obtain materials and workmen for the Temple, and afterward for the supply of ship-builders and sailors (1 K. v. 2-12, ix. 27); (2.) with a Pharaoh, king of Egypt, by which he secured a monopoly of the trade in horses and other products of that country (1 K. x. 28, 29; COMMERCE). After the division of the kingdom, the alliances were offensive and defensive. The kings of Judah and Israel both sought a connection with Syria, on which side Israel was particularly assailable (1 K. xv. 19); but Asa ultimately secured the active coöperation of Ben-hadad against Baasha (1 K. xv. 16-20). An alliance between Israel and Judah was formed under Ahab and Jehoshaphat, which was maintained until the end of Ahab's dynasty: it occasionally extended to commercial operations (2 Chr. xx. 36). When war broke out between Amaziah and Jeroboam II. a coalition was formed between Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah on the one side, and Ahab and Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, on the other (2 K. xvi. 5-9). By this means an opening was afforded to the advances of the Assyrian power: and the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, as they were successively attacked, sought the alliance of the Egyptians. Thus Hoshea made a treaty with So, and rebelled against Shalmaneser (2 K. xvii. 4). Hezekiah adopted the same policy in opposition to Sennacherib (Is. xxx. 2); but in neither case was the alliance productive of much good; though afterward, when Egypt itself was threatened, the Assyrians were defeated, and a temporary relief was afforded thereby to Judah (2 K. xix. 9, 36). On the restoration of independence Judas Maccabeus sought an alliance with the Romans as a counterpoise to Syria (1 Mc. viii.; AMBASSADOR). This alliance was renewed by Jonathan (1 Mc. xii. 1) and by Simon (1 Mc. xv. 17). On the last occasion the independence of the Jews was recognized and formally notified to the neighboring nations, B. c. 140 (1 Mc. xv. 22, 23). Treaties of a friendly nature were at the same period concluded with the Lacedemonians under an impression that they came of a common stock (1 Mc. xii. 2, xiv. 20). The Roman alliance was again renewed by Hyrcanus, B. c. 128, but it ultimately proved fatal to Jewish independence: the rival claims of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus having been referred to Pompey, B. c. 63, he availed himself of the opportunity to place the country under tribute. Finally, Herod was made king by the Roman Senate.—The formation of an alliance was attended with various religious rites (COVENANT; OATH), a feast, &c. Presents were also sent by the parties soliciting the alliance (1 K. xv. 18; 2 K. xvi. 8; 1 Mc. xv. 18).—<sup>1881</sup>RYTHRIAGE.

Al'lon = AMI = AMON (1 Esd. v. 34; comp. Ezr. ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59).

Al'lon (Heb. oak, Ges.), a Simeonite, ancestor of Ziza (1 Chr. iv. 37).

Al'lon (Heb. allôn or êlôn = an oak, Ges.). 1. A place named among the cities of Naphtali (Josh. xix.

33). Probably it should be taken with the following word, i. e. "the oak by Zaanannim," or "the oak of the loading of tents," as if named from some nomad tribe frequenting the spot. (ZAAANAIM.)—2. Al-lam-ba'chuth [-kuth] (Heb. oak of weeping), the tree under which Rebekah's nurse, Deborah, was buried (Gen. xxxv. 8). DEBORAH 1, 2; TABOR, THE PLAIN OF.

* Al-might'y (Heb. Shaddai; Gr. pantokrator), a title of God from his boundless might or power (Gen. xlix. 25; Num. xxiv. 4, 16; Ru. i. 20, 21; Job v. 17, vi. 4; Wis. vii. 25; Eccles. i. 14; Rev. i. 8, &c.). JEHOVAH.

Al-me'dad (Heb. the extension or measure, Fū. ?), the first, in order of the sons of JOKTAN (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chr. i. 20), and the progenitor of an Arab tribe. His name appears to be preserved in that of Mudād, a famous personage in Arabian history, the reputed father of Ishmael's Arab wife, and chief of the Joktanite tribe of Jurhum.

Al'men (Heb. concealment, Ges.), a city of the priests in Benjamin (Josh. xxi. 18); = ALEMETH.

Al'men-Dib-la-tha'im (fr. Heb. = concealment of the two cakes, prob. fr. the shape of the city, Ges.), a station of the Israelites between Dibon-gad and the mountains of Abarim (Num. xxxiii. 46, 47); probably = BETH-DIBLATHAIM.

Almond-tree, Al'mond [ah'mund]. This word is found in Gen. xliii. 11; Ex. xxv. 33, 34, xxxvii. 19, 20; Num. xvii. 8; Eccles. xii. 6; Jer. i. 11, in the text of the A. V. It is invariably represented by the Hebrew shaked, which sometimes stands for the whole tree, sometimes for the fruit or nut; e. g. in Gen. xliii. 11, Jacob commands his sons to take as a present to Joseph "a little honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds;" here the fruit is clearly meant. In Exodus the "howls made like unto almonds," which were to adorn the golden candlestick, seem to allude to the nut also. Aaron's rod, that miraculously budded, yielded almond-nuts. In Ecclesiastes and Jeremiah the Hebrew is translated almond-tree, which from the context it certainly represents. It is clearly then a mistake to suppose with some writers that shaked exclusively = almond-nuts, and that luz (translated "HAZEL" in Gen. xxx. 37, A. V.) = the tree. Probably this tree, conspicuous as it was for its early flowering and useful fruit, was known by these two different names. Shaked is derived from a root which signifies "to be wakeful," "to hasten," for the almond-tree blossoms very early in the season, the flowers appearing before the leaves. Hence it was regarded by the Jews as a welcome harbinger of the spring, reminding them that the winter was passing away, that the flowers would soon appear on the earth, that the time of the singing of birds was come, and the voice of the turtle would soon be heard in the land (Cant. i. 11, 12). The word shaked, therefore, or the tree which hastened to put forth its blossoms, was a very beautiful and fitting synonyme for the luz, or almond-tree, in the language of a people so fond of imagery and poetry as were the Jews. The almond-tree has been noticed in flower at Sidon as early as the 9th of January; the 18th, 19th, and 23d are also recorded dates at other places in Palestine. This fact will explain Jer. i. 11, 12, "The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see the rod of an almond-tree (shaked). Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen, for I will hasten (shoked) my word to perform it." The expression in Eccl. xii. 5, "the almond-tree shall flourish," is generally understood as emblematic of the hoary locks of old age thinly scattered on the head, as the white blossoms appear on the yet leafless boughs of this tree. Gesenius translates "the almond is rejected," because the flowers are generally pink or rose-colored, though they are sometimes nearly white. But all the old versions agree with the A. V., and the allusion may refer to the hastening of old age in the case of him who remembered not his Creator in the days of his youth. (See also under MEDICINE.)—The almond-tree has always been regarded by the Jews with reverence, and even to this day the English Jews on their great feast-days carry a bough of flowering almond to the synagogue, just as the Jews of old presented palm branches in the temple. The almond-tree (Amygdalus communis) is a native of Asia and northern Africa, but it is cultivated in the milder parts of Europe, &c. The tree is about twelve or fourteen feet high; the flowers are pink, and arranged mostly in pairs; the leaves are long, ovate, with a serrated margin, and an acute point. The covering of the fruit is downy and succulent, enclosing the hard shell which contains the kernel. It is curious to observe, in connection with the almond-bowls of the golden candlestick, that, in the language of lapidaries, Almonds are pieces of rock-crystal, even now used in adorning branch-candlesticks.

Alms [ahmz]. This word is not found in our version of the O. T., but it occurs repeatedly in the N. T., and in Tobit and Ecclesiasticus. Instead of "righteousness" the LXX. have "alms" in Deut. xxiv. 13, and Dan. iv. 24 (27 A. V.); while some manuscripts read with the Vulgate in Mat. vi. 1, "righteousness." Almsgiving is strictly enjoined by the law. (BLIND; CORNER; GLEANING; LOAN; POOR; TITHE; WIDOW.) For the theological estimate of it among the Jews see Job xxxi. 17; Esth. ix. 22; Ps. cxii. 9; Acts ix. 36, x. 2; also Tob. iv. 10, 11, xiv. 10, 11; and Eccles. iii. 30, xl. 24. And the Talmudists interpret righteousness by almsgiving in Gen. xviii. 19; Ps. xvii. 15; Is. liv. 14, &c.—In the women's court of the Temple were thirteen receptacles for voluntary offerings (Mk. xii. 41), one of which was devoted to alms for the education of poor children of good family.—After the Captivity, but at what time is unknown, a definite system of almsgiving was introduced and even enforced under penalties. Collectors received money for the poor of the city in a chest or box every Sabbath in the synagogue, and distributed it in the evening; and also collected food and money for the poor in general in a dish every day from house to house which they distributed. Special collections and distributions were made on fast-days. The Pharisees were zealous and ostentatious in almsgiving (Mat. vi. 2). The expression "do not sound a trumpet" is probably only a mode of denouncing their display, by a figure drawn from the frequent and well-known use of trumpets in religious and other celebrations, Jewish as well as heathen.—The duty of relieving the poor was not neglected by the Christians (Mat. vi. 1-4; Lk. xiv. 13; Acts xx. 35; Gal. ii. 10). Every Christian was exhorted to lay by on the first day of each week some portion of his profits, to be applied to the wants of the needy (Acts xi. 30; Rom. xv. 25-27; 1 Cor. xvi. 1-4).

Al'mug-trees = ALGUM-TREES.

Al'na-than or Al-na'than (Gr.) = ELNATHAN 2 (1 Esd. viii. 44).

Aloes [al'oze], Lign-Al'oes [lig-nal'oze, or line-al'oze] (in Heb. ahālīm, ahālō'h), the name of a costly and sweet-smelling wood mentioned in Num. xxiv. 6; Ps. xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14. The word "aloes" occurs once in the N. T. (Gr. aloē, Jn. xix. 39), when Nicodemus brings "a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pound weight," for anointing the body of our Lord. It is usually identified with the agallochum or aloes-wood of commerce, much valued in India for fumigation and for incense on account of its aromatic qualities. The tree which produces this wood, the Aquilaria agallochum of northern India, grows to the height of one hundred and twenty feet, being twelve feet in girth. It is, however, uncertain whether the ahālīm or ahālō'h is in reality the aloes-wood of commerce, which in its turn must not be confounded with the aloes used in medicine; some kind of odoriferous cedar may be the tree denoted by these Hebrew terms.

A'loth (Heb. ascents?) a place or district, forming with Asher the jurisdiction of Baanah, Solomon's commissary (1 K. iv. 16). The LXX. and later scholars read "BEALOTH" as one word, instead of "in (= Heb. bē) Aloth" (A. V.).

Al'pha (see ALEPH), the first letter of the Greek alphabet, as Omega is the last. Its significance is plainly indicated in the context, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last" (Rev. xxii. 13, i. 8, 11, xxi. 6; comp. Is. xli. 4, xlv. 6). Both Greeks and Hebrews employed the letters of the alphabet as numerals. NUMBER; WRITING.

Al'pha-bet. WRITING.

Al-phæ'us [-fee-] (L.) = ALPHEUS.

Al-phæ'us [-fee-] (L. Alphæus; fr. Aram. Halpai or Chalpai = exchange?), the father of the apostle James the Less (Mat. x. 3; Mk. iii. 18; Lk. vi. 15; Acts i. 13), and husband of that Mary who, with the mother of Jesus and others, was standing by the cross during the crucifixion (Jn. xix. 25; MARY OF CLEOPHAS). In this latter place he is called "Clopas" in the margin (text of A. V. "Cleophas"); a variation arising from the double pronunciation of the Hebrew letter CHETH; and found also in the rendering of Hebrew names by the LXX. Whether Alpheus = the CLEOPAS of Lk. xxiv. 18, can never be satisfactorily determined. If, as commonly, we read in Lk. vi. 16, Acts i. 13, "Judas the brother of James," then the apostle (JUDAS, THE BROTHER OF JAMES) was another son of Alpheus. And in Mk. ii. 14, Levi (or MATTHEW) is also said to have been the son of Alpheus. For further particulars see JAMES.

Al'tar [awl'tar]. A. The first altar of which we have any account is that built by Noah when he left the ark (Gen. viii. 20). In the early times altars were usually built in certain spots hallowed by religious associations, e. g. where God appeared (Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 18, xxvi. 25, xxxv. 1). Generally of course they were erected for offering sacrifice (SACRIFICE); but in some instances they appear to have been only memorial, e. g. that built by Moses, and called JEHOVAH-NISSI (Ex. xvii. 15, 16), and that built by the Reubenites, &c., "in the borders of Jordan," to be "a witness" between them and the rest of the tribes (Josh. xxii. 10-29). Altars were probably originally made of earth. The Law of Moses allowed them to be made either of earth or unhewn stones (Ex. xx. 24, 25); any iron tool would profane the altar—but this could only refer to the body of the altar, and that part on which the victim was laid, as directions were given to make a casing of shittim-wood overlaid with brass for the altar of burnt-offering. (See below.) In later times they were frequently built on high places, especially in idolatrous worship (Deut. xii. 2; HIGH PLACES; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE). The sanctity attaching to the altar led to its being regarded as a place of refuge or asylum (Ex. xxi. 14; 1 K. i. 50, ii. 28).—B. The Law of Moses directed that two altars should be made, the Altar of Burnt-offering (called also simply "the Altar"), and the Altar of Incense.—I. The Altar of BURNT-OFFERING, or "brazen altar" (Ex. xxxviii. 30), called in Mal. i. 7, 12, "the table of the Lord," perhaps also in Ez. xlv. 16. It differed in construction at different times.—(1). In the TABERNACLE (Ex. xxvii. 1 ff., xxxviii. 1 ff.) it was portable, square, five cubits long, five broad, and three high, made of planks of shittim-wood (SHITTAR-TREE) overlaid with brass. The interior was hollow, and probably filled up with earth (so Rashi) whenever the tabernacle was set up. At the four corners were four projections called horns, also made of shittim-wood overlaid with brass (Ex. xxvii. 2). They probably were of one piece with the altar, and projected upward; and to them the victim was bound when about to be sacrificed (Ps. cxviii. 27). At the consecration of priests (Ex. xxix. 12) and the offering of the sin-offering (Lev. iv. 7 ff.) the blood of the victim was sprinkled on the horns of the altar. Round the altar, midway between the top and bottom, ran a projecting ledge (A. V. "compass"), on which perhaps the priests stood when they officiated. To the outer edge of this ledge a grating or net-work of brass was affixed, and reached to the bottom of the altar, which thus appeared larger below than above. At the four corners of the net-work were four brazen rings, into which were inserted the staves of shittim-wood by which the altar was carried. As the priests were forbidden to ascend the altar by steps (Ex. xx. 26), it has been conjectured that a slope of earth led gradually up (Jewish tradition says on the S. side) to the ledge from which they officiated. The place of the altar was at "the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation" (Ex. xl. 29). The various utensils for the service of the altar (Ex. xxvii. 3) were: (a.) Pans to clear away the fat and ashes with. (PAN.) (b.) Shovels for removing ashes. (c.) Basins, in which the blood of the victims was received, and from which it was sprinkled. (BASIN.) (d.) Flesh-hooks (three-pronged, see 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14), by which the flesh was removed from the caldron or pot. (HOOK.) (e.) Fire-pans, or censers ("snuff-dishes" in Ex. xxv. 38), for taking coals from the fire on the altar (Lev. xvi. 12), or for burning incense (Num. xvi. 6, 7; FIRE-PAN). All these utensils were of brass.—(2.) In Solomon's TEMPLE the altar as well as the building was considerably larger, square as before, but twenty cubits long, twenty broad, and ten high (2 Chr. iv. 1), made entirely of brass (1 K. viii. 64; 2 Chr. vii. 7). It had no grating; and the ascent to it was probably by three successive platforms, with steps leading to each, as in the figure annexed. The Law indeed positively forbade the use of steps (Ex. xx. 26), and Josephus asserts that in Herod's Temple the ascent was by an inclined plane. On the other hand steps are introduced in the Temple of Ezekiel (Ez. xliii. 17), and Ex. xx. 26, has been interpreted as prohibiting a continuous flight of stairs, and not a broken ascent. But the Biblical account is so brief that we cannot determine the question. Asa "renewed" this altar (2 Chr. xv. 8), i. e. repaired it, or more probably perhaps reconsecrated it after it had been polluted by idol-worship. Subsequently Ahaz had it removed to the N. side of the new altar which Urijah had made by his direction (2 K. xvi. 14). It was "cleansed" by command of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 18), and Manasseh, after the repentance, either repaired or rebuilt it (xxxiii. 16). It may have been broken up, and the brass carried to Babylon, but this is not mentioned (Jer. lii. 17 ff.).—(3.) The altar in the second (Zerubbabel's) Temple was built before the foundations of the Temple were laid (Ezr. iii. 2), on the same spot (so Jos. xi. 4, § 1) on which that of Solomon had stood. It was constructed, as we may infer from 1 Mc. iv. 47, of unhewn stones. Antiochus Epiphanes desecrated it (1 Mc. i. 54); and (so Jos. xii. 5, § 4) removed it altogether. Judas Maccabeus built a new altar of unhewn stone (1 Mc. iv. 47).—(4.) The altar erected by Herod is thus described (Jos. B. J. v. 5, § 6): "In front of the Temple stood the altar, fifteen cubits in height, and in breadth and length of equal dimensions, viz. fifty (Rufinus says forty) cubits; it was built foursquare, with horn-like corners projecting from it; and on the S. side a gentle acclivity led up to it. Moreover it was made without any iron tool, neither did iron ever touch it at any time." The dimensions given in the Mishna are different. In connection with the horn on the S. W. was a pipe to receive the blood of the victims sprinkled on the left side of the altar, and carry it by a subterranean passage into the brook Kidron. Under the altar was a cavity into which the drink-offerings passed. It was covered with a slab of marble, and emptied from time to time. On the north side of the altar were a number of brazen rings, to secure the animals brought for sacrifice. Round the middle of the altar ran a scarlet thread to mark where the blood was to be sprinkled, whether above or below it. According to Lev. vi. 12, 13, a perpetual fire was to be kept burning on the altar. This was the symbol and token of the perpetual worship of Jehovah. It was essentially different from the perpetual fires of the Persians and of Vesta, which were not sacrificial fires at all.

Supposed form of the Altar of Incense.

(FIRE.) This perpetual fire was one of the five things in the first temple which Jewish tradition declares to have been wanting in the second.—II. The Altar of INCENSE, called also the "golden altar" (Ex. xxxix. 38; Num. iv. 11), to distinguish it from No. I. Probably this is the "altar of wood" (Ez. xli. 22), described as the "table that is before the Lord." The name "altar" was not strictly appropriate, as no sacrifices were offered upon it; but once in the year, on the great day of atonement, the high-priest sprinkled upon its horns the blood of the sin-offering

(Ex. xxx. 10).—(1.) That in the Tabernacle was of shittim-wood, overlaid with pure gold, a cubit in length and breadth, and two cubits in height. Like the Altar of Burnt-offering it had horns at the four corners. It had also a top or roof, on which the incense was laid and lighted. Many, following the Vulgate (craticulam ejus), have supposed a kind of grating to be meant; but for this there is no authority. Round the altar was a border or wreath ("crown," A. V.). Below this were two golden rings "for places for the staves to bear it withal." The staves were of shittim-wood overlaid with gold. Its appearance may be illustrated by the preceding figure. This altar stood in the Holy Place, "before the veil that is by the ark of the testimony" (Ex. xxx. 6, xl. 5).—(2.) The altar in Solomon's Temple was similar (1 K. vii. 48; 1 Chr. xxviii. 18), but was made of cedar overlaid with gold (1 K. vi. 20, 22).—(3.) The Altar of Incense is mentioned as removed from the Temple of Zerubbabel by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mc. i. 21). Judas Maccabaeus restored it, with the holy vessels, &c. (1 Mc. iv. 49). On the arch of Titus no Altar of Incense appears. But that it existed in the last Temple, and was richly overlaid, we learn from the Mishna. As the sweet incense was burnt upon it every day, morning and evening (Ex. xxx. 7, 8), and the blood of atonement was sprinkled upon it (v. 10), this altar had a special importance attached to it. It is the only altar which appears in the Heavenly Temple (Is. vi. 6; Rev. viii. 3, 4).—C. Other Altars. (1.) Altars of brick. There seems to be an allusion to such in Is. lxv. 3, though Rosenmüller (and so Gesenius and Maurer) supposes the allusion is to some Babylonish custom of burning incense on bricks covered with magic formulæ or cuneiform inscriptions.—(2.) An Altar to an Unknown God (Acts xvii. 23). St. Paul mentions in his speech on Mars' Hill that he had himself seen such an altar in Athens. Pausanias and Philostratus mention "altars of unknown gods" at Athens. It is not probable that such an inscription referred to the God of the Jews, as One whose Name it was unlawful to utter, as some have supposed. Diogenes Laertius says that in the time of a plague, when the Athenians knew not what god to propitiate in order to avert it, Epimenides caused black and white sheep to be let loose from the Areopagus, and wherever they lay down, to be offered to the respective divinities. It was probably on this or similar occasions that altars were dedicated to an Unknown God, since they knew not what god was offended and required to be propitiated.

Al-tas'chith [kith] (fr. Heb. = destroy not), in the title of Ps. lvii., lviii., lix., lxxv., probably the beginning of some song or poem to the tune of which those psalms were to be chanted. Comp. AIJELETH SHAHAR, &c.

Al'ush (Heb. a crowd of men, Talmud), a station of the Israelites on their journey to Sinai, the last before REPHIDIM (Num. xxxiii. 13, 14); given in the Seder Olam as eight miles from Rephidim. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Al'vah (Heb. evil, Ges.), a duke of Edom (Gen. xxvi. 40); = ALIAH in 1 Chr. i. 51.

Al'van (Heb. tall, thick, Ges.), a Horite, son of Shobal (Gen. xxxvi. 23); = ALIAN in 1 Chr. i. 40.

A'mad (Heb. people of duration, Ges.), an unknown place in Asher, between Alammelech and Misheal (Josh. xix. 26 only.)

A-mad'a-tha (Esth. xvi. 10, 17), and A-mad'a-thus (Esth. xii. 6); = HAMMEDATHA.

A'mal (Heb. labor, Ges.), an Asherite, son of Helem (1 Chr. vii. 35).

Am'a-lek (Heb. a people that licks up? Fbn., Ayre, &c.). 1. Son of Eliphaz by his concubine TIMNA; grandson of Esau, and a chieftain ("duke," A.V.) of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 12, 16; 1 Chr. i. 36).—2. "Amalek" often = AMALEKITES, as in Ex. xvii.; Num. xxiv. 20; Deut. xxv. 17–19, &c.

Am'a-lek-ites (fr. AMALEK), a nomadic tribe which occupied the peninsula of Sinai and the wilderness between the southern hill-ranges of Palestine and the border of Egypt (Num. xiii. 29; 1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8). Arab historians represent them as originally dwelling on the shores of the Persian Gulf, whence they were pressed W. by the growth of the Assyrian empire, and spread over a portion of ARABIA before its occupation by the descendants of Joktan. This account of their origin harmonizes with Gen. xiv. 7, where the "country" of the Amalekites is mentioned several generations before the birth of the Edomite Amalek, though the passage does not assert that the Amalekites were then in that "country": it throws light on the traces of a permanent occupation of central Palestine in their passage W., as indicated by the names "Amalek" and "Mount of the Amalekites" (Judg. v. 14, xii. 15): and it accounts for the silence of Scripture as to any relationship between the Amalekites and the Edomites or the Israelites. That a mixture of the two former races occurred at a later period, would in this case be the only inference from Gen. xxxvi. 16, though many writers have considered that passage to refer to the origin of the whole nation, explaining Gen. xiv. 7, as a case of prolepsis or anticipation. The physical character of the district, which the Amalekites occupied, necessitated a nomadic life, and they took their families with them even on a military expedition (Judg. vi. 5). Their wealth consisted in flocks and herds. Mention is made of a "town" (1 Sam. xv. 5), but their towns could have been little more than stations, or nomadic enclosures. The kings or chieftains perhaps had the hereditary title AGAG (Num. xxiv. 7; 1 Sam. xv. 8). Two important routes led through the Amalekite district, viz., from Palestine to Egypt by the Isthmus of Suez, and to southern Asia and Africa by the Elanitic arm of the Red Sea. It has been conjectured that the expedition of the four kings (Gen. xiv.) had for its object the opening of the latter route; and it was by the former that the Amalekites first came in contact with the Israelites, whose progress they attempted to stop by a guerilla warfare (Deut. xxv. 18), but were signally defeated at REPHI-

AM (Ex. xvii.). In union with the Canaanites they again attacked the Israelites on the borders of Palestine, and defeated them near Hormah (Num. xiv. 45). Afterward they were at one time in league with the Moabites (Judg. iii. 13) defeated by Ehud near Jericho; at another time with the Midianites (Judg. vi. 3) defeated by Gideon. Saul overran their whole district from Havilah to Shur, and inflicted an immense loss upon them (1 Sam. xv.); and an Amalekite in turn claimed to have slain Saul (2 Sam. i.). Their power was thenceforth broken, and they degenerated into a horde of banditti. Their contests with David and destruction of Ziklag ended in their signal defeat (1 Sam. xxvii., xxx.). The last notice of the Amalekites is that the Simeonites in the days of Hezekiah smote "the rest" or the remnant of them (1 Chr. iv. 43). The words of Moses (Deut. xxv. 19) and of Balaam (Num. xxiv. 20) seem to have been fulfilled in their complete destruction.

AMAN (Heb. gathering-place, Fül.), a city in the S. of Judah, named with Shema and Moladah in Josh. xv. 26 only. KERIOTH 1.

AMAN = HAMAN (Tob. xiv. 10; Esth. x. 7, xii. 6, xlii. 3, 12, xiv. 17, xvi. 10, 17).

AM-NA (fr. Heb. = confirmation, Ges.; the established, determined, Fül.), a mountain (Cant. iv. 8); commonly regarded as the part of Anti-Lebanon in which the river ABANA (2 K. v. 12; written "Amana" in marg. of A. V., Heb. Keri, &c.) has its source.

AM-NA'IAH (Heb. whom Jehovah said, i. e. promised, Ges.). 1. Father of AMRUB 2, and son of MERUBOTH, in the line of the high-priests (1 Chr. vi. 7, 52; HIGH-PRIEST; ЗАРОК).—2. High-priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xix. 11); son of AZARIAH, and the seventh in descent from No. 1 (1 Chr. vi. 11).—3. Head of a family of Kohathite Levites (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).—4. A priest in Hezekiah's time (2 Chr. xxxi. 15); supposed by Lord A. C. Hervey to be a family name = IMMER 1.—5. A son of Bani in Ezra's time; husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 42).—6. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. x. 3, xii. 2, 13).—7. A descendant of PHARAZ, the son of JUDAH (Neh. xi. 4); probably = IMRI 1 in 1 Chr. ix. 4.—8. An ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

AM-NA'RIAS (Gr.; 1 Esd. viii. 2; 2 Esd. i. 2) = AMARIAH 1.

AM-NA-SA (Heb. burden). 1. Son of Ithra or Jether, by Abigail, David's sister (2 Sam. xvii. 25). He was Abalom's commander-in-chief (ABSAALOM), and was totally defeated by JOAB (xviii.). Afterward he was forgiven by DAVID, recognized by him as his nephew, and appointed Joab's successor (xix. 13). Joab afterward, when they were both in pursuit of the rebel Sheba, pretending to salute Amasa, stabbed him with his sword (xx. 10), which he held in his left hand.—2. One of the princes of Ephraim in Pekah's reign, who succored the captives from Judah (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).

AM-NA-SAL (Heb. burdensome, Ges.). 1. A Kohathite, father of Mahath and ancestor of Samuel and Heman the singer (1 Chr. vi. 23, 35).—2. Chief of the captains of Judah and Benjamin, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 18); whether = Amasa, David's nephew, is uncertain.—3. One of the priests who blew trumpets before the ark, when David brought it from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chr. xv. 24).—4. Another Kohathite, father of another Mahath, in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12), unless the name is that of a family.

AM-NA-SHAL (fr. Heb. = AMASAI), son of Azareel, and priest in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 13); apparently = MAASAI (1 Chr. ix. 12).

AM-A-SIAH (Heb. whom Jehovah bears in his arms, Ges.), son of Ziehi, and captain of 200,000 warriors of Judah under Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 16).

A'math. HAMATH.

* Am'a-thas. AMATHIS.

Am-a-the-is (1 Esd. ix. 29). ATHLAI.

Am'a-this (or Am'a-thas), "the land of" = the region or district of HAMATH (1 Mc. xii. 25).

Am-a-zia'ah (fr. Heb. whom Jehovah strengthens, Ges.), son of JOASH 1, and eighth king of Judah (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), succeeded to the throne at the age of twenty-five, on the murder of his father, and punished the murderers, but spared their children, in accordance with Deut. xxiv. 16 (2 K. xiv. 6). He made war on the Edomites, defeated them in the valley of salt (SALT, VALLEY OF), and took their capital, which he named JOKTHEEL. We read in 2 Chr. xxv. 12-14, that the victorious Jews threw 10,000 Edomites from the cliffs, and that Amaziah worshipped the gods of the country; an exception to the general character of his reign (comp. 2 K. xiv. 3, with 2 Chr. xxv. 2). In consequence of this he was overtaken by misfortune. Having already offended the Hebrews of the northern kingdom by sending back, in obedience to a prophet, 100,000 troops whom he had hired from it, he had the foolish arrogance to challenge JOASH 2, king of Israel, to battle. But Judah was completely defeated, and Amaziah himself was taken prisoner, and conveyed by Joash to Jerusalem, which opened its gates to the conqueror (so Josephus). A portion of the northern wall of Jerusalem was broken down, and treasures and hostages were carried off to Samaria. Amaziah lived fifteen years after the death of Joash; and in the twenty-ninth year of his reign was murdered by conspirators at Lachish, whither he had retired for safety from Jerusalem. This is recorded as a consequence of his turning away from Jehovah (2 Chr. xxv. 27).—2. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 34).—3. A Levite, ancestor of Ethan the singer (vi. 45).—4. Priest of the golden calf at Bethel, who endeavored to drive the prophet Amos from Israel (Am. vii. 10, 12, 14).

Am-bas'sa-dor = an official representative of one sovereign or people at the court or seat of government of another sovereign or people. Examples of ambassadors occur in the cases of Edom, Moab, and the Amorites (Num. xx. 14, xxi. 21; Judg. xi. 17-19), afterward in that of the fraudulent Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 4, &c.), and in the instances mentioned Judg. xi. 12, 14, and xx. 12. They are alluded to more frequently during and after the contact of the great monarchies of Syria, Babylon, &c., with those of Judah and Israel, as in the invasion of Sennacherib. They were usually men of high rank (2 Sam. viii. 10; 2 K. xviii. 17, 18; Is. xxx. 4). Ambassadors were employed, not only on occasions of hostile challenge or insolent menace (2 K. xiv. 8; 1 K. xx. 2, 5, 6; 2 K. xix. 9, 14), but of friendly compliment, of request for alliance or other aid, of submissive deprecation, and of curious inquiry (2 Sam. x. 2; 2 K. xvi. 7, xviii. 14; 2 Chr. xxxii. 31; Lk. xiv. 32; ALLIANCES). See also Is. xviii. 2; Ez. xvii. 15, &c.—The apostle Paul claims for himself and Timothy in preaching the Gospel the deference due to ambassadors of the Lord Jesus Christ (2 Cor. v. 20; Eph. vi. 20).

Am'ber (Heb. hashmal or chashmal) occurs only in Ez. i. 4, 27, viii. 2. (COLORS.) It is usually supposed by biblical critics, but by no means certain, that the Hebrew word denotes a metal, and not the fossil resin called amber. The LXX. and Vulgate afford no certain clew to identification, for the Greek word electron (L. electrum) employed as its equivalent, was used to express both amber and a certain metal, which was composed of four parts of gold to one of silver, and held in very high estimation by the ancients.

* Am'bush, Am'bush-ment. WAR.

A'men' (Heb. firm, true, truth; often used in Gr. of N. T., and at the beginning of a sentence usually in A. V. translated "verily," i. e. in truth, certainly, in other positions usually not translated, and then = so be it, let it be true), a word used in strong asseverations, fixing as it were the stamp of truth upon the assertion which it accompanied, and making it binding as an oath (comp. Num. v. 22). In Deut. xxvii. 15-26, the people were to say "Amen," as the Levites pronounced each of the curses upon Mount Ebal, signifying by this their assent to the conditions under which the curses would be inflicted. So among the Rabbins, "Amen" involves the ideas of swearing, acceptance, and truthfulness. The first two are illustrated by the passages already quoted; the last by 1 K. i. 36; Jn. iii. 3, 5, 11 (A. V. "verily"), in which the assertions are made with the solemnity of an oath, and then strengthened by the repetition of "Amen." "Amen" was the proper response of the person to whom an oath was administered (Neh. v. 13, viii. 6; 1 Chr. xvi. 36; Jer. xi. 5, marg., text of A. V. "so be it"), and the Deity to whom appeal is made on such occasions is called "the God of Amen" (Is. lxxv. 16, A. V. "truth"), as being a witness to the sincerity of the implied compact. With a similar significance Christ is called "the Amen, the faithful and true witness" (Rev. iii. 14; comp. Jn. i. 14, xiv. 6; 2 Cor. i. 20). It is matter of tradition that in the Temple the "Amen" was not uttered by the people, but that, instead, at the conclusion of the priest's prayers, they responded, "Blessed be the name of the glory of his kingdom for ever and ever." Of this a trace is supposed to remain in the concluding sentence of the Lord's Prayer (comp. Rom. xi. 36). But in the synagogues and private houses it was customary for the people or members of the family who were present to say "Amen" to the prayers offered by the minister or the master of the house, and the custom remained in the early Christian Church (Mat. vi. 13; 1 Cor. xiv. 16). And not only public prayers, but those offered in private, and doxologies were appropriately concluded with "Amen" (Rom. ix. 5, xi. 36, xv. 33, xvi. 27; 2 Cor. xiii. 14, &c.).

* A-merce', to, = to punish by inflicting a fine (Deut. xxii. 19). PUNISHMENTS.

Am'e-thyst (Heb. ahlâmâh or achlâmâh; Gr. amethystos, the origin of amethyst, generally regarded as thus named from its supposed power of dispelling drunkenness in those who wore it). Mention is made of this precious stone, which formed the third in the third row of the high-priest's breastplate, in Ex. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12, "And the third row a figure, an agate, and an amethyst." It occurs also in the N. T. (Rev. xxi. 20; Gr. amethystos) as the twelfth stone which garnished the foundations of the wall of the heavenly Jerusalem. Modern mineralogists by the term amethyst usually understand the amethystine variety of quartz, or rose quartz, which is crystalline, highly transparent, and of a violet or purplish-violet color. The oriental amethyst is a variety of corundum, of a violet color. (ADAMANT; SAPPHIRE.) The Hebrew and Greek terms doubtless denoted one or both of these two minerals.

A'mi (Heb. prob. corrupted from AMON), one of "Solomon's servants" (Ezr. ii. 57); = AMON 3, and ALLOM.

A-min'a-dab (Gr. and L.; Mat. i. 4; Lk. iii. 33) = AMMINADAB 1.

A-mi't'ai (Heb. true, veracious, Ges.), father of the prophet Jonah (2 K. xiv. 25; Jon. i. 1).

Am'mah (Heb. beginning, head, Ges.; waterfall, Fû.), the hill of, a hill "facing" Giah by the way of the wilderness of Gibeon; the point to which Jacob's pursuit of Abner extended (2 Sam. ii. 24); site unknown. METHEG-AMMAH.

Am'mi (Heb. my people), a figurative name, applied to the kingdom of Israel in token of God's reconciliation with them (Hos. ii. 1), in contrast with LO-AMMI. Comp. RUHAMAH and LO-RUHAMAH.

Am'mi-dol (Gr.), in some copies Am-mid'ol (Gr.; 1 Esd. v. 20). "They of Chadias and Ammidci" are named here, not in Ezra or Nehemiah, among those who came up from Babylon with Zorobabel.

Am'mi-el (Heb. kindred [i. e. servants or worshippers] of God, Ges.). 1. The spy selected by Moses from the tribe of Dan (Num. xiii. 12).—2. Father of Machir of Lodebar (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5, xvii. 27).—3. Father of Bath-sheba (1 Chr. iii. 5); called ELIAM in 2 Sam. xi. 3.—4. Sixth son of Obad-edom (1 Chr. xxvi. 5), and a doorkeeper of the Temple.

Am'mi-hud (Heb. kindred of Judah, Ges.). 1. An Ephraimite, father of Elishama, the chief of the tribe under Moses (Num. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48, 53, x. 22; 1 Chr. vii. 26), and ancestor of Joshua.—2. A Simeonite, father of Shemuel, a prince of the tribe (Num. xxxiv. 20) at the division of Canaan.—3. Father of Pedabel, a prince of Naphtali at the same time (xxxiv. 28).—4. (Heb. text and A. V. marg. Ammihur = kindred of nobles, Ges.; Keri, Ammi-hud.) Father of Talmai, the king of Geshur (2 Sam. xiii. 37).—5. A descendant of Pharez, son of Judah (1 Chr. ix. 4).

* Am'mi-hur = AMMIHUD 4.

Am-min'a-dab (Heb. kindred of the prince, Ges.; man of generosity, Fû.). 1. In N. T. AMINADAB. Son of Ram or Aiam, and father of Nahshon, who was the prince of Judah under Moses (Num. i. 7, ii. 3; Ru. iv. 19, 20; 1 Chr. ii. 10), and of Elisheba Aaron's wife (Ex. vi. 23). He probably died in Egypt before the Exodus.—2. A Kohathite Levite, chief of the one hundred and twelve sons of Uzziah, summoned by David, with other chief Levites and priests, to bring the ark of God to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 10-12).—3. In 1 Chr. vi. 22 = IZHAR.

Am-min'a-dib (Heb.). In Cant. vi. 12, it is uncertain whether we ought to read, Amminadib, with the A. V., or my willing people (= Heb. 'ammi u-dib), as in the margin.

Am-mi-shad'da-i or Am-mi-shad'dai (Heb. kindred [i. e. servant] of the Almighty, Ges.), father of Ahi-ezer, the prince of Dan at the Exodus (Num. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66, 71, x. 25).

Am-miz'a-bad (Heb. kindred of the Giver, i. e. of Jehovah, Ges.), son of Benaiah, and apparently Benaiah's lieutenant in the third division of David's army (1 Chr. xxvii. 6).

Am'mon (Heb. = BEN-AMMI, Ges.), Am'mon-ites, children of Am'men, a people descended from Ben Ammi, the son of Lot by his younger daughter (Gen. xix. 38; comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 7, 8), as Moab was by the elder; and dating from the destruction of Sodom. The near relation between the two peoples indicated in their origin continued through their existence (comp. Judg. x. 6; 2 Chr. xx. 1; Zeph. ii. 8, &c.). Indeed, so close was their union that each appears to be occasionally spoken of under the name of the other. See Deut. ii. 19; xxiii. 4; Judg. xi., &c. Unlike Moab, the precise position of the territory of the Ammonites is not ascertainable. In the earliest mention of them (Deut. ii. 20) they are said to have destroyed the Zamzummim, and to have dwelt in their place, Jabbok being their border (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 37, iii. 16). "Land" or "country" is, however, rarely ascribed to them, nor is there any reference to those habits and circumstances of civilization, which so constantly recur in the allusions to Moab (Is. xv., xvi.; Jer. xlviii.). On the contrary we find everywhere traces of the fierce habits of marauders in their incursions (1 Sam. xi. 2; Am. i. 13), and a very high degree of crafty cruelty to their foes (Jer. xl. 14; Jd. vii. 11, 12). Probably Moab was the settled and civilized half of the nation of Lot, and Ammon its predatory and nomad section. On the W. of Jordan they never obtained a footing. In the times of the Judges they passed over once with Moab and Amalek, and seized Jericho (Judg. iii. 13), and a second time "to fight against Judah and Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim" (x. 9); but they quickly returned to the freer pastures of Gilead. (CHEPHAR HA-AMMONAL.) The hatred of the Israelites toward the Ammonites arose partly from their opposition or denial of assistance to the Israelites on their approach to Canaan, but mainly from their share in the affair of Balaam (Deut. xxiii. 4; Neh. xiii. 1). The command, "distress not the Moabites . . . distress not the children of Ammon, nor meddle with them" (Deut. ii. 9, 19; and comp. 37), is followed by a sentence excluding Moab and Ammon from the congregation for ten generations (Deut. xxiii. 3). This animosity continued in force to the latest date. Subdued by Jephthah who smote twenty cities (Judg. xi. 33), and scattered with great slaughter by Saul (1 Sam. xi. 11, xiv. 47), they enjoyed under his successor a short respite, probably from the connection of Moab with David (1 Sam. xxii. 3). But this was soon brought to a close by their king's shameful treatment of the friendly messengers of David (2 Sam. x. 4; 1 Chr. xix. 4), for which he destroyed their city, and inflicted on them the severest blows (2 Sam. xii.; 1 Chr. xx.; RABBAH). In the days of Jehoshaphat they made an incursion into Judah with the Moabites and the Maonites (MEHUNIM), but were signally repulsed, and so many killed that three days were occupied in spoiling the bodies (2 Chr. xx. 1-25). Before Amos prophesied, they made incursions, and committed atrocities in Gilead (Am. i. 13); they paid tribute to Uzziah (2 Chr. xxvi. 8; the LXX. ascribe this to the MEHUNIM); Jotham had wars with them, and exacted from them a heavy tribute of "silver" (comp. "jewels," 2 Chr. xx. 25), wheat, and barley" (2 Chr. xxvii. 5). They took possession of the cities of Gad, from which the Jews had been removed by Tiglath-pileser (Jer. xlix. 1-6); and other incursions are elsewhere alluded to (Zeph. ii. 8, 9). At the captivity many Jews took refuge among the Ammonites from the Assyrians (Jer. xl. 11), but on the return from Babylon, Tobiah the Ammonite and Sanballat (probably a Moabite) were foremost among the opponents of Nehemiah's restoration. The Ammonites are mentioned in Jd. v., vi., vii. and 1 Mc. v. 6, 30-43. (AMMONITESS.)—The tribe was governed by a king (NAHASH 1; Judg. xi. 12, &c.; 1 Sam. xii. 12; 2 Sam. x. 1; Jer. xl. 14), and by "princes" (2 Sam. x. 3;

1 Chr. xix. 3).—The divinity of the tribe was MOLECH, also written MILCOM and MALCHAN.

Am'mon-i-tess [as in Ammonite] = an Ammonite woman. NAAMAH 2, the mother of Rehoboam (1 K. xiv. 21, 31; 2 Chr. xii. 13), and SHIMEATH, the mother of one of the murderers of Joash (2 Chr. xxiv. 26) were of the race of AMMON. For allusions to these mixed marriages see 1 K. xi. 1; Ezr. ix. 1 ff.; Neh. xiii. 23 ff. MARRIAGE, II. i.

Am'non (Heb. faithful, Ges.). 1. Eldest son of David, by Ahinoam the Jezreelitess, born in Hebron while his father's royalty was only acknowledged in Judah. He dishonored his half-sister Tamar, and was in consequence murdered by her brother ABSALOM (2 Sam. iii. 2, xiii. 1-29; 1 Chr. iii. 1).—2. Son of Shimon (1 Chr. iv. 20).

A'mok (Heb. deep, Ges.), a chief priest, companion of Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 7, 20).

A'mon (Heb.), an Egyptian divinity, whose name occurs in No-AMON (Nah. iii. 8, marg.), or Thebes. The Greeks called this divinity Ammon. The ancient Egyptian name is Amen = "the hidden." Amen was one of the eight gods of the first order, and chief of the triad of Thebes. He was worshipped at that city as Amen-Ra (= "Amen the sun"), represented as a man wearing a cap with two high plumes, and Amen-Ra ka mu'ef (= "Amen-Ra, who is both male and female"), represented as the generative principle. The Greeks identified Amen with Zeus, and he was therefore called Zeus Ammon and Jupiter Ammon.

Amon.—From Sculptures, British Museum (Ayre).

A'mon (Heb. architect, Ges.; others say, son or father-child, Ges.). 1. King of Judah, son and successor of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 18-26; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 20-25; Mat. i. 10; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF). Following his father's example, Amon devoted himself wholly to the service of false gods, but was killed in a conspiracy after a reign of two years. The people avenged him by putting all the conspirators to death, and made his son Josiah king. To Amon's reign we must refer the terrible picture of idolatry supported in Jerusalem by priests and prophets (Zeph. i. 4, iii. 4), the poor ruthlessly oppressed (iii. 3), and shameless indifference to evil (iii. 11).—2. Prince or governor of Samaria in the reign of Ahad (1 K. xxii. 26; 2 Chr. xviii. 25). The precise nature of his office is not known. Perhaps the prophet Micaiah was intrusted to his custody as captain of the citadel.—3. See AMI.

Am'o-rite, the Am'o-rites (fr. Heb. = the dwellers on the summits, mountaineers), one of the chief nations who possessed the land of Canaan before its conquest by the Israelites. "Amorite" (so Mr. G. Grove) was a local term, and not the name of a distinct tribe. Gesenius says the name is sometimes taken in a wide sense, so as to include all the other Canaanitish tribes (Gen. xv. 16, xlviii. 22, &c.). In Gen. x. 16, "the Amorite" is given as the fourth son of Canaan. The Amorites as dwelling on the elevated portions of the country, are contrasted with the Canaanites, who dwell in the lowlands; and the two thus formed the main broad divisions of the Holy Land. "The Hittite, and the Jebusite, and the Amorite, dwell in the mountain (of Judah and Ephraim), and the Canaanite dwells by the sea (the lowlands of Philistia and Sharon) and by the 'side' of Jordan" (in the Arabah)—was the report of the spies (Num. xiii. 29; and see Josh. v. 1, x. 6, xi. 3; Deut. i. 7, 20, "mountain of the Amorites," 44). In the earliest times (Gen. xiv. 7) they occupied the barren heights W. of the Dead Sea. (EN-GEDI; HAZEZON-TAMAR.) From this point they stretched W. to Hebron, where Abram was then dwelling (Gen. xiv. 13). We next meet them on the high table-lands E. of the Jordan. Sihon, their king, had taken the rich pasture-land S. of the Jabbok, and driven the Moabites across the Arnon (Num. xxi. 13, 26). The Israelites apparently approached from the S. E., keeping "on the other (i. e., E.) side" of the upper part of the Arnon, which there bends S., so as to form the eastern boundary of Moab. Their request to pass through his land was refused by Sihon; he "went out" against them, was killed with his sons and his people, and his land, cattle, and cities were taken by Israel (Num. xxi. 21-31; Deut. ii. 26-36). This rich tract, bounded by the Jabbok on the N., the Arnon on the S., Jordan on the W., and "the wilderness" on the E., was, perhaps, especially the "land of the Amorites" (Num. xxi. 31; Josh. xii. 2, 3, xiii. 9; Judg. xi. 21, 22); but their possessions extended to Hermon (Deut. iii. 8, iv. 48), embracing "all Gilead and all Bashan" (iii. 10), with the Jordan valley on the E. of the river (iv. 49), and forming together the land of the "two kings of the Amorites," Sihon and Og (Deut. xxxi. 4; Josh. ii. 10, ix. 10, xxiv. 12). After the passage of the Jordan the Amorites disputed with Joshua the conquest of the W. country (Josh. x. 5, &c., xi. 3, &c.). After the conquest of Canaan the Bible scarcely mentions the Amorites, except in designating the early inhabitants of the country (Judg. i. 34-36; 1 Sam. vii. 14; 1 K. ix. 20, 21; 2 K. xxi. 11, &c.).

Amos (Heb. a burden). 1. A native of Tekoa in Judah, originally a shepherd and dresser of sycamore-trees, called by God to be a prophet, although not trained in any of the regular prophetic schools (Am. i. 1, vii. 14, 15). He travelled from Judah into the kingdom of Israel or Ephraim, and there exercised his ministry, probably not for any long time. His date cannot be later than the death of Jeroboam II. (about 784 B. C.; see ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), for he prophesied "in the reigns of Uzziah, king of Judah, and Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel, two years before the EARTHQUAKE" (i. 1). But his ministry probably took place earlier, perhaps about the middle of Jeroboam's reign, for Amos speaks of his conquests as completed (vi. 13; comp. 2 K. xiv. 25), yet the Assyrians, who toward the end of his reign were approaching Palestine (Hos. x. 6, xi. 5), do not seem as yet to have caused any alarm. Amos predicts indeed that Israel and other neighboring nations will be punished by certain wild conquerors from the N. (i. 5, v. 27, vi. 14), but does not name them. Israel was now at the height of power, wealth, and security; but the poor were oppressed (viii. 4), the ordinances of religion thought burdensome (viii. 5), and idleness, luxury, and extravagance were general (iii. 15). The source of these evils was IDOLATRY—that of the golden calves. CALF-worship was specially practised at BETHEL, also at Gilgal, Dan, and Beersheba in Judah (iv. 4, v. 5, viii. 14), and was offensively united with the true worship of the Lord (v. 14, 21-23; comp. 2 K. xvii. 33). Amos went to rebuke this at Bethel, but the high-priest AMAZIAH 2 complained of him to Jeroboam, and endeavored to drive him from the northern kingdom. The book of the prophecies of Amos seems divided into four principal portions closely connected together. (1.) From i. 1 to ii. 8 he denounces the sins of the nations bordering on Israel and Judah; (2.) from ii. 4 to vi. 14, he describes the state of these two kingdoms, especially the former; (3.) in vii. 1 to ix. 10, after reflecting on the previous prophecy, he relates his visit to Bethel, and sketches the impending punishment of Israel which he predicted to Ananiah; (4.) he rises to a loftier strain, looking forward to the time when the hope of the Messiah's kingdom will be fulfilled, and His people forgiven and established in the enjoyment of God's blessings to all eternity. The chief peculiarity of the style consists in the number of allusions to natural objects and agricultural occupations, as might be expected from the early life of the author. See i. 3, ii. 13, iii. 4, 5, iv. 2, 7, 9, v. 8, 19, vi. 12, vii. 1, ix. 3, 9, 13, 14. The references to it in the N. T. are two: v. 25, 26, 27 is quoted in Acts vii. 42, 43, and ix. 11 in Acts xv. 16. As the book is not a series of detached prophecies, but logically and artistically connected in its several parts, it was probably written by Amos as we now have it after his return to Tekoa from his mission to Bethel. (CANON.)—2. SON of Naum, and ancestor of Jesus Christ (Lk. iii. 25).

Amoz (Heb. amôz = strong, Ges.), father of the prophet Isaiah, and, according to Rabbinical tradition, brother of Amaziah, king of Judah (2 K. xix. 2, 20, xx. 1; 2 Chr. xxvi. 22, xxxii. 20, 32; Is. i. 1, ii. 1, xiii. 1, xx. 2, xxxvii. 2, 21, xxxviii. 1).

Am-philip-olis [-fip-] (Gr. round the city; for the river Strymon flowed almost round Amphipolis), a city of Macedonia, through which Paul and Silas passed on their way from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1). It was thirty-three Roman miles from Philippi. It stood upon an eminence on the left or E. bank of the Strymon, just below the lake Cercinitis, and about three miles from the sea. It was a colony of the Athenians, and was memorable in the Peloponnesian war for the battle fought under its walls, in which both Brasidas and Cleon were killed. On its site is now a village called Neokhârio, in Turkish Jeni-Keui, or "New Town."

Amph-as (Gr. fr. L. = extended, enlarged, Schleusner), a Christian at Rome, styled by the Apostle Paul "my beloved in the Lord" (Rom. xvi. 8).

Amram (Heb. kindred of the High, i. e. of God, Ges.). 1. A son of Kohath, and grandson of the patriarch Levi; husband of Jochebed, his father's sister; father of Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Ex. vi. 18, 20; Num. iii. 19, xxvi. 58, 59; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 3, 18). Mr. Wright and others suppose that in this genealogy several generations have been omitted; for from Joseph to Joshua ten generations are recorded (Gen. xlv. 20; 1 Chr. vi. 22-27), while from Levi to Moses there are but three; and again, the Kohathites in the time of Moses mustered 8,600 males, from a month old and upward (Num. iii. 28). But Jochebed, Amram's wife, is described as a daughter of Levi, born to him in Egypt (Num. xxvi. 59); though the suggestion has been made that "Levi" here may = the tribe of Levi instead of the individual. (CHRONOLOGY II.; GENEALOGY.) The faith and firmness of Amram and his wife are favorably noticed (Heb. xi. 23).—2. (Heb. Hamran or Chamran, prob. an error for HEMDAN, Ges.) A son of Dishon and descendant of Seir (1 Chr. i. 41); = HEMDAN.—3. A son of Bani in Ezra's time, husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 34); = OMAEUS in 1 Esd. ix. 34.

Am'ram-ites = descendants of AMRAM 1; a branch of the Kohathite Levites (Num. iii. 27; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23).

Am'ra-pher (Heb. fr. Sanscrit = keeper of the gods, Ges.), a king of Shinar or Babylonia, who joined the incursion of CHEDORLAOMER against the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c. (Gen. xiv.).

Am'u-lets were ornaments, gems, scrolls, &c., worn as preservatives against enchantments, and generally inscribed with mystic forms or characters. The word does not occur in the A. V., but the "ear-rings" in Gen. xxxv. 4, were probably amulets taken from the slain Shechemites. They were among the spoils of Midian (Judg. viii. 24), and perhaps their objectionable character was the reason why Gideon asked for them. In Hos. ii. 13, "decking herself with ear-rings" is mentioned as one of the signs of the "days of Baalim." The "ear-rings" in Is. iii. 20, were also amulets. (EAR-RINGS; ENCHANTMENTS 3; EPHESUS; FRONTLETS.) The Jews were particularly addicted to amulets, and the only restriction placed by the Rabbis on their use was, that none but approved amulets (i. e. such as were known to have cured three persons) were to be worn on the Sabbath. DIVINATION; EPHESUS; FRONTLETS; MAGIC; THERIAUM.

Am'zi (fr. Heb. = strong, Ges.). 1. A Levite of the family of Merari, and ancestor of Ethan the singer (1 Chr. vi. 46).—2. A priest, ancestor of Adaiah in Nehemiah's time (Neh. xi. 12).

Anab (Heb. = place of clusters? Ges.), a town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 50), once belonging to the Anakim (Josh. xi. 21). It has retained its ancient name, and lies among the hills six or eight miles S. S. W. of Hebron (Rbn. i. 494).

An'a-el (Gr. = HANIEL?), brother of Tobit (Tob. i. 21).

Anah (Heb. answer, sc. to prayer, Ges.), son of Zibeon, the son of Seir the Horite, and father of Aholibamah, one of Esau's wives (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 14, 18, 24, 25, 29; 1 Chr. i. 40, 41). Anah was probably the head (A. V. "duke") of a tribe independent of, and equal with, his father's tribe; and Anah is therefore mentioned (Gen. xxxvi. 20; 1 Chr. i. 38) among the sons of Seir who were heads of tribes. In Gen. xxxvi. 2, Aholibamah is described as "the daughter of Anah, the daughter ('son' LXX. and Sam.) of Zibeon the Hivite;" "daughter" in the second case (here = descendant, grand-daughter) referring still to Aholibamah, and not to Anah, as is evident from verse 25. But in Gen. xxvi. 34, the same wife of Esau is called Judith, the daughter of Beeri the Hittite. If therefore Judith = Aholibamah, Beeri the Hittite apparently = Anah the Hivite, and on this supposition there seems to arise a two-fold discrepancy. Anah was a Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 20); but "Hivite," in verse 2, is probably a mistake of the transcriber for "Horite" (and the Alexandrian MS. of the LXX. actually reads "Horite" here), or, as Hengstenberg supposes, Anah may have belonged to that branch of the Hivites, who from living in caves were called Horites or Troglodytes. Hengstenberg conjectures that from his discovering the hot springs in the wilderness (MULE 3), Anah obtained the name BEERI (= the man of the wells), and that the "Hittite," in Gen. xxvi. 1, is a general term = "Canaanite" (comp. Gen. xxvii. 46 with xxviii. 1).

An-a-ha'rath (Heb. hollow way or pass, Fül.), a place in Issachar, named with Shihon and Rabbith (Josh. xix. 19); site unknown.

An'al'ah [ab-nay'ah] or An-a-l'ah (Heb. whom Jehovah answers, Ges.). 1. Probably a priest; one who stood on Ezra's right hand as he read the law to the people (Neh. viii. 4); = ANANIAS in 1 Esd. ix. 43.—2. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 22).

Anak. ANAKIM.

An'a-kim or An'a-kims (Heb. 'andkim, fr. 'andk = length of neck, Ges.), a race of giants, descendants of Arba (Josh. xv. 13, xxi. 11), dwelling in the southern part of Canaan, particularly at Hebron, or Kirjath-Arba. They are also called sons of Anak (Num. xiii. 33), descendants of Anak (Num. xiii. 22), and sons of Anakim (Deut. i. 28). These designations show "Anak" to be the name of the race rather than that of an individual, and accordingly Arba, their progenitor, "was a great man among the Anakim" (Josh. xiv. 15). The race appears to have been divided into three tribes or families, bearing the names Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi. Though the warlike appearance of the Anakim had struck the Israelites with terror (Num. xiii. 28; Deut. ix. 2), they were dispossessed by Joshua, and utterly driven from the land, except a small remnant that found refuge in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (Josh. xi. 21, 22). Hebron became the possession of Caleb, who drove out from it the three sons of Anak mentioned above, i. e. the three families or tribes of the Anakim (Josh. xv. 14; Judg. i. 20). GIANTS.

An'a-mim (Heb.), a Mizraite people or tribe, settled probably in or near Egypt (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 11). MIZRAIM.

An'am-me-lech (Heb. prob. = image of the king, or [so Hyde] head of the king, i. e. the constellation Cepheus, Ges.), an idol of the colonists introduced into Samaria from Sepharvaim (2 K. xvii. 31); the companion-god to ADRAMMELECH.

Anan (Heb. covering, cloud, Ges.). 1. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 26).—2. HANAN 4 (1 Esd. v. 30).

An-a-ni (Heb. = ANANIAH, Ges.), seventh son of Elioenai, and descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 24).

An-a-n'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah covers, i. e. protects, Ges.), probably a priest, and ancestor of AZARIAH 19 (Neh. iii. 23).

An-a-n'ah (see above), a place, named between Nob and Hazor, in which the Benjamites lived after the captivity (Neh. xi. 32).

An-a-ni'as (Gr. fr. Heb. = ANANIAH or HANANIAH).

1. Ancestor of a family of 101 (Vulgate 130) under Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 16); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.—2. HANANI 3 (1 Esd. ix. 21).—3. HANANIAH 9 (1 Esd. ix. 29).—4. ANANIAH 1 (1 Esd. ix. 43).—5. HANAN 5 (1 Esd. ix. 48).—6. Father of the Azarias personated by Raphael (Tob. v. 12, 13). In the LXX. he appears to be Tobit's elder brother.—7. Ancestor of Judith (Jd. viii. 1).—8. HANANIAH 7, or SHADRACH (Sg. 3 H. Ch. 66; 1 Mc. ii. 59).—9. A high-priest in Acts xxiii. 2-5, xxiv. 1. He was the son of Nebedæus, succeeded Joseph son of Camydus, and preceded Ismael son of Phabi. (HIGH-PRIEST.) He was nominated to the office by Herod, king of Chalcis, in A. D. 48; and in A. D. 52 sent to Rome by the prefect Umidius Quadratus to answer before the Emperor Claudius a charge of oppression brought by the Samaritans. He appears, however, not to have lost his office, but to have resumed it on his return. He was deposed shortly before Felix left the province; but still had great power, which he used violently and lawlessly. He was assassinated by the sicarii (or robbers) at the beginning of the last Jewish war.—10. A disciple of Jerusalem, husband of SAPPHIRA (Acts v. 1-11). Having sold his goods for the benefit of the church, he kept back a part of the price, bringing to the apostles the remainder, as if it were the whole, his wife also being privy to the scheme. St. Peter, being enabled by the Spirit to see through the fraud, denounced him as having lied to the Holy Ghost, i. e. having attempted to pass upon the Spirit resident in the apostles an act of deliberate deceit. On hearing this, Ananias fell down and expired. That this incident was no mere physical consequence of St. Peter's severity of tone, as some German writers have maintained, distinctly appears by the direct sentence of a similar death pronounced by the same apostle upon Sapphira a few hours after. Ananias's death may indeed have been unlooked for by the apostle, who was in this matter only the organ and announcer of the divine justice which was pleased by this act of deserved severity to protect the morality of the infant church and strengthen its power for good.—11. A Jewish disciple of Damascus (Acts ix. 10-17), "a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwell there" (Acts xxii. 12). Being ordered by the Lord in a vision, he sought out Saul (PAUL) during the blindness and dejection which followed his conversion, and announced to him his future commission as a preacher of the Gospel, conveying to him at the same time, by the laying on of his hands, the restoration of sight, and commanding him to arise, and be baptized, and wash away his sins, calling on the name of the Lord. Tradition makes him afterward bishop of Damascus, and a martyr.

A'rath (Heb. answer, sc. to prayer, Ges.), father of Shamgar (Judg. iii. 31, v. 6).

A-nath'e-ma (Gr.), literally a thing suspended, in N. T. generally translated "accursed," = Hebrew hérem or chérem, signifying a thing or person devoted. Any object so devoted to the Lord was irredeemable: if an inanimate object, it was to be given to the priests (Num. xviii. 14); if a living creature, it was to be slain (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29). Generally such a vow respected only the idolatrous nations marked out for destruction by the special decree of Jehovah (Num. xxi. 2; Josh. vi. 17; but occasionally the vow was made indefinitely (Judg. xi. 31; 1 Sam. xiv. 24; JEPHTHAH; JONATHAN 1). The breach of such a vow by any one directly or indirectly participating in it was punished with death (Josh. vii. 25; ACHAN). When applied to the extermination of idolatrous nations, according to God's positive command (Ex. xxii. 20; 1 Sam. xv. 3, 21), the idea of a vow appears to be dropped, although a vow was occasionally superadded to the command (Num. xxi. 2; Josh. vi. 17; HORMAH; JERICHO). Anathema is translated "accursed" in N. T. four times (Rom. ix. 3, comp. Ex. xxxii. 32; 1 Cor. xii. 3; Gal. i. 8, 9); once it is not translated (1 Cor. xvi. 22; see MARANATHA), and once (Acts xxiii. 14) it occurs with its kindred verb anathematizô (= to anathematize, to make an anathema, to declare accursed), and the two are translated "we have bound (ourselves) under a great curse," literally we have anathematized ourselves with an anathema. The Greek verb anathematizô also occurs in Mk. xiv. 71 (A. V. "to curse"), Acts xxiii. 12 (A. V. "bound under a curse"), 21 (A. V. "have bound with an oath"), and in 1 Mc. v. 5 (A. V. "destroyed utterly"). CURSE; EXCOMMUNICATION; VOWS.

An'a-theth (Heb. answers, sc. to prayers, Ges.). 1. Son of Becher, a son of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).—2. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 19); or perhaps = "the men of Anathoth" in Neh. vii. 27.

An'a-thoth (see above), a priests' city, in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. vi. 60), the native place of ABIATHAR, ABIEZER 2, JERU 5, and JEREMIAH the prophet. The "men" of Anathoth returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 23; Neh. vii. 27; 1 Esd. v. 18). Anathoth lay on or near the great road from the N. to Jerusalem (Is. x. 30), and is placed by Eusebius and Jerome at three miles from the city. Its position has been discovered (Robinson) at 'Andá, on a broad ridge an hour and a quarter N. N. E. from Jerusalem. The cultivation of the priests survives in tilled fields of grain, with figs and olives. There are the remains of walls and strong foundations; and the quarries still supply Jerusalem with building stone.

Anchor. SHIP.

*An'cient [ane'shent]. (AGE, OLD; ELDER.) "The Ancient of Days" (Dan. vii. 9, 13, 22) is a title of the Supreme King and Judge, i. e. God (comp. "the Eternal").

And'rew (fr. Gr. Andreas = manly), one among the first called of the apostles of our Lord (Jn. i. 40; Mat. iv. 18); brother (whether elder or younger is uncertain) of Simon Peter. He was of Bethsaida, and had been a disciple of John the Baptist. On hearing Jesus a second time designated by him as the Lamb of God, he left his former master, and, with another of John's disciples, attached himself to our Lord. He brought his brother Simon to Jesus (Jn. i. 41). The apparent discrepancy with Mat. iv. 18 ff., Mk. i. 16 ff., where the two appear to have been called together, is no real one; St. John relating the first introduction of the brothers to Jesus, the other evangelists their formal call to follow Him in His ministry. In the catalogue of the apostles, Andrew appears, in Mat. x. 2, Lk. vi. 14, second, next after Peter; but in Mk. iii. 16, Acts i. 13, fourth, after Peter, James, and John, and in company with Philip. And this appears to have been his real place of dignity among the apostles; for in Mk. xiii. 3, we find Peter, James, John, and Andrew, inquiring privately of our Lord about His coming; and in Jn. xii. 22, when certain Greeks wished for an interview with Jesus, they applied through Andrew, who consulted Philip, and with him made the request known to our Lord. This last circumstance, with the Greek character of both their names, may perhaps point to some slight Hellenistic connection on the part of the two apostles; though it is extremely improbable that any of the twelve were Hellenists in the proper sense. When the five thousand in the wilderness want food, Andrew points out the little lad with the five barley loaves and two fishes (Jn. vi. 8 ff.). Scripture relates nothing of him beyond these scattered notices. Traditions about him are various. Eusebius makes him preach in Scythia; Jerome and Theodoret in Achaia (Greece); Nicphorus in Asia Minor and Thrace. He is said to have been crucified at Patræ in Achaia on a cross cecusate (= X), hence called "St. Andrew's cross." (Cross 2.) Some ancient writers speak of an apocryphal Acts of Andrew.

An-dre-ni'cus (L. fr. Gr. = man-conquering). 1. An officer left as viceroy (A. V. "deputy," 2 Mc. iv. 31) in Antioch by Antiochus Epiphanes (B. C. 171). At the instigation of MENELAUS, Andronicus put to death the high-priest ONIAS 3. This murder excited general indignation; and on the return of Antiochus, Andronicus was publicly degraded and executed (2 Mc. iv. 31-38).—2. Another officer of Antiochus Epiphanes left by him on Garizim (2 Mc. v. 23), probably in occupation of the temple there. (GARIZIM).—3. A Christian at Rome, saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 7), together with Junias (JUNIA), both being called "kinsmen" and "fellow-prisoners," and "of note among the apostles" (Dr. Alford takes "apostles" here in the wider sense of this term = Christian messengers and teachers; Prof. Stuart, Conybeare and Howson, and many others take "apostle" in the common meaning, and "of note" as = well known), and described as converted to Christ before himself. One tradition makes him bishop of Pannonia; another, of Spain.

A'mem (Heb. two fountains, Ges.), a city of Issachar, allotted to the Gershonites (1 Chr. vi. 73); perhaps = EN-GANNIM 2.

A'ner (Heb. boy, Ges.; juvenility, Fü.), a city of Manasseh W. of Jordan, allotted to the Kohathites (1 Chr. vi. 70); = TAANACH?

A'ner (see above), one of the three Amorite chiefs of Hebron who aided Abraham in pursuing and routing the four invading kings (Gen. xiv. 13, 24). CHEDORLAOMER.

* A-ne'thon (Gr.; Mat. xxiii. 23, marg.). ANISE.

Am'e-toth-lte (2 Sam. xxiii. 27), Am'e-toth-lte (1 Chr. xxvii. 12), and Am'toth-lte (1 Chr. xi. 28, xii. 3) = an inhabitant of Anathoth in Benjamin.

Am'e-toth-lte = ANETHOTHITE.

Am-ga-reu'o (Gr.). COMPEL.

Ang'els [ane'jelz] (fr. Gr. = messengers = Heb. mal'achim). A race of spiritual beings, exalted above man, although infinitely below God, whose office is "to do Him service in heaven, and by His appointment to succor and defend men on earth." I. Scriptural use of the word.—In many passages "the angel of God," "the angel of Jehovah," is a manifestation of God himself. Compare Gen. xxii. 11 with 12, and Ex. iii. 2 with 6 and 14; where the "angel of Jehovah" is called "God," and "Jehovah," and accepts the worship due to God alone. (Contrast Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 9.) See also Gen. xvi. 7, 13, xxxi. 11, 13, xlviii. 15, 16; Num. xxii. 22, 32, 35, and comp. Is. lxiii. 9 with Ex. xxxiii. 14, &c., &c. Side by side with these expressions, we read of God's being manifested in the form of man; as to Abraham at Mamre (Gen. xviii. 2, 22, comp. xix. 1), to Jacob at Peniel (Gen. xxxii. 24, 30), to Joshua at Gilgal (Josh. v. 13, 15), &c. Apparently both sets of passages refer to the same kind of manifestation of the Divine Presence. Now, since "no man hath seen God" (the Father) "at any time," and "the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, He hath revealed Him" (Jn. i. 18), the "Angel of the Lord" in such passages must be He, who is from the beginning the "Word," i. e. the Manifestor or Revealer of God, and these appearances must be "foreshadowings of the Incarnation." Besides this highest application of "angel" or "messenger," it is used of any messengers of God, as the prophets (Is. xlii. 19; Hag. i. 13; Mal. iii. 1), the priests (Mal. ii. 7), and the rulers of the Christian churches (Rev. i. 20). Compare APOSTLE, and see SYNAGOGUE. Rev. I. Jennings, of Ongar, England, maintains that "the angels of the seven churches" (Rev. i. 20, &c.) = the messengers of the churches to which the epistles were addressed (ii. iii.), whom he supposes those churches sent to the apostle in Patmos (B. S. xii. 346 ff.).—II. Nature of Angels.—Little is said of their nature as distinct from their office. They are termed

"spirits" (as in Heb. i. 14). The word is the same (Gr. pneuma) as that used of the soul of man, when separate from the body (e. g. Mat. xiv. 26; Lk. xxiv. 37, 39; 1 Pet. iii. 19). Many of the Christian Fathers and of the philosophers of the middle ages as well as some modern theologians have maintained the corporeality or materiality of the angelic nature. But their arguments—that the word pneuma denotes only the supersensuous and rational, yet not necessarily immaterial, element of man's nature, that there is a "spiritual (Gr. psuchikon) body" (1 Cor. xv. 44), that men, after the resurrection, having this spiritual body, are yet "like the angels" (Gr. is'angeloi, Lk. xx. 36), and that there is a general resemblance in titles (e. g. "sons of God," "gods") and appearance (Gen. xviii. xix; Lk. xxiv. 4; Acts i. 10, &c.) between angels and men, and that therefore the angels are now both in nature and character what mankind will be in heaven—are all fairly met by arguments drawn from the use of the same word to denote the nature of God (Jn. iv. 24) and designate the Holy Ghost (SPIRIT, THE HOLY), from the known fact that angels are not ordinarily visible or perceptible to human sense, and hence must be, when they become visible, different in some important respect from what they usually are, from the fact that the spiritual or glorified bodies of the redeemed are represented as like Christ's (Phil. iii. 21) and not as angelic, and from the acknowledged imperfection of the figurative human language which the sacred writers must use in attempting to describe all invisible things, including the human soul and God Himself. (See Prof. Stuart in B. S. for 1843, pp. 88-154, or in Comm. on Apocalypse, ii. 397-409.)—The angels are revealed to us as finite, created beings, holy and lovely, happy and immortal, endowed with power and might, knowledge and wisdom, desires and sympathies, affections and wills; in short, as superhuman moral agents, beings who think and feel and choose, and are capable of unlimited progress, the proper and glorious inhabitants of heaven (Ps. viii. 5, ciii. 20; Mat. vi. 10, xviii. 10, xxiv. 36; Mk. xiii. 32; Lk. xv. 10; Eph. iii. 10; Col. i. 16; 2 Th. i. 7; 1 Pet. i. 12; 2 Pet. ii. 11; Rev. vii. 11, &c.).—The angels are very numerous (Dan. vii. 10; Heb. xii. 22; Rev. v. 11, &c.), and are called the "holy angels," "angels of God," "elect angels," "angels of light," "holy ones," &c. (Gen. xxviii. 12; Dan. iv. 13, 23, viii. 13; Mat. xxv. 31; Lk. ix. 26; 2 Cor. xi. 14; 1 Tim. v. 21, &c.), in distinction from the angels which "kept not their first estate," or "the devil and his angels," &c. (APOLLYON; DEMON; DEVIL; SATAN).—III. Office of the angels.—Of their office in heaven, we have only vague prophetic glimpses (1 K. xxii. 19; Is. vi. 1-3; Dan. vii. 9, 10; Rev. v. 11, &c.), which show us nothing but a never-ceasing adoration. Their office toward man is far more fully described. They are represented as, in the widest sense, agents of God's providence, natural and supernatural, to the body and to the soul. The operations of nature are spoken of, as under angelic guidance fulfilling the will of God. Thus the pestilences which slew the first-born (Ex. xii. 23; Heb. xii. 28), the disobedient people in the wilderness (1 Cor. x. 10), the Israelites in the days of David (2 Sam. xxiv. 16; 1 Chr. xxi. 16), and the army of Sennacherib (2 K. xix. 35; 2 Chr. xxxii. 21), as also the plague which cut off Herod (Acts xii. 23), are plainly spoken of as the work of the "angel of the Lord." Nor can the numerous declarations of the Apocalypse be resolved into mere poetical imagery. (See especially Rev. viii. and ix.) More particularly, however, angels are spoken of as ministers of the supernatural (or spiritual) providence of God; as agents in the spiritual redemption and sanctification of man. In Job (i. 6, ii. 1, xxxviii. 7) they are spoken of vaguely, as surrounding God's throne above, and rejoicing in the completion of His creative work, without any hint of their direct and visible appearance to man. In Genesis, after the call of Abraham, the angels mingle with and watch over the chosen family, entertained by Abraham and by Lot (Gen. xviii., xix.), guiding Abraham's servant to Padan-aram (xxiv. 7, 40), seen by the fugitive Jacob at Bethel (xxviii. 12), and welcoming his return at Mahanaim (xxxii. 1). Their ministry hallows domestic life, and is closer, more familiar, and less awful than in after-times. (Contrast Gen. xviii. with Judg. vi. 21, 22, xiii. 16, 22.) In the subsequent history of the chosen nation, the records of their appearance belong especially to the periods of the Judges, and of the Captivity, the former one destitute of direct revelation or prophetic guidance, the latter one of special trial and unusual contact with heathenism. In Judges angels appear to rebuke idolatry (ii. 1-4), to call Gideon (vi. 11, &c.) and consecrate Samson (xiii. 8, &c.) to the work of deliverance. During the prophetic and kingly period, angels appear when needed by the prophets themselves (1 K. xix. 5; 2 K. vi. 17), and are (as noticed above) ministers of God in the operations of nature. But in the Captivity, angels are revealed as watching, not only over Jerusalem, but also over heathen kingdoms, under the providence, and to work out the designs, of the Lord. (See Zech.; also Dan. iv. 13, 23, x. 10, 13, 20, 21, &c.) The Incarnation marks a new epoch of angelic ministration. "The angel of Jehovah," the lord of all created angels, having now descended from heaven to earth, it was natural that His servants should continue to do Him service there. Whether to predict and glorify His birth itself (Mat. i. 20; Lk. i. ii.), to minister to Him after His temptation and agony (Mat. iv. 11; Lk. xxii. 43), or to declare His resurrection and triumphant ascension (Mat. xxviii. 2; Jn. xx. 12; Acts i. 10 11) they seem now to be indeed "ascending and descending on the Son of man," almost as though transferring to earth the ministrations of heaven. The N. T. is the history of the Church of Christ, every member of which is united to Him. Accordingly, the angels are revealed now, as "ministering spirits" to each individual member of Christ for His spiritual guidance and aid (Heb. i. 14). The records of their visible appearance are unfrequent (Acts v. 19, viii. 26, x. 3, xii. 7, xxvii. 23); but their presence and aid are referred to familiarly ever after the Incarnation. They watch over Christ's little ones (Mat. xviii. 10), rejoice over a penitent sinner (Lk. xv. 10), are present in the worship of Christians (1 Cor. xi. 10) and, perhaps, bring their prayers before God (Rev. viii. 3, 4), and bear the souls of the redeemed into Paradise (Lk. xvi. 22). In one word, they are Christ's ministers of grace now, as they shall be of judgment hereafter (Mat. xiii. 39, 41, 49, xvi. 27, xxiv. 31, &c.). The mode of their action is not made known to us. (For the evil angels, see DEMON; DEMONIAIC; DEVIL; SATAN.) That there are degrees of the angelic nature, fallen and unfallen, and special titles and agencies belonging to each, is clearly declared (Eph. i. 21; Rom. viii. 38). #### Ang'ling. FISHING.

A'ni-am (Heb. sighing of the people, Ges.), a Manas-site, son of Shemidah (1 Chr. vii. 19).

A'nim (Heb. fountains, Ges.), a city in the mountains of Judah, named with Eshtemoah and Goshen (Josh. xv. 50); probably at the ruined village el-Ghuwein, about ten miles south of Hebron (Wln. i. 354; Rbn. ii. 204).

An'ise [an'is] (Gr. anêthon). This word occurs only in Mat. xxiii. 23, "Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! for ye pay tithe of mint and anise (marg. "Gr. anethon, dill") and cummin." It is by no means certain whether the anise (Pimpinella Anisum, Linn.) or the dill (Anethum graveolens) is here intended, but more probably the latter. Both the dill and the anise are umbelliferous plants, and are much alike in external character; the seeds of both, moreover, are aromatic, and have been long employed in medicine and cookery, as condiments and carminatives. Both are cultivated, but dill is said to be more a plant of Eastern cultivation than anise.

Anise (Pimpinella Anisum.)

Ank'let. This word does not occur in the A. V., but the thing denoted by it is mentioned in the plural (Is. iii. 18, Heb. 'achûsim, A. V. "tinkling ornaments about their feet;" see also Is. iii. 16). Anklets were fastened to the ankle-band of each leg, were as common as bracelets and armlets, and made of much the same materials; the pleasant jingling and tinkling which they made as they knocked against each other, was no doubt a reason why they were admired. They are still worn in the East, and Lane (Mod. Egypt) quotes from a song, in allusion to the pleasure caused by their sound, "the ringing of thine anklets has deprived me of reason." Hence Mohammed forbade them in public; "let them not make a noise with their feet, that their ornaments which they hide may (thereby) be discovered" (Koran, xxiv. 31). BELLS; CHAIN; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.

Anklets (fr. Ayre).

1, 2, 3, 4. Egyptian from paintings. 5. Modern, worn by dancing-girls. 6, 7. Assyrian, of iron and bronze, from originals in the Nineveh Collection, British Museum.

An'na (G. and L. fr. Heb. = HANNAH), the name in Punic of Dido's sister (Virgil, Æneid, iv.); used in the LXX. and Vulgate for HANNAH (1 Sam. i. 2 ff.) and in the Vulgate for EDNA (Tob. vii. 2 ff.). 1. The wife of Tobit (Tob. i. 9 ff.).—2. An aged widow and "prophetess" in Jerusalem at the time of our Lord's presentation in the Temple (Lk. ii. 36). She was of the tribe of ASHER.

An'na-as (1 Esd. v. 23) = SENAAS.

An'nas (Gr.). 1. HARIM (1 Esd. ix. 32).—2. (fr. Heb. = HANAN, FÜ.). A high-priest of the Jews. He was son of one Seth, and was appointed high-priest A. D. 7, by Quirinus, imperial governor of Syria; but was obliged by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea, to give way to Ismael, son of Phabi, at the beginning of the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 14. But soon Ismael was succeeded by Eleazar, son of Annas; then followed, after one year, Simon, son of Camithus, and then, after another year, (about A. D. 25), Joseph CALAPHAS, son-in-law of Annas (Jn. xviii.

18). But in Lk. iii. 2, Annas and Caiaphas are both called high-priests, Annas being mentioned first. Our Lord's first hearing (Jn. xviii. 13) was before Annas, who then sent him bound to Caiaphas. In Acts iv. 6, Annas is plainly called the high-priest, and Caiaphas merely named with others of his family. Winer supposes that Annas retained the title from his former enjoyment of the office. Wieseler and Selden maintain that the two, Annas and Caiaphas, were together at the head of the Jewish people, Caiaphas as actual high-priest, Annas as president of the Sanhedrim. Others again suppose that Annas held the office of sagan, or substitute of the high-priest, mentioned by the later Talmudists. (Comp. ABIATHAR.) He lived to old age, having had five sons high-priests.

An-nu-us (fr. Gr.; 1 Esd. viii. 48). Probably a corruption of the Hebrew word ânô, A. V. "with him" (Ezr. viii. 19).

Anoint'ing in the Scriptures is either I. Material, with oil, or II. Spiritual, with the Holy Ghost.—I. Material.—1. Ordinary. Anointing the body or head with oil was a common practice with the Jews, as with other Oriental nations (Deut. xxviii. 40; Ru. iii. 8; Mic. vi. 15; BATH). Abstinence from it was a sign of mourning (2 Sam. xiv. 2; Dan. x. 3; Mat. vi. 17). Anointing the head with oil or ointment seems also to have been a mark of respect sometimes paid by a host to his guests (Lk. vii. 46 and Ps. xxiii. 5; see also Jn. xi. 2, xii. 3), and was an ancient Egyptian custom at feasts. From the discontinuance of anointing in times of sorrow and disaster, to "be anointed with oil" = to enjoy success or prosperity (Ps. xcii. 10; comp. Eccl. ix. 8; OIL; OINTMENT).—2. Official (MESSIAH). (a) Prophets were occasionally anointed to their office (1 K. xix. 16), and are called messiahs, or anointed (1 Chr. xvi. 22; Ps. cv. 15). (b) Priests, at the institution of the Levitical priesthood, were all anointed to their offices, Aaron's sons as well as Aaron himself (Ex. xl. 15; Num. iii. 3); but afterward anointing seems to have been especially reserved for the high-priest (Ex. xxix. 29; Lev. xvi. 32); so that "the priest that is anointed" (Lev. iv. 3) probably = the high-priest (so the LXX. and most). See also Lev. iv. 5, 16, and vi. 22. (c) The Hebrews were familiar with anointing kings before they had any (Judg. ix. 8, 15). Anointing was the principal and divinely-appointed ceremony in the inauguration of their kings (1 Sam. ix. 16, x. 1; 1 K. i. 34, 39); indeed, "the Lord's anointed" was a common designation of the theocratic king (1 Sam. xii. 3, 5; 2 Sam. i. 14, 16; xix. 21). David was thrice anointed to be king: (1.) privately by Samuel, before Saul's death, to confer on him a right to the throne (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13); (2.) over Judah at Hebron (2 Sam. ii. 4); (3.) over the whole nation (2 Sam. v. 3). After the separation, the kings both of Judah and of Israel seem still to have been anointed (2 K. ix. 3, xi. 12). So late as the Captivity the king is called "the anointed of the Lord" (Ps. lxxxix. 38, 51; Lam. iv. 20). Some, however, think, that after David, subsequent kings were not anointed, except when, as in the cases of Solomon, Joash, and Jehu, the right of succession was disputed or transferred (Jahn, Bib. Archaeology). Hazael was to be anointed king over Syria (1 K. xix. 15). Cyrus also is called the Lord's anointed, as raised by God to the throne to deliver the Jews out of captivity (Is. xlv. 1). (d) Inanimate objects were anointed with oil as set apart for religious service. Thus Jacob anointed a pillar at Bethel (Gen. xxxi. 13); the tabernacle and all its furniture were consecrated by anointing (Ex. xxx. 26–28).—3. Ecclési- l'cal. Anointing with oil in the name of the Lord is prescribed by St. James to be used together with prayer, by the elders of the church, for the recovery of the sick (Jas. v. 14). Analogous to this is the anointing with oil practised by the twelve (Mk. vi. 13), and our Lord's anointing the eyes of a blind man with clay made from saliva, in restoring him miraculously to sight (Jn. ix. 6, 11).—II. Spiritual.—1. In the O. T. a deliverer is promised under the title of MESSIAH, or Anointed (Ps. ii. 2; Dan. ix. 25, 26); and his anointing is described to be with the Holy Ghost (Is. lxi. 1; see Lk. iv. 18). As anointing with oil betokened prosperity, and produced a cheerful aspect (Ps. civ. 15), so this spiritual unction is figuratively described as anointing "with the oil of gladness" (Ps. xlv. 7; Heb. i. 9). In the N. T. Jesus of Nazareth is shown to be the Messiah, or Christ, or Anointed of the O. T. (Jn. i. 41; Acts ix. 22, xvii. 2, 3, xviii. 5, 28); and his being anointed with the Holy Ghost is asserted and recorded (Jn. i. 32, 33; Acts iv. 27, x. 38).—2. Spiritual anointing with the Holy Ghost is conferred also upon Christians by God (2 Cor. i. 21; 1 Jn. ii. 20, 27; SPIRIT, THE HOLY). To anoint the eyes with eye-salve figuratively denotes the process of obtaining spiritual perception (Rev. iii. 18).

A'nos (fr. Gr.), a son of Maani or Bani; perhaps = VANIAH (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Ant (Heb. nēmālāh). This insect is mentioned twice in the O. T.: in Prov. vi. 6, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise;" in xxx. 25, "The ants are a people not strong, yet they prepare their meat in the summer." In the former passage the unforced diligence of this insect is instanced as an example worthy of imitation; in the latter the ant's wisdom is especially alluded to, for these insects, though "little upon the earth, are exceeding wise." It is well known that the ancient Greeks and Romans believed that the ant stored up food, which it collected in the summer, ready for the winter's consumption; but this is now considered by most naturalists an error. Ants are carnivorous, or rather omnivorous, in their habits of living. They eat sweet fruits, crumbs of bread, animal food of various kinds &c.; but their favorite food is the saccharine secretion from the bodies of the aphides or plant-lice. The European species of ants are all dormant in the winter, and consequently require no food; but until we know more accurately the habits of ants in Palestine and other warm countries "it would be rash to affirm that no ants have magazines for provisions" (Kirby and Spence, Introd. to Entomology, ii. 46). "They are great robbers; and the farmer must keep a sharp eye to his floor in harvest, or they will abstract a large quantity of grain in a single night" (Thn. i. 520-1).—The words of Solomon do not necessarily teach that ants store up food for future use, though they have been commonly so understood. Kirby and Spence say: "He does not affirm that the ant, which he proposes to the sluggard as an example, laid up in her magazine stores of grain against winter, but that, with considerable prudence and foresight, she makes use of proper reasons to collect a supply of provisions sufficient for her purposes. She prepares her bread and gathers her food (viz., such food as is suited to her) in summer and harvest (i. e. when it is most plentiful), and thus shows her wisdom and prudence by using the advantages offered to her." The accuracy of Solomon may also be vindicated, if, as is not improbable, the Heb. nēmālāh includes the termites, or "white ants," which, although belonging to a different order of insects, are yet popularly associated with "ants." "White ants" are especially abundant in tropical regions, but one or more among the numerous species may be found in most temperate climates. They form populous societies, and their habitations often contain large stores of vegetable food.

An'ti-christ (fr. Gr. = against Christ or instead of Christ). This term is employed only by the Apostle John in his second and third Epistles. Nevertheless, by an almost universal consent, the term has been applied to the Man of Sin in 2d Thessalonians, to the Little Horn and to the fierce-countenanced King in Daniel, and to the two Beasts of Revelation, as well as to the false Christ spoken of in Mat. xxiv.—I. In Mat. xxiv. 3-31, our Lord is not speaking of any one individual (or polity), but rather of those forerunners of the Antichrist who are his servants and actuated by his spirit. This passage does not therefore elucidate for us the characteristics of the Antichrist.—II. The Antichrist is mentioned in several passages in the Epistles of John (1 Jn. ii. 18-23, iv. 1-8; 2 Jn. 5-7). The whole teaching here with regard to the Antichrist himself seems to be confined to the words twice repeated, "Ye have heard (i. e. by oral teaching from the apostle) that the Antichrist shall come." The rest appears to be rather a practical application of the doctrine of the Antichrist than a formal statement of it. The apostle warns his readers that the spirit of the Antichrist could exist even then, though the coming of the Antichrist himself was future, and that all who denied the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus were Antichrists, as being wanting in that divine principle of love which is the essence of Christianity, and thus being types of the final Antichrist who was to come.—III. St. Paul (2 Th. ii. 1-12; 1 Tim. iv. 1-3; 2 Tim. iii. 1-5) does not employ the term Antichrist, but there can be no hesitation in identifying with the Antichrist who was to come "that Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition, who opposeth and exalted himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped." He also refers to his previous oral teaching, and says that "the mystery of iniquity (i. e. the spirit of Antichrist or Antichristianism) doth already work." He adds an assurance that the Antichrist should not be revealed in person until some present obstacle to his appearance should have been taken away, and until the predicted "falling away" or apostasy should have occurred. From St. John and St. Paul together we learn (1.) that the Antichrist would come; (2.) that he would not come until a certain obstacle to his coming (supposed by the early Christian writers to be the power of secular law existing in the Roman empire) was removed; (3.) nor till the time of, or rather till after the "falling away;" (4.) that his characteristics would be (a) open opposition to God and religion, (b) a claim to the incommunicable attributes of God, (c) iniquity, sin, and lawlessness, (d) a power of working lying miracles, (e) marvellous capacity of beguiling souls; (5.) that he would be actuated by Satan; (6.) that his spirit was already at work, manifesting itself, partially, incompletely, and typically, in the teachers of infidelity and immorality already abounding in the Church. This last is considered as referring to such as Cerinthus, Simon Magus, the Gnostics, &c.—IV. The fierce-countenanced King of Dan. viii. 8-25, xi. 36-39, is universally recognized to be ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, who is regarded as the chief prototype of the Antichrist; and the prophecy may therefore be considered as typically descriptive of the Antichrist.—V. In the prophecy of the Little Horn (Dan. vii. 7-27)

the four beasts represent four kings, i. e. four kingdoms or empires (= the Assyrian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires), and the last (the Roman) breaks up into ten kingdoms, among which grows up another (the Little Horn) which gets the mastery over three of the ten. This Little Horn is not an individual, but a kingdom or polity, and therefore cannot be identified with the Antichrist of St. John's and St. Paul's Epistles.—VI. The Apocalyptic Beast of St. John (Rev. xiii. 1-8, xvii. 1-18) is clearly identical with the Little Horn of Daniel, and therefore is not the Antichrist. But it is evident that the two former sustain some relation to the Antichrist. There are four classes of writers on the Antichrist:—(1.) those who regard him as an individual yet future, among whom are most of the early Christian Fathers, the early Waldenses, &c.; (2.) those who regard him as a polity now present, among whom are the Waldenses of the fourteenth century, Wickliffites, Hussites, Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, &c., all regarding the system of Popery as the Antichrist; (3.) those who regard him as an individual already past, among whom are Roman Catholics on one side, and Grotius, Eichhorn, Hug, Ewald, Stuart, Davidson, &c., on the other, their general view being that the Apocalypse describes the triumph of Christianity over Judaism in the first century and over Heathenism in the third; (4.) those who consider the Antichrist as an antichristian and lawless principle not embodied either in an individual or in a special polity, e. g. Koppe, Storr, Nitzsch, Pelt. Of these four opinions the first two appear to contain the truth between them (so Mr. Meyrick). The Apocalyptic Beast may be identified with "the falling away" (2 Th. ii. 3; not "a falling away," as in A. V.), and the antitype of both may be found in the corrupted Church of Christ, in which there has been a falling away from her purity and first love into unfaithfulness to God, exhibited especially in idolatry and creature-worship. As a religious defection grows up by degrees, we cannot point to its precise commencement. Cyril of Jerusalem (fourth century) considered it already existing. The decrees of the second Council of Nice, A. D. 787, and the theory of the Papal Supremacy put forth by Pope Gregory VII. (eleventh century) and subsequently prevalent to the sixteenth century and onward, are noticeable in this connection. According to the view here presented, the fall of BABYLON (i. e. of Rome) would be as yet future, as well as the still subsequent destruction of the corrupted Church, on the day of the coming of Christ. The period of the three and a half times would continue down to this destruction.—VII. The Apocalyptic Beast from the Earth (Rev. xiii. 11-18), or the False Prophet (xix. 11-21; comp. xvi. 13), apparently represent the Antichrist, if the Antichrist appears at all in the Apocalypse. The characteristics of this Beast are (1.) miracle-working, (2.) a special power of beguiling, (3.) an outward resemblance to the Messiah ("horns like a lamb"), (4.) the title "The False Prophet," our Lord being emphatically "The Prophet." Compare 2 Th. ii. 1-12, and III. 4 above. The antitype of this might be an individual person who will at some future time arise, and ally himself with the corrupted Church, represent himself as her minister and vindicator (Rev. xiii. 12), compel men by violence to pay her reverence (14), breathe a new life into her decaying frame by his use of the secular arm in her behalf (15), forbidding civil rights to those who renounce her authority and reject her symbols (17), and putting them to death by the sword (15), while personally he is an atheistical blasphemer (1 Jn. ii. 22), and sums up in himself the evil spirit of unbelief which has been working in the world from St. Paul's days to his (2 Th. ii. 7). The Antichrist would thus combine the forces, generally and happily separated, of Infidelity and Superstition. In this would consist the special horror of his reign. Hence also the special sufferings of the faithful believers until Christ Himself once again appears to vindicate the cause of Truth and Liberty and Religion.

The capital of the Grecian kings of Syria, and afterward the residence of the Roman governor of the province of Syria; situated where the chain of Lebanon running N., abruptly meets that of Taurus running E. Here the Orontes breaks through the mountains, and Antioch was placed at a bend of the river, partly on an island, partly on the level which forms the left bank, and partly on the steep and craggy ascent of Mount Silpius, which rose abruptly on the S. and grove of laurels and cypresses, a nursery of heathenish pollution (2 Mc. iv. 33); whence the city was sometimes called "ANTIOCH by Daphne." Antioch was founded 300 B. C., by Seleucus Nicator. Jews were settled there from the first in large numbers, were governed by their own ethnarch, and allowed to have the same political privileges with the Greeks. Antioch grew under the Seleucid kings, till it became a city of great extent and of remarkable beauty. Some of the most magnificent buildings were on the island. One feature, apparently characteristic of the great Assyrian cities—a vast street with colonnades, intersecting the whole from end to end—was added by Antiochus Epiphanes. For some notices of the Antioch of this period, and of its relation to Jewish history, see 1 Mc. iii. 37, xi. 13; 2 Mc. iv. 7-9, v. 21, xi. 36. It is the Antioch of the Roman period with which we are concerned in the N. T. By Pompey it had been made a free city, and such it continued till the time of Antoninus Pius. The early emperors raised there some large and important structures, such as aqueducts, amphitheatres, and baths. Herod the Great contributed a road and a colonnade. The citizens of Antioch under the Empire were noted for scurrilous wit and the invention of nicknames. This perhaps was the origin of the name CHRISTIAN.—No city, after Jerusalem, is so intimately connected with the history of the apostolic church. These two cities were closely associated in certain points. One of the seven deacons appointed at Jerusalem, was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (Acts vi. 5). The Christians, dispersed from Jerusalem at Stephen's death, preached the Gospel at Antioch (xi. 19). From Jerusalem, Agabus, who foretold the famine, and other prophets, came to Antioch (xi. 27, 28); and Barnabas and Saul were consequently sent on a mission of charity from Antioch to Jerusalem (xi. 30, xii. 25). From Jerusalem the Judaizers came, who disturbed the church at Antioch (xv. 1); and at Antioch St. Paul rebuked St. Peter

Paul exercised his ministerial work (xi. 22–26, xiv. 26–28, xv. 35, and xviii. 22, 23); here he began and ended his first and second missionary journeys (xiii. 1–3, xiv. 26, xv. 36, xviii. 22), and entered upon the third (28). To the Gentile converts at Antioch were especially addressed the letters from the apostles, &c., at Jerusalem (xv. 23). Antioch was afterward an important centre for Christian progress. Ignatius, who suffered martyrdom under Trajan at Rome, was bishop of Antioch forty years; Chrysostom, the eloquent preacher, was born at Antioch. The bishop has been styled patriarch of Antioch since the fourth century; and this title is now borne by prelates of three Oriental churches (Greek, Syriac, and Maronite), though for a long time none of them have resided at Antioch. The nominal Christians at Antioch (mod. Antakia) were estimated at 2,000, and the whole population at 20,000, in 1856, when American Protestant missionaries began to preach the Gospel there. Antioch has suffered greatly from wars and earthquakes. It for conduct into which he had been betrayed through the influence of emissaries from Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 11, 12).—At Antioch the first Gentile church was founded (Acts xi. 20, 21); here the disciples of Jesus Christ were first called Christians (xi. 26); here St.

was a principality under the Crusaders A. D. 1098–1269. In 1269 its churches were destroyed by its captor, the Sultan Bibars.—2. In PISIDIA (Acts xiii. 14, xiv. 19, 21; 2 Tim. iii. 11), on the borders of Phrygia, at the modern Yalobatch, which is distant from Ak-sheer (now known to be the ancient Philomelium, but formerly supposed to be the site of Antioch in Pisidia) six hours over the mountains. The ruins are very considerable. This city, like No. 1, was founded by Seleucus Nicator. Under the Romans it became a colony, and was also called Cesarea. When St. Paul first visited the city, (Acts xiii. 14), in his first missionary journey with Barnabas, his preaching in the synagogue led to the reception of the Gospel by many Gentiles: and this resulted in a violent persecution by the Jews, who first drove him from Antioch to Iconium (50, 51), and subsequently followed him even to Lystra (xiv. 19). St. Paul, on his return from Lystra, revisited Antioch to strengthen the disciples (21). He probably visited Antioch again at the beginning of his second journey, when Silas was his associate, and Timotheus (Τιμόθεος), a native of this neighborhood, had just joined to the party. An-ti-o-chi'a [-ki'ah] (1 Mc. iv. 35, vi. 63; 2 Mc. iv. 33, v. 21) = ANTIOCH 1.

An-ti-o-chi-an [-ke-anz], partisans of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mc. iv. 9, 19).

An-ti-o-chis [-kis] (Gr.) concubine of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mc. iv. 30).

An-ti-o-chus [-kus] (L. fr. Gr. = the withstander), father of Numenius, ambassador from Jonathan to the Romans (1 Mc. xii. 16, xiv. 22).

An-ti-o-chus (see above) II., king of Syria, surnamed Theos (Gr. the God), succeeded his father Antiochus Soter, B. C. 261. During the earlier part of his reign he was engaged in a fierce war with Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, in the course of which Parthia and Bactria revolted and became independent kingdoms. At length (B. C. 253) peace was made, and the two monarchs "joined themselves together," and Ptolemy ("the king of the South") gave his daughter Berenice in marriage to Antiochus ("the king of the North"), who set aside his former wife, Laodice, to receive her. When Ptolemy died (B. C. 247), Antiochus recalled Laodice and her children Seleucus and Antiochus to court. Thus Berenice was "not able to retain her power;" and Laodice, in jealous fear lest she might again lose her ascendancy, poisoned Antiochus (him "that strengthened her," i. e. Berenice), and caused Berenice and her infant son to be put to death, B. C. 246. After the death of Antiochus, Ptolemy Euergetes, brother of Berenice ("out of a branch of her roots"), who succeeded his father Ptolemy Philadelphus, avenged his sister's death by an invasion of Syria, in which Laodice was killed, her son Seleucus Callinicus driven for a time from the throne, and the whole country plundered. The hostilities thus renewed continued many years; and on the death of Seleucus, B. C. 223, after his "return into his own land," his sons Alexander (Seleucus) Ceraunus and Antiochus "assembled a multitude of great forces" against Ptolemy Philopator, the son of Euergetes, and one of them (Antiochus) threatened to overthrow the power of Egypt (Dan. xi. 6-11).

An-ti-o-chus III. (see above), surnamed the Great, succeeded his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, who was assassinated after a short reign B. C. 223. He prosecuted the war against Ptolemy Philopator with vigor, and at first with success. B. C. 218 he drove the Egyptian forces to Sidon, conquered Samaria and Gilead, and wintered at Ptolemais, but was defeated next year at Raphia, near Gaza (B. C. 217), with immense loss, and in consequence made a peace with Ptolemy, in which he ceded to him the disputed provinces of Celosyria, Phenicia, and Palestine. During the next thirteen years Antiochus was strengthening his position in Asia Minor, and on the frontiers of Parthia, and by his successes gained his surname of the Great. B. C. 205, Ptolemy Philopator died, and left his kingdom to his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, who was only five years old. Antiochus then united with Philip III. of Macedon to conquer and divide the Egyptian dominions. The Jews, exasperated by the conduct of Ptolemy Philopator both in Palestine and Egypt, openly espoused his cause, under the influence of a short-sighted policy ("the factious among thy people shall rise," i. e. against Ptolemy). Antiochus occupied the three disputed provinces, but was recalled to Asia by a war with Attalus, king of Pergamus; and his ally Philip was embroiled with the Romans. Then Ptolemy, by the aid of Scopus, again made himself master of Jerusalem, and recovered the territory which he had lost. B. C. 198, Antiochus reappeared in the field and gained a decisive victory "near the sources of the Jordan;" and afterward captured Scopus and the remnant of his forces in Sidon. The Jews, who had suffered severely during the struggle, welcomed Antiochus as their deliverer, and "he stood in the glorious land which by his hand was to be consumed." His further designs against Egypt were frustrated by Roman intervention; and his daughter Cleopatra, whom he gave in marriage to Ptolemy Epiphanes, with the Phenician provinces for her dowry, favored the interests of her husband rather than those of her father. From Egypt Antiochus turned again to Asia Minor, and after various successes, crossed over to Greece, and by the advice of Hannibal entered on a war with Rome. His victorious course was checked at Thermopylae (B. C. 191), and he was finally defeated at Magnesia in Lydia, B. C. 190. By the peace concluded B. C. 188, he was forced to cede all his possessions "on the Roman side of Mount Taurus," and to pay an enormous sum to defray the expenses of the war.

This last condition led to his ignominious death. B. C. 187 he attacked a rich temple of Belus in Elymais, and was slain by the people who rose in its defence. Thus "he stumbled and fell, and was not found" (Dan. xi. 11-19).—Antiochus not only assured to the Jews perfect freedom and protection in their worship, but made splendid contributions toward the support of the temple ritual, and gave various immunities to the priests and other inhabitants of Jerusalem. He also transported two thousand families of Jews from Mesopotamia to Lydia and Phrygia, to repress the tendency to revolt manifested in those provinces. Two sons of Antiochus succeeded him, first SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR, then ANTIOCHUS IV.

An-ti-o-chus (see above) IV., E-piph'a-nes [e-pif'a-neez] (Gr. the illustrious), the youngest son of ANTIO-

CHUS THE GREAT. He was given as a hostage to the Romans (B. C. 188) after his father's defeat at Magnesia. B. C. 175 he was released by the intervention of his brother SELEUCUS, who substituted his own son Demetrius in his place. Antiochus was at Athens when Seleucus was assassinated by Heliodorus. By the assistance of Eumenes and Attalus, he easily expelled the usurper Heliodorus, and himself "obtained the kingdom by flatteries," to the exclusion of his nephew Demetrius. The accession of Antiochus was immediately followed by desperate efforts of the Hellenizing party at Jerusalem to assert their supremacy. JASON 4 persuaded the king to transfer the high-priesthood from his brother ONIAS III. to him, and bought permission to carry out his design of habituating the Jews to Greek customs; but three years afterward MENELAUS, who offered the king a larger bribe, was appointed high-priest, while Jason took refuge among the Ammonites. From these circumstances, and from the marked honor with which Antiochus was received at Jerusalem very early in his reign (about B. C. 173), it appears that he easily regained the border provinces given as the dower of his sister Cleopatra to Ptolemy Epiphanes. But his ambition led him to undertake four campaigns against Egypt, B. C. 171, 170, 169, 168, and his complete conquest of the country was prevented only by Roman interference. The exhaustion of his treasury, and the armed conflicts of the rival high-priests whom he had appointed, furnished the occasion for an assault upon Jerusalem on his return from his second Egyptian campaign (B. C. 170), which he had probably planned with Ptolemy Philometor, who was at that time in his power. The Temple was plundered, a terrible massacre took place, and a Phrygian governor was left with Menelaus in charge of the city. At the close of the fourth Egyptian expedition, two years afterward, Antiochus detached a force under Apollonius to occupy Jerusalem and fortify it, and availed himself of the assistance of the ancestral enemies of the Jews. The decrees then followed which have rendered his name infamous. The Temple was desecrated, and the observance of the law was forbidden. "On the 15th day of Casleu the Syrians set up the ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION (i. e. an idol altar) upon the altar." Ten days afterward an offering was made upon it to Jupiter Olympius. At Jerusalem all opposition appears to have ceased; but Mattathias and his sons organized a successful resistance ("holpen with a little help"). (MACCABEES.) Meanwhile Antiochus turned his arms toward Parthia and Armenia. Hearing not long afterward of the riches of a temple of Nanea in Elymais (comp. ANTIOCHUS III.), he resolved to plunder it. The attempt was defeated; and the event hastened his death. He retired to Babylon, and thence to Tabæ in Persia, where he died, B. C. 164, the victim of superstition, terror, and remorse, having first heard of the successes of the Maccabees in restoring the Temple-worship at Jerusalem (1 Mc. i.-vi.; 2 Mc. i., iv., v.). "He came to his end and there was none to help him."—The reign of Antiochus was the last great crisis in Jewish history before the coming of our Lord. The prominence given to it in prophecy (Dan. vii. 8, 25, viii. 11 ff., xi. 21-45) fitly accords with its typical and representative character. (ANTICHRIST.) The conquest of ALEXANDER THE GREAT (ALEXANDER) had introduced Greek thought and life into the Jewish nation; and now, after one hundred and fifty years, an outward struggle must decide whether Judaism was to be merged in a rationalized Paganism, or to become purer and more vigorous. The exposed position of Judea between Syria and Egypt, the terrible crimes of the wars of "the N. and S.," and the persecutions first from Egypt and then from Syria, all betokened the approaching struggle. Politically the Jews must now either be independent, or abandon every prophetic hope. Nor was their social and religious position less perilous. Foreign influence had made itself felt in daily life; and before the rising of the Maccabees no opposition was offered, even by the priests, to the execution of the king's decrees. (JASON 4.) Antiochus at first imitated the liberal policy of his predecessors; and the occasion for his attacks was furnished by the Jews themselves. Able, energetic, and liberal to profusion, Antiochus was reckless and unscrupulous in the execution of his plans. He had learned at Rome to court power and to dread it. He gained an empire, and remembered that he had been a hostage. Regardless himself of the gods of his fathers, he did not appreciate religion in others; and he became a type of the enemy of God (ANTICHRIST) by the disregard of every higher feeling. "He magnified himself above all." His real deity was the Roman war-god; and fortresses were his most sacred temples. Confronted with such a persecutor, the Jew realized the spiritual power of his faith. The evils of heathenism were seen concentrated in a personal shape. The outward forms of worship became invested with a sacramental dignity. Common life was purified and ennobled by heroic devotion. An independent nation asserted the integrity of its hopes in the face of Egypt, Syria, and Rome.

Antiochus (see above) V., Eu'pa-tor (Gr. of noble descent), succeeded his father ANTIOCHUS IV., B. C. 164, while still a child, under the guardianship of Lysias, though Antiochus had on his death-bed assigned this office to Philip, his own foster-brother. Shortly after his accession he marched against Jerusalem with a large army, accompanied by Lysias, to relieve the Syrian garrison. He repulsed Judas (MACCABEES) at Pethzacharias, and took Bethsura. But when the Jewish force in the Temple was on the point of yielding, Lysias persuaded Antiochus to make peace that he might advance to meet Philip, who had made himself master of Antioch. Philip was speedily overpowered; but the next year (B. C. 162) Antiochus and Lysias fell into the hands of DEMETRIUS Soter, who caused them to be put to death in revenge for his own wrongs from Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mc. iii. 32, 33, vi., vii. 2-4; 2 Mc. ix. 29, xiv. 1, 2).

Antiochus (see above) VI. was the son of ALEXANDER BALAS and Cleopatra. After his father's death (146 B. C.) he remained in Arabia; but though still a child, he was soon brought forward by Tryphon (about 145 B. C.) as a claimant to the throne of Syria against DEMETRIUS NICATOR. Tryphon succeeded in gaining Antioch; and afterward the most of Syria submitted to Antiochus. Jonathan (MACCABEES), confirmed by him as high-priest and ruler of Judea, &c., contributed greatly to his success, occupying Ascalon and Gaza, reducing the country as far as Damascus, and defeating the troops of Demetrius. (NASOR.) Tryphon having now gained the supreme power in Antiochus's name, took Jonathan by treachery and put him to death, B. C. 143; and afterward murdered Antiochus, and ascended the throne (1 Mc. xi. 39-xiii. 31).

AN-ti'o-chus (see above) VII., SI-de'tes [-teez] (Gr. of Side, in Pamphylia), king of Syria, was the second son of DEMETRIUS I. When his brother, DEMETRIUS NICATOR, was taken prisoner (about 141 B. C.) by the king of Parthia (ARSACES VI.), he married his wife Cleopatra and took the throne (137 B. C.) from the usurper TRYPHON. At first he made a very advantageous treaty with Simon (MACCABEES), but afterward violated it and sent against him a force under Cendebeus, who occupied CEDRON I, and harassed the surrounding country. After the defeat of Cendebeus by Simon's sons, Antiochus undertook an expedition against Judea in person. He laid siege to Jerusalem, but (so Josephus) granted honorable terms to John Hyrcanus (B. C. 133), who had made a vigorous resistance. Antiochus next turned his arms against the Parthians, and Hyrcanus accompanied him in the campaign. But after some successes he was entirely defeated by Phraortes II. (ARSACES VII.), and fell in the battle, about B. C. 127-6 (1 Mc. xv., xvi.).

AN-ti-pas (Gr. = ANTIPATER, Rbn. N. T. Lex.; against all, Fbn.). 1. See HEROD 2.—2. A martyr at Pergamos (Rev. ii. 13); according to tradition, the bishop of Pergamos; said to have suffered martyrdom under Domitian by being cast into a burning brazen bull.

AN-ti-pa-ter (L. fr. Gr. = over against [i. e. like] his father), son of Jason; Jewish ambassador to the Lacedemonians (1 Mc. xii. 16, xiv. 22).

AN-ti-pa-tris (Gr.; named fr. Antipater, Herod's father), a town to which the soldiers conveyed St. Paul by night on their march from Jerusalem to Cesarea (Acts xxiii. 31); anciently named Capharsaba; rebuilt and named Antipatris by Herod. It was (Itin. Hier.) forty-two miles from Jerusalem and twenty-six from Cesarea. The modern village Kefr-Siba answers to the ancient name, and its position is in sufficient harmony with what Josephus says of the position of Antipatris, in a well-watered and well-wooded plain, near a hilly ridge, and with his notices of a trench dug from thence for military purposes to the sea near Joppa by one of the Asmonean princes.

AN-to-ni-a (L.), a fortress (A. V. "castle," Acts xxi. 34, &c.), built by Herod on the site of the more ancient Baris, N. W. of the Temple, and named by him after his friend Antony. (JERUSALEM.) The word nowhere occurs in the Bible.

AN-to-thi'jah (Heb. answers from Jehovah, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 24).

AN-to-thite (fr. ANATHOTH), a dweller at Anathoth (1 Chr. xi. 28, xii. 3); = ANETHOTHITE.

A'nub (Heb. bound together, Ges.), son of Coz and descendant of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 8).

A'nus, a Levite (1 Esd. ix. 48); = BANI 7.

AP'a-me (Gr.), concubine of Darius, and daughter of Bartacus (1 Esd. iv. 29).

A-pol'les [-leez] (Gr. given by Apollo, A. F. Pott), a Christian saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 10) as "approved in Christ." Tradition makes him bishop of Smyrna or Hieraclea.

Apes (Heb. kôphîm), occur in 1 K. x. 22, "once in three years came the navy of Tharshish (TARSHISH 2), bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks," and in the parallel passage of 2 Chr. ix. 21. Probably the Hebrew word here used was not intended to refer to any one particular species of ape, but may have denoted any animals of the monkey tribe, including apes, baboons, and monkeys proper.

A-phar'sath-chites [-kites], A-phar'sites, A-phar'sa-chites [a-far'sa-kites] (all fr. Heb.), certain tribes, colonies from which had been planted in Samaria by Asnapper (Ezr. iv. 9, v. 6). The first and last are regarded as the same, and have been supposed to be the Paratæci or Parætaceni (= mountaineers), a tribe on the borders of Media and Persia; the second has been referred to the Parrhasii, and by Gesenius to the Persians.

A'phék [-fek] (Heb. strength, fortress, a strong city, Ges.). 1. A royal city of the Canaanites, the king of which was killed by Joshua (Josh. xii. 18); probably = APHEKAH.—2. A city, apparently in the extreme N. of Asher (Josh. xix. 80); probably = APHIK, and the city on the N. "border of the Amorites," apparently beyond Sidon, identified with the Aphaca of classical times, famous for its temple of Venus, the ruins of which are the modern Afka on the N.W. slopes of Lebanon, midway between Baalbek and Byblus (Jebel).—3. A place at which the Philistines encamped, before the battle in which Eli's sons were killed and the ark taken (1 Sam. iv. 1); apparently N.W. of, and not far from Jerusalem.—4. The scene of another encampment of the Philistines, before the defeat and death of Saul (1 Sam. xxix. 1); possibly = No. 3.—5. A walled city on the military road from Syria to Israel, apparently a common spot for engagements with Syria (1 K. xx. 26 ff.; 2 K. xiii. 17). It was situated in "the plain" (1 K. xx. 25; PLAIN 4) E. of the Jordan, where is the modern village of Fik, at the head of the Wady Fik, six miles E. of the sea of Galilee, the great road between Damascus, Nabulus, and Jerusalem still passing through it.

A-phé'kah (Heb. strong place, Ges.), a city of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 53); probably = APHEK 1.

A-pher'e-ma (fr. Gr.), one of the three "governments," "Apherema, and Lydda, and Ramathem," added to Judea from Samaria by Demetrius Soter, and confirmed by Nicanor (1 Mc. xl. 34); probably = EPHRAIM and OPHRAH 1.

A-pher'ra (Gr.) ancestor of some of the sons of Solomon's servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd. v. 34); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

A-phl'ah (Heb. rekindled, refreshed, Ges.), ancestor of King Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1); supposed by Lord A. C. Hervey = ABIAH 1 (?).

Aphik (Heb. strong, Ges.), a city of Asher (Judg. i. 81); probably = APHEK 2.

Aph'rah (Heb. female fawn, Ges.), the House of, a place (Mic. i. 10), supposed by some = OPHRAH 1.

Aph'ses [af'seez] (L. fr. Heb. the dispersion, Ges.), chief of the eighteenth course of priests (1 Chr. xxiv. 15).

A-poc'a-lypse [-lips] (fr. Gr. = revelation). REVELATION OF ST. JOHN.

A-poc'ry-pha (fr. Gr.; primarily = hidden, secret, sc. books; apparently associated, toward the end of the second century, with the idea of spurious; afterward = spurious), a term popularly applied to the following fourteen books: 1 Esdras; 2 Esdras; Tobit; Judith; Esther x. 4-xvi.; Wisdom; Ecclesiasticus; Baruch; Song of the Three Holy Children; History of Susanna; Bel and the Dragon; Prayer of Manasses; 1 Maccabees; 2 Maccabees. These books are treated of under their titles. For their relation to the canonical books of the O. T. see CANON. (INSPIRATION.) These books represent the period of transition and decay after the return of the Jews from Babylon, and most (perhaps all) were probably written B. C. 300-30. We may notice in them (1.) the absence of the prophetic element; (2.) the almost total disappearance of the power shown in the poetry of the O. T.; (3.) the appearance of works of fiction resting or purporting to rest on an historical foundation; (4.) the growth of a purely legendary literature; (5.) the tendency to pass off supposititious books under the cover of illustrious names; (6.) the insertion of unauthenticated formal documents as authentic; (7.) abundant errors and anachronisms; (8.) some peculiarities connected with the religious and ethical development of Judaism, as the manifest influences of the struggle against idolatry under Antiochus, the growing hostility to the Samaritans, the prominence assigned in Tobit to alms-giving, with the growing belief in the individual guardianship of angels and the germs of a grotesque demonology there apparent, and (in Wisdom) the teachings in respect to wisdom, to the kingdom of God and its eternal blessings, and to the love and righteousness of God.

Ap-ol-lō-ni-a (Gr. fem. = of or from Apollo), a city of Macedonia, through which Paul and Silas passed in their way from Philippi and Amphipolis to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1). It was thirty Roman miles from Amphipolis, and thirty-seven from Thessalonica (Itin. Ant.).

Ap-ol-lō-ni-as (L. fr. Gr. masc. = of or from Apollo). 1. Son of Thraseas, governor of Celsyria and Phenice, under SELEUCTS IV. PHILOPATOR, B. C. 187 ft., a bitter enemy of the Jews (2 Mc. iv. 4), who urged the king at the instigation of SIMON 3, to plunder the Temple at Jerusalem (iii. 5 ff.; HELIOPOLES).—2. An officer of Antiochus Epiphanes, and governor of Samaria, who led out a large force against Judas Maccabeus, but was defeated and slain, B. C. 166 (1 Mc. iii. 10-12); probably the same who was chief commissioner of the revenue of Judea, spoiled Jerusalem, taking advantage of the Sabbath, and occupied a fortified position there, B. C. 168 (1 Mc. i. 29 ff.; 2 Mc. v. 24-26).—3. Son of Menestheus (possibly = No. 2); an envoy sent (B. C. 178) by Antiochus Epiphanes to congratulate Ptolemy Philometor on his being enthroned (2 Mc. iv. 21).—4. Son of Genneus; a Syrian general under Antiochus V. Eupator, about B. C. 163 (2 Mc. xii. 2).—5. Apollonius Daus of Josephus (= Apollonius of the Dahæ or Dai, a people of Sogdiana; comp. DEHAVITES), a governor of Celsyria under Alexander Balas, who embraced the cause of Demetrius Nicator, and was appointed to a chief command. Apollonius with a large force attacked Jonathan (MACCABEES), but was entirely defeated by him (B. C. 147) near Azotus (1 Mc. x. 69-87).

Ap-ol-lō-ph'a-nes [-lof'a-neez] Gr. revealed by or as Apollo), a companion of TIMOTHEUS 2, killed by Judas Maccabeus at Gazara (2 Mc. x. 37).

Ap-ol-lōs (Gr. = APOLLONIUS, or Apollodorus, i. e. given by Apollo), a Jew from Alexandria, "eloquent" (the Gr. may = learned) and mighty in the Scriptures: one instructed in the way of the Lord, according to the imperfect view of the disciples of John the Baptist (Acts xviii. 25), but on his coming to Ephesus during a temporary absence of St. Paul, A. D. 54, more perfectly taught by Aquila and Priscilla. After this he became a preacher of the Gospel, first in Achaia and then in Corinth (Acts xviii. 27, xix. 1), where he watered that which Paul had planted (1 Cor. iii. 6). When the apostle wrote 1 Corinthians, Apollos was with or near him (1 Cor. xvi. 12), probably at Ephesus in A. D. 57, unwilling at that time to journey to Corinth, but proposing to do so when he should have convenient time. In Tit. iii. 13, Titus is desired to "bring Zenas the lawyer and Apollos on their way diligently, that nothing may be wanting to them." After this nothing is known of him. Tradition makes him bishop of Cesarra. Another tradition, credited by Jerome, made him at last bishop of Corinth; others still, bishop of Colophon, of Iconium, &c.—Apollos's exact part in the missionary work of the apostolic age can never be ascertained. After the entire amity between St. Paul and him which appears in 1 Corinthians, it is hardly possible to imagine any important difference in the doctrines which they taught. There may have been difference enough in the outward character and expression of the two to attract the lover of eloquence and philosophy rather to Apollos, somewhat perhaps to the disparagement of St. Paul. Luther and others supposed Apollos the author of the epistle to the Hebrews.

A-pel-l'yon [in L. pron. A-pol'y-on] (Latinized Gr. = destroyer = Heb. ABADDON), in Rev. ix. 11, "the angel of the bottomless pit." The Hebrew ABADDON, here a synonyme of Apollyon, is really abstract = "destruction" (Job xxvi. 6; xxviii. 22; Prov. xv. 11, &c.). The angel Apollyon is further described as the king of the locusts which rose from the smoke of the bottomless pit at the sounding of the fifth trumpet. From the occurrence of the Hebrew word in Ps. lxxxviii. 11, the Rabbins made Abaddon the nethermost of the two regions into which they divided the lower world. But in Rev. ix. 11, Abaddon and Apollyon are names of the angel and not of the abyss. There is no authority for connecting it with "the destroyer" in 1 Cor. x. 10. ASSEMBLERS, the king of the demons in Jewish mythology, is probably connected with Apollyon as "the destroyer" or destroying angel. See also Wis. xviii. 22, 25. SATAN.

A-pes'tle [a-pes'tl'] (fr. Gr. = one sent forth), in the N. T., originally the official name of those twelve of the disciples whom Jesus chose to send forth first to preach the Gospel, and to be with Him during His ministry on earth (Lk. vi. 13). Afterward it was extended to others (MATTHIAS; PAUL) who, though not of the twelve, yet were equal with them in office and dignity (1 Cor. ix., &c.). The word also appears to have been used in a non-official sense to designate a much wider circle of Christian messengers and teachers (see 2 Cor. viii. 23; Phil. ii. 25; A. V. "messenger" in these passages). It is once applied to the Lord Jesus Christ, the one sent from God (Heb. iii. 1; comp. Mal. iii. 1; Jn. iii. 34; Ex. iii. 10-15; ANGELS). This article, abridged from one by Dr. Alford, treats only of those who were officially designated apostles. The original qualification of an apostle, as stated by St. Peter (Acts i. 21, 22), on occasion of electing a successor to the traitor Judas, was, that he should have been personally acquainted with the whole ministerial course of our Lord, from His baptism by John till the day when He was taken up into heaven. He Himself describes them as "they that had continued with Him in His temptations" (Lk. xxii. 28). By this close personal intercourse with Him, they were peculiarly fitted to give testimony to the facts of redemption; and we gather, from His own words (Jn. xiv. 26, xv. 26, 27, xvi. 13), that by an especial bestowal of the Spirit's influence their memories were quickened, and their power of reproducing what they had heard from Him increased above the ordinary measure of man. The apostles were from the lower ranks of life, simple and uneducated; some of them were related to Jesus according to the flesh; some had been disciples of John the Baptist. Our Lord chose them early in His public career, though it is uncertain precisely at what time. (JESUS CHRIST.) Some of them had certainly partly attached themselves to Him before; but after their call as apostles they appear to have been continuously with Him or in His service. They seem to have been all on an equality, both during and after the ministry of Christ on earth. We find one indeed (PETER), from fervor of personal character, usually prominent among them, and distinguished by having the first place assigned him in founding the Jewish and Gentile churches (Mat. xvi. 18; Acts ii. 14, 42, xi. 11; comp. Rev. xxi. 14; Eph. ii. 20); but we never find the slightest trace in Scripture of any superiority or primacy being in consequence accorded to him. We also find that he and two others, James and John, the sons of Zebedee, are admitted to the inner privacy of our Lord's acts and sufferings on several occasions (Mat. xvii. 1-9, xxvi. 37; Mk. v. 37); but this is no proof of superiority in rank or office. Early in our Lord's ministry, He sent them out two and two to preach repentance and perform miracles in His name (Mat. x.; Lk. ix.). This mission was of the nature of a solemn call to the children of Israel, to whom it was confined (Mat. x. 5, 6). The apostles were early warned by their Master of the solemn nature and the danger of their calling (x. 17). They accompanied Him in His journeys of teaching and to the Jewish feasts, saw His wonderful works, heard His discourses addressed to the people (Mat. v.-vii., xiii.; Lk. vi. 13-49), or those which He held with learned Jews (Mat. xix. 13 ff.; Lk. x. 25 ff.), made inquiries of Him on religious matters, sometimes concerning His own sayings, sometimes of a general nature (Mat. xiii. 10 ff., xv. 15 ff., xviii. 1 ff., xxiv. 3 ff., Lk. viii. 9 ff., xii. 41; Jn. ix. 2 ff., xiv. 5, 22, &c.); sometimes they worked miracles (Mk. vi. 13; Lk. ix. 6), sometimes attempted to do so without success (Mat. xvii. 16). They recognized their Master as the Christ of God (Mat. xvi. 16; Lk. ix. 20), and ascribed to Him supernatural power (Lk. ix. 54); but in the recognition of the spiritual teaching and mission of Christ, they made very slow progress, held back as they were by weakness of apprehension and by national prejudices (Mat. xv. 16, xvi. 22, xvii. 20, 21; Lk. ix. 54, xxiv. 25; Jn. xvi. 12): they were compelled to ask of Him the explanation of even His simplest parables (Mk. viii. 14 ff.; Lk. xii. 41 ff.), and openly confessed their weakness of faith (xvii. 5). Even at the removal of our Lord from the earth they were yet weak in their knowledge (xxiv. 21; Jn. xvi. 12), though He had so long been carefully preparing and instructing them. And at His apprehension by the chief priests and Pharisees, of which He had so often forewarned them, they all forsook Him and fled (Mat. xxvi. 56). They left His burial to one who was not of their number, and to the women, and were only convinced of His resurrection on the very plainest proofs furnished by Himself. It was first when this fact became undeniable that light seems to have entered their minds, and not even then without His special aid, opening their understandings that they might understand the Scriptures. Even after that, many of them returned to their common occupations (Jn. xxi. 3 ff.), and it required a new direction from the Lord to recall them to their mission, and reunite them in Jerusalem (Acts i. 4). Before the descent of the Holy Spirit on the Church, Peter, at least, seems to have been specially inspired by Him to declare the prophetic sense of Scripture respecting the traitor Judas, and direct his place to be filled up. On the feast of Pentecost, ten days after our Lord's ascension, the Holy Spirit came down on the assembled church (Acts ii.); and from that time the apostles became altogether different men, giving witness with power of the life and death and resurrection of Jesus as He had declared they should (Lk. xxiv. 48; Acts i. 8, 22, ii. 32, iii. 15, v. 32, xiii. 31). First of all the mother-church of Jerusalem grew up under their hands (iii.-vii.), and their superior dignity and power were universally acknowledged by the rulers and the people (v. 12 ff.). Even the persecution which arose about Stephen, and put the first check on the spread of the Gospel in Judea, does not seem to have brought peril to the apostles (viii. 1). Their first mission out of Jerusalem was to Samaria (viii. 5-25), where the Lord Himself had, during His ministry, sown the seed of the Gospel. Here ends, properly speaking (or rather perhaps with the general visitation hinted at in Acts ix. 31, 32), the first period of the apostles' agency, during which its centre is Jerusalem, and the prominent figure is St. PETER. The centre of the second period of the apostolic agency is Antioch, where a church soon was built up, consisting of Jews and Gentiles; and the central figure of this and of the subsequent period is St. PAUL, not originally of the twelve, but wonderfully prepared and miraculously won for the high office. This period, whose history (all that we know of it) is related in Acts xi. 19-30, xiii. 1-5, was marked by the united working of Paul and the other apostles, in the coöperation and intercourse of the two churches of Antioch and Jerusalem. From this time the third apostolic period opens, marked by the almost entire disappearance of the twelve from the sacred narrative, and the exclusive agency of St. Paul, the great apostle of the Gentiles. The remaining narrative of the Acts is occupied with his missionary journeys; and when we leave him at Rome, all the Gentile churches from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum owe to him their foundation, and look to him for supervision. Of the missionary agency of the rest of the twelve, we know absolutely nothing from the sacred narrative. Some notices of their personal history will be found under their respective names, together with the principal legends which have come down to us respecting them. (See PETER, JAMES, JOHN especially.)—The apostolic office seems to have been preëminently to found the churches, and uphold them by supernatural power specially bestowed for that purpose. It ceased, as a matter of course, with its first holders: all continuation of it, from the very conditions of its existence (comp. 1 Cor. ix. 1), being impossible. The bishops of the ancient churches coexisted with, and did not in any sense succeed, the apostles; and when it is claimed for bishops or any church officers that they are their successors, it can be understood only chronologically, and not officially.

ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

* Apostle-ship [-pos'l-], the office of an APOS-tie (Acts i. 25; Rom. i. 5; 1 Cor. ix. 2; Gal. ii. 8).

* A-po-th'e-ca-ry. MEDICINE; OINTMENT.

Ap-pa-lm (Heb. the two nostrils, face, Ges.; face, i. e. presence, sc. of God, Fii.), son of Nadab, and descendant of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 30, 31).

* Ap-par'el. DRESS.

Ap-peal. The principle of appeal was recognized by the Mosaic law in the establishment of a central court under the presidency of the judge or ruler for the time being, before which all cases too difficult for the local courts were to be tried (Deut. xvii. 8, 9; JUDGE; TRIAL). Thus the appeal lay in the time of the Judges to the judge (Judg. iv. 5), and under the monarchy to the king, who appears to have deputed certain persons to inquire into the facts of the case, and record his decision thereon (2 Sam. xv. 3). Jehoshaphat delegated his judicial authority to a court permanently established for the purpose (2 Chr. xix. 8). These courts were reestablished by Ezra (Ezr. vii. 25). After the institution of the SANHEDRIM the final appeal lay to them. A Roman citizen under the republic had the right of appealing in criminal cases from the decision of a magistrate to the people; and as the emperor succeeded to the power of the people, there was an appeal to him in the last resort. St. Paul, as a Roman citizen, exercised a right of appeal from the local court at Jerusalem to the emperor (Acts xxv. 11). But as no decision had been given, there could be no appeal, properly speaking, in his case: the language used (ver. 9) implies the right on the part of the accused of electing to be tried either by the provincial magistrate, or by the emperor. Since the procedure in the Jewish courts at that period was of a mixed and undefined character, the Roman and Jewish authorities coexisting and carrying on the course of justice between them, Paul availed himself of his undoubted privilege to be tried by the pure Roman law.

Ap'phi-a [af'fe-ah] (Gr. form of L. Appia), a Christian woman addressed jointly with Philemon and Archippus in Phn. 2; apparently a member of Philemon's household, and not improbably his wife.

Ap'phus [af'fus] (L. fr. Heb. = the wary, Michaelis, surname of Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Mc. ii. 5)).

Ap'pi-i Fo'rum (L. market-place of Appius, i. e. probably of Appius Claudius), a well-known station on the Appian Way or great road from Rome to the neighborhood of the bay of Naples. St. Paul, having landed at Puteoli (Acts xxviii. 13) on his arrival from Malta, proceeded under the charge of the centurion along the Appian Way toward Rome, and found at Appii Forum, forty-three miles from Rome (Itin. Ant.; Itin. Hier.), a group of Christians who had gone to meet him (ver. 15). Horace describes Appii Forum as full of taverns and boatmen. This arose from its being at the N. end of a canal which ran parallel with the road, through a considerable part of the Pomptine or Pontine Marshes. The site is at some ruins near Treponi. THREE TAVERNS.

Ap'ple-Tree, Ap'ple (Heb. tappuah or tappuah). The A. V. mentions the apple-tree in the following passages. Cant. ii. 3: "As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons. I sat down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste." Cant. viii. 5: "I raised thee up under the apple-tree: there thy mother brought thee forth." Joel i. 12, where the apple-tree is named with the vine, fig, pomegranate, and palm trees, as withering under the desolating effects of the locust, palmer-worm, &c. The fruit of this tree is mentioned in Prov. xxv. 11: "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." In Cant. ii. 5: "Comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love;" vii. 8, "The smell of thy nose (shall be) like apples." Celsius and others maintain that the quince rather than the apple is meant in the above passages. The quince was sacred to Venus, and its fragrance was held in high esteem by the ancients. "Its scent," says an Arabian author, "cheers my soul, renews my strength, and restores my breath." On the other hand, Dr. Royle (in Kit.) thinks that the citron is meant, and says, "The rich color, fragrant odor, and handsome appearance of the tree, whether in flower or in fruit, are particularly suited to all the above passages of Scripture." Yet neither the quince nor the citron is "sweet to the taste." Thomson (ii. 328-9) favors the A. V. in its translation of "apples." He says of Askelon, "It is especially celebrated for its apples, which are the largest and best I have ever seen in this country. When I was here in June, quite a caravan started for Jerusalem loaded with them, and they would not have disgraced even an American orchard. The Arabic word for apple is almost the same as the Hebrew, and it is as perfectly definite, to say the least, as our English word, as much as the word for grape, and just as well understood; and so is that for citron. . . . As to the smell and color, all the demands of the biblical allusions are fully met by these apples of Askelon; and no doubt, in ancient times and in royal gardens, their cultivation was far superior to what it is now, and the fruit larger and more fragrant." Most travellers assert that the apples of Palestine are generally of a very inferior quality. It is questionable (so Mr. Houghton) whether the apple would merit the Scriptural character for excellent fragrance. The orange would answer all the demands of the Scriptural passages, and orange-trees are found in Palestine; but there is not sufficient evidence that this tree was known in the earlier times to the inhabitants of Palestine, the tree having been probably introduced at a later period. Tristram (p. 605) maintains that the apricot, which abounds in Palestine, a "deliciously perfumed fruit,"—"golden fruit" on a tree of "bright yet pale foliage,"—is the "apple" of the Scriptures. The question of identification, therefore, is still an open one. As to the apples of Sodom, see VINE OF SODOM. The expression "apple of the eye" occurs in Deut. xxxii. 10; Ps. xvii. 8; Prov. vii. 2; Lam. ii. 18; Zech. ii. 8. The English word here is the representative of the Hebrew word ishon, i. e. "little man" = the English pupil, Latin pupillus.

* Ap-pre-hend, to. GAMES; OFFICER; TRIAL.

* A'prou [a'purn], the A. V. translation of—1. Hebrew hagorah or chagorah (Gen. iii. 7, marg. "things to gird about;") usually translated "GIR-DLE" (2 Sam. xviii. 11, &c.).—2. Hebrew mitpachath or mitpachath (Ru. lii. 15 marg. "vail" in text; see DRESS, III.—8. Greek sinikinthion (Acts xix. 12); see HANDKERCHIEF.

Aq'u-la [ak'we-lah] (L. eagle), a Jew whom St. Paul found at Corinth on his arrival from Athens (Acts xviii. 2). He was a native of Pontus, but had fled, with his wife Priscilla, from Rome in consequence of an order of CLAUDIUS commanding all Jews to leave the city. He became acquainted with St. PAUL, and they abode together, and wrought at their common trade of making the Cilician tent or hair cloth. On the apostle's departure from Corinth, one and a half years afterward, Priscilla and Aquila accompanied him to Ephesus on his way to Syria.

There they afterward taught APOLLOS the way of the Lord more perfectly. At what time they became Christians is uncertain. When 1 Corinthians xvi. 19 was written, Aquila and his wife were still in Ephesus; but in Rom. xvi. 3 ff. we find them again at Rome, and their house a place of assembly for the Christians. They are there described as having endangered their lives for that of the apostle. In 2 Tim. iv. 19, they are saluted as with Timotheus, probably at Ephesus. There is a vague tradition that they were afterward beheaded.

Ar (Heb. city, Ges.), or Ar of Mo'ab, one of the chief places of Moab (Is. xv. 1; Num. xxi. 28); = RABBAH 2; known in the time of Eusebius and Jerome as Areopolis and Rabbath-Moab. The site, still called Rabba, lies about half way between Kerak (ancient Kir of Moab) and the Wady Mijeb (ancient Arnon), ten or eleven miles from each, the Roman road passing through it. The remains are not important. In the books of Moses, Ar appears = the whole nation of Moab; see Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29; Num. xxi. 15.

Ara (Heb. = lion? Ges.), a son of Jether, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 38).

'Arab (Heb. ambush, Ges.), a city in the mountains of Judah, probably near Hebron (Josh. xv. 52).

Ar-a-bah (Heb. 'arābdh = arid tract, sterile region, Ges.), a word of frequent occurrence in the Hebrew, though only in Josh. xviii. 18 in the A. V. It is used generally to indicate a barren, uninhabitable district (translated "wilderness" in the A. V. in Job xxiv. 6, xxxix. 6; Is. xxxiii. 9; Jer. li. 43; "desert" in Is. xxxv. 1, 6, xl. 3, xli. 19, li. 3; Jer. xvii. 6, l. 12; "deserts" in Jer. ii. 6, v. 6, marg.); but the Arabah (tr. in the A. V. "plain" in Deut. i. 1, 7, ii. 8, iii. 17, twice, iv. 49; Josh. iii. 16, viii. 14, xi. 16, xii. 1, 3, twice; 1 Sam. xxiii. 24; 2 Sam. ii. 29, iv. 7; 2 K. xiv. 25, xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7; "plains" in Josh. xi. 2, xii. 8; "champaign" in Deut. xi. 30; "desert" in Ez. xlvii. 8; "wilderness" in Am. vi. 14) indicates more particularly the deep-sunken valley or trench which extends from the slopes of HERMON to the Elanitic Gulf (Gulf of 'Akubah) of the RED SEA; the most remarkable depression known to exist on the surface of the globe. Through the N. portion of this the JORDAN rushes through the lakes of Huleh and Gennesaret down its tortuous course to the Dead Sea. (SEA, THE SALT.) This portion, about one hundred and fifty miles in length, called by Jerome (Onom.) Aulôn (Gr. channel), is known among the Arabs as el-Ghór. (PALESTINE; PLAIN 6.) The S. boundary of the Ghór is the wall of cliffs which crosses the valley about six or eight miles S. of the Dead Sea. (AKRABBIM.) From their summits, S. to the Gulf of 'Akubah, the valley changes its name, or rather retains its old name of Wady el-'Arabah. This S. portion is rather more than one hundred miles long, varying in width from two (or four, so some) miles at the Gulf of 'Akubah to fourteen or sixteen miles at about seventy miles N. of this. It lies between the long and desolate limestone ranges of the Tih on the W. (WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING) and the mountains of EDOM on the E. Its surface is dreary and desolate, and the heat is terrible. The drainage of the N. part (probably to about sixty miles S. from the Dead Sea) is by the Wady el-Jib into the Dead Sea, that of the remainder into the Gulf of 'Akubah.—In the Bible, in the times of the conquest and the monarchy the name Arabah was applied to the valley in the entire length of both its S. and N. portions. Thus in Deut. i. 1 (prob.) and ii. 8 (A. V. "plain" in both cases), the allusion is to the S. portion, while the other passages, in which the name occurs, points to the N. portion. See Deut. iii. 17, iv. 49; Josh. iii. 16, xi. 2, xii. 3; and 2 K. xiv. 25. The allusions in Deut. xi. 30; Josh. viii. 14, xii. 1, xviii. 18; 2 Sam. ii. 29, iv. 7; 2 K. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7, become intelligible with this meaning of the Arabah. In Josh. xi. 16 and xii. 8 the Arabah ("plain" or "champaign" A. V.) is one of the great natural divisions of the conquered country.

Ar-a-bat'ti-ne, in Idumea (1 Mc. v. 3). AKRABBIM.

A-ra'bi-a (Gr. and L.; see below), a country known in the O. T. under two designations.—1. The East Country, Heb. erets kedem (see EAST; Gen. xxv. 6); or perhaps the East, Heb. kedem (x. 30; Num. xxiii. 7; Is. ii. 6; the last two passages relate to Mesopotamia and Babylonia, Ges.); and Land of the sons ("people" A. V.) of the East (Gen. xxix. 1); gentile name, Heb. benei kedem = sons ("children" or "men," A. V.) of the East (Judg. vi. 3, 33, vii. 12; 1 K. iv. 30; Job i. 3; Is. xi. 14; Jer. xlix. 28; Ez. xxv. 4). From these passages it appears that the Land of the East and Sons of the East indicate, primarily, the country E. of Palestine and N. of the Arabian peninsula, and the tribes descended from Ishmael and from Keturah; and that this original signification may have become gradually extended to Arabia and its inhabitants generally, though without any strict limitation.—2. 'Arab and 'Arab (Heb. = arid, sterile, Ges.), whence "Arabia" (2 Chr. ix. 14; Is. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 24; Ez. xxvii. 21). This name seems to have the same geographical reference as the former. Among geographers in general, however, both classical and modern, "Arabia" designates the whole of the extensive region which occupies the S. W. corner of the continent of Asia. According to this prevalent usage, Arabia reaches from 12½° to 34½° N. latitude, and from 32½° to 60° E. longitude from Greenwich, or from 109½° to 137° E. longitude from Washington. This region is bounded on the N. by Palestine and Syria; on the E. by the Euphrates (or ancient Babylonia, Chaldea, &c.), the Persian Gulf, and the Sea of Arabia; on the S. by the Sea of Arabia or Indian Ocean, and the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb; on the W. by the Red Sea, or Arabian Gulf, and Egypt. The name Erythrean Sea was anciently applied to the Arabian and Persian Gulfs (especially the former; see RED SEA), as well as to the sea or ocean on the S. of Arabia. According to the above description, the greatest length of Arabia, from Egypt to the Sea of Arabia, is about 1,650 miles; its greatest width, from near ancient Palmvra to a point on the coast E. of the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, is about 1,450 miles. Its area would thus be nearly 1,100,000 square miles. Geographers have differed greatly in their estimates of the extent of Arabia, some making it embrace an area equal to more than one-third of that contained in the whole United States, and others reducing it to about one-fourth of the area of the United States. Much of this discrepancy is due to the unsettled boundary of North Arabia (see II. below), which spreads out in that direction into deserts that meet those which may be considered as belonging to the neighboring countries, and are occupied by roving tribes of Arabs having scarcely a nominal subjection to any superior authority. Arabia is indeed one of the few countries of the south where the descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants have neither been extirpated nor expelled by northern invaders.—"There is no people," says Ritter, "who are less circumscribed to the territory usually assigned to them than the Arabs; their range outstrips geographical boundaries in all directions" (Morren, in Kit.). Arabia was divided by the ancient classical geographers into Arabia Felix (L., Happy Arabia), Arabia Deserta (L., Desert Arabia), and Petræa (L., Stony Arabia, or [so some] named from its chief city Petra; see SELA). It may be more conveniently divided into Arabia Proper, Northern Arabia, and Western Arabia.—1. Arabia Proper, or the Arabian peninsula, consists of high table-land, declining toward the N.; its most elevated portions being the chain of mountains nearly parallel to the Red Sea, and the territory E. of the S. part of this chain. The high land is encircled from the Gulf of 'Akabah to the head of the Persian Gulf by a belt of low littoral country. So far as the interior has been explored it consists of mountain and desert tracts, relieved by large districts under cultivation, well peopled, watered by wells and streams, and enjoying periodical rains. There are no navigable rivers. The desert of Ahkaf, according to Mr. W. G. Palgrave, extends from about 23½° to 17° N. latitude. The most fertile tracts are those on the S. W. and S. Arabia Proper may be subdivided into five principal provinces: the Yemen in the S. W., on the Red Sea and Indian Ocean; the districts of Hadramāwt, Mahreh, and 'Omān, on the Indian Ocean, and the entrance of the Persian Gulf; El-Bahreyn, toward the head of the Persian Gulf; the great central country of Nejd and Yamāneh; and the Hijāz and Tihāneh on the Red Sea. The modern Yemen is especially productive and picturesque. The deserts afford pasturage after the rains. The products mentioned in the Bible as coming from

Arabia will be found described under their respective heads. (ASS; CAMEL; FRANKINCENSE; GOLD; HORSE; LOCUST; OSTRICH; SERPENT; SHITTAH-TREE; SPICE; STONES, PRECIOUS, &c.)—II. Northern Arabia or the Arabian Desert—divided by the Arabs (who do not consider it as strictly belonging to their country) into the Deserts of Mesopotamia, Syria, and El-'Irāk—is a high, undulating, parched plain, of which the Euphrates forms the natural boundary from the Persian Gulf to the frontier of Syria, whence it is bounded by the latter country and the desert of Petra on the N. W. and W., the peninsula of Arabia forming its southern limit. It has few oases, the water of the wells is generally either brackish or unpotable, and it is visited by the Simoom. (WINDS.) The Arabs find pasture for their flocks and herds after the rains, and in the more depressed plains; and the desert generally produces prickly shrubs, &c., on which the camels feed. The inhabitants, principally descendants of ISHMAEL and of KETURAH, were known to the ancients as "dwellers in tents," L. Scenitæ (compare Is. xiii. 20; Jer. xlix. 31; Ez. xxxviii. 11); and they extended from Babylonia on the E. (compare Num. xxiii. 7; 2 Chr. xxi. 16; Is. ii. 6, xiii. 20), to the borders of Egypt on the W. Their predatory habits are mentioned in 2 Chr. xxi. 16, 17, xxvi. 7; Job i. 15; Jer. iii. 2. They conducted a considerable trade of merchandise of Arabia and India from the shores of the Persian Gulf (Ez. xxvii. 20–24), whence a chain of oases still forms caravan-stations; and they likewise with the Idumeans traded from the western portions of the peninsula, probably in the products of Southern Arabia and Ethiopia (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28; 1 K. x. 15, 25; 2 Chr. ix. 14, 24; Is. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20).—III. Western Arabia includes the peninsula of SINAÏ, and the desert of Petra, corresponding generally with the ancient Arabia Petraea. It was in the earliest times inhabited by the HORITES. Its later inhabitants were in part the same as those of Northern Arabia, but mostly descendants of Esau, and it was called the land of EDOM, or Idumea, also the desert of SEIR, or Mount Seir. The common origin of the Idumeans from Esau and Ishmael is found in Esau's marriage with Ishmael's daughter (Gen. xxviii. 9, xxxvi. 3). The Nabatheans (see NEBALIOTH) succeeded to the Idumeans, and Idumea is mentioned only as a geographical designation after the time of Josephus. Petra was in the great route of the western caravan-traffic of Arabia, and of the merchandise brought up the Elanitic Gulf. (See Northern Arabia; EDOM; ELATH; EZION-GEZER, &c.)—Inhabitants. The Arabs, like every other ancient nation of any celebrity, have traditions representing their country as originally inhabited by races which became extinct at a very remote period. These were the tribes of 'Ad, Thamood, Umeiyim, 'Abeel, Tasm, Jedees, 'Emleek (Amalek?), Jurhum (the first of this name), and Webâri: some omit the fourth, eighth, and ninth, but add Jâsim. The majority of their historians derive these tribes from Shem; but some, from Ham, though not through Cush. Their traditions refer the origin of the existing nation (1.) to Kahtân, whom they and most European scholars identify with Joktan; and (2.) to Ishmael, who, they say, married a descendant of Kahtân. They are still respecting Cushite settlements in Arabia; but certain passages in the Bible seem to agree with modern research, that Cushites were among its early inhabitants. (CUSH; DEDAN; EDEN 1; ETHIOPIA; HAVILAH; NIMROD; RAAMAH; SABTAN; SABTECHA; SEBA; SHEBA.) 1. The descendants of JOKTAN occu-piated the principal portions of the S. and S. W. of the peninsula, with colonies in the interior. (MESHA; SEPBAR.)—The principal Joktanite kingdom, and the chief state of ancient Arabia, was that of the Yemen, founded (according to the Arabs) by Yaarub, son (or descendant) of Kahtân (Joktan). Its most ancient capital was probably San'd, formerly called Azâl. (UZAL.) The other capitals were Mar-ib, or Sebâ, and Zafâri. (SEPBAR.) This was the Bible kingdom of SHEBA. Its rulers, and most of its people, were descendants of Sebâ (= Sheba), whence the classical Sabari. The dominant family was apparently that of Himyer, son (or descendant) of Sebâ. A member of this family founded the more modern kingdom of the Himyerites, the latter appellation apparently superseding the former only shortly before the Christian era, i. e. after the foundation of the later kingdom. The rule of the Himyerites (whence the Homeritæ of classical authors) probably extended over the modern Yemen, Hadramâwt, and Mah-reh. Their kingdom lasted until A. D. 525, when it fell before an Abyssinian invasion. Already, about the middle of the fourth century, the kings of Axum appear to have become masters of part of the Yemen, adding to their titles the names of places in Arabia belonging to the Himyerites. After four reigns they were succeeded by Himyerite princes, vassals of Persia, the last of whom submitted to Mohammed. Kings of Hadramâwt (= HAZARMAVETH, the classical Chatramotite) are also enumerated by the Arabs. The Greek geographers mention a fourth people in conjunction with the Sabai, Homeritæ, and Chatramotitæ,—the Minei, who have not been identified with any Biblical or modern name. Some place them as high as Mecca; but Fresnel places them in Hadramâwt. The other chief Joktanite kingdom was that of the Hijâz, founded by Jurhum (= HADORAM 1?), brother of Yaarub, who left the Yemen and settled near Mecca. The Arab lists of its kings are inextricably confused; but the name of their leader and of two of his successors was Mudâd (or El-Mudâd), probably = ALMODAD. Ishmael, according to the Arabs, married a daughter of the first Mudâd, whence sprang 'Adnân the ancestor of Mohammed. This kingdom merged, by intermarriage and conquest, into the tribes of Ishmael. Other Joktanite kingdoms were founded in Northern Arabia, as that of El-Heereh in El-'Irāk (afterward Ishmaelitic) and that of Ghassân on the confines of Syria (many of whose rulers were named El-Hârith, perhaps = ARETAS). The history of all the Arabs for more than a thousand years past has been closely connected with Mohammedanism. (See Religion, below.)—2. The ISHMAELITES appear to have entered the peninsula from the N. W. That they have spread over the whole of it (except one or two districts on the S. coast which are said to be still inhabited by unmixed Joktanite peoples), and that the modern nation is predominantly Ishmaelite, is asserted by the Arabs. (See the articles on ISHMAEL and his sons, also HAGARENES.) They extended N. from the Hijâz into the desert, where they mixed with Keturahites and other Abrahamic peoples; and W. to Idumea, where they mixed with Edomites, &c. The tribes sprung from Ishmael have always been governed by petty chiefs or heads of families (sheikhs and emeers); they have generally followed a patriarchal life and have not originated kingdoms, though they have in some instances succeeded to those of Joktanites, the principal one of these being that of El-Heereh (see above).—3. The descendants of KETURAH appear to have settled chiefly N. of the peninsula in Desert Arabia, from Palestine to the Persian Gulf. (DEDAN; SHEBA, &c.)—4. In Northern and Western Arabia are other peoples, sometimes classed with the Arabs. (AMALEK; ESAU, &c.)—Religion. The most ancient idolatry of the Arabs must have been fetichism, of which there are striking proofs in the sacred trees and stones of historical times, and in the worship of the heavenly bodies, or Sabeism. (INOL; IDOLATRY.) The objects of the earlier fetichism, the stone-worship, tree-worship, &c., of various tribes, are too numerous to mention. Manâh, the goddess worshipped between Mecca and Medina, has been compared with MENI (Is. lxx. 11), A. V. "number." Magianism (MAGI) never had very numerous followers. Christianity was introduced in southern Arabia toward the close of the second century. It flourished chiefly in the Yemen, where many churches were built. It also rapidly advanced in other portions of Arabia through the kingdom of Heerah, Ghassân, &c. The persecutions of the Christians brought about the fall of the Himyerite dynasty (see above) by the invasion of the Christian ruler of Abyssinia. Judaism was propagated in Arabia, principally by Karaites, at the Captivity, but it was introduced before that time: it became very prevalent in the Yemen, and in the Hijâz, especially at Kheybar and Medina, where there are said to be still tribes of Jewish extraction. Mohammedanism has almost wholly superseded other religions in Arabia. Its fundamental principle is, "There is one God, and Mohammed is his prophet." Mohammed, born near Mecca in or about A. D. 570, assumed the prophetic office in his fortieth year as the restorer of the pure religion revealed by God to Abraham, and afterward promulgated his doctrines in the Koran. His religion (Islam, or Islamism) is made up of Christianity, Judaism, and Paganism. In 622 a plot against his life constrained him to flee from Mecca to Medina. This flight (called the Hegira, from the Arabic) is the era from which Mohammedans reckon time by lunar years of 354 days each. The citizens of Medina embraced the prophet's cause, and from this time his religion was propagated by the sword. Before his death at Medina in 632, he had brought all Arabia under his dominion. Medina was the capital of Mohammed's successors, who were styled caliphs, about twenty-five years; Ali, fourth caliph, Mohammed's son-in-law, removed to Kufa on the Euphrates, and was there assassinated (661) after reigning five years; then Damascus was the seat of the caliphs till 752; afterward Bagdad for several centuries. About 934 the caliphate became a mere nominal dignity, and various Mohammedan countries had their own absolute rulers. Syria and Palestine came under Arab sway between 632 and 639; Egypt in 640; Persia, Mesopotamia, and Armenia about 640; northern Africa within the seventh century; Spain was invaded in 709, and a kingdom established there, which lasted till 1492, though the progress of the Arabs (also called Saracens and Moors) in western Europe was stopped by the victory gained over them in 732 by Charles Martel of France. In one hundred years from the Hegira the dominion, faith, and language of the Arabs overspread the regions between the Atlantic and the Indus. Afterward various tribes of Tartars embraced Mohammedanism, and made it the state religion in their empires in India, Turkey, &c. The present number of Mohammedans in the world is probably 160,000,000, principally in Arabia, Turkey, Persia, and neighboring countries in Asia, and in northeastern and central Africa. The three holy cities of Mohammedans are Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem. Mohammedans are divided into sects: the great majority are Sunnites or Sunnites, who receive the sunna (Ar. = tradition) as well as the Koran; while the Shiites (Persians and Kurds) reject the sunna and maintain that Ali, fourth caliph, was the first lawful successor of Mohammed. The Wahabees or followers of Abd-el-Wahab (born in Eastern Arabia between 1720 and 1730, died 1787), who aimed to restore Mohammedanism to its original purity, and founded a kingdom in 1770, were at one time masters of nearly all Arabia, held Mecca and Medina, but were defeated in 1818, and their power was supposed to be broken; but Mr. W. G. Palgrave in 1862 found their kingdom extending from 26½° to 23½° N. Lat., and from the Persian Gulf on the E. to the province of Hijâz on the W., and now stronger than ever, its new capital Riadh being a very beautiful and populous town. (See the articles ARABIA, MOHAMMEDANISM, and WAHABEES in the New Amcr. Cyc., and EXPLORATION AND DISCOVERY in the Annual Cyc. for 1864.)—Language. Arabic, the language of Arabia, and generally regarded as the language of the Ishmaelites, is the vernacular tongue through southwestern Asia and northern Africa, and the language of religion wherever Mohammedanism prevails. (See above.) It is the most developed and the richest of the Shemitic languages, and the only one of which we have an extensive literature: it is, therefore, of great importance to the study of Hebrew. Probably in Jacob's time (Gen. xxxi. 47) and Gideon's (Judg. vii. 9-15) the Shemitic languages differed much less than in after-times. But it appears from 2 K. xviii. 26, that in the eighth century B. C. only the educated Jews understood Aramaic. Apparently, the Himyeritic is to be regarded as a sister of the Hebrew, and the Arabic (commonly so called) as a sister of the Hebrew and Aramaic, or, in its classical phase, as a descendant of a sister of these two; but the Himyeritic probably is mixed with an African language. Respecting the Himyeritic, the ancient language of Southern Arabia, until lately little was known; but monuments bearing inscriptions in this language have been discovered, principally in Hadramâwt and the Yemen, and some of the inscriptions have been published. (SHEMITIC LANGUAGES; VERSIONS, ARABIC.)—For several centuries after A. D. 800 the Arabs (or Saracens) were preëminent in mathematics, philosophy, geography, astronomy, medicine, architecture, poetry, romance, &c. The court at Bagdad was then the world's centre of learning and civilization, while Europe was in darkness.—The manners and customs of the Arabs are of great value in illustrating the Bible. No one can mix with this people without being constantly and forcibly reminded either of the early patriarchs or of the settled Israelites. (AGE, OLD; BEARD; DRESS; FATHER; FRONTLETS; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL; RING; SANDAL; SEAL; SHEPHERD; VEIL; WRITING, &c.)—References in the Bible to the Arabs themselves are still more clearly illustrated by the manners of the modern people in their predatory expeditions, mode of warfare, caravan-journeys, &c. To the interpretation of the book of Job, an intimate knowledge of this people and their language and literature is essential.—Commerce. While the Ishmaelite tribes have been caravan-merchants, the Joktanites of Southern Arabia have been the chief traders of the Red Sea, carrying their commerce to the shores of India as well as of Africa. See passages in the Scriptures relating to Solomon's fleets and the maritime trade. (SHIP.)

The commerce of Southern Arabia with Palestine was evidently by the two great caravan routes from the head of the Red Sea and from that of the Persian Gulf: the former especially taking with it African produce; the latter, Indian. All testimony goes to show that from the earliest ages the people of Arabia have travelled and formed colonies in distant lands.

A-ra'bi-ans (in the Scriptures: see ARABIA), the nomadic tribes inhabiting the country E. and S. of Palestine, who in the early Hebrew history were known as Ishmaelites and descendants of Keturah. Their roving pastoral life in the desert is alluded to in Is. xiii. 20; Jer. iii. 2; 2 Mc. xii. 11; their country is associated with that of the Dedanim, the travelling merchants (Is. xxi. 13), with Dedan, Tema, and Buz (Jer. xxv. 24), and with Dedan and Kedar (Ez. xxvii. 21), all of which were probably in the N. part of the peninsula later known as Arabia. During the reign of Jehoshaphat, the Arabians, with the Philistines, were tributary to Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 11); but in the reign of his successor they revolted, ravaged the country, plundered the royal palace, slew all the king's sons except the youngest, and carried off the royal harem (2 Chr. xxi. 16, xxii. 1). The Arabians of Gur-baal were again subdued by Uzziah (xxvi. 7). On the return from Babylon they were among the foremost in hindering Nehemiah's work of restoration, and plotted with the Ammonites and others for that end (Neh. iv. 7). Geshem, or Gashmu, a leader of the opposition, was of this race (ii. 19, vi. 1). In later times the Arabians served under Timotheus against Julius Maccabeus, but were defeated (1 Mc. v. 39; 2 Mc. xii. 10). The Zabadeans, an Arab tribe, were routed by Jonathan, brother and successor of Judas (1 Mc. xii. 31). Zibdiel, the assassin of Alexander Balas (xi. 17), and Simalcue who brought up Alexander Balas's young son Antiochus (xi. 39), afterward Antiochus VI., were both Arabians. The "Arabians" in Acts ii. 11, were Jews or Jewish proselytes from Arabia (compare ver. 5-10).

A'rad (Heb. wild ass, Ges., Fü.), a Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Chr. viii. 15).

A'rad (Heb. see above), a royal city of the Canaanites, named with Hormah and Libnah (Josh. xii. 14). The wilderness of Judah was to "the S. of Arad" (Judg. i. 16). It is also undoubtedly named in Num. xxi. 1 (comp. Hormah in ver. 3), and xxxiii. 40, translated properly "the Canaanite king of Arad," A. V. "king; Arad the Canaanite." The site of Arad has been identified (Rbn. ii. 101) with "a barren-looking eminence," Tell 'Arad, one hour and a half N. E. by E. from Milth (Moladah), and eight hours from Hebron.

A'ra-das (fr. Gr.) = ARVAD (1 Mc. xv. 23).

A'rah (Heb. perhaps = wayfaring, Ges.). 1. An Asherite, of the sons of Ulla (1 Chr. vii. 39).—2. Ancestor of a family of 775 (Ezr. ii. 5) or 652 (Neh. vii. 10) who returned with Zerubbabel. One, Shechaniah, was father-in-law of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. vi. 18). Arah = ARES in 1 Esd. v. 10.

A'ram (Heb. high region, highlands, Ges.). 1. The name by which the Hebrews designated, generally, the country lying to the N. E. of Palestine; the high table-land which stretches from the Jordan to the Euphrates; also the region beyond the Euphrates, especially the mountainous region and high plain between it and the Tigris N. of 35°, called in Hebrew Aram-naharaim = the highland of the two rivers (see HARAN; Ps. lx. title; also in Heb., A. V. "MESOPOTAMIA," in Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxxiii. 5 [4]; Judg. iii. 8; 1 Chr. xix. 6), PADAN-ARAM (Gen. xxv. 20, &c.), Aram simply (Num. xxiii. 7; Judg. iii. 10, marg.; comp. 2 Sam. x. 16, A. V. "Syrians [Heb. Aram] beyond the river"). Aram is usually translated, as in the Vulgate and LXX., "SYRIA" or "SYRIANS." The Hebrew derivative Arammi = the Aramite, translated "Syrian" in A. V., is used in Gen. xxv. 20, and other parts of the Pentateuch, to designate a dweller in Aram-naharaim; in 2 K. v. 20, &c., an inhabitant of that part of Syria which had Damascus for its capital. (See Aram-damme, sek below.) The shortened Hebrew plural Rammim for Arammim, A. V. "Syrians," occurs in 2 Chr. xxii. 5; compare RAM 8. (See SHEMITIC LANGUAGES.) Besides Aram-naharaim and Padan-aram, we meet with the following small nations or kingdoms forming parts of the general land of Aram:—1. Aram-zobah (Ps. lx. title; also in Heb., A. V. "Syrians of Zoba," 2 Sam. x. 6, 8), or simply ZOBAB (1 Sam. xiv. 47, &c.). 2. Aram beth-rehob, A. V. "Syrians of Beth-rehob" (2 Sam. x. 6), or РЕХОВ (x. 8). 3. Aram-maachah, A. V. "Syria-maachah" (1 Chr. xix. 6), or Maachah only (2 Sam. x. 6; МААХАИ 2). 4. GESHUR, "in Aram," A. V. "in Syria" (2 Sam. xv. 8). 5. Aram-dammek (Damascus) (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6; 1 Chr. xviii. 5, 6). The whole of these petty states are spoken of collectively as "Aram" (2 Sam. x. 9 ff.), but Damascus gradually absorbed the smaller powers (1 K. xx. 1), and took the name of "Aram" alone (Is. vii. 8; also 1 K. xi. 25, xv. 18, &c.). See also HAMATH; HAMATH-ZOBAB; ISH-TOB.—According to Gen. x., Aram was a son of SHEM, and his brethren were Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, and Lud.—2. Son of Kemuel, and descendant of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 21); probably = RAM 3.—3. An Asherite, son of Shamer (1 Chr. vii. 34).—4. Son of Esrom, or Pezron; = RAM 1 (Mat. i. 3, 4; Lk. iii. 33).

A'ram-l-tess [i as in vine] (fr. Heb.) = a female inhabitant of Aram; a Syrian woman (1 Chr. vii. 14).

A'ram-na-ha-ra'im (Heb.; Ps. lx. title). ARAM 1

A'ram-zo'bah (Heb.; Ps. lx. title). ARAM 1.

A'ran (Heb. wild goat, Ges.), a Horite, son of Dishan (Gen. xxxvi. 28; 1 Chr. i. 42).

* A-ra-ni'ah (fr. Heb.; 2 Sam. xxiv. 18, marg.) = ARAUNAH.

A'ra-rat (Heb. fr. Sansc. = holy land, Bohlen, Ges.), a mountainous district of Asia mentioned in the Bible—(1.) as the resting-place of the Ark after the Deluge (Gen. viii. 4); (2.) as the asylum of the sons of Sennacherib (2 K. xix. 37, marg.; Is. xxxvii. 38, marg.; A. V. "the land of Armenia"); (3.) as the ally, and probably the neighbor, of Minni and Ashchenaz (Jer. li. 27; ARMENIA). In Gen. xi. 2, "from the E." A. V., apparently indicating its position as E. of Mesopotamia, is more correctly in the margin "eastward," as in Gen. ii. 8, xii. 8, xiii. 11, with reference to the writer's own country rather than to Ararat. The name Ararat, though unknown to Greek and Roman geographers and to the modern Armenians, was an indigenous and an ancient name for a portion of Armenia, for Moses of Chorene gives Araratia as the designation of the central province. In its biblical sense Ararat = generally the Armenian highlands—the lofty plateau which overlooks the plain of the Araxes on the N., and of Mesopotamia on the S. Various opinions have been put forth as to the spot where the ark rested, as described in Gen. viii. 4. Josephus (i. 3, § 6) quotes a tradition from Berosus the Chaldean, fixing the spot on the mountains of Kurdistan. Local tradition still points to the Jebel Judi, in this range, as the scene of the event, and reports, with Berosus, that fragments of the ark exist on its summit. Josephus also (l. c.) gives another tradition from Nicolaus Damascenus that a mountain in Armenia named Baris, beyond Minyas, was the spot. Josephus states himself (i. 3, § 5) that the spot where Noah left the ark had received an Armenian name which he renders Apobaterion (= the place of descent), and which seems identical with Nachdjevan, on the banks of the Araxes. To this neighborhood native Armenians now assign all the associations connected with Noah, and Europeans have so far indorsed this last opinion as to give the name Ararat exclusively to the mountain called Massis by the Armenians, Agri-Dagh (= Sleep Mountain) by the Turks, and Kuh-i-Nuh (= Noah's Mountain) by the Persians. This mountain, the loftiest and most imposing in the region, rises immediately out of the plain of the Araxes, and terminates in two conical peaks, named the Great and Less Ararat, about seven miles apart, the former of which is 17,260 feet above the level of the sea and about 14,000 above the plain of the Araxes, while the latter is lower by 4,000 feet. The summit of the higher rises about 3,000 feet above the limit of perpetual snow. It is of volcanic origin. The summit of Ararat was first ascended in 1829 by Parrot, who describes a secondary summit about 400

the Persian Gulf and the Mediterranean on the S. Viewed with reference to the dispersion of the nations, Armenia is the true centre of the world: and Ararat is now the great boundary-stone between the empires of Russia, Turkey, and Persia. (3.) Its physical character. Though of volcanic origin, Armenia differs materially from other regions of similar geological formation, for it does not rise to a sharp well-defined central crest, but expands into plains separated by a graduated series of subordinate ranges. It is far more accessible, both from without, and within its own limits, than other districts of similar elevation. The fall of the ground in the centre of the plateau is not decided in any direction; for the Araxes, which flows into the Caspian, rises W. of either branch of the Euphrates, and runs N. at first; while the Euphrates, which flows to the S. rises N. of the Araxes, and runs W. at first. (4.) The climate. Winter lasts from October to May, and is succeeded by a brief spring and summer of intense heat. In April the Armenian plains are still covered with snow; and in the early part of September it freezes keenly at night. (5.) The vegetation. Grass grows luxuriantly on the plateau, and furnishes abundant pasture during the summer to the flocks of the nomad Kurds. Wheat, barley, and vines ripen at far higher altitudes than on the Alps and the Pyrenees; and the harvest is brought to maturity with wonderful speed. These observations show that, while the elevation of the Armenian plateau constituted it the natural resting-place of the ark after the Deluge, its geographical position and physical character secured an impartial distribution of mankind to the various quarters of the world. The climate furnished a powerful inducement to seek the more tempting regions on all sides of it. At the same time the character of the vegetation was remarkably adapted to the nomad state in which Noah's early descendants probably lived.

Ar'a-rath (Tob. i. 21) = ARA-RAT.

A-rau'nah (fr. Heb. variously written; = Jah is strong, Fû.), a Jebusite who sold to David a site for an altar to Jehovah (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-24); = ORNAN. Keil (on 1 Chr. xxi. 25, Eng. tr.) says of the apparent discrepancy between 1 Chronicles and 2 Samuel in regard to the price, &c.; "in 1 Chr. xxi. 25, it is stated that David gave to Ornan for the place (probably the hill, Mount Moriah) 600 shekels of gold. On the other hand, in 2 Sam. xxiv. 24, we read that David bought the threshing-floor and the oxen for 60 shekels of silver. The very words of the two passages show that the authors were writing of different things, and, therefore, there is no reason to suppose that there is any error." From 2 Sam. xxiv. 23, "these things did Araunah the king, give unto the king," it has been inferred that he was one of the royal race of the Jebusites.

Ar'ba (Heb. giant-Baal or Baal-Hercules, Fû.), the progenitor of the ANAKIM, from whom HEBRON was called KIRJATH-ARBA (Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, xxi. 11).

Ar'bah (= ARBA), the city of = KIRJATH-ARBA or HEBRON Gen. xxxv. 27).

yards from the highest point, and on the gentle depression between the two eminences he surmises that the ark rested. The region immediately below the limit of perpetual snow is barren and unvisited by beast or bird. Arguri, the only village known to have been built on its slopes, was the spot where, according to tradition, Noah planted his vineyard. Lower down, in the plain of Araxes, is Nachdjevan, where the patriarch is reputed to have been buried. —Taking the Armenian plateau from the base of Ararat in the N. to the range of Kurdistan in the S. as = "the mountains of Ararat" (Gen. viii. 4), we notice—(1.) Its elevation. It rises to a height of from 6,000 to 7,000 feet above the sea, presenting a surface of extensive plains, whence spring lofty mountain ranges, having a generally parallel direction from E. to W., and connected with each other by transverse ridges of moderate height. (2.) Its geographical position. It is equidistant from the Euxine and the Caspian seas on the N., and between

Ar'bath-lte (fr. Heb.), the, = a native of the ARABIA or Ghór. Gesenius makes Arbathite = one from BETH-ARABAH. Abi-albon the Arbathite was one of David's valiant men (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chr. xi. 32).

Ar-bat'tis (fr. Gr.), a district of Palestine (1 Mc. v. 23 only); according to Ewald, the district N. of the sea of Galilee, part of which is still called Ard el-Bathah, but perhaps a corruption of Acrabattine = the toparchy between Neapolis and Jericho. AKRABIM.

Ar-be'la (Gr. fr. Heb. = citadel of God, Wr.), only in 1 Mc. ix. 2, defining the situation of MABALOTH, which was besieged and taken by Bacchides and Alcimus. According to Josephus this Arbela was a city of Galilee near the lake of Gennesaret, and remarkable for certain impregnable caves, the resort of robbers and insurgents, and the scene of more than one desperate encounter. Arbela is identified with the existing Irbid, a site with a few ruins W. of Medjel (MAGDALA), on the S. E. side of the Wady el-Hamám, in a small plain at the foot of the hill of Kurún Hatín. The caverns are in the opposite face of the ravine, and bear the name of Kula'at Ibn Ma'n. Arbela may be the BETH-ARBEL of Hos. x. 14.

Ar'bite, the (fr. Heb. = native of ARAB, Ges.). PAARAI the Arbite was one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 35); called in 1 Chr. xi. 37, NAARAI the son of EZBAI.

Ar-bo'nai (Gr. Abnonas), a torrent, apparently near Cilicia; possibly the Nahr Abraim or Ibrahim (ancient Adonis), which rises in Lebanon at Afka (ancient Aphek), and falls into the Mediterranean at Jebel (Byblos); or a corruption of the Hebrew 'éber han-náhar = beyond the river, i. e. Euphrates (Jd. ii. 24).

* Arch. The arch was used by the Egyptians at Thebes as early as B. C. 1540 (Wilkinson), and by the ancient Assyrians (Rawlinson). It was therefore probably known to the Israelites. The plural of the Hebrew éylám is translated "arches" in Ez. xl. 16 ff. A. V. (margin, "galleries" or "porches"); but the real meaning is doubtful. The Targums, LXX., Vulgate, Fairbairn (on Ezekiel), &c., translate porches; but Gesenius says they were carried round an edifice, and are distinguished from the porches. Fürst defines it a sort of hall-like space that recedes and projects. TEMPLE.

* Arch-an'gel [ark-ane'jel] (fr. Gr. = a chief of the angels) 1 Th. iv. 16; Jude 9. ANGEL; GABRIEL; MICHAEL; RAPHAEL; URIEL.

Ar-che-la'us [-ke-] (L. fr. Gr. = leading the people, a chief, L. & S.), son of Herod the Great, by a Samaritan woman, Malthace, and, with his brother Herod Antipas, brought up at Rome. At the death of Herod (B. C. 4) his kingdom was divided between his three sons, Herod Antipas, Archelaus, and Philip. Herod by will gave to Archelaus "the kingdom," but Augustus, though he confirmed the will in general, appointed Archelaus ethnarch, promising him the dignity of king afterward, if he governed well. He received half of what had been subject to Herod, including Idumea, Judea, Samaria, with the cities of Cesarea, Sebaste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, the whole yielding him six hundred talents' income (Jos. xxi. 8, § 1, and 11, § 4). In the tenth year of his reign (ninth, so Dion Cassius, A. D. 6, a complaint was preferred against him by his brothers and his subjects on the ground of his tyranny, in consequence of which he was banished to Vienne in Gaul, where he is generally said to have died. But Jerome relates that he was shown the sepulchre of Archelaus near Bethlehem. He seems to have been guilty of great cruelty and oppression (Mat. ii. 22). Josephus relates that he put to death three thousand Jews in the Temple not long after his accession. Archelaus wedded illegally Glaphyra, once the wife of his brother Alexander, who had had children by her.

Arch'e-ry. ARMS.

Arch'e-vites [-ke-] (fr. Heb.), perhaps = inhabitants of ERECH, placed as colonists in Samaria (Ezr. iv. 9).

Ar'chl [-kl] (Heb.) Josh. xvi. 2. ARCHITE.

Ar-chip'pus [-kip-] (L. fr. Gr. = ruling horses), a Christian teacher in Colosse (Col. iv. 17), called by St. Paul his "fellow-soldier" (Phn. 2); probably a member of Philemon's family. Some suppose him to have been overseer of the church at Colosse; others (improbably) a teacher at Laodicea. There is a legend that he was one of the seventy disciples, and suffered martyrdom at Chonæ, near Laodicea.

Ar'chite [-kite] (fr. Heb. as if from a place named Erech), the, the usual designation of David's friend Hushai (2 Sam. xv. 32, xvii. 5, 14; 1 Chr. xxvii. 83). The same word (in the Hebrew) occurs in Josh. xvi. 2, where "the borders of Archi" (i. e. "the Archite") are named as somewhere near Bethel.

Ar'chl-te-ture [-ke-]. Gen. iv. 17, 20, 22, appears to divide mankind into the "dwellers in tents" and the "dwellers in cities." (CITY; FENCED CITY.) The race of Shem (Gen. x. 11, 12, 22, xi. 2-9) founded the cities in the plain of Shinar, Babylon, Nineveh, &c., one of which, Resen, is called "a great city." We have in Gen. xi. 3-9, an account of the earliest recorded building, and of the materials employed in its construction. (BABEL, TOWER OF.) In Esth. i. 2, mention is made of the palace at Susa (SHUSHAN), the spring residence of the kings of Persia (Esth. iii. 15); and in Tobit and Judith, of ECBATANA, to which they retired during the heat of summer (Tob. iii. 7, xiv. 14; Jd. i. 14). In Egypt the Israelites appear first as builders of cities (Pithom and Raamses), compelled to labor at the buildings of the Egyptian monarchs (Ex. i. 11). The Israelites were by occupation shepherds, and by habit dwellers in tents (Gen. xlvii. 3). They had therefore originally, speaking properly, no architecture. In Canaan they became dwellers in towns and in houses of stone (Lev. xiv. 34, 45; 1 K. vii. 10); but these were not all, nor indeed in most cases, built by themselves (Deut. vi. 10; Num. xiii. 19, 22; Josh. xiv. 15). The peaceful reign and vast wealth of Solomon gave great impulse to architecture; for besides the Temple and his other great works, he built fortresses and cities in various places, Baalath, Tadmor, &c. (1 K. ix. 15-24). Subsequent kings are recorded as builders: Asa (1 K. xv. 23), Baasha (xv. 17), Omri (xvi. 24), Ahab (xvi. 32, xxii. 39), Hezekiah (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Chr. xxxii. 27-30), Jehoash, and Josiah (2 K. xii. 11, 12, xxii. 6); and Jehoikim, whose winter palace is mentioned (Jer. xxii. 14, xxxvi. 22; see also Am. iii. 15). On the return from captivity the chief care of the rulers was to rebuild the Temple and the walls of Jerusalem in a substantial manner, with stone, and with timber from Lebanon (Ezr. iii. 8, v. 8; Neh. ii. 8, iii.). Under Herod and his successors not only was the Temple magnificently rebuilt, but the fortifications and other public buildings of Jerusalem were enlarged and embellished (Lk. xxi. 5). Herod also built the town of Cesarea; enlarged Samaria, and named it Sebaste; built the cities of Agrippæum and Phasælis; and even adorned with buildings many foreign cities. His sons built or rebuilt Cesarea Philippi, Tiberias, Bethsaida, &c. These great works were undoubtedly splendid, and probably formed on Greek and Roman models. For the domestic architecture of the Jews, see HANDICRAFT; HOUSE.

Are-tu'rus (L. fr. Gr. = bear's tail). The Hebrew words 'dash' and 'ayish' (= a barrow bearer, the Arabic name of the Great Bear, Ges.), rendered "Arcturus" in the A. V. of Job ix. 9, xxxviii. 32, in conformity with the Vulgate of the former passage, are now generally believed to be identical, and to represent the constellation Ursa Major, known commonly as the Great Bear, or Charles's Wain. The star now known as Arcturus is a star of the first magnitude in the constellation Bootes, and is nearly in a line with two bright stars in the tail of the Great Bear. The ancient versions differ greatly in their renderings. The LXX. render 'dash' by the "Pleiades" in Job ix. 9 (unless the text which they had before them had the words in a different order), and 'ayish' by "Hesperus," the evening star, in Job xxxviii. 32. In the former they are followed or supported by the Chaldee, in the latter by the Vulgate.

Ard (Heb. fugitive), son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Num. xxvi. 40); ancestor of the ARDITES; probably = Ard, the "son" of Benjamin in Gen. xli. 21; = ADDAR in 1 Chr. viii. 3. BECHER; NAMAN 2.

Ardath—"the field called Ardath" (2 Esd. ix. 26).

Ard'ites = the descendants of ARD (Num. xxvi. 40).

Ardon (Heb. fugitive, Ges.), son, by Azubah, of Caleb the son of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 18).

A-re'll (Heb. son of a hero, Ges.; see ARIEL), a son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16; Num. xxvi. 17); ancestor of the ARELITES.

* A-re'llites = a family descended from ARELI (Num. xxvi. 17).

A-re-op'a-gite [-jite] = a member of the court of AREOPAGUS (Acts xvii. 34).

A-re-op'a-gus (L. fr. Gr. = hill of Ares; the Gr. Ares = L. Mars; Acts xvii. 19; literally translated MARS' HILL in verse 22), a rocky height in ATHENS, opposite the W. end of the Acropolis, from which it is separated only by an elevated valley. It rises gradually from the N. end, and terminates abruptly on the S., over against the Acropolis, at which point it is about fifty or sixty feet above the valley already mentioned. Tradition derives its name from the legendary trial, before the gods assembled here, of Mars for murdering Neptune's son Halirrhothius. This spot was the place of meeting of the celebrated Council of Areopagus, often called simply "the Areopagus," the most ancient and venerable of the Athenian courts. This court consisted of those who had held the office of Archon, and they were Areopagites for life, unless disqualified by misconduct. At first the court tried only cases of wilful murder, wounding, poison, and arson; but Solon gave it extensive censorial and political powers. It continued to exist under the Roman emperors. Its meetings were held on the S. E. summit of the rock. There are still sixteen stone steps cut in the rock, leading up to the hill from the valley of the Agora or "market" below; and immediately above the steps is a bench of stones excavated in the rock, forming three sides of a quadrangle, and facing the S. Here the Areopagites sat as judges in the open air. On the E. and W. side are raised blocks, probably those described by Euripides as assigned, one to the accuser, the other to the accused.—The Areopagus was the spot from which St. Paul delivered his memorable address to the men of Athens (Acts xvii. 22-31). Some commentators suppose that St. Paul was brought before the Council of Areopagus; but there is no trace in the narrative of any judicial proceedings. He "disputed daily" in the "market" (ver. 17), which was S. of the Areopagus in the valley. Attracting more and more attention, "certain philosophers of the Epicureans and Stoics" brought him up from the valley, probably by the stone steps already mentioned, to the Areopagus above, that they might listen to him more conveniently. Here the philosophers probably took their seats on the stone benches usually occupied by the members of the Council, while the multitude stood on the steps and in the valley below.

A'res (L.) = ARAH 2 (1 Esd. v. 10).

A're-tas (Gr. fr. Ar. = a cutter, graver, Pococke, Wr.), a common appellation of many of the Arabian kings or chiefs. (ARABIA; EDOM; NEBAIOTH.) Only two require mention here.—1. A contemporary of Antiochus Epiphanes (B. C. 170) and Jason (2 Mc. v. 8).—2. The father-in-law of HEROD ANTIPAS, and king of Arabia Petræa, whose ethnarch ("governor," A. V.) kept the city of Damascus with a garrison, desirous to apprehend St. Paul (2 Cor. xi. 32). There is a somewhat difficult chronological question respecting the subordination of Damascus to this Aretas. Under Augustus and Tiberius the city was attached to the province of Syria; and it is probable that a change in the rulership took place after the death of Tiberius. There had been war for some time between Aretas and Herod Antipas. A battle was fought, and the army of Antipas destroyed. Vitellius, governor of Syria, was sent to his aid against Aretas; but while on his march he heard of the death of Tiberius (A. D. 37), and remained at Antioch. By this change of affairs at Rome a complete reversal took place in the situation of Antipas and Aretas. The former was (A. D. 39) banished to Lyons, and his kingdom given to his nephew and enemy Herod Agrippa, who was intimate with the new emperor Caligula. It would be natural that Aretas should be received into favor; and the more so as Vitellius had an old grudge against Antipas, which, Josephus says, he concealed till he obtained revenge under Caligula. Now in A. D. 38, Caligula is known to have made several changes in the E.; and these facts, coupled with the non-existence of any Damascene coins of Caligula or Claudius, make it probable that about this time Damascus, which had belonged to the predecessor of Aretas, was granted to him by Caligula. The other hypotheses, that the ethnarch was only visiting the city, or that Aretas had seized Damascus on Vitellius's giving up the expedition against him, are very improbable (so Dr. Alford).

A-re'us (fr. Gr.), a king of the Lacedemonians, whose letter to the high-priest Onias is given in 1 Mc. xii. 20-23. There were two Spartan kings of the name of Areus, of whom the first reigned B. C. 309-265, and the second, grandson of the former, died at eight years old, B. C. 257. The first high-priest of the name of ONIAS held the office B. C. 323-300, and probably wrote the letter to Areus I. between 309 and 300.

Ar'gob (Heb. the stony), a tract of country on the E. of the Jordan, in BASHAN, containing sixty great and fortified cities. Argob was in the portion allotted to the half-tribe of Manasseh, and was taken possession of by JAIR. (Havoth-Jair.) It afterward formed one of Solomon's commissariat districts under an officer at Ramoth-Gilead (Deut. iii. 4, 13, 14; 1 K. iv. 13). In later times Argob was called TRACHONITIS, apparently a mere translation of the older name; and it is now apparently identified with the Lejah, a very remarkable district S. of Damascus, and E. of the Sea of Galilee. This extraordinary region—about twenty-two miles from N. to S. by fourteen from W. to E., and of a regular, almost oval, shape—has been described as an ocean of basaltic rocks and boulders, tossed about in the wildest confusion, and intermingled with fissures and crevices in every direction. "Strange as it may seem, this forbidding region is thickly studded with deserted cities and villages, all solidly built and of remote antiquity" (Ptr. ii. 241). The peculiar Hebrew word constantly attached to Argob (hebel, or chebel, literally = rope, A. V. "region") accurately designates the remarkably defined boundary of the Lejah, "sweeping round in a circle clearly defined as a rocky shore line;" "resembling a Cyclopean wall in ruins" (Ptr. ii. 219).

Argob (Heb.; see above), a man killed with Pekahiah, king of Israel (2 K. xv. 25); perhaps a Gileadite officer, who was governor of Argob; according to some, an accomplice of Pekah in the murder of Pekahiah. Sebastian Schmid makes Argob and ARIEH = two princes of Pekahiah, whom Pekah slew with the king. Rashi makes Argob = the royal palace, near which was the castle in which the murder took place.

Ar-i-a-ra'thes [-theez] (Gr., probably fr. Sansc. = great, or honorable, master) (properly Mithridates) VL. Philop'a-tor (Gr. loving his father), king of Cappadocia, B. C. 163-130. He was educated at Rome, and his subservience to the wishes of the Romans (B. C. 153) cost him his kingdom; but he was shortly afterward restored by the Romans to a share in the government; and on the capture of his rival Olophernes by Demetrius Soter, regained the supreme power. He fell, B. C. 130, in the war of the Romans against Aristonicus. Letters were addressed to him from Rome in favor of the Jews (1 Mc. xv. 22), who, in after-times, seem to have been numerous in his kingdom (Acts ii. 9; compare 1 Pet. i. 1).

A-ri'd'a-l or A-ri'd'al (Heb. fr. Pers. = the strong? Ges.; perhaps fr. Zend = giving what is worthy, Fñ.), ninth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

A-ri'd'a-tha or Ar-i-da'tha (etymology = ARIDAI, Ges.), sixth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 8).

A-ri-eh (Heb. the lion, probably from his daring as a warrior), either an accomplice of Pekah in his conspiracy against Pekahiah, king of Israel; or (so Sebastian Schmid) a prince of Pekahiah, who was put to death with him (2 K. xv. 25). Rashi explains it literally of a golden lion which stood in the castle. ARGOB.

A-ri-el (Heb. lion, i. e. hero, of God, or hearth of God; see below). 1. One of the "chief men" under Ezra in the caravan from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 16).—The Hebrew word occurs also in reference to two Moabites slain by Benaiah (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chr. xi. 22). Many with Gesenius and A. V. regard the word as an epithet, "lion-like;" but Thénius, Winer, Fürst, &c., make it a proper name, and translate "two (sons) of Ariel" (comp. ARELI).—2. A designation of the city of Jerusalem (Is. xxix. 1, 2, 7). Gesenius, Ewald, Hävernick, and many others make it = lion of God; Umbreit, Knobel, and most ancient Jewish expositors make it = hearth of God, tracing the first part to the Arabic. The latter meaning is suggested by the use of the word in Ez. xliii. 15, 16 (where, however, the reading is doubtful), as a synonyme for the altar of burnt-offering, though Hävernick makes it even here = lion of God.

Ar-i-ma-the'a (L.) = ARIMATHEA.

Ar-i-ma-the'a (L. Arimathæa, fr. Heb. RAMATH-ATH), "a city of Judea;" the birthplace or residence of JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA (Mat. xxvii. 57; Mk. xv. 43; Lk. xxiii. 51; Jn. xix. 38); probably = the Ramath of 1 Sam. i. 1, 19. RAMAH 2.

A-ri-och [-ok] (Assyrio-Chal. fr. Sansc. = venerable, Böhlen, Ges.; noble, Fñ.). 1. The king of Ellasar, an ally of Chedorlaomer in his expedition against Sodom, &c. (Gen. xiv. 1, 9).—2. The captain of Nebuchadnezzar's body-guard (Dan. ii. 14, &c.).—3. King of the Elymeans (Jd. i. 6). Junius and Tremellius make him = Deioceus, king of part of Media.

A-ri-s'a-l or A-ri'sal (Pers. fr. Sansc. = Vishnu's arrow, Böhlen), eighth son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

Ar-is-tar'chus [-kus] (L. fr. Gr. = excellent ruler, L. & S.), a Thessalonian, who accompanied St. Paul on his third missionary journey, and with Gaius was seized in the tumult at Ephesus (Acts xix. 29). He was with the apostle on his return to Asia (xx. 4); and again (xxvii. 2) on his voyage to Rome. He was afterward St. Paul's fellow-prisoner and fellow-laborer in Rome (Col. iv. 10; Phn. 24). Tradition makes him bishop of Apamea.

Ar-is-to-bu'lus (L. fr. Gr. = best advised, or best advising, L. & S.). 1. A Jewish priest, who resided in Egypt in the reign of Ptolemy VI. Philometor. In a letter of Judas Maccabeus he is addressed (163 B. C.) as the representative of the Egyptian Jews, and "the master" (i. e. counsellor?) of the king (2 Mc. i. 10). He was probably the peripatetic philosopher who dedicated to Ptolemy Philometor his allegoric exposition of the Pentateuch. Considerable fragments of this work have been preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius, but the authenticity of the quotations, though now generally conceded, has been vigorously contested. The object of Aristobulus was to prove that the peripatetic doctrines were based on the Law and the Prophets. (ALEXANDRIA).—2. A resident at Rome, some of whose household are greeted in Rom. xvi. 10. Tradition makes him one of the seventy disciples, and afterward a preacher of the Gospel in Britain.

* Ark, the A. V. translation of the Heb. áron (see ARK OF THE COVENANT; CHEST 1), and tébah, and the Gr. kibótos. The Heb. tébah is used of both Noah's "ark" (Gen. vi.-viii.; see NOAH), and the "ark" in which MOSES was put (Ex. ii. 3, 5; see REED 2). The Gr. kibótos in N. T. and Apocrypha denotes both Noah's "ark" (Mat. xxiv. 38, &c.) and the "ark" of the covenant (2 Mc. ii. 4, 5; Heb. ix. 4, &c.).

Ark of the Cove-nant [kuv-]. The first piece of the tabernacle's furniture, for which precise directions were delivered (Ex. xxv.).—1. It appears to have been an oblong chest (ARK) of shittim (acacia) wood, two and a half cubits long, by one and a half broad and deep. Within and without gold was overlaid on the wood, and on the upper side or lid, which was edged with gold, the MERCY SEAT (CHERUBIM) was placed. The ark had a ring at each of the four corners, and through these were passed staves of the same wood similarly overlaid, by which it was carried by the Kohathites (Num. vii. 9, x. 21). The ends of the staves were visible without the veil in the holy place of the temple of Solomon (1 K. viii. 8). The ark, when transported, was enveloped in the "veil" of the dismantled TABERNACLE, in the curtain of badger's skins, and in a blue cloth over all, and was therefore not seen (Num. iv. 5, 20).—II. Its purpose or object was to contain inviolate the Divine autograph of the two tables, that "covenant" from which it derived its title. It was also probably a reliquary for the pot of manna and the rod of Aaron. 1 K. viii. 9 says "there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone which Moses put there at Horeb." Yet Heb. ix. 4 asserts that, besides the two tables of stone, the "pot of manna" and "Aaron's rod that budded" were inside the ark; probably by Solomon's time these relics had disappeared. The A. V. in 1 Chr. xiii. 3, "we inquired not at it," seems to imply a use of the ark for an oracle; but the LXX. translate "we sought it not." (ΑΙΙΑΝ 1.)—Occupying the most holy spot of the sanctuary, it tended to exclude any idol from the centre of worship. It was also the support of the mercy seat, materially symbolizing, perhaps, the "covenant" as that on which "mercy" rested. Jer. iii. 16 predicts the time when even "the ark should be no more remembered," as the climax of spiritualized religion.—III. For the chief facts in the earlier history of the ark, see Josh. iii. and vi. In the decline of religion in a later period a superstitious security was attached to its presence in battle (1 Sam. iv.). Yet, though this was rebuked by its permitted capture, its sanctity, when captured, was vindicated by miracles, in its avenging progress through the Philistine cities (v.). Afterward it came back, first to BETH-SHEMESH (vi.); then it sojourned among several, probably Levitical, families (vii. 1, 2; 2 Sam. vi. 8, 11; 1 Chr. xiii. 13, xv. 24, 25) in the border villages of E. Judah, and did not take its place in the tabernacle, but dwelt in curtains, i. e. in a separate tent pitched for it in Jerusalem by David. Its bringing up by David thither was a national festival. Subsequently the Temple, when completed, received, in the installation of the ark in its shrine, the signal of its inauguration by the effulgence of Divine glory instantly manifested. Several PSALMS contain allusions to these events, e. g. xxiv., xlvii., cv., cxxxii.—When idolatry became more shameless in Judah, Manasseh placed "a carved image" in the "house of God," and probably removed the ark to make way for it. This may account for its being reinstated by Josiah (2 Chr. xxxiii. 7, xxxv. 3). It was probably taken or destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Esd. x. 22). Prieux's argument that there must have been an ark in the second temple is of no weight against express testimony, such as that of Josephus, &c. According to the Rabbins, a sacred stone, the "stone of drinking," stood in its stead.—The ancient Egyptians, Etruscans, Greeks, Romans, &c., had also mystic chests or arks.

Ark'ite (fr. Heb. = inhabitant of Arca or of Arce, Ges.), the, one of the families of the Canaanites

(Gen. x. 17; 1 Chr. i. 15), located in the N. of Phenicia. The city of Arce or Arca is mentioned by Josephus, Pliny, Ptolemy, &c. From Ælius Lamprius we learn that it contained a temple dedicated to Alexander the Great. It was the birthplace of Alexander Severus, and was thence called Cæsarea Libani. The Crusaders besieged it, A. D. 1099, for two months in vain, but afterward took it. In 1202 it was destroyed by an earthquake. The site, now 'Arka, lies on the coast, two to two and a half hours from the shore, about twelve miles N. of Tripoli, and five S. of the Nahr el-Khebir. A rocky hill rises to the height of one hundred feet close above the Nahr 'Arka; on the top of this is an area of about two acres, on which and on a plateau to the N. the ruins of the former town are scattered.

* Arm, one of the upper limbs of the human body (2 Sam. i. 10, &c.), often figuratively = strength, might, power (Ex. xv. 16; Ps. xlv. 3; Jn. xii. 38, &c.). Hence "to break one's arm" = to destroy his power (Ps. x. 15, &c.). "With a stretched-out arm" (Ex. vi. 6, &c.), and "to make bare the arm" (Is. lii. 10), refer to the position of an ancient warrior ready for battle and prepared to use his strength to the best advantage. DRESS.

Ar-ma-ged don [g hard] (fr. Heb. = hill of MEGIDON), a place (Rev. xvi. 16). The locality implied in the Hebrew term is the great battle-field of the O. T. In a similar passage in Joel (iii. 2, 12), the sense of the Divine judgments is spoken of as the "valley of Jehoshaphat," the fact underlying the image being Jehoshaphat's great victory (2 Chr. xx. 26; see Zech. xiv. 2, 4). So here the scene of the struggle of good and evil is suggested by that battle-field, the plain of Esdraelon, which was famous for two great victories, of Barak over the Canaanites (Judg. iv., v.), and of Gideon over the Midianites (vii.); and for two great disasters, the deaths of Saul (1 Sam. xxxi. 8), and of Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 29, 30; 2 Chr. xxxv. 22). The same figurative language is used in Zech. xii. 11.

Ar-me-ni-a (L. and Gr., fr. Heb. = mountains of MINNI; see below) is not in the Hebrew, though it occurs in A. V. (2 K. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38) for Ararat (comp. marg.). The Hebrew writers use the names ARARAT, MINNI, and TOGARMAH to describe certain districts of Armenia (see below).—The limits of the region called Armenia have varied greatly, but are described in general under Ararat. The Armenians claim descent from Haig or Haik, son of Thorgom (= Togarmah). The ancient kingdom of Armenia fell before the Macedonian power B. C. 328. Afterward it was sometimes independent, sometimes under the Syrian or other foreign rule. Lesser Armenia (the part W. of the Euphrates) became a Roman province under Vespasian. Greater Armenia (E. of the Euphrates) was an independent kingdom 190–34 B. C., and was afterward for centuries an object of contention between the Romans and Parthians, who by turns appointed and deposed its rulers. Many of the Armenians became Christians in the fourth century, and the W. part of Armenia was attached to the Roman empire A. D. 387; the E. part was then assigned by compact to Persia, and soon became a field of heathenish persecution. The Armenians are now widely scattered through Turkey and other countries; all nominally Christians; everywhere, like the Jews, a distinct trading people, but nowhere an independent nation. The Armenian is one of the chief Oriental churches; and in its forms, &c., is much like the Greek church.—The acquaintance of the Hebrews with this country was probably derived from the Phenicians. In the prophets, Armenia is one of the extreme N. nations known to the Jews. (1.) ARARAT, properly the central district of Armenia, whither the sons of Sennacherib fled (2 K. xix. 37, marg.; Is. xxxvii. 38, marg.), is summoned in Jer. li. 27, with Minni and Ashchenaz, to the destruction of Babylon. (2.) MINNI, only in Jer. li. 27, is probably = the district Minyas, in the upper valley of the Murad-su branch of the Euphrates. (3.) TOGARMAH is noticed in two passages of Ezekiel, in both of which it apparently = Armenia. In xxvii. 14, he speaks of Togarmah in connection with Meshech and Tubal; in xxxviii. 6, it is described as "of the N. quarters" in connection with Gomer. These particulars, the known relationship between Togarmah, Ashkenaz, and Riphath (Gen. x. 3), and the traditional belief of the Armenians that they are descendants from Togarmah, unite to establish the conclusion that Togarmah = Armenia. TONGUES, CONFUSION OF; VERSIONS, ANCIENT (ARMENIAN).

Arm'let, an ornament universal in the East, especially among women; used by princes as one of the insignia of royalty, and by distinguished persons in general. The word is not used in the A. V.; in Num. xxxi. 50, the Hebrew el'adāh is translated "chains;" in 2 Sam. i. 10, "the bracelet on his arm." Sometimes only one was worn, on the right arm (Ecclus. xxi. 21). From Cant. viii. 6, it appears that the signet sometimes consisted of a jewel on the armlet. These ornaments were worn by most ancient princes. They are frequent on the sculptures of Persepolis and Nineveh, and were worn by the kings and people of Persia, by the old British chiefs, &c. In the Egyptian monuments kings are often represented with armlets and bracelets. They are still worn among the most splendid regalia of modern oriental sovereigns, and it is even said that those of the king of Persia are worth a million pounds sterling. Now, as in ancient times, they are sometimes made plain, sometimes enchased; sometimes with the ends not joined, and sometimes a complete circle. Their enormous weight may be conjectured from Gen. xxiv. 22. BRACELET; GOLD; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.

Ar-mō'ni (Heb. of a fortress, palatine, Ges.), son of Saul by Rizpah (2 Sam. xxi. 8).

* Ar'mor. ARMS.

* Ar'mor-bear'er, one who bears another's shield, &c.; one who carries the arms or armor of a king or military chief. Abimelech (Judg. ix. 54), Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 21, xxxi. 4 ff.; 1 Chr. x. 4 f.), Jonathan his son (1 Sam. xiv. 1 ff.), Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 7, 41), and Joab (2 Sam. xxiii. 37; 1 Chr. xi. 39), are mentioned as having had each his armor-bearer. David was armor-bearer to Saul, and Naharai to Joab. Joab had ten armor-bearers at Absalom's death (2 Sam. xviii. 15).

* Ar'mo-ry, a building for receiving arms or armor, or for suspending them within or upon it (Neh. iii. 19; Cant. iv. 4; compare 1 K. x. 17; 2 Chr. xi. 12; Ez. xxvii. 10, 11). It is used figuratively in Jer. l. 25.

Arms, Ar'mor. The subject naturally divides itself into—

I. Offensive weapons: Arms.

II. Defensive weapons: Armor.

I. Offensive weapons.—1. The "Sword" (Heb. hereb or chereb) is frequently mentioned (Gen. iii. 24, xxvii. 40, xxxi. 26, xxxiv. 25, 26, &c.); but very little can be gathered as to its shape, size, material,

Gr. heavy-armed Warrior.—From Hope's Costume of the Ancients.—(Fbn.)

or mode of use. Ehud's sword ("dagger," A. V., but the same in Hebrew, as above) was only a cubit long, concealed under his garment, and we do not know that it was shorter than usual. But even if it was, the narratives in 2 Sam. ii. 16, and xx. 8-10, and the ease with which David used the sword of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 51; xxi. 9), go to show that the Hebrew sword was both lighter and shorter than the modern sword. It was carried in a sheath (Heb. ta'ar in 1 Sam. xvii. 51, &c.; nāddān in 1 Chr. xxi. 27), slung by a girdle (1 Sam. xxv. 18), and resting upon the thigh (Ps. xlv. 3; Judg. iii. 16), or upon the hips (2 Sam. xx. 8). The common Greek sword (Gr. ziphos, A. V. "sword," only in 2 Mc. xiv. 41; = Heb. hereb in LXX., in Josh. x. 28 ff., &c.) had a short cut-and-thrust blade, diminishing gradually from hilt to point, made in early times of bronze, afterward of iron, and was worn on the left side. A long and broad sword (Gr. rhomphaia; see Rbn. N. T. Lex.), like that used by the Thracians, and carried on the right shoulder = "sword" in Ecclus. xxi. 3, xxii. 21, xxvi. 28, xxxix. 30, xl. 9, xli. 2; Bar. ii. 25; 1 Mc. ii. 9, iii. 3, iv. 33, vii. 38, viii. 23, ix. 73; 2 Mc. xv. 15, 16; Lk. ii. 35; Rev. i. 16, ii. 12, 16, vi. 8, xix. 15, 21; also in the LXX. in Gen. iii. 24; Ex. v. 21, xxxii. 27, &c. = Heb. hereb. The Gr. machaira (originally [so L. & S.] a large knife or dirk; as a weapon, a short sword or dagger; afterward a sabre or bent sword; compare ziphos, above) is translated "sword" in Ecclus. xxviii. 18; 1 Mc. iii. 12, x. 85; Mat. x. 34, xxvi. 47 ff., and often in the N. T.; and very often in the LXX. = Heb. hereb (Gen. xxvii. 40, &c.). "Girding on the sword" symbolically = commencing war; and a similar expression denotes those able to serve (Judg. viii. 10; 1 Chr. xxi. 5). We read of swords with two edges (Judg. iii. 16; Ps. cxlix. 6; Ecclus. xxi. 8; Heb. iv. 12; Rev. i. 16, ii. 12), and "whetting" the sword (Deut. xxxii. 41; Ps. lxiv. 3; Ez. xxi. 9). Doubtless it was of metal, for it was bright and "glittering;" but Josh. v. 2, 3 ("swords of rock," A. V. "sharp knives") perhaps implies that in early times the material was flint. (AXE; KNIFE).—2. The "Spear," of which there were at least three distinct kinds. a. The "Spear" (Heb. hanith or chanith), apparently of the largest kind. It was the weapon of Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 7, 45; 2 Sam. xxi. 19; 1 Chr. xx. 5), and of other giants (2 Sam. xxiii. 21; 1 Chr. xi. 23) and mighty warriors (2 Sam. ii. 23, xxiii. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 11, 20). It was the habitual companion of King Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 6, xxvi. 7 ff.; 2 Sam. i. 6). This heavy weapon (not the lighter "javelin," A. V.) he cast at David (1 Sam. xviii. 10, 11, xix. 9, 10), and at Jonathan (xx. 33). The "hinder end" of this, considerable time (18, 26; A. V. "spear"). When not in action it was carried on the warrior's back (1 Sam. xvii. 6, A. V. "target"). In Job xxxix. 23, the A. V. inconsistently, with the Vulgate, translates "shield," as, with the Vulgate and LXX., in 1 Sam. xvii. 45; in xli. 29 (Heb. 21) "spear," as in Jer. vi. 23; in Jer. l. 42, "lance."—c. Another kind of spear (Heb. romah or romach). This occurs in Num. xxv. 7 (A. V. "javelin"); Judg. v. 8; 1 K. xviii. 28 (A. V. "lancets"; of 1611, "lancers"); often in the later books, especially in the phrase "shield and spear" (= arms); 1 Chr. xii. 8 (A. V. "buckler"), 24 ("spear"), 2 Chr. xi. 12, xiv. 8 (Heb. 7), xxv. 5; Neh. iv. 13, 16, 21 (Heb. 7, 10, 15); Ez. xxxix. 9, &c.—d. Probably a lighter missile or "dart" (Heb. shelah or shelach = something sent); translated in A. V. in 2 Chr. xxiii. 10, "weapon," xxxii. 5, "darts"; Neh. iv. 17 (Heb. 11) "weapon," 23 (Heb. 17, "weapon" in marg.); Job xxxiii. 18, xxxvi. 12, "sword" in both; Joel ii. 8, "sword," "dart" in margin. The Gr. belos (Eph. vi. 16) and bolis (Heb. xii. 20), both translated "dart" in A. V., = shelah or hêls (arrow, No. 3, below) in LXX.—e. The Heb. shebel, ordinarily = a rod (Ex. xxi. 20, &c.), or staff (2 Sam. xxiii. 21, &c.), and hence a bâton or sceptre (Gen. xlix. 10, &c.), is used once for the "darts" with which Joab dispatched Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 14). The plural of the Gr. zulon, translated "staves" in Mat. xxvi. 47, 55; Mk. xiv. 43, 48; Lk.

Abner drove through the body of Asahel (2 Sam. ii. 23). It is mentioned also in 1 Sam. xiii. 19, 22, xxi. 8; 2 K. xi. 10; 1 Chr. xii. 34; 2 Chr. xxiii. 9, and numerous poetical passages.—b. The "Javelin" (Heb. cidôn), apparently lighter than the preceding. It was appropriate for such manœuvring as in Josh. viii. 14–27, and could be held outstretched for a occurs in the N. T. only in Jn. xix. 34, and there = the Gr. longché, which the LXX. use in 1 Sam. xvii. 7 as = Goliath's "spear's head" (its proper meaning), but in Judg. v. 8, &c., as = Heb. rômah. In the Apocrypha "spear" is the translation of the

Gr. words longché (2 Mc. xv. 11), doru (Jd. xi. 2; Eccles. xxix. 13), and gaisos (Jd. ix. 7). Of these the third is used in the LXX. as = Heb. cidôn in Josh. viii. 18. The second (doru) is the common translation of the Heb. hanûth, also of rômah in 2 Chr. xi. 12, xiv. 8, xxvi. 14, &c., and of kayin in 2 Sam. xxi. 16. "Darts" in Jd. i. 15 = plural of Gr. sibunê, which the LXX. use for hanûth ("spear") in Is. ii. 4, and for cidôn ("spear") in Jer. vi. 23.—"Pikes" in 2 Mc. v. 3 = the plural of Gr. kamaz (= any long piece of wood, shaft of a spear, &c., L. & S.).—3. The "Bow" (Heb. keseth; Gr. toxon) is met with in the earliest history, in use both for the chase (Gen. xxi. 20, xxvii. 3) and war (xlviii. 22). In later times archers accompanied the Philistine (1 Sam. xxxi. 3; 1 Chr. x. 8) and Syrian armies (1 K. xxii. 34). Hebrew common soldiers, captains high in rank (2 K. ix. 24), and even kings' sons (1 Sam. xviii. 4), carried the bow, and were expert in its use (xx. 20, 36; 2 Sam. i. 22). The tribe of Benjamin seems to have been especially addicted to archery (1 Chr. viii. 40, xii. 2; 2 Chr. xiv. 8, xvii. 17); but there were also bowmen among Reuben, Gad, Manasseh (1 Chr. v. 18), and Ephraim (Ps. lxxviii. 9). The bow seems to have been bent by the aid of the foot, the Hebrew being literally treaders of the bow, &c., in 1 Chr. v. 18, viii. 40; 2 Chr. xiv. 8; Is. v. 28; Ps. vii. 12, &c. Bows of "steel" (?) are mentioned as if specially strong (2 Sam. xxii. 35; Job xx. 24; Ps. xviii. 34). It is possible that in 1 Chr. xii. 2, a kind of bow for shooting bullets or stones is alluded to (Wis. v. 22, "stone-bow"). The "Arrows" (Heb. hêls or chêls, plural hitlatim or chitlatim) were carried in a QUIVER. The bow and arrows are called "artillery" (1 Sam. xx. 40; marg. "instruments"), i. e. weapons. (FURNITURE 1.) From Job vi. 4, they seem to have been sometimes poisoned; and Ps. cxx. 4, may point to a practice of using arrows with some burning material attached to them. (DIVINATION 10; MAGOG.)—4. The "Sling" (Heb. kela'; Greek sphendonê) consists of two strings of sinew or some fibrous substance, attached to a leathern receptacle for the stone in the centre; it is swung once or twice round the head, and the stone is then discharged by letting go one of the strings. The sling is first alluded to in Judg. xx. 16, in noticing the seven hundred Benjamites who with their left hand could "sling stones at an hair-breadth and not miss" (comp. 1 Chr. xii. 2). David killed Goliath with this common weapon of a Hebrew or Syrian shepherd (1 Sam. xvii. 40 ff.), who by using it kept at a distance and drove off any thing attempting to molest his flocks. Abigail's bold metaphor—"the souls of thine enemies, them shall God sling out, as out of the middle of a sling" (1 Sam. xxv. 29)—was natural for the wife of a man whose possessions in flocks were so great as those of Nabal. The sling was advantageously used among the Syrians as well as the Hebrews in attacking and defending towns, and in skirmishing (1 Mc. ix. 11). In action the stones were carried in a bag round the neck (1 Sam. xvii. 40) or were heaped up at the feet of the combatant. Under the monarchy, slingers formed part of the regular army (2 K. iii. 25), though the slings with which they could break down the fortifications of Kir-haraseth must have been more ponderous than in early times, and more like the engines which king Uzziah contrived to "shoot great stones" (2 Chr. xxvi. 15; ENGINE). In 2 Chr. xxvi. 14, mention is made of stones especially adapted for slings (i. e. smooth stones; compare 1 Sam. xvii. 40):—"Uzziah prepared . . . shields and spears . . . bows and sling-stones" (see margin; A. V. "slings to cast stones").

II. Armor.—1. The "Breastplate" occurs in 1 Sam. xvii. 5, in describing Goliath's equipments, Heb. shiryón kaskasim, A. V. "coat of mail," literally breastplate of scales, and further (38), where Shiryón alone is translated "coat of mail." This passage contains the most complete inventory of the furniture of a warrior to be found in the sacred history. The Heb. shiryón (A. V. "harness;" margin, "breastplate") occurs in 1 K. xxii. 34, and 2 Chr. xviii. 33, in the phrase translated in A. V., after the Syriac, "between the joints of the harness," where the real meaning is probably "between the joints and the breastplate." One of the three forms, shiryón, shryon, shrydh, is also found in 2 Chr. xxvi. 14 and Neh. iv. 16 (Heb. 10, translated in A. V. "habergeons" in both); in Job xli. 26 (Heb. 18; A. V. "habergeon;" margin, "breastplate"), and Is. lix. 17 (A. V. "breastplate"). (SIRION.)—A kindred word (Heb. siryón = coat of mail, Ges.) is translated "brigandine" in the A. V. of Jer. xli. 4, li. 3. The Gr. thorax occurs in Rev.

defines the Hebrew "a military garment, properly of linen, strong and thickly woven, and furnished round the neck and breast with a breastplate or coat of leather or skin, frequently strengthened or adorned with bronze or gold, with or without a crest, sometimes wholly of metal, or of wood, of cloth in many folds, &c.—4. "Greaves" (Heb. mitsáh or mitscháh), or defences for the feet (so Mr. Grove), or for the legs (so Ges., Kit., Fbn., &c.), made of brass, are named in 1 Sam. xvii. 6, only.—5. Two or more kinds of "Shield" are distinguishable. a. The large shield (Heb. tsinnáh), encompassing (Ps. v. 12, xxxv. 2, A. V. "buckler," xci. 4) and protecting the whole person. When not in actual conflict, it was carried before the warrior (1 Sam. xvii. 7, 41). The word is used in the formula "shield and spear," &c., in 1 Chr. xii. 8, 24, 34; 2 Chr. xi. 12, &c., to denote weapons generally (see "Spear," a, b, above). b. Of smaller dimensions was the buckler or target (Heb. mághén), probably for use in hand-to-hand fighting. The difference in size between this and the tsinnáh is evident from 1 K. x. 16, 17; 2 Chr. ix. 15, 16, where a much larger quantity of gold is used for the tsinnáh (A. V. "target") than for the mághén (A. V. "shield"). The mághén is mentioned in 2 Sam. i. 21, xxii. 31 (A. V. "buckler"); 2 Chr. xii. 9, 10; Job xv. 26 (A. V. "bucklers"); Ps. iii. 3 (Heb. 4, A. V. "shield"); xviii. 2 (Heb. 3, A. V. "buckler"), &c. It also occurs in a formula for weapons of war, with the bow (2 Chr. xiv. 8 [Heb. 7, A. V. "shields"], xvii. 17), darts (2 Chr. xxxii. 5). The ordinary shield consisted of a frame-work of wood covered with leather, and thus might be burned (Ez. xxxix.

ix. 9, 17; figuratively in Eph. vi. 14; 1 Th. v. 8; in LXX. for shiryón, &c. The "breastplate" or cuirass, covered the body from the neck to the thighs, and consisted of two parts, one covering the front, the other the back (Rbn. N. T. Lez.). It was of bronze (BRASS), iron, sometimes of gold, &c. (HIGH-PRIEST.)—2. The Heb. tahrá or tachrá, in A. V. "habergeon" (i. e. a quilted shirt or doublet put on over the head), is mentioned but twice—in reference to the gown of the high-priest (Ex. xxviii. 32, xxxix. 23). Gesenius

9). The "boss" (Job xv. 36) was the exterior convex part or back (Ges.). The māḡēn was frequently cased with metal, either brass or copper; its appearance in this case resembled gold, when the sun shone on it (1 Mc. vi. 39), and to this rather than to the practice of smearing blood on the shield, we may refer the redness in Nah. ii. 3. Shields were anointed (Oil), and protected from the weather by being kept covered, except in actual conflict (Is. xxii. 6). The shield was worn on the left arm, to which it was attached by a strap. Shields of state were covered with beaten gold. Solomon made such for use in religious processions (1 K. x. 16, 17). Shields were suspended about public buildings for ornamental purposes (1 K. x. 17; 1 Mc. iv. 57, vi. 2). In metaphorical language the "shield" = protection or protector, generally spoken of God (Gen. xv. 1; Ps. iii. 3, xxviii. 7, lxxxiv. 11 [Heb. 12], &c.), but in Ps. xlvii. 9 (Heb. 10), of earthly rulers, in Eph. vi. 16, of faith. The Gr. thureos (= "shield," A. V., Eph. vi. 16) is used in the LXX. for both māḡēn (Judg. v. 8; 2 Sam. i. 21, &c.) and tsinnāh ("target," A. V., 2 Chr. ix. 15, &c.). So the Gr. aspis (= "shield," A. V., in Jd. ix. 7; Eccles. xxix. 13; 1 Mc. xv. 18, 20; 2 Mc. v. 3) in the LXX. = māḡēn (1 Chr. v. 18; 2 Chr. ix. 16, &c.) and tsinnāh once (Jer. xlv. 3, xxvi. 3 Gr.). The plural of the Gr. aspidiskē (= small shields) is once used (1 Mc. iv. 57, "shields," A. V.). The Gr. hoplon, a general term for arms (used in the LXX. for "weapons" in Ez. xxxix. 9), is translated in the plural "shields" in 1 Mc. vi. 2, and in the LXX. = māḡēn (1 K. x. 17, xiv. 26, 27, &c.), both shelah (see I. 2, d, above) and māḡēn (A. V. "darts and shields," 2 Chr. xxxii. 5), shelet (see 6, below; A. V. "weapon," 2 Chr. xxiii. 9), and both tsinnāh and sōhērāh (see c, below; A. V. "shield and buckler," Ps. xci. 4, xc. 4 Gr.).—c. The Heb. sōhērāh or sōhērāh, a poetical term occurring only in Ps. xci. 4, = "shield," A. V., and so Gesenius.—6. The Heb. shelet is translated by some (after Rashi) "quiver," by some "weapons" generally, by others (Kimchi, Ges., A. V., and most) a "shield." It denoted certain weapons of gold taken by David from Hadadezer, king of Zobah (2 Sam. viii. 7; 1 Chr. xvii. 7), and dedicated in the Temple (2 K. xi. 10; 2 Chr. xxiii. 9; Cant. iv. 4). In Jer. li. 11; Ez. xxvii. 11, the word refers to foreign armor. EGYPT; PERSIANS.

ture from Egypt. Every man above twenty years of age was a soldier (Num. i. 3): each tribe formed a regiment with its own banner and leader (ii. 2, x. 14): their positions in the camp or on the march were accurately fixed (ii. x.; ENCAMPMENT): the whole army started and stopped at a given signal (x. 5, 6): thus they came up out of Egypt ready for the fight (Ex. xiii. 18). On the approach of an enemy, a conscription was made from the general body under the direction of a muster-master (A. V. "officer" or "scribe of the host," Deut. xx. 5; 2 K. xxv. 19; 2 Chr. xxvi. 11), by whom also the officers were appointed (Deut. xx. 9). The army was then divided into thousands and hundreds under their respective captains (Num. xxxi. 14), and still further into families (ii. 34; 2 Chr. xxv. 5, xxvi. 12). From the time the Israelites entered Canaan until the establishment of the kingdom, little progress was made in military affairs; their wars resembled border forays. (WAR.) No general muster was made at this period; but the combatants were summoned on the spur of the moment.—With the kings arose the custom of maintaining a body-guard, which formed the nucleus of a standing army. Thus Saul had 3,000 select warriors (1 Sam. xiii. 2, xiv. 52, xxiv. 2), and DAVID, before his accession to the throne, 600 (xxiii. 13, xxv. 13). This band he retained after he became king, and added the CHERETHITES and PELETHITES (2 Sam. xv. 18, xx. 7), together with another class (called in Hebrew shālīshim, literally third men; hence chariot-warriors, so Gesenius, because each chariot contained three soldiers; the thirty officers of the guard, so Ewald, see 2 Sam. xxiii. 23 ff), officers of high rank (A. V. "captains" n 1 K. ix. 22; 2 K. x. 25; 1 Chr. xi. 11, &c.), the chief of whom (2 K. vii. 2, A. V. "lord," 1 Chr. xii. 18, A. V. "chief of the captains") was immediately about the king's person. David further organized a national militia, divided into twelve regiments, each serving under its own officers a year (1 Chr. xxvii. 1); at the head of the army when in active service he appointed a commander-in-chief (A. V. "captain of the host," 1 Sam. xiv. 50; 2 Sam. xix. 13; or "general," 1 Chr. xxvii. 34).—Hitherto the army had consisted entirely of infantry (A. V. "footmen," 1 Sam. iv. 10, xv. 4), the use of horses having been restrained by divine command (Deut. xvii. 16); but David reserved 100 chariots from the spoil of the Syrians (2 Sam. viii. 4): these probably served as the foundation of the force which Solomon afterward enlarged to 1,400 chariots and 12,000 horsemen (1 K. x. 26; 2 Chr. i. 14; CHARIOT; HORSE).—It does not appear that the system established by David was maintained by the kings of Judah; but in Israel the proximity of Syria necessitated the maintenance of a standing army. The militia was occasionally called out in time of peace (2 Chr. xiv. 8, xxv. 5, xxvi. 11); but such cases were exceptional. On the other hand the body-guard appears to have been regularly kept up (1 K. xiv. 28; 2 K. xi. 4, 11). Occasional reference is made to war-chariots and horsemen (viii. 21, xviii. 23, 24, &c.).—Of the arrangement and manœuvring of the army in the field, we know but little. A division into three bodies is frequently mentioned (Judg. vii. 16, ix. 43; 1 Sam. xi. 11; 2 Sam. xviii. 2). Jehoshaphat divided his army into five bodies (2 Chr. xvii. 14–18). The maintenance and equipment of the soldiers at the public expense dates from the establishment of a standing army. It is doubtful whether the soldier ever received pay even under the kings (the only recorded instance of pay applies to mercenaries, 2 Chr. xxv. 6): but he was maintained, while on active service, and provided with arms (1 K. iv. 27, x. 16, 17; 2 Chr. xxvi. 14). At the Exodus the number of the warriors was 600,000 (Ex. xii. 37) or 603,550 (xxxviii. 26; Num. i. 46); at the entrance into Canaan 601,730 (xxvi. 51). In David's time the army amounted, according to 2 Sam. xxiv. 9, to 1,300,000, viz. 800,000 for Israel and 500,000 for Judah; but according to 1 Chr. xxi. 5, 6 to 1,570,000, viz. 1,100,000 for Israel and 470,000 for Judah. (NUMBER.) The militia in service, a division for each month of the year, then amounted to 24,000 × 12 = 288,000 (1 Chr. xxvii. 1 ff.). Afterward the army of Judah under ABIAH is stated at 400,000, and that of Israel under Jeroboam at 800,000 (2 Chr. xiii. 3). Still later, Asa's army, derived from Judah and Benjamin alone, is put at 580,000 (xiv. 8) and Jehoshaphat's at 1,160,000 (xvii. 14 ff.; CENSUS). The system adopted by Judas Maccabeus was in strict conformity with the Mosaic law (1 Mc. iii. 55): and though he maintained a standing army (iv. 6; 2 Mc. viii. 16), yet the custom of paying the soldiers appears to have originated afterward with Simon (1 Mc. xiv. 32). The introduction of mercenaries commenced with John Hyrcanus; the intestine commotions in the reign of Alexander Jannæus obliged him to increase the number to 6,200 men; and the same policy was followed by Alexandra and by Herod the Great, who had in his pay Thracian, Germanic, and Gallic troops. The discipline and arrangement of the army was gradually assimilated to that of the Romans, and the titles of the officers borrowed from it.—II. Roman Army.—This was divided into legions, the number of which varied considerably, each under six tribunes ("chief captain," Acts xxi. 31), who commanded by turns. The legion was subdivided into ten cohorts ("band," Acts x. 1), the cohort into three maniples, and the maniples into two centuries, containing originally a hundred men, as the name implies, but subsequently from fifty to a hundred, according to the strength of the legion. There were thus in a legion sixty centuries, each under a centurion (Acts x. 1, 22; Mat. viii. 5, xxvii. 54). In addition to the legionary cohorts, independent cohorts of volunteers served under the Roman standards. One of these cohorts was named the Italian (Acts x. 1), as consisting of volunteers from Italy. The cohort named "Augustus" (xxvii. 1) may have been an independent cohort, known as the Augustan or imperial, because it held some such relation to the procurator as the imperial life-guard at Rome held to the emperor. It may have been the Italian cohort above (Hackett, on Acts, l. c.). The headquarters of the Roman forces in Judea were at Cesarea. CAPTAIN; ENSIGN; QUATERNION; SPEARMEN.

Ar'na (L.), an ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd. i. 2); = ZERAHIAH 1, or ZARAIAS 1.

Ar'nan (Heb. active, nimble, Ges.), a man whose sons are in Zerubbabel's genealogy (1 Chr. iii. 21); according to the LXX., Vulgate, and Syriac versions, son of Rephaiah.

Ar'non (Heb. a rushing, roaring, i. e. a roaring stream, Ges.), the river or torrent which formed the N. boundary of Moab, separating Moab from the Amorites (Num. xxi. 13 ff.; Judg. xi. 22), and afterward from Israel (Reuben) (Deut. ii. 24, 36, iii. 8, 12, 16, iv. 48; Josh. xii. 1, 2, xiii. 9, 16; Judg. xi. 13, 26; 2 K. x. 33; Jer. xlviii. 20). From Judg. xi. 18, it seems to have been also the E. border of Moab. Its fords are mentioned in Is. xvi. 2; its HIGH PLACES in Num. xxi. 28. By Josephus it is described as rising in the mountains of Arabia and flowing through all the wilderness till it falls into the Dead Sea. The modern Wady el-Môjeb undoubtedly = the Arnon. Its principal source is near Katrâne, on the route of the Mecca pilgrims. Thence it flows N.W. under several names, and takes that of Wady el-Môjeb one hour E. of 'Arâ'ir (AROER), whence it flows W. to the Dead Sea. On the S. edge of the ravine through which it flows are some ruins called Mehatet el Haj, and on the N. edge, directly opposite, those of 'Arâ'ir. Burckhardt judged the width across the ravine here to be about two miles; the descent on the S. side to the water is extremely steep and almost impassable. The stream (in June and July) runs through a level strip of grass some forty yards in width, with a few oclanders and willows on the margin. It enters the Dead Sea through a chasm about one hundred feet wide and a low delta at its mouth.

A-ro'd' (Heb. perhaps = wild ass, Ges.), a son of Gad; ancestor of the ARODITES (Num. xxvi. 17); called ARODI in Gen. xli. 16.

A-ro'di (Heb.) = AROD.

A'rod-ites. AROD.

A-ro'er (Heb. ruins, places whose foundations are laid bare, Ges.), the name of several towns of E. and W. Palestine. 1. A city "by the brink" or "on the bank of," or "by" the torrent Arnon, the S. point of the territory of Sihon, king of the Amorites, and afterward of the tribe of Reuben (Deut. ii. 36, iii. 12, iv. 48; Josh. xii. 2, xiii. 9, 16; Judg. xi. 26; 2 K. x. 33; 1 Chr. v. 8), but later again in possession of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 19). The description of Aroer by Eusebius and Jerome agrees with that of Burckhardt, who found ruins named 'Arâ'ir on the old Roman road, upon the very edge of the precipitous N. bank of the Wady Môjeb. Burckhardt found also between the Arnon and Wady Lejûm, one hour E. of Aroer, a hill with ruins, perhaps "the city that is in the midst of the river" (Josh. xiii. 9, 16, &c.; ARNON).—2. Aroer "that is 'facing' (A. V. "before") RABBAH 1," a town built by and belonging to Gad (Num. xxiii. 34; Josh. xiii. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 6); probably the place mentioned in Judg. xi. 33; perhaps at Ayra, a ruined site, two and a half hours S.W. of es-Salt (Ritter).—3. Aroer, in Is. xvii. 2, if a place at all, must be still further N. than No. 2, and dependent on Damascus. Rosenmüller, Gesenius (formerly), &c., however took it to be = No. 2: Gesenius (Lex. 1854, ed. by Rbn.) translated "Aroer" here ruins.—4. A town in Judah (1 Sam. xxx. 28 only), identified (Rbn. ii. 199) with some ruins called Ar'arah, in Wady 'Ar'arah, on the road from Petra to Gaza, about eleven miles E. S. E. of Beer-sheba.

A-ro'er-ite (fr. Heb. = one from AROER), a designation of Hothan (1 Chr. xi. 44).

A'rom (Gr.), ancestor of thirty-two men, said to have returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 16); possibly = HASHUM 1.

* Ar-pach'shad [-pak-] (Heb.; Gen. x. 22, marg.) = ARPHAXAD.

Ar'pad (Heb. prop, support, i. e. fortified city, Ges.), a city or district in Syria, apparently dependent on Damascus (Jer. xlix. 23); invariably named with HAMATH, but otherwise unknown (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13; Is. x. 9); = A. V. "Arphad" in Is. xxxvi. 19, xxxvii. 13. Some have supposed Arpad = ARVAD, but the similarity of names does not prove this.

Ar'phad [-fad] = ARPAD.

Ar-phax'ad (Gr. and L.; Heb. Arpachshad = the stronghold of the Chaldees, Ewald). 1. Son of Shem and ancestor of Eber (Gen. x. 22, 24, xi. 10-13; Lk. iii. 36). Buchart supposed the name preserved in that of the province Arrapachitis in N. Assyria.—2. A king “who reigned over the Medes in Ecbatana, and strengthened the city by vast fortifications,” and was afterward entirely defeated, taken, and slain by “Nabuchodonosor, king of Assyria” (Jd. i.); frequently identified with Deioeces, the founder of Ecbatana; but more like his son Phraortes, who fell in a battle with the Assyrians, 663 B. C. Niebuhr endeavors to identify the name with Astyages. JUDITH.

Ar-ray’. DRESS; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.

Ar’rows. ARMS.

* Ar’row-snake (Gen. xlix. 17, marg.) ADDER.

Ar-sa’ces [-seez] (L. fr. Armenian, &c.; = [so Rln.] the venerable?) VI., a king of Parthia who assumed the royal title Arsaces in addition to his proper name, MITHRIDATES I. He made great additions to the empire by successful wars; defeated and captured DEMETRIUS II. NICATOR, B. C. 138 (1 Mc. xiv. 1-3); treated him with respect and gave him his daughter in marriage, but kept him in confinement till his own death, about B. C. 130.

Ar’sa-reth, a region beyond the Euphrates, apparently of great extent (2 Esd. xiii. 45).

Ar-tax-erxes [ar-tag-zerk’seez] (Gr.; Heb. Artah- or Artach-shashia or -shast; fr. old Pers. = great king), the name probably of two different kings of Persia mentioned in the O. T. 1. The Artaxerxes in Ezr. iv. 7, who stopped the rebuilding of the temple, appears = Smerdis, the Magian impostor, and pretended brother of Cambyses (ANASUERUS 2), who usurped the throne B. C. 522, and reigned eight months. The name Artaxerxes may have been adopted or conferred on him as a title.—2. The Artaxerxes of Neh. ii. 1, who permits Nehemiah to spend twelve years at Jerusalem, in order to settle affairs there, may be identified with Artaxerxes Longimanus, the son of Xerxes, who reigned B. C. 464-425, and is probably the same king who had allowed Ezra to go to Jerusalem for a similar purpose (Ezr. vii. 1). Some have supposed the Artaxerxes of Ezr. vii. 1 = Xerxes. ANASUERUS 3.

Ar’te-mas (Gr. given by Artemis; see DIANA), a companion of St. Paul (Tit. iii. 12). According to tradition he was bishop of Lystra.

* Ar-tif’i-cer. HANDICRAFT.

* Ar-tif’le-ry in 1 Sam. xx. 40 = weapons; see ARMS I. 3; FURNITURE, 1: in 1 Mc. vi. 51 = engines to cast missiles; see ENGINE.

* Arts. See AGRICULTURE; ARCHITECTURE; HANDICRAFT; MEDICINE, &c. “Curious Arts” (Acts xix. 19); see MAGIC.

Ar’u-both (fr. Heb. = LATTICES, windows, Ges.; court, Fñ.), the third of Solomon’s commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 10). It included Sochoh, and therefore probably = the rich corn-growing lowland country. SEPIELA; VALLEY 5.

A-ru’mah (Heb. height, Fñ.), a place apparently near Shechem, at which Abimelech resided (Judg. ix. 41); possibly = RUMAH.

Ar’vad (Heb. prob. = a wandering, Ges.), a place in Phenicia, the men of which are named with those of Zidon as the navigators and defenders of Tyre in Ez. xxvii. 8, 11. In agreement with this, “the Arvadite” in Gen. x. 18, and 1 Chr. i. 16, is a son of Canaan. Arvad is undoubtedly the island of Ruwád (anciently Aradus), which lies off Tortosa (Tartús), two or three miles from the Phenician coast, some distance above the mouth of the river Eleutherus, now the Nahr el-Kebir. The island is high and rocky, but very small, hardly one mile in circumference.

Ar’vad-ite (fr. Heb.) = a native of ARVAD.

Ar’za (Heb. earth, Ges.), prefect of the palace at Tirzah under Elah, king of Israel, who was assassinated at a banquet in Arza’s house by Zimri (1 K. xvi. 9).

A’sa (Heb. curing, physician). 1. Son of Abijah, and third king of Judah, conspicuous for his earnestness in supporting the worship of God and rooting out idolatry, and for the vigor and wisdom of his government (1 K. xv. ff.; 2 Chr. xiv. ff.; Mat. i. 7, 8; HIGH PLACES). In his zeal against heathenism he did not spare his grandmother MAACHAH, the “King’s Mother.” (MOTHER; QUEEN.) Asa burnt the symbol of her religion (1 K. xv. 13; IDOL 4), and threw its ashes into the brook Kidron, and then deposed Maachah from her dignity. He also placed in the Temple certain gifts which his father had dedicated, and renewed the great altar which the idolatrous priests apparently had desecrated (2 Chr. xv. 8). Besides this, he fortified cities on his frontiers, and raised an army, amounting, according to 2 Chr. xiv. 8, to 580,000 men (comp. ABIJAH 1; NUMBER). Thus Asa’s reign marks the return of Judah to a consciousness of the high destiny to which God had called her. The good effects of this were visible in the enthusiastic resistance of the people to ZERAH 5, the Ethiopian. At the head of an enormous host (a million of men, 2 Chr. xiv. 9) Zerah attacked MARESHAH. There he was utterly defeated, and driven back with immense loss to Gerar. As Asa returned, laden with spoil, he was commended and encouraged by a prophet (AZARIAH 9), and then in the fifteenth year of his reign convoked an assembly of his own people with many from Israel, and solemnly renewed the national covenant with God (2 Chr. xv.). The peace which followed this victory was broken by the attempt of Baasha of Israel to fortify RAMAH, “that he might not suffer any to go out or come in unto Asa, king of Judah” (xvi. 1). To stop this Asa purchased the help of Ben-hadad I., king of Damascus, by a large payment of treasure, forced Baasha to abandon his purpose, and destroyed the works at Ramah, using the material to fortify GEBA 1 and Mizpeh. (MIZPAH 6.) The wells which he sunk at Mizpeh were famous in Jeremiah’s time (Jer. xli. 9). The means by which he obtained this success were censured by the prophet Hanani, who seems even to have excited some discontent in Jerusalem, in consequence of which he was imprisoned, and suffered other punishments (2 Chr. xvi. 10). In his old age Asa suffered from the gout, and “he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians.” He died greatly loved and honored in the forty-first year of his reign. There are some difficulties connected with its chronology. Thus, in 2 Chr. xvi. 1, we read that Baasha fortified Ramah in the thirty-sixth year of Asa’s reign, while from 1 K. xv. 33, Baasha appears to have died in the twenty-sixth. The former number is supposed by the marginal note of A. V., by Clinton, &c., to refer to the year of the separate kingdom of Judah = Asa’s sixteenth year and Baasha’s thirteenth. So in 2 Chr. xv. 19, the “thirty-fifth year of Asa’s reign” may = thirty-fifth year of the kingdom of Judah. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF).—2. A Levite, ancestor of BERECHIAH 3 (1 Chr. ix. 16).

As-a-dil’as (Gr.; prob. = PASADIAH), son of Chelcias, or Hilkiah, and ancestor of Baruch (Bar. i. 1).

A’sa-el, an ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1); = JANZEEL or JANZIEL?

A'sa-hel (Heb. whom God made, or constituted, Ges.). 1. A nephew of David; youngest son of his sister Zeruiah, and brother of Abishai and Joab; one of David's thirty valiant men; celebrated for his swiftness of foot; slain at Gibeon by ABNER (2 Sam. ii. 18 ff., xxiii. 24; 1 Chr. ii. 16, xi. 26).—2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 8).—3. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign; overseer of tithes, &c. (xxxi. 13).—4. Father of JONATHAN 7 (Ezr. x. 15); called AZAZEL in 1 Esd. ix. 14.

As-a-hi'ah (fr. Heb. = ASATAH), a servant of king Josiah, sent with Hilkiah, &c., to inquire of Jehovah respecting the book of the law found in the Temple (2 K. xxii. 12, 14); also called ASATAH (2 Chr. xxxiv. 20).

As-alah [ah-sa'yah] or As-a-l'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah made or constituted). 1. A prince of the Simeonites in Hezekiah's reign, participant in the extermination of the Hamite shepherds of Gedor (1 Chr. iv. 36).—2. A Levite, chief of the 220 sons of Merari, summoned by David with other Levites and priests, to bring the ark of God to Jerusalem (vi. 30, xv. 6, 11).—3. The firstborn of the SHILONITES, resident with his family in Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (ix. 5); supposed by some = MAASEKIAH 9.—4. ASAHIAH (2 Chr. xxxiv. 20).

As-a-na (L.) = ASNAH (1 Esd. v. 31).

Asaph (Heb. collector, Ges.). 1. A Levite, son of Berechiah, and one of the leaders of David's choir (1 Chr. vi. 39, xv. 17, xxv. 6, 9). Psalmus l. and lxxiii.-lxxxiii. are attributed to him (PSALMS); and he was in after-times celebrated as a seer (PROPHET) as well as a musical composer (2 Chr. xxix. 30; Neh. xii. 46). The office appears to have remained hereditary in his family, unless he was the founder of a school of poets and musical composers, who were called after him "the sons of Asaph," as the Homeric Homēridē from Homer (1 Chr. xxv. 1 f.; 2 Chr. xx. 14, xxix. 13; Ezr. ii. 41, iii. 10; Neh. vii. 44, xi. 22).—2. Father or ancestor of Joah, the recorder under Hezekiah (2 K. xviii. 18, 37; Is. xxxvi. 3, 22); not improbably = No. 1.—3. Keeper of the royal forest or "paradise" of Artaxerxes (Neh. ii. 8), probably a Jew.—4. Ancestor of MATTANIAH 2 (1 Chr. ix. 15; Neh. xi. 17); probably = No. 1 and 2.—5. In 1 Chr. xxvi. 1, Asaph probably = ABIASAPH or EBASAPH.

As-a-re-el (Heb. whom God hath bound, sc. by a vow, Ges.), a son of Jehaleleel in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 16).

As-a-re'lah (fr. Heb. = upright toward God, Ges.), one of the sons of ASAPH 1 (1 Chr. xxv. 2); = JESH-ARELAH in verse 14.

* As-a-rites, a misprint in some copies for ATARITES in 1 Chr. ii. 54, marg.

As'a-ron (L.) = ASHKELOH.

* As-ces'sion. BETHANY 1; JESUS CHRIST.

As-e-as (L.) = ISHIAH (1 Esd. ix. 32).

As-e-b-e-bi'a (Gr.) = SHEREBIAH (1 Esd. viii. 47).

As-e-bi'a = HASHABIAH 7 (1 Esd. viii. 48).

As-e-nath (Heb.; fr. Egyptian = she who is of Neith [the Egyptian Neith = Rom. Minerva], Ges.; perhaps rather [comp. BITHIAH], a Hebrew name received on her marriage to Joseph, = [comp. ASNAH] storehouse or bramble), daughter of POTIPHERAH, priest, or prince, of On; wife of JOSEPH (Gen. xli. 45), and mother of Manasseh and Ephraim (xli. 50, xlii. 20).

As'er or As'er (L. fr. Heb.) = ASHER (Tob. i. 2; Lk. ii. 36; Rev. vii. 6).

As'e-rer = SISERA 2 (1 Esd. v. 32).

* Ash (Heb.), Job ix. 9, marg. ARCTURUS.

Ash (Heb. ōren) occurs only in Is. xlv. 14, as one of the trees out of the wood of which idols were carved: "He heweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypress and the oak which he strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest; he planteth an ash and the rain doth nourish it." It is impossible (so Mr. Houghton) to determine the tree denoted by the Hebrew word; the LXX. and the Vulgate understand some species of pine-tree. The translation in A. V. ("ash") was probably adopted from the similarity of the L. ornus (= ash) to the Heb. ōren, and Dr. Royle (in Kitto) says the Manna Ash (Ornus Europaea) is found in Syria, but being cultivated it may have been introduced.

A'shan (Heb. smoke, Ges.), a city in the low country of Judah, named in Josh. xv. 42, with LIBNATH and Ether; in Josh. xix. 7, and 1 Chr. iv. 32, with Ain and Kimmōn, as belonging to Simeon; in 1 Chr. vi. 59, as a priests' city, occupying the same place as AIN 2, in Josh. xxi. 16; perhaps = CHORASHAN in 1 Sam. xxx. 30. Wilton (in Fbn., art. Libnath) identifies Ashan with Selān near Gaza.

Ash-be'a (Heb. I adjure, Ges.), a proper name, but whether of a person or place is uncertain (1 Chr. iv. 21). Houbigant makes it a place, and would render "the house of Ashbea" by Beth-ashbea. The whole clause is obscure. The Targum of Rabbi Joseph paraphrases it "and the family of the house of manufacture of the fine linen for the garments of the kings and priests, delivered to the house of Eshba."

Ash'bel (Heb. determination of God, Ges.; = ESHBAAL, Fū.), son of Benjamin and ancestor of the ASHBELITES (Gen. xli. 21; Num. xxvi. 38; 1 Chr. viii. 1).

Ash'bel-ites = descendants of ASHBEL (Num. xxvi. 38).

Ash'che-naz [-ke-] (1 Chr. i. 6; Jer. li. 27) = ASH-KENAZ.

Ash'dod (Heb. stronghold, castle, Ges.), A-zo'tus (L. fr. Heb.) in Acts viii. 40; one of the five confederate cities of the Philistines, situated about thirty miles from the S. frontier of Palestine, three from the Mediterranean, and nearly midway between Gaza and Joppa. It stood on an elevation overlooking the plain, was strongly fortified, and was one of the seats of the worship of Dagon (1 Sam. v. 5). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 47), but was never subdued by the Israelites, though Uzziab broke down the wall of the town, and established forts on the adjacent hills; and even down to Nehemiah's age it preserved its distinctiveness of race and language (Neh. xiii. 23, 24). It occupied a commanding position on the high-road from Palestine to Egypt, and was besieged by Tartan about B. C. 718, apparently to frustrate Hezekiah's league with Egypt (Is. xx. 1). The effects of its siege of twenty-nine years by Psammetichus (B. C. 630) are incidentally referred to in Jer. xxv. 20. It apparently recovered from this blow, and was allied with the Arabians, &c. against Jerusalem (Neh. iv. 7). It was destroyed by the Maccabees (1 Mc. v. 68, x. 84), and lay in ruins until the Roman conquest of Judea, when it was restored by Gabinius (B. C. 55). The only notice of it in the N. T. is in connection with Philip's return from Gaza (Acts viii. 40). It is now an insignificant village called Esdūd. (See cut on next page.)

Ash'dod-ites = the inhabitants of ASHDOD (Neh. iv. 7); called ASHDOTHITES in Josh. xiii. 3.

Ash'doth Pis'gah (Heb. outpourings of torrents [or ravines] of Pisgah, Ges.); only in Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20; and in Deut. iv. 49, A. V. "springs of PISGAH." In Deuteronomy the words form part of a formula (A. V. "under Ashdath Pisgah eastward," "eastward under the springs of Pisgah"), apparently defining the mountains which enclose the Dead Sea on the E. The same intention is evident in Josh. xii. 3 and xiii. 20; and in Josh. x. 40 and xii. 8. Ashdath (A. V. "the springs") is used alone to denote one of the main natural divisions of the country. A kindred word (Heb. ashed, A. V. "stream") is used in Num. xxi. 15, which also refers to the E. of the Dead Sea.

Ash'doth-ites (Josh. xiii. 3) = ASHDODITES.

Ash'er (Heb. happy, blessed, Ges.). 1. (In Apoc. and N. T. ASER). Eighth son of Jacob, by Zilpah, Leah's handmaid (Gen. xxx. 13). This passage is full of paronomastic turns: "And Leah said, 'In my happiness am I, for the daughters will call me happy,' and she called his name Asher" (i. e. "happy"). A similar play occurs in the blessing of Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 24).—Asher is in the lists of the tribes in Gen. xxxv. xli. ; Ex. i. ; Num. i. ii. xiii. , &c. During the march through the desert Asher's place was between Dan and Naphtali on the N. side of the tabernacle (ii. 27).—The territory assigned to Asher was on the sea-shore from Carmel northward, with Manasseh on the S., Zebulun and Issachar on the S. E., and Naphtali on the N. E. The boundaries and towns are given in Josh. xix. 24–31, xvii. 10, 11; and Judg. i. 31, 32. The S. boundary was probably one of the streams which enter the Mediterranean S. of Dor (modern Tantûra)—either Nahr el-Defneh or Nahr Zurka. The tribe had the maritime portion of the rich plain of Esdraelon, probably for eight or ten miles from the shore. The boundary then appears to have run N., possibly bending to the E. to embrace Ahlab, and reaching Zidon by Kanah, whence it turned and came down by Tyre to Achzib. This territory contained some of the richest soil in Palestine; and to this fact, as well as to their proximity to the Phenicians, the degeneracy of the tribe may be attributed (Judg. i. 31, v. 17). At the numbering of Israel at Sinai, Asher was more numerous than Ephraim, Manasseh, or Benjamin (Num. i. 32–41); but in the reign of David, his name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chr. xxvii. 16–22). Some from Asher came to Jerusalem to attend Hezekiah's Passover (2 Chr. xxx. 11). Simeon and Asher have been said to be the only tribes W. of the Jordan which furnished no hero or judge to the nation. "One name alone shines out of the general obscurity—the aged widow 'Anna the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Asher,' who in the very close of the history departed not from the Temple, but 'served God with fastings and prayers night and day'" (Stl. 261).—2. A place on the S. boundary of the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 7); placed by Eusebius on the road from Shechem to Bethshan or Scythopolis, about fifteen miles from the former; supposed by Porter (Hand-book, p. 348) to have been at the modern hamlet of Teyâsir, three-quarters of an hour from Tûbûs (anciently Thebez).

A-she'rah (Heb. prob. fr. a root signifying to be straight, direct), the name of a Phenician goddess, or rather of the idol itself; translated in A. V. "grove," after the LXX. and Vulgate. Asherah is very closely connected with ASHTORETH and her worship, and with Baal (Judg. iii. 7, comp. ii. 8; vi. 25; 1 K. xviii. 19; 2 K. xxiii. 13–15). Many critics have regarded Asherah and Ashtoreth as identical; but Bertheau's view appears to be correct, that Ashtoreth is the proper name of the goddess, whilst Asherah is the name of her image or symbol. This symbol seems in all cases to have been of wood (see Judg. vi. 25–30; 2 K. xxi. 7, xxiii. 6, 14).

Ash'er-ites = descendants of ASHER 1, and members of his tribe (Judg. i. 32).

Ash'es. The ashes on the altar of burnt-offering were gathered into a cavity in its surface. On the days of the three solemn festivals the ashes were not removed, but the accumulation was taken away afterward in the morning, the priests casting lots for the office. The ashes of a red heifer burnt entire (Num. xix.), ceremonially purified the unclean (Heb. ix. 13), but polluted the clean. (PURIFICATION.) Ashes about the person, especially on the head, were a sign of sorrow. (MOURNING.) "Ashes" figuratively = any thing light, worthless, fallacious (Job xiii. 12; Is. xlv. 20). "Dust and ashes" (Gen. xviii. 27, &c.) is a proverbial expression for the lowliness and frailty of human nature (Ges.).

Ash'la-ma (Heb.; according to the Talmudists, a gout without hair, or rather with short hair), a god worshipped by the Hamathite colonists in Samaria (2 K. xvii. 30). Ashima has been regarded as = the Mendesian god of the Egyptians, the Pan of the Greeks. It has also been identified with the Phœnician god Esmûn, to whom belong the characteristics both of Pan and of Esculapius.

Ash'ke-lon (Heb., perhaps = migration, Ges.), also written Ash'ke-lon, in the Apocrypha As'ca-lon, one of the five cities of the lords of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17), on the shore of the Mediterranean, W. S. W. from Jerusalem, on the main road from Egypt through Gaza to central and northern Palestine. The village near the ruined site retains its ancient name. Samson went down from Timnath to Ashkelon (Judg. xiv. 19), as if to a remote place whence his slaying thirty men and taking their spoil was not likely to be heard of. Ashkelon is also mentioned in Judg. i. 18; 2 Sam. i. 20; Jer. xxv. 20, xlvii. 5, 7; Am. i. 8; Zeph. ii. 4, 7; Zech. ix. 5; in the Apocrypha in Jd. ii. 28; 1 Mc. x. 86, xi. 60, xii. 33. In post-biblical times Ashkelon rose to considerable importance. Near the town were the temple and sacred lake of Derceto, the Syrian Venus. (ATARGATIS.) The soil around was remarkable for its fertility. The "Eschalot" or "Shallot," a kind of onion, was first grown there. Ashkelon was a famous stronghold in the Crusades. By the Mohammedan geographers it was called "the bride of Syria." Its position is naturally very strong, and a small harbor toward the E. advanced a little way into the town.

Ash'ke-naz (Heb.; see below), one of the three sons of Gomer, son of JAPHETH (Gen. x. 3), i. e. one of the peoples or tribes belonging to that part of the Japhetic division of the human race which bears the name of GOMER. The original seat of the people of Ashkenaz was undoubtedly in the neighborhood of ARMENIA, since they are connected (Jer. li. 27; A. V. "Ashchenaz") with the kingdoms of ARARAT and MINNI. We may probably recognize the tribe of Ashkenaz afterward on the N. shore of Asia Minor, in the name of Lake Ascanius, and in Europe in the name Scand-ia, Scand-inavia. Knobel regards Ashkenaz as a compound (Ash-kenaz = the As-race; perhaps the origin of the name ASIA), and considers Ashkenaz = the German race.

Ash'nah (Heb. the strong, fortified, Ges.), the name of two cities, both in the Lowland of Judah: (1.) named between Zoreah and Zanoah, and therefore probably W. of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 33); and (2.) between Jiphtah and Nezib, and therefore S. W. of Jerusalem (xv. 43). Wilton (in Fbn. under Libnah) identifies this Ashnah with Deir Esneid, a village about six miles N. E. of Gaza.

Ash-pe-naz (Heb.; fr. Pers. and Sansc. = nose of the horse, Rödiger, Ges.), Nebuchadnezzar's master of the eunuchs (Dan. i. 3).

Ash'ri-el (1 Chr. vii. 14), properly ASRIEL.

Ash'ta-roth. 1. Hebrew plural of ASHTORETH (Judg. ii. 13; 1 Sam. vii. 3, xxxi. 10); associated with the plural BAALIM (Judg. x. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 4, xii. 10). Gesenius maintains that these plurals = statues of Ashtoreth and Baal; but probably (so Movers) they indicate different modifications of the divinities themselves.—2. A city on the E. of Jordan, in Bashan, in the kingdom of Og, doubtless so called from being a seat of the worship of the goddess Ashtaroeth or ASHTORETH. It is generally mentioned in describing Og (Deut. i. 4; Josh. ix. 10, xii. 4, xiii. 12). It fell to the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 31), and was given with its suburbs to the Gershonites (1 Chr. vi. 71, Heb. 56). Jerome states that in his time it lay six miles from Adra, which again was twenty-five from Bostra. Eusebius and Jerome speak of two villages or castles, nine miles apart, between the cities Adara and Abila. One of these was possibly Ashtaroeth; the other may have been ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM. The only trace of the name yet recovered in these districts is Tell-Ashterah, or Ashe-rah, a large mound or hill about six miles W. of Edr'a (ancient Edrei?). Ashtaroeth is also written ASTAROTH, and probably = BEESHTERAH.

Ash'te-rath-ite = a native or inhabitant of ASHTAROTH (1 Chr. xi. 44) beyond Jordan. Uzzia the Ashterathite was one of David's valiant men.

Ash'te-roth Kar-na'im (Heb. Ashtaroeth of the two horns or peaks), a place of very great antiquity, the abode of the Rephaim at the incursion of Chedorlamer (Gen. xiv. 5). The name reappears as CARNAIM or CARNION (1 Mc. v. 26, 43, 44; 2 Mc. xii. 21, 26), "a strong and great city" in "the land of Galaad." It is usually assumed (probably incorrectly) = ASHTAROTH 2. Es-Sanamein (= the two idols), by which the word is rendered in the Arabic version of Saadiah, is now an important place on the route of the Mecca pilgrims, about twenty-five miles S. of Damascus, and to the N. W. of the Lejah.

BAAL was the principal male divinity. (ASHTAROTH.) The name Ishtar (undoubtedly = Ashtoreth of the O. T. and the Greek and Roman Astarte) appears to be clearly identified in the list of the great gods of Assyria. The worship of Astarte seems to have extended wherever Phœnician colonies were founded. The character and attributes of Ashtoreth are involved in considerable perplexity. There can be no doubt that the general notion symbolized is that of productive power, as Baal symbolizes that of generative power; and it would be natural to conclude that as the sun is the great symbol of the latter, and therefore = Baal, so the moon is the symbol of the former and must = Astarte. That this goddess was so typified can scarcely be doubted (compare the name ASHTEROOTH-KARNAIM). It is certain that she was by some ancient writers identified with the moon. On the other hand the Assyrian Ishtar appears to have been not the moon-goddess, but the planet Venus: and it is certain that Astarte was by many ancient writers identified with the goddess Venus (or Aphrodite), and also with the planet of that name. Movers distinguishes two Astartes, one Carthaginian-Sidonian, a virgin goddess symbolized by the moon, the other Syro-Phœnician symbolized by the planet Venus. Whether this be so or not, it is certain that the worship of Astarte became identified with that of Venus, and that this worship was connected with the most impure rites is apparent from the close connection of this goddess with ASHERAH (1 K. xi. 5, 33; 2 K. xxiii. 13).

Ash'ur (fr. Heb. perhaps = blackness, Ges.), posthumous son of Hezron by his wife Abiah (1 Chr. ii. 24, iv. 5); "father" or founder of TEKOA.

Ash'ur-ites (fr. Heb.), a people named among Ish-bosheth's subjects (2 Sam. ii. 9). The Arabic, Syriac, and Vulgate versions, and Ewald take Ashurites = the Geshurites (ARAM; GESHUR); but Geshur had a king of its own, Talmi, David's father-in-law (1 Chr. iii. 2, compare 4; 2 Sam. xiii. 37), and was too remote. It may therefore be safer to follow the Targum of Jonathan, which has Beth-Asher (= house of Asher), and is supported by several MSS. of the original text. "The Asherites" will then = the inhabitants of the country W. of the Jordan above Jezreel. BOX-TREE.

Ash'yath (Heb. firmer, stronger, Fû.), an Asherite, son of Japhlet (1 Chr. vii. 33).

Asia [in Gr. or L. pron. a'she-ah, but in English usually a'shah] (Gr. and L.; fr. a root denoting aurora, orient, the East, Pott; see ASHKENAZ). In the N. T. this occurs in Acts ii. 9, vi. 9, xvi. 6, xix. 10, 22, 26, 27, xx. 4, 16, 18, xxi. 27, xxvii. 2; Rom. xvi. 5 (in A. V., &c., "Achaia"); 1 Cor. xvi. 19; 2 Cor. i. 8; 2 Tim. i. 15; 1 Pet. i. 1; Rev. i. 4, 11. ("Chief of Asia": see ASIARCAS.) In all these passages the word = not "the continent of Asia," nor what we commonly understand by "Asia Minor," but a Roman province which embraced the W. part of the peninsula of Asia Minor, and of which Ephesus was the capital. This province originated in the bequest of Attalus, king of Pergamus, or king of Asia, who left by will to the Roman Republic his hereditary dominions in the W. of the peninsula (B. C. 133). In the division made by Augustus of senatorial and imperial provinces, it was placed in the former class, and was governed by a proconsul. It contained many important cities, among which were the seven churches of the Apocalypse, and was divided into assize districts for judicial business. It included the territory anciently subdivided into Æolia, Ionia, and Doris, and afterward into MYSIA, LYDIA, and CARIA. (LYCIA; BITHYNIA; PHRYGIA; GALATIA.) The title "King of Asia" was used by the Seleucid monarchs of Antioch (1 Mc. xi. 13).

A'si-archs [a'she-arks] (fr. Gr. = rulers of Asia; "chief of Asia," A. V.; Acts xix. 31), officers chosen annually by the cities of that part of the province of Asia, of which Ephesus was, under Roman government, the metropolis. They had charge of the public GAMES and religious theatrical spectacles, the expenses of which they bore. Their office was thus, in great measure at least, religious, and they are consequently sometimes called "high-priests." The office of Asiarch was annual, and subject to the approval of the proconsul, but might be renewed; and the title appears to have been continued to those who had at any time held the office.

As-i-bi'as (fr. Gr.), a son of Phoros or Parosh (1 Esd. ix. 26); apparently = MALCHIJAH 3.

A'si-el (Heb. created of God, Ges.). 1. A Simeonite, ancestor of JEHU 4 (1 Chr. iv. 35).—2. One of the five swift writers taken by Esdras to write the law and the history of the world (2 Esd. xiv. 24).

As'i-pha (1 Esd. v. 29) = HASUPHA.

As'ke-lon (Judg. i. 18; 1 Sam. vi. 17) = ASHKE-LON.

As-mo-de-us (L., fr. Heb. root = to destroy, or [so Reland] fr. Pers. = to tempt) = ABADDON or APOLLYON (Tob. iii. 8, 17). Since the Talmud calls him "king of the demons," some identify him with Beelzebub, and others with Azrael. In Tobit this evil spirit is represented as loving Sara, the daughter of Raguel, and causing the death of seven husbands; but Tobias, instructed by Raphael, having burnt the heart and liver of a fish on "the ashes of the perfumes," "the evil spirit fled into the utmost parts of Egypt, and the angel bound him" (Tob. viii. 1-3).

As'nah (Heb. storehouse or thornbush, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim under Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 50); = ASANA.

As-nap'per (Heb. Amappar, fr. Sansc. = leader of an army? Bohlen), in Ezr. iv. 10, the "great and noble" person who settled the Cutheans and others in the cities of Samaria. He has been variously identified with Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon, but was more probably a general of the latter king.

A'som (Gr. and L.) = HASHUM (1 Esd. ix. 33).

Asp. 1. The Heb. pythē occurs in Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 14, 16; Ps. lviii. 5 (4, A. V.), xci. 13; Is. xi. 8; and is translated in A. V. in Psalms "adder" (margin, "asp"), elsewhere "asp." "Asp" among the ancients (Gr. and L. aspis) probably stood for several different kinds of venomous serpents; in modern zoology it generally = an Alpine species, the Vipera aspis of Linnæus. The "adder" ("asp," margin) of Ps. lviii. 5, was a snake upon which the serpent-charmers practised their art. In this passage the wicked are compared to "the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear, which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely." From Is. xi. 8, "the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp," it would appear that this serpent dwelt in holes of walls, &c. The true explanation of Ps. lviii. 5, is that some serpents defy all the attempts of the charmer: in the language of Scripture such may be termed deaf. The point of the rebuke consists in the fact that this serpent could hear the charmer's song, but would not. The individual case in question was an exception to the rule. Serpents, though comparatively deaf to ordinary sounds, are no doubt capable of hearing the sharp, shrill sounds which the charmer produces either by his voice or by an instrument; and this comparative deafness is probably the very reason why such sounds as the charmer makes produce the desired effect in the subject under treatment. (SERPENT-CHARMING.) As the Egyptian cobra is more frequently used than any other species by the serpent-charmers of the Bible lands, is fond of concealing itself in walls and in holes, and as the probable derivation of the Hebrew word pethen (from a root signifying to distend or expand) may refer to the expanding powers of this serpent's neck when irritated, it appears to have the best claim to represent the "asp" of the A. V.—2. The Gr. aspis, translated "asp," occurs in Rom. iii. 13, and in the LXX. of Ps. cxl. 3, as = Heb. 'ach-shub. (ADDER 1.) See above under No. 1.

Egyptian Cobra.—(Naisa Hajc.)

As-pal-a-thus (L. fr. Gr.), a sweet perfume mentioned in Eccl. xiv. 15. Theophrastus enumerates it with cinnamon, cassia, and many other articles used for ointments. Probably at least two kinds or varieties of plants were anciently known by this name; one was white, inodorous, and inferior; the other had red wood under the bark, and was highly aromatic. The plant was of so thorny a nature that Plato says cruel tyrants were punished with it in the lower world. The Lignum Rhodianum is by some supposed to be the substance indicated by the aspalathus; the plant which yields it is the Convolvulus scoparius of Linnaeus, a native of the Canary Islands.

As-pa-tha or As-pa'tha (Pers., prob. fr. Sansc. = given by a horse, i. e. by Bramah under the form of a horse, Benfey, Pott, Ges., Fñ.), third son of Haman (Esth. ix. 7).

As-phar, the pool in "the wilderness of Thecoe" (1 Mc. ix. 33). Can this name (Gr. lakkos Asphar) = lacus Asphaltites, i. e. DEAD SEA?

As-phar-a-sus (1 Esd. v. 8) = MISPERETH or MIZPAB.

As'ri-el (Heb. vow of God, Ges.), son of Gilead, and great-grandson of Manasseh (Num. xxvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 2); ancestor of the ASRIELITES; erroneously ASHRIEL in the A. V. of 1 Chr. vii. 14. According to 1 Chr. vii. 14 in the LXX., Asriel was the son of Manasseh by his Syrian concubine.

As'ri-el-ites = a family of Manassites, descended from ASRIEL (Num. xxvi. 31).

Ass. Five Hebrew names of the genus Asinus (= the "Ass" kind) occur in the O. T. 1. Hamôr or Chamôr (A. V. "ass," "he-ass") = the male domestic ass, also in a general sense any ass whether male or female. The ass is frequently mentioned in the Bible: it was used for carrying burdens, for riding, for ploughing, for grinding at the mill, and for carrying baggage in wars. Issachar was compared to a strong ass (Gen. xlix. 14), not reproachfully, but because the ass is "a patient, drudging animal, capable of enduring the severest labor without suffering any diminution of strength or hardness" (Bush, in loc.). The ass in Eastern countries is a very different animal from what he is in Western Europe or America. The most noble and honorable among the Jews were wont to be mounted on asses: and in this manner our Lord Himself made his triumphant entry into Jerusalem (Mat. xxi. 2). He came indeed "meek and lowly," but it is a mistake to suppose that the fact of His riding on the ass had ought to do with his meekness; although thereby, doubtless, He meant to show the peaceable nature of His kingdom, as horses were used only for war purposes. In illustration of Judg. v. 10, "Speak ye that ride on white asses" (the Hebrew here is plural of athôn = she-ass; see below), it may be mentioned that Buckingham tells us that one of the peculiarities of Bagdad is its race of white asses, which are saddled and bridled for the conveyance of passengers. . . . that they are large and spirited, and have an easy and steady pace. In Deut. xxii. 10 "ploughing with an ox and an ass together" was forbidden, probably because they could not pull pleasantly together on account of the difference in size and strength: perhaps also this prohibition may have some reference to the law given in Lev. xix. 19 (compare 2 Cor. vi. 14). The ass was not used for food. The Mosaic law considered it unclean, as "not dividing the hoof and chewing the cud." In extreme cases, however, as in the great famine of Samaria, when "an ass's head was sold for eighty pieces of silver" (2 K. vi. 25), the flesh was eaten.—2. Athôn (A. V. "she-ass," "ass") = the common domestic she-ass (Gen. xii. 16, xlix. 11, A. V. "ass," &c.). Balaam rode on a she-ass (Num. xxi. 23, &c.). The asses of Kish which Saul sought were she-asses (1 Sam. ix. 3, &c.). The Shunammite (2 K. iv. 22, 24) rode on one when she went to seek Elisha. She-asses formed the special charge of one of David's officers (1 Chr. xxvii. 30).—3. Ayir (A. V. "foal," "ass colt," "young ass," "colt") = a young ass (Gen. xxxii. 16, A. V. 15, "foals," xlix. 11, A. V. "foal;" Judg. x. 4, xii. 14; Job xi. 12; Is. xxx. 6, 24; Zech. ix. 9). Sometimes this is spoken of as being old enough for riding upon, for carrying burdens, and for tilling the ground.—4. Pere (A. V. "wild ass") = a species of wild ass (Gen. xvi. 12, A. V. "wild man," literally "wild-ass man;" Ps. civ. 11; Job vi. 5, xi. 12, xxiv. 5, xxxix. 5, first clause; Hos. viii. 9; Jer. ii. 24, xiv. 6; Is. xxxii. 14). Hosea compared Israel to a wild ass of the desert.—5. Arôd (A. V. "wild ass") occurs only in the latter clause of Job xxxix. 5; but in what respect it differs from the Pere (mentioned in the former clause; see above) is uncertain. The Chaldee plural 'Arādayyā (A. V. "wild asses") occurs in Dan. v. 21. Bochart, Gesenius, &c., suppose No. 4 = No. 5; but they may be different animals.—The species of the Ass kind known to the ancient Jews and represented by the preceding Hebrew words and by the Greek words onos, hupozugion (= beast of burden), and onagros (= "wild ass," Ecclus. xiii. 19) in the N. T. and Apocrypha, are the Asinus Hemippus, a wild ass which inhabits the deserts of Syria, Mesopotamia, and N. Arabia; the Asinus vulgaris of the N. E. of Africa, the true onager or aboriginal wild ass, whence the domesticated breed has sprung; and probably the Asinus Onager, the Koulan or Ghor-khur, which is found in Western Asia from 48° N.

latitude S. to Persia, Beluchistan, and Western India. Mr. Layard remarks that in fleetness the wild ass (Asinus Hemippus) equals the gazelle, and to overtake them is a feat which only one or two of the most celebrated mares have been known to accomplish. Compare Job xxxi. 5-8.

As-sa-bī'as (1 Esd. i. 9) = HASHABIAH 6.

As-sal'i-moth (1 Esd. viii. 36) = SHELOMITH 6.

As-sa-nī'as (1 Esd. viii. 54) = HASHABIAH 8.

* As-say, to = to essay, to attempt, to try (Deut. iv. 34; 1 Sam. xvii. 39; Job iv. 2; 2 Mc. ii. 23; Acts ix. 26, xvi. 7; Heb. xi. 29).

* As-sem'by, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. mō'ed (from a verb signifying to point out or appoint, hence to meet by appointment, Ges.) (Lam. i. 15; Ez. xlv. 24); often translated "congregation" (Num. xvi. 2, &c.), once "synagogue" (Ps. lxxiv. 8); also translated variously "set time" (Gen. xvii. 21, &c.), "time appointed" (Gen. xviii. 14, &c.), "appointed season" (Num. ix. 2 ff.), "season" (Gen. i. 14, &c.), "time" (Dan. xii. 7), "solemn day" (Num. x. 10, &c.), "solemn feast" (xv. 3, &c.), "set feast" (xxix. 39, &c.), "solemnity" (Deut. xxxi. 10, &c.), "solemn assembly" (Zeph. iii. 18), "feast" (2 Chr. xxx. 22), "place of the assembly" (Lam. ii. 6).—2. Heb. mōshab (Ps. cvii. 32 only); elsewhere translated "dwelling" (Gen. x. 30, &c.), "habitation" (xxxvi. 43, &c.), or "seat" (1 Sam. xx. 18, 25, &c.).—3. Heb. mikrā (Is. i. 13, iv. 5); elsewhere translated "convocation" (Ex. xii. 16, &c.), "calling" (Num. x. 2), "reading" (Neh. viii. 8).—4. Heb. sōd (Ps. lxxxix. 7, Heb. 8, cxi. 1; Jer. vi. 11, xv. 17; Ez. xiii. 9); also translated "secret" (Gen. xlix. 6, &c.), "counsel" (Ps. lv. 14, Heb. 15, &c.), "secret counsel" (Ps. lxiv. 2, Heb. 3), &c.—5. Heb. 'ēdāh (Num. x. 2, 3, &c.); usually translated "congregation" (Ex. xii. 3, 6, 19, 47, &c.).—6. Heb. 'atsārāh or 'atsereth (Jer. ix. 2, Heb. 1, only); elsewhere translated "solemn assembly" (Lev. xxiii. 36,

&c.), "solemn meeting" (Is. i. 13).—7. Heb. kāhāl (Gen. xlix. 6; Ex. xii. 6, xvi. 3; Lev. iv. 13, &c.); usually translated "congregation" (iv. 14, 21, &c.), sometimes "company" (Num. xxii. 4, &c.), once "multitude" (Gen. xxviii. 3).—8. Heb. kēhillāh (Neh. v. 7 only); elsewhere translated "congregation" (Deut. xxxiii. 4 only).—9. Gr. ekklesia (literally = what is called out or summoned) (Jd. vi. 16, 21, vii. 29, xiv. 6; Acts xix. 32, 39, 41); also translated "congregation" (Ecclus. xxiv. 2, xxxi. 11 [xxxiv. 11, Gr.], xxxiii. 18 [Gr. 19], xxxviii. 33, l. 13, 20; 1 Mc. ii. 56, iv. 59, xiv. 19); uniformly translated "church" in N. T. except in Acts xix.; in LXX. = Heb. kāhāl (No. 7 above) in Deut. ix. 10, xviii. 16, xxiii. 1, 2, 3, 8, xxxi. 30; Josh. viii. 35.—10. Gr. sunagōgē (literally = a bringing together, a gathering, a collection, see Sus. 41, 60; Jas. ii. 2); translated "congregation" (Ecclus. i. 30, iv. 7, xxi. 9, xxiv. 23, xlv. 18; 1 Mc. xiv. 28; Acts xiii. 43); elsewhere in N. T. translated "synagogue;" in LXX. = Heb. 'ēdāh and kāhāl (No. 5 and 7) usually; also = Heb. sōd (No. 4) in Jer. vi. 11; also = Heb. kēhillāh in Deut. xxxiii. 4.—11. Gr. sustrophē (literally = a turning together, a rolling up together, a gathering or union in a mass) (1 Mc. xiv. 44); translated "concourse" (Acts xix. 40). In Acts xxiii. 12, "banded together" in A. V. (Gr. poiēsantes sustrophēn) = having made a gathering, viz., in secret, i. e. formed a combination or conspiracy. Compare use of the word in the LXX. = Heb. sōd (No. 4 above) in Ps. lxiv. 2 (3, Heb.; lxiii. 3, Gr.).—12. Gr. panēguris, translated "general assembly" (Heb. xii. 23 only); = in Herodotus, &c., an assembly of a whole nation, especially for a public festival such as the Olympic games, &c., a high festival, a solemn assembly at a high festival (L. & S.). CHURCH; CONGREGATION; SYNAGOGUE.

As'shur [ash'ur] (Heb.). ASSHURIM; ASSYRIA.

As-shu'rim [ash-shu'rim] (Heb. steps? see ASSHUR, under ASSYRIA), a tribe descended from Dedan, the grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3); not identified with certainty. Knobel considers them = the Asshur of Ez. xxvii. 23, and connected with S. Arabia.

As-sl-dē'ans [as-sc-dee'anz] (fr. Heb. Hāsīdim or Chasidim = the pious, puritans = "saints" in Ps. lxxix. 2, and "Chasidim," the name adopted by a Jewish sect originating in Poland about A. D. 1740), the name assumed by a section of the orthodox Jews (1 Mc. ii. 42, vii. 13; 2 Mc. xiv. 6) as distinguished from the Hellenizing faction (A. V. "the ungodly" and "the wicked"). They appear to have existed as a party before the Maccabean rising, and were probably bound by some peculiar vow to the external observance of the Law. Frankel has shown that both the ESSENES and the PHARISEES are sections of the ASSIDEANS, and that all three orders are frequently spoken of under the same name (Ginsburg in Kitto, art. Essenes).

As'sir (Heb. one bound, a captive, Ges.). 1. Son of Korah (Ex. vi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 22).—2. Son of Ebi-asaph, and ancestor of Samuel (vi. 23, 37).—3. Son of Jeconiah (iii. 17), unless "Jeconiah the captive" be the true rendering.

As'sos (Gr.) or As'sus (L.), a seaport of the Roman province of ASIA, in the district anciently called MYRIA. It was situated on the N. shore of the gulf of ADRIANTICUM, about seven miles from the opposite coast of Lesbos, near Methymna. A good Roman road, connecting the central parts of the province with Alexandria Troas (TROAS) passed through Assos, which was about twenty miles from Troas. These geographical points illustrate St. Paul's rapid passage through the town (Acts xx. 13, 14). The ship in which he was to accomplish his voyage from Troas to Cesarea, went round Cape Lectum, while he took the much shorter journey by land.

Thus he was able to join the ship without difficulty, and in sufficient time for her to anchor off Mitylene at the close of the day on which Troas had been left. Assos was entirely a Greek city. The remains are numerous and remarkably well preserved, partly because many of the buildings were of granite.—The Greek word asson (A. V. "close by") in Acts xxvii. 13, is translated in the Vulgate as a proper name, and was erroneously supposed to be a city in Crete. The Rhemish Testament translates "when they had loosed from Asson, they sailed close by Crete."

As-su-rus (L.) = AHASUERUS (Tob. xiv. 15).

As'sur (L.). 1. ASSHUR or ASSYRIA (Ezr. iv. 2; Ps. lxxxiii. 8; 2 Esd. ii. 8; Jd. ii. 14, v. 1, vi. 1, 17, vii. 20, 24, xiii. 15, xiv. 3, xv. 6, xvi. 4).—2. HARHUR (1 Esd. v. 31).

* As-su-rance [ash-shu'rans] = a making secure or sure, hence, that which gives security or sureness, a state of security or of being sure (Deut. xxviii. 66; Is. xxxii. 17). In N. T. it is once (Acts xvii. 31) the translation of the Gr. pistis (which is almost uniformly and correctly translated "FAITH"). The Gr. plérôphoria (= full conviction, certainty, L. & S.) is once (1 Th. i. 5) translated "assurance," and three times (Col. ii. 2; Heb. vi. 11, x. 22) "full assurance."

As-syr'i-a (L. form), As'shur (Heb. šep, Ges.; hero, mighty [as a man's name], and level, plain [as a name of the land], Fii.), a great and powerful country lying on the Tigris (Gen. ii. 14), the capital of which was NINEVEH (x. 11, &c.). It derived its name apparently from Asshur, the son of Shem (Gen. x. 22), who in later times was worshipped by the Assyrians as their chief god. The boundaries of Assyria differed greatly at different periods. Probably in the earliest times it was confined to a small tract of low country, lying chiefly on the left bank of the Tigris. Gradually its limits were extended, until it came to be regarded as comprising the whole region between the Armenian mountains (lat. 37° 36') on the N., and the country about Bagdad (lat. 33° 30') on the S. The E. boundary was the high range of Zagros, or mountains of Kürdistan; the W.

was, according to some, the Mesopotamian desert, according to others, the Euphrates. The greater part of the region embraced in ancient Assyria is now nominally subject to the Turkish sultan. It is peopled by Turks, who are found in the towns and larger villages; by Kúrds, who as well as the Turks are Mohammedans (ARABIA, Religion), but are much more numerous, and are some of them stationary in villages, while others are nomadic; and by Christians, including Chaldeans, Nestorians, Syrians, Armenians, &c., who are scattered over the whole region, though most numerous in the N.—1. General character of the country.—On the N. and E. the high mountain-chains of Armenia and Kúrdistan are succeeded by low ranges of limestone-hills of a somewhat arid aspect, with some rich plains and fertile valleys. To these ridges there succeeds at first an undulating country, well watered and fairly productive, which finally sinks down upon the great Mesopotamian plain, the modern district of El-Jezireh. (MESOPOTAMIA.) This vast flat, two hundred and fifty miles in length, is interrupted only by the Sinjar range, a conspicuous and beautiful narrow limestone range rising abruptly out of the plain. Above and below this barrier is an immense level tract, not alluvial, in most places considerably above the rivers, scantily watered on the right bank of the Tigris, but abundantly supplied on the left. All over this vast flat, now mostly a wilderness, rise "grass-covered heaps, marking the site of ancient habitations," which serve to mark the extent of the real Assyrian dominion. They are numerous on the left bank of the Tigris, and on the right they thickly stud the entire country.—2. Provinces.—The classical geographers divided Assyria into a number of regions, which appear to be chiefly named from cities, as Arbelitis from Arbela; Calacine (or Calachene) from Calah or Halah; Apolloniatis from Apollonia; Sittacene from Sittace, &c. Adiabone, however, the richest region of all, derived its appellation from the Zab (Diab) river on which it lay.—3. Chief Cities.—The chief cities of Assyria in the time of its greatness appear to have been—NINEVEH; CALAH or HALAH; Asshur (now Kileh-Sherghat); Sargina, or Dur-Sargina (now Khorsabad); Arbela (still Arbil); Opis (at the junction of the Diyaleh with the Tigris); and Sittace (a little farther down the latter river, if this place should not rather be reckoned to Babylonia).—4. Nations bordering on Assyria.—On the N. lay Armenia; on the E. in the mountains were originally many independent tribes (now represented by the Kurds, &c.), and beyond them was Media, which ultimately subjected the mountaineers, and was then brought into direct contact with Assyria; on the S. were Elam or Susiana, and Babylonia; on the W., Arabia, Syria, and the country of the Hittites.—5. History of Assyria—original peopling.—Scripture informs us that Assyria was peopled from Babylon (Gen. x. 11), and both classical tradition and the monuments of the country agree in this representation. In Herodotus (i. 7), Ninus, the mythic founder of Nineveh, is the son (descendant) of Belus, the mythic founder of Babylon—a tradition in which the derivation of Assyria from Babylon, and the greater antiquity and superior position of the latter in early times are shadowed forth sufficiently. Recent researches clearly show that Babylonian greatness and civilization was earlier than Assyrian, and that while the former was of native growth, the latter was derived from the neighboring country (see § 16, below).—6. Date of the foundation of the kingdom.—As a country, Assyria was evidently known to Moses (Gen. ii. 14, xxv. 18; Num. xxiv. 22, 24); but it does not appear in Jewish history as a kingdom till the reign of Menahem (about B. C. 770). Ctesias represents the empire as founded B. C. 2182; but his account is untrustworthy. Herodotus relates that the Assyrians were “lords of Asia” for 520 years, and then, after a period of anarchy, the Median kingdom was formed, 179 years before the death of Cyrus, or B. C. 708. He would thus, it appears, have assigned to the foundation of the Assyrian empire a date not much before B. C. 1228. Berosus, who made the empire last 526 years to the reign of Pul, would certainly have placed the rise of the kingdom within the thirteenth century. This is, perhaps, the utmost that can be determined with any approach to certainty. Dr. Brandis fixes B. C. 1273 as the date.—7. Early kings, from the foundation of the kingdom to Pul.—According to Rawlinson, whose views are given in this article, the residence of the earliest kings and of the previous Babylonian governors of the country, was at Kileh-Sherghat, on the right bank of the Tigris, sixty miles S. of the later capital. (But see NINEVEH.) The kings proved to have reigned there are fourteen, divisible into three groups, and reigning probably from B. C. 1273 to B. C. 930. The most remarkable of the series was called Tiglath-pileser, apparently king toward the close of the twelfth century, and thus contemporary with Samuel. The other monarchs of the Kileh-Sherghat series, both before and after Tiglath-pileser, are comparatively insignificant. Sardanapalus the first, probably the warlike Sardanapalus of the Greeks, transferred the seat of government from Kileh-Sherghat to Nimrud, where he built the first of those magnificent palaces recently exhumed (see Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, ii. ch. 11). He was a great conqueror, carrying his arms W. to Syria and the Mediterranean. His son Shalmaneser or Shalmanubar, was a still greater conqueror. He appears to have been opposed in his Syrian wars by Ben-hadad and Hazael, and to have taken tribute from Jehu, king of Israel. His son and grandson followed in his steps, but scarcely equalled his glory. The latter is thought = the biblical Pul, Phul, or Phaloch.—8. The kings from Pul to Esar-haddon.—The succession of the Assyrian kings from Pul almost to the close of the empire is rendered tolerably certain, not merely by the inscriptions, but also by the Jewish records. In 2 Kings we find Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon, following one another in rapid succession (2 K. xv. 19, 29, xvii. 3, xviii. 13, xix. 37); and in Isaiah (xx. 1) we have SARGON, a contemporary of the prophet, and evidently belonging to the same series. The inscriptions show us that Sargon was the father of Sennacherib, and give us for the last half of the eighth and the first half of the seventh century B. C. the (probably) complete list of Tiglath-pileser II., Shalmaneser II., Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon.—9. Lower Dynasty.—It seems to be certain that at, or near, the accession of Pul, about B. C. 770, a great change occurred in Assyria. It was only twenty-three years later, that the Babylonians considered their independence to have commenced (B. C. 747). Tradition seems to show that about the middle of the eighth century B. C. there must have been a break in the line of Assyrian kings, and probably the Pul or Phaloch of Scripture was really the last king of the old monarchy, and Tiglath-pileser II., his successor, was the founder of what has been called the “Lower Empire.”—10. Supposed loss of the empire at this period.—Many writers of repute (Clinton, Niebuhr, &c.) have been inclined to accept the statement of Herodotus with respect to the breaking up of the whole empire at this period. It is evident, however, from Scripture, that in the reigns of Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon, Assyria was as great as at any former era. These kings all warred successfully in Palestine and its neighborhood; some attacked Egypt (Is. xx. 4); one was master of Media (2 K. xvii. 6); another had authority over Babylon, Susiana, and Elymais (xvii. 24; Ezr. iv. 9). The Assyrian annals also represent the empire as continually rising under these monarchs, and reaching its culminating point under Esar-haddon. This representation is fully borne out by the indications of greatness in the architectural monuments, and by the statements of the writers supposed to have drawn from Berosus. This second Assyrian kingdom was evidently greater and more glorious than the first. Herodotus may have supposed, erroneously, though naturally, that when Babylon became free (B. C. 747), there was a general dissolution of the empire. Yet even as regards Babylon, the Assyrian loss was not permanent. Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon, all exercised full authority over that country.—11. Successors of Esar-haddon.—By the end of Esar-haddon's reign, the kingdoms of Hamath, of Damascus, and of Samaria, had been successively absorbed; Phœnicia had been conquered; Judea had been made a feudatory; Philistia and Idumea had been subjected, Egypt chastised, Babylon recovered, cities planted in Media. A profound peace seems now to have followed. Esar-haddon's son, Sardanapalus II., occupied almost his whole time in the pleasures of the chase. In Scripture we hear nothing of Assyria after Esar-haddon, and profane history is equally silent until the attacks begin which brought about her downfall.—12. Fall of Assyria.—This was long before predicted (Is. x. 5-19). The first Median attack on Nineveh took place (so Herodotus) about B. C. 633. For some time their efforts were unsuccessful; but after a while, having won over the Babylonians to their side, they became superior to the Assyrians in the field, and about B. C. 625, or a little earlier, laid final siege to the capital. (MEDIA.) Saracus, the last king—probably grandson of Esarhaddon—after a stout and prolonged defence, collected his wives and treasures in his palace, and with his own hand setting fire to the building, perished in the flames.—13. Fulfillment of prophecy.—The prophecies of Nahum and Zephaniah (ii. 13-15) against Assyria were probably delivered shortly before the catastrophe. Ezekiel, writing afterward, bears witness (Ez. xxxi.) to the complete destruction of Assyria. In accordance with Nahum's announcement (Nah. iii. 19), Assyria never succeeded in maintaining a distinct nationality. Once only was revolt attempted, about a century after the Median conquest, but it failed signally, and the Assyrians were thenceforth submissive subjects of the Persian empire.—14. General character of the empire.—Like all the early monarchies of any great extent, it was composed of a number of separate kingdoms. The Assyrian monarchs bore sway over many petty kings (compare 2 Chr. ix. 26)—the native rulers of the several countries—who held their crowns by the double tenure of homage and tribute. Menahem (2 K. xv. 19), Hoshea (xvii. 4), Ahaz (xvi. 8), Hezekiah (xviii. 4), and Manasseh (2 Chr. xxxiii. 11-13), were certainly in this position, as were many native kings of Babylon. It is not quite certain how far Assyria required a religious conformity from the subject people. Her religion was a gross and complex polytheism, comprising the worship of thirteen principal and numerous minor divinities, at the head of all of whom stood the chief god, Asshur, who seems to be the deified patriarch of the nation (Gen. x. 22). (ASHTORETH; ATARGATIS; BAAL; DAGON; GROVE; IDOLATRY.) The inscriptions appear to state that in all conquered countries the Assyrians set up "the laws of Asshur," and "altars to the Great Gods." It was probably from this Assyrian requirement that Ahaz, on his return from Damascus, where he had made his submission to Tiglath-pileser, incurred the guilt of idolatry (2 K. xvi. 10-16). Yet Hezekiah, though tributary, was not an idolater.—15. Its extent.—The native monuments and the Scriptures indicate the following boundaries: on the W., the Mediterranean and the river Halys; on the N., a fluctuating line, never reaching the Euxine nor extending beyond the N. frontier of Armenia; on the E., the Caspian Sea and the Great Salt Desert; on the S., the Persian Gulf and the Desert of Arabia. The countries within these limits are—Susiana, Chaldaea, Babylonia, Media, Mariene, Armenia, Assyria Proper, Mesopotamia, parts of Cappadocia and Cilicia, Syria, Phœnicia, Palestine, and Idumea. Cyprus was also for a while a dependency of Assyria, as were perhaps at one time certain portions of Lower Egypt.—16. Civilization of the Assyrians.—This, as already observed, was derived originally from the Babylonians. The Assyrians were a Semitic race, originally resident in Babylonia (then Cushite), who ascended the valley of the Tigris and established a separate nationality. Their modes of writing and building, the form and size of their bricks, their architectural ornamentation, their religion and worship, in a great measure, were drawn from Babylon, which they always regarded as a sacred land—the original seat of their nation, and the true home of all their gods, except Asshur. Still, as their civilization developed, it became in many respects peculiar. Their art is of home growth. The alabaster quarries in their neighborhood supplied them with a material unknown to the Babylonians. Their emblematical figures of the gods have a dignity and grandeur indicating the possession of some elevated feelings. Their pictures of war, and of the chase, and even sometimes of the more peaceful incidents of human life, have a fidelity, a spirit, a boldness, and an appearance of life which place them high among realistic schools. The advanced condition of the Assyrians in various other respects is abundantly evidenced by the sculptures and the remains discovered among their buildings. They attained to a very high degree of material comfort and prosperity. (ARCH; ARMLET; ARMS; BOTTLE; CHARIOT; CHERUB; ENGINE; GLASS; HORSE; METALS; SEMITIC LANGUAGES, &c.) They were still, however, in the most important points barbarians. Their government was rude and artificial; their religion coarse and sensual; their conduct of war cruel; even their art materialistic and so debasing; they had served their purpose when they had prepared the East for centralized government, and been God's scourge to Israel (Is. x. 5, 6); they were, therefore, swept away to allow the rise of that Aryan race (MEDES) which, with less appreciation of art, was to introduce into western Asia a more spiritual form of religion, a better treatment of captives, and a superior governmental organization.

As'ta-roth (Deut. i. 4) = ASHTARETH 2.

As-tar'te (Gr. and L.) = ASHTORETH.

As'tath (Gr.) = AZGAD (1 Esd. viii. 38).

* As-ton'led [-id], an old English word = astounded (Ez. ix. 8; Job xvii. 8, xviii. 20; Ez. iv. 17; Dan. iii. 24, iv. 19, v. 9).

* As-trol'o-gers [-jerz] (Is. xlviii. 13; Dan. i. 20, ii. 2, 10, 27, iv. 7, v. 7, 11, 16). ASTRONOMY.

* As-tron'o-my was especially cultivated among the ancient CHALDEANS. The Egyptians (EGYPT) made considerable progress in astronomical observations, and are supposed to have been the first instructors of the Greeks in this branch of knowledge. Both these nations connected astronomy with religious observances (ASHTORETH; BAAL; IDOLATRY; QUEEN OF HEAVEN) and the prediction of future events (DIVINATION; MAGI), as well as with the computation of time (CHRONOLOGY; DAY; DIAL; HOUR; MONTH; YEAR). The Hebrews are not known to have made much advance in astronomical science, though there are many allusions in the Scriptures to the visible heavens. (ARCTURUS; CREATION; DARKNESS; EARTH; FIRMAMENT; HEAVEN; LUCIFER; MAZZAROTH; MOON; ORION; PLEIADES; STAR OF THE WISE MEN; SUN.)

As-ty'a-ges [-jeez] (L. fr. Zend Aj-dahak, Sir H. C. Rawlinson; = the biting snake, the emblem of the Median power), the last king of the MEDES, B. C. 595-560, or B. C. 592-558, conquered by Cyrus (B. and D. 1).

A-sup'plm (Heb. gatherings), and House of A-sup'plm (= house of the gatherings) (1 Chr. xxvi. 15, 17); a proper name of chambers on the S. side of the Temple (so some); certain store-rooms (Gesenius and Bertheau); the council-chambers in the outer court of the Temple in which the elders held their deliberations (Fürst, after the Vulgate); "lintels" (Targum of Rabbi Joseph). The Hebrew word in Neh. xii. 25, A. V., is translated "thresholds," margin "treasuries," or "assemblies."

A'tad (Heb. thorn), the thresh'ing-floor of, a spot "beyond (i. e. W. of) Jordan," at which Joseph and his brethren, on their way from Egypt to Hebron, made their seven days' "great and very sore mourning" over the body of Jacob; in consequence of which it acquired from the Canaanites ("the inhabitants of the land" W. of Jordan; see Gen. i. 13; CANAAN, &c.) the new name of Abel-Mizraim (Gen. i. 10, 11). According to Jerome it was in his day called Bethagla or Bethacla (BETH-HOOLA); more probably it was S. of Hebron (Thn. ii. 385).

At'a-rah (Heb. crown, Ges.), a wife of Jerahmeel, and mother of Onam (1 Chr. ii. 26).

A-tar-ga-tis, or Der'ee-to (both L. fr. Gr.; orig. fr. Syr. = an opening, Michaelis; a fish, Ges.), a Syrian goddess, represented generally with the body of a woman and the tail of a fish (compare DAGON) Her most famous temples were at Hierapolis (Ma-bug) and Ascalon. Herodotus identified her with Aphrodite (= Roman Venus) Urania. Lucian compared her with Here (= Roman Juno), though he allowed that she combined traits of other deities. Plutarch says that some regarded her as "Aphrodite, others as Here, others as the cause and natural power which provides the principles and seeds for all things from moisture." This last view is pronounced an accurate description of the attributes of the goddess, and explains her fish-like form and popular identification with Aphrodite. A temple of Atargatis (2 Mc. xii. 26) at Carnion was destroyed by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. v. 44). Some have supposed that Atargatis was the tutelary goddess of the first Assyrian dynasty, and that the name appears in Tiglath- or Tilyath-pileser.

* At'a-rites (1 Chr. ii. 54, marg.) ATAROTH 4.

At'a-roth (Heb. crowns). 1. One of the towns in the "land of Jazer and land of Gilead" (Num. xxxii. 3), taken and built by the tribe of Gad (xxxii. 34). From its mention with places on the N. E. of the Dead Sea near Jebel (= mount) Atarús, a connection has been assumed between Ataroth and that mountain. But this seems too far S. (ATROTH.) —2. A place on the (S. ?) boundary of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi. 2, 7); = No. 3? —3. At'a-roth-a'dar or At'a-roth-ad'dar (Heb. crowns of Ad-dar, Ges.), on the W. border of Benjamin, "near the hill that lieth on the S. side of the nether Beth-boron" (Josh. xvi. 5, xviii. 13). The Onomasticon mentions an Atharoth in Ephraim, in the mountains, four miles N. of Sebaste; also two places of the name not far from Jerusalem. The former cannot be the large village on a hill about fifteen miles N. of Jerusalem, now 'Atára (Rbn. ii. 265). Another 'Atára, ruins, six or seven miles N. of Jerusalem (Rbn. i. 575), is too far E. to be = No. 3, and too far S. to be = No. 2.—4. "Ataroth, the house of Joab," a place (?) occurring in the list of the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 54; margin "Atarites, or crowns of the house of Joab"). Gesenius, Kitto, &c., make it Ataroth-beth-Joab, a city of Judah. BETH.

A'ter (Heb. shut up, bound, perhaps dumb, Ges.).

1. Ancestor of certain porters of the Temple who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45); = JATAL in 1 Esd. v. 28.—2. "The children (descendants) of Ater of Hezekiah" (ninety-eight in number) returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21), and are supposed to have been among the chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 17; A. V. "Ater, Hizkiah"). The name appears in 1 Esd. v. 15, as ATERZZIAS.

A'thach [-thak] (fr. Heb. = lodging-place, Ges.), one of the places in Judah, which David and his men frequented during his residence at Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 30); supposed by some a copyist's error for ETHER (Josh. xv. 42). In the Vatican LXX. it is written Nombe.

A-thal'ah [ah-tha'yah] or Ath-a-l'ah (Heb.; perhaps = ASAIAH, Ges.), a descendant of Pharez and resident at Jerusalem after the return from Babylon (Neh. xi. 4); = UTHAI in 1 Chr. ix. 4.

Ath-a-l'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah afflicts, Ges.). 1. Daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and wife of JEHORAM 2, the son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah. She probably introduced into the S. kingdom the worship of Baal. After the great revolution under Jehu in Samaria, she killed all the royal family of Judah who had escaped his sword (2 K. xi. 1; 2 Chr. xxii. 10), availing herself probably of her position as King's Mother (MOTHER; QUEEN) to perpetrate the crime. From the slaughter of the royal house Ahaziah's youngest son JOASH 1 was rescued by his aunt JEHOSHEBA, who had married JEHOIADA 4, the high-priest. The child was brought up under Jehoiada's care, and concealed in the Temple six years, during which period Athaliah reigned over Judah. At length Jehoiada, communicating his design to five "captains of hundreds" (2 Chr. xxiii. 1), and securing the coöperation of the Levites and chief men in the country-towns, brought the young Joash into the Temple to receive the allegiance of the soldiers of the guard. It was customary on the Sabbath for one-third of them to do duty at the palace, while two-thirds restrained the crowd of visitors and worshippers at the Temple by occupying the gates. On the day fixed for the outbreak there was no change in the arrangement at the palace, lest Athaliah, who did not worship in the Temple, should form suspicions from missing her usual guard, but the other two-thirds, armed with King David's "spears and bucklers and shields" (ARMS), protected the king's person in the Temple. Athaliah was first roused to a sense of her danger by the shouts and music at the inauguration of her grandson, and hurried into the Temple. She arrived, however, too late, and was immediately put to death by Jehoiada's commands, without the precincts. The only other recorded victim of this happy revolution, was MARTAN 1, the priest of Baal. (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) —2. A Benjamite chief, son of Jeroham, who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chr. viii. 26). —3. A son (descendant) of Elam, whose son Jeshai-ah with seventy males returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 7).

Ath-a-r'i-as, a corruption of "the TIRSHATHA" (1 Esd. v. 40).

A-the-ni-ans = natives or citizens of Athens (Acts xvii. 21).

Ath-e-ni'bl-ans (L. fr. Gr. = having life, or strength, from Minerva; see ATHENS), "the king's friend," an envoy of Antiochus VII., Sidetes, to Simon Maccabeus (1 Mc. xv. 28–36).

Ath'ens [-enz] (fr. Gr. goddess Athina = Roman Minerva), the capital of Attica, and the chief seat of Grecian learning and civilization during the golden period of the history of Greece; said to have been founded by Cecrops, B. C. 1556, and ruled by kings (one of whom, Theseus, is said to have united the twelve cities of Attica into one confederacy with Athens at its head) till the death of Codrus, B. C. 1069, then by archons, who through the influence of the popular assembly became at length simply municipal officers of high rank. The laws of Solon (about B. C. 594) were the foundation of the Athenian philosophy and the fine arts. It has still in the Parthenon, &c., some of the noblest monuments of ancient art.—St. Paul visited Athens in his journey from Macedonia, and appears to have remained there some time (Acts xvii. 14-34; comp. 1 Th. iii. 1). During his residence he delivered his memorable discourse on civil polity, though the ordinances of Draco, which punished capitally the smallest theft as well as murder, were retained in regard to many religious matters. Athens was captured by the Romans under Sulla B. C. 86, and its commerce was annihilated. It fell into the power of the Turks A. D. 1456, and was afterward twice (1467 and 1687) taken by the Venetians, and twice (1470 and 1688) recaptured by the Turks. During the war for Grecian independence, "altar to the Unknown God," see ALTAR. Of the Christian church, founded by St. Paul at Athens, according to ecclesiastical tradition, DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE was the first bishop.

Ath'lah (Heb. = ATHALIAH, Ges.), a son of Behai, who put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 28); called AMATHEIS in 1 Esd. ix. 29.

At'l-pha (1 Esd. v. 32) = HATIPHA.

* A-tone'ment, in the O. T. and Apocrypha (see No. 6, below) is an expiation or satisfaction for sin by which forgiveness is obtained. (BLEMISH; SACRIFICE.) Several Hebrew and Greek words are thus translated in the A. V.—1. The Hebrew plural cippurim is translated "atonement" or "atonements" (Ex. xxix. 36, xxx. 10, 16; Lev. xxiii. 27, 28, xxv. 9 [ATONEMENT, DAY OF]; Num. v. 8, xxix. 11).—2. The Hebrew verb côphar (literally = to cover over sin, to cover sin, Ges.) is usually translated "to make atonement" (Ex. xxix. 33, 36, 37, xxx. 10, 15, 16, &c.), sometimes "to make reconciliation" (Lev. viii. 15; Dan. ix. 24, &c.), "to purge away" (Ps. lxxviii. 3 [4 Heb.], &c.),

Athens was taken by the Greeks (1822) and retaken by the Turks (1827), who kept possession of it till 1832. Since 1835, it has been the capital of the kingdom of Greece (see New Amer. Cyc., art. Athens).—Athens was the city of Pericles, Demosthenes, Socrates, Plato, &c.; long distinguished for its spirit of liberty and its culture of eloquence, phi-

"to purge" (1 Sam. iii. 14, &c.), "to be merciful" (Deut. xxxii. 43, &c.), "to forgive" (Ps. lxxviii. 38; Jer. xviii. 28), &c.—3. The Hebrew noun côpher is translated "atonement" in the margin of Job xxxiii. 24, and "ransom" in the text (as in Ex. xxx. 12; Job xxxvi. 18, &c.). (CAMPHIRE; PITCH.)—4. The Greek compound verb exilaskomai

(= to appease or win over, L. & S.) is translated "to make atonement" in Eccles. iii. 3, 30; usually in the LXX. = cáphar (No. 2, above; compare No. 5, below).—5. The Greek hilamos (= a means of appeasing, a propitiation, a sacrifice, L. & S.) is translated "atonement" in 2 Mc. iii. 33, and "propitiation" in 1 Jn. ii. 2, iv. 10; in the LXX. = cippurim (No. 1, above) in Lev. xxv. 9 and Num. v. 8. The Greek verb hilaskomai (= to reconcile to one's self, sc. by expiation, to propitiate, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) in the LXX. = cáphar (No. 2, above; comp. No. 4) in Ps. lxxv. 3 (4, Heb., and lxxiv. 4, Gr.), lxxviii. 38 (lxxvii. 38, Gr.); it is also used in the N. T. in Lk. xviii. 13 (A. V. "be merciful") and Heb. ii. 17 (A. V. "to make reconciliation"). The kindred Greek word hilastérion is translated "propitiation" in Rom. iii. 25, and "MERCY-SEAT" in Heb. ix. 5, and is commonly used in the LXX. for the latter (Ex. xxv. 18 ff., &c.).—6. The Greek katallagḗ (literally exchange, change, sc. of feeling, &c.; hence settlement of difficulties), translated "atonement" in Rom. v. 11, is translated in the margin "reconciliation," as in the text of 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, and is translated "reconciling" in Rom. xi. 15. JESUS CHRIST; SAVIOUR.

A-tonement, the Day of (called "the fast" in Acts xxix. 9, A. V.), the great day of national humiliation, and the only one commanded in the Mosaic law. (FASRS.) The mode of its observance is described in Lev. xvi.; the victims offered, besides those strictly belonging to the special service of the day and to the usual daily sacrifice, are enumerated in Num. xxix. 7-11; and the conduct of the people is emphatically enjoined in Lev. xxiii. 26-32.—II. It was kept on the 10th day of Tisri, i. e. from the evening of the 9th to the evening of the 10th of that month, five days before the Feast of Tabernacles. (FESTIVALS).—III. The observances of the day are thus described in the law. It was to be kept by the people as a solemn sabbath. On this occasion only the high-priest was permitted to enter into the Holy of Holies. Having bathed his person and dressed himself entirely in the holy white linen garments, he brought a young bullock for a sin-offering and a ram for a burnt-offering, purchased at his own cost, for himself and his family, and two young goats for a sin-offering with a ram for a burnt-offering, which were paid for out of the public treasury, for the people. He then presented the two goats before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle and cast lots upon them. On one lot "for Jehovah" was inscribed, and on the other "for Azazel" ("for the scape-goat," A. V.). He next sacrificed the young bullock as a sin-offering for himself and his family. Taking with him some of the blood of the bullock, he filled a censer with burning coals from the brazen altar, took a handful of incense, and entered into the most holy place. He then threw the incense upon the coals and enveloped the mercy-seat in a cloud of smoke. Then, dipping his finger into the blood, he sprinkled it seven times before ("upon," A. V. and Ewald) the mercy-seat eastward. The goat upon which the lot "for Jehovah" had fallen was then slain, and the high-priest sprinkled its blood, like the bullock's, before the mercy-seat. He then purified the holy place, sprinkling some of the blood of both the victims on the altar of incense (see Ex. xxx. 10). At this time no one besides the high-priest was suffered to be present in the holy place. After the purification of the Holy of Holies, and of the holy place, the high-priest laid his hands upon the head of the goat on which the lot "for Azazel" had fallen, and confessed over it all the sins of the people. The goat was then led, by a man chosen for the purpose, into the wilderness, into "a land not inhabited," and was there let loose. The high-priest after this returned into the holy place, bathed himself again, put on his usual garments of office, and offered the two rams as burnt-offerings, one for himself and one for the people. He also burnt upon the altar the fat of the two sin-offerings, while their flesh was carried away and burned outside the camp. They who took away the flesh and the man who had led away the goat had to bathe their persons and wash their clothes as soon as their service was performed. The accessory burnt-offerings mentioned Num. xxix. 7-11, were a young bullock, a ram, seven lambs, and a young goat.—IV. Josephus, giving of course the practice in the second Temple, when the ark of the covenant had disappeared, states that the high-priest sprinkled the blood with his finger seven times on the ceiling and seven times on the floor of the most holy place, and seven times toward it (apparently outside the veil), and round the golden altar; then going into the court he either sprinkled or poured the blood round the great altar. The kidneys, the top of the liver, and the extremities of the victims were burned with the fat.—V. The Mishna (Yoma) professes to give the observances of the day according to the usage in the second Temple. 1. The high-priest himself, dressed in his colored official garments, performed on the Day of Atonement, all the duties of the ordinary daily service, lighting the lamps, presenting the daily sacrifices, &c. After this he bathed himself, put on the white garments, and commenced the special rites of the day. 2. The high-priest went into the Holy of Holies four times this day: (1.) with the censer and incense; (2.) with the bullock's blood; (3.) with the goat's blood; (4.) after the evening sacrifice, to bring out the censer and incense-plate. This is not opposed to Heb. ix. 7. Compare Lev. xvi. 12, 14, 15. 3. The blood of the bullock and that of the goat were each sprinkled eight times, once toward the ceiling and seven times on the floor (see above, IV.). 4. After he had gone into the most holy place the third time, and had returned into the holy place, the high-priest sprinkled the blood of the bullock (and so of the goat) eight times toward the veil. Having then mingled the blood of the two victims together and sprinkled the altar of incense with the mixture, he came into the court and poured out what remained at the foot of the altar of burnt-offering. 5. For seven days before the Day of Atonement the high-priest kept away from his own house, and dwelt in a chamber appointed for his use. To provide further for his incurring some uncleanness, a deputy was chosen who might act for him when the day came. Compare Jos. xvii. 6, § 4. During these seven days as well as on the Day of Atonement, the high-priest performed the ordinary duties of the daily service. On the third and seventh days he was sprinkled with the ashes of the red heifer to cleanse him if he had touched a dead body without knowing it. 6. The two goats of the sin-offering were to be of similar appearance, size, and value. The lots were put into a little box or urn, into which the high-priest put both his hands and took out a lot in each, while the two goats stood before him. The lot in each hand belonged to the goat in the corresponding position. The high-priest then tied a piece of scarlet cloth on the scape-goat's head, called "the scarlet tongue," from its shape. A prayer was then offered by the high-priest over the head of the goat, which was led away by the man appointed. As soon as it reached a certain spot, a signal was made to the high-priest, who waited for it. The man who led the goat is said to have taken him to the top of a high precipice and thrown him down backward, so as to dash him to pieces. Originally, however, the goat was set free (Lev. xvi. 22, 26). 7. The high-priest, on receiving the signal that the goat had reached the wilderness, read some lessons from the law, and offered up some prayers. He then bathed himself, resumed his colored garments, and offered either the whole, or a great part, of the accessory offering (Num. xxix. 7-11) with the regular evening sacrifice. After this, he washed again, put on the white garments, and entered the most holy place for the fourth time (see above, V. 2). 8. All (except invalids and children under thirteen years) are forbidden to eat any thing that day so large as a date, to drink, or to wash from sunset to sunset. In the law itself no express mention is made of abstinence from food.—VI. In regard to the Hebrew word Azazel ("scape-goat," A. V.), the opinions most worthy of notice are—1. A designation of the goat itself. The old interpreters in general, the Vulgate, Symmachus, Aquila, Luther, the A. V., &c., supposed it = the goat sent away, or let loose. But the application of Azazel to the goat itself involves the Hebrew text in difficulty. If one expression in Lev. xvi. 8, &c. = for Jehovah, the other naturally = for Azazel, with the preposition in the same sense. If this is admitted, taking Azazel = the goat itself, an inconsistency appears in Lev. xvi. 10, 26. 2. The name of the place to which the goat was sent. But the place is specified in Lev. xvi. 10, 21, 22 (Ges.). 3. A personal being to whom the goat was sent. (a.) Gesenius makes Azazel = avertor, expiator, and supposes it to be some false deity who was to be appeased by a sacrifice of the goat. (b.) Others have regarded him as an evil spirit, or the devil himself. Spencer (on the Heb. Ritual Laws) supposes that the goat was given up to the devil. Hengstenberg, confidently affirming that Azazel = Satan, repudiates the conclusion that the goat was a sacrifice to Satan, and maintains that the goat was sent away laden with the sins of God's people, now forgiven, in order to mock their spiritual enemy. 4. An explanation of the word which seems less objectionable, if not wholly satisfactory, would render the designation of the lot (Lev. xvi. 8, &c., "for the scape-goat," A. V.) "for complete sending away" (Tholuck, Bähr, Winer, &c.).—VII. The Talmudists regarded the Day of Atonement as an opportunity afforded them of wiping off the score of their more heavy offences. Philo speaks of the day as an occasion for self-restraint in regard to bodily indulgence, and for bringing home to our minds the truth that man does not live by bread alone, but by whatever God is pleased to appoint. It cannot be doubted that what especially distinguished the symbolical expiation of this day from that of the other services of the law, was its broad and national character, with perhaps a deeper reference to the sin which belongs to the nature of man.—In the particular rites of the day, three points appear very distinctive. 1. The white garments of the high-priest. 2. His entrance into the Holy of Holies. 3. The scape-goat. Heb. ix. 7-25, teaches us to apply the first two particulars. The high-priest himself, with his person cleansed and dressed in white garments, was the type of that pure and holy One who was to purify His people from their sins. But the subject of the scape-goat is one of great doubt and difficulty. Of those who take Azazel = the Evil Spirit (VI. 3, above), some have supposed that the goat was a sort of bribe, or retaining fee, for the accuser of men. Spencer made it a symbol of the punishment of the wicked; while Hengstenberg considers it significant of the freedom of those who had become reconciled to God. Some few have supposed that the goat was taken into the wilderness to suffer there vicariously for the sins of the people. But it has been generally considered that it was dismissed to signify the carrying away of their sins, as it were, out of the sight of Jehovah. Since the two goats were parts of one and the same sin-offering, they form together but one symbolical expression. There may have been two, simply because a single material object could not symbolically embrace the whole truth to be expressed (compare Heb. ix.). Hence some, regarding each goat as a type of Christ, supposed that the one slain represented his death, and the one set free his resurrection. But we shall take a simpler, and perhaps a truer view (so Mr. Clark, the original author of this article), if we look upon the slain goat as setting forth the act of sacrifice, in giving up its own life for others "to Jehovah," in accordance with the requirements of the Divine law; and the goat which carried off its load of sin "for complete removal," as signifying the cleansing influence of faith in that sacrifice (compare Ps. ciii. 12).

Atroth (Heb. crowns, Ges.), a city of Gad (Num. xxxii. 35). No doubt the name should be taken with that following it, Shopban, to distinguish this place from ATAROTH 1, in the same neighborhood.

At'tal [-tay] (Heb. perhaps = opportune, Ges.). 1. Grandson of Sheeban the Jerahmeelite through his daughter AHLAI the wife of Jarha (1 Chr. ii. 35, 36).—2. The sixth of the mighty Gadite captains, who forded the swollen Jordan, and joined David in the wilderness (1 Chr. xii. 11).—3. A son of King Rehoboam by Maachab (2 Chr. xi. 20).

At-ta-li'a (L. fr. Gr.), a coast-town of Pamphylia (Acts xiv. 25), from which Paul and Barnabas sailed on their return to Antioch from their missionary journey into Asia Minor. It was built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus, about 160 B. C., and named after him. It was intended to command the trade with Egypt and Syria. It is still an important town, the modern Adalia or Satalia, on the gulf of the same name on the S. coast of Asia Minor (Leake; Spratt and Forbes).

At'ta-lus (L. fr. Gr.), the name of three kings of Pergamus who reigned respectively B. C. 241-197, 159-138 (Philadelphus), 138-133 (Philometor). It is uncertain whether the letters sent from Rome in favor of the Jews (1 Mc. xv. 22) were addressed to Attalus II. (Philadelphus), or Attalus III. (Philometor), as their date falls in B. C. 139-8 (LUCIUS), about the time when the latter succeeded his uncle.

At-tha-ra'tes (Gr.), a corruption of "the Tirshath" (1 Esd. ix. 49). ATHARIAS.

* At-tire'. DIADEM; DRESS.

Au'gi-a [aw'je-ah] (Gr.), daughter of Berzelus or Barzillai, and wife of ADJUS (1 Esd. v. 38); not in Ezra or Nehemiah.

Au-gus'tus Cæ'sar or Au-gus'tus Cæ'sar [-see'zar] (L. Augustus [= consecrated, august, majestic] Cæsar; see CÆSAR), the first Roman emperor. During his reign Christ was born (Lk. ii. 1 ff.). Augustus was born A. V. C. 691, B. C. 63. His father was Caius Octavius; his mother Atia, daughter of Julia, the sister of Caius Julius Cæsar (= Julius Cesar, the dictator). He bore the same name as his father, Caius Octavius. He was principally educated by his great-uncle Julius Cesar, and was made his heir. After his murder, B. C. 44, the young Octavius, then Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus, was taken into the Triumvirate with Antony and Lepidus, and, after the removal of the latter, divided the empire with Antony. The struggle with Antony for the supreme power was terminated in favor of Octavianus by the battle of Actium, B. C. 31. On this victory, he was saluted emperor by the senate, who conferred on him the title Augustus (B. C. 27). He managed with consummate tact to consolidate his power by gradually uniting in himself all the principal state offices. After the battle of Actium, Heron, who had espoused Antony's side, found himself pardoned, taken into favor and confirmed, may even increased in his power. After Herod's death in A. D. 4, Augustus divided his dominions almost exactly according to his dying directions, among his sons, but afterward exiled Archelaus. Augustus died at Nola in Campania, August 19, A. D. C. 787, A. D. 14, in his seventy-sixth year; but long before his death he had associated Tiberius with him in the empire.

Aug-us'tus' Band (Acts xxvii. 1). ARMY, II.

Aug-ra-nus (L. fr. Gr.), leader of a riot at Jerusalem (2 Mc. iv. 40).

Aug-te-as (1 Esd. ix. 48) = HODIJAH 1.

*An-thor'i-ty. ARMY; CHAIN; ELDER; FATHER; GOVERNOR; JUDGE; KING; LAW; PRINCE; TRIAL, &c.

A'va (fr. Heb. = overturning, Ges.), a place in the empire of Assyria, from which colonists (AVITES 2) were brought to Samaria (2 K. xvii. 24); probably (so Rawlinson) = AHAVA and IVAN.

Av'a-ran (fr. Ar., in allusion to his killing the royal elephant; see 1 Mc. vi. 43-46), the surname of Eleazar, brother of Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. ii. 5), erroneously SAVARAN in 1 Mc. vi. 43.

A'ven (Heb. nothingness). 1. The "plain of Aven" ("Bikath-aven," margin), mentioned by Amos (i. 5) in his denunciation of Syria and the country N. of Palestine, has not been identified with certainty. The LXX. translate "the plain of On," i. e. of Heliopolis or Baalbek—the modern d-Buk'a'a. (PLAIN 2).—2. In Hos. x. 8, "the HIGH PLACES of Aven," the word clearly = BETH-AVEN, i. e. BETH-EL.—3. In Ez. xxx. 17, "Aven" = ON, the sacred city of Heliopolis in Egypt.

*A-ven'ger of Blood. BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

A'vim, A'vims, or A'vites (Heb. Avvim = dwellers among ruins, Ges.). 1. A people among the early inhabitants of Palestine, dwelling in the S. W. corner of the sea-coast, whither they may have made their way N. from the desert. In Deut. ii. 23 we see them dwelling in the villages ("HAZERIM," A. V.) in the S. part of the great western lowland (PLAIN 6), "as far as Gaza." In these rich possessions they were attacked by "the Caphtorim which came forth out of Caphtor," and who after "destroying" them and "dwelling in their stead," appear to have pushed them further N. Possibly a trace of their existence is found in "Avim" (or "the Avim") among the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23). Yet "Avim" here may = AI. It is a CAZAR that both the LXX. and Jerome identified the Avim with the Hivites, and also that the town of Avim was in the actual district of the Hivites (Josh. ix. 7, 17, compare with xviii. 22-27).—2. "Avites," the people of AVA, sent as colonists into Samaria (2 K. xvii. 31). They were idolaters, worshipping Nibhaz and Tartak.

A'vith (Heb. ruins, Ges.), the city of Hadad, the son of Bedad, an early king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 36; 1 Chr. i. 46).

*A-way' with is several times used elliptically or peculiarly in the A. V. In Jn. xix. 15 and Acts xxi. 36, "away with him" = go away with him, i. e. take him away, or put him out of the way, viz., by killing him. So also in Lk. xxiii. 18; Acts xxii. 22.—In Is. i. 13, "I cannot away with" = I cannot go with, I cannot be in fellowship with, I cannot endure.

Awl, a tool for boring, only noticed in connection with boring the servant's ear (Ex. xxi. 6; Deut. xv. 17). The ancient Egyptian awl was much like the well-known modern instrument. MEDICINE.

Ax or Axe. Seven Hebrew words are translated "ax" (thus spelled in the English authorized editions) in the A. V.—1. Garzen, from a root signifying to cut or sever. It consisted of a head of iron (compare Is. x. 34), fastened, with thongs or otherwise, upon a handle of wood, and so liable to slip off (Deut. xix. 5; compare 2 K. vi. 5). It was used for felling trees (Deut. xx. 19; Is. x. 15), and also for shaping the wood when felled, perhaps like the modern adze (1 K. vi. 7).—2. Hereb or chereb, usually translated "sword" (ARMS), is used of other cutting instruments, as a "knife" (Josh. v. 2) or razor (Ez. v. 1), or a tool for hewing or dressing stones (Ex. xx. 25), and is once translated "ax" (Ez. xxvi. 9), evidently denoting a weapon for destroying buildings, a pick-axe.—3. Cashul occurs but once (Ps. lxxiv. 6), and is evidently a later word, denoting a large axe.—4. Magzrah (2 Sam. xii. 31), and, 5, Megzrah (1 Chr. xx. 3) are found in the description of the punishments inflicted by David upon the Ammonites of Rabbah. The latter word is properly "a saw," and is probably a copyist's error for the former.—6. Ma'atsad, translated "ax" in Is. xlv. 12 (margin), and Jer. x. 3, was an instrument employed both by the iron-smith and the carpenter, and is supposed to be a curved knife or bill, smaller than—7. Kardom, which was a large axe used for felling trees (Judg. ix. 48; 1 Sam. xiii.

20, 21; Ps. lxxiv. 5; Jer. xlv. 22).—The “battle-ax” (Heb. mappéts, Jer. li. 20) was probably a heavy mace or maul, like that which gave his French surname to Charles Martel.—The Gr. axiné, translated “ax” in the N. T. (Mat. iii. 10; Lk. iii. 9), is used in the LXX. for the Heb. garzen (No. 1, above) in Deut. xix. 5 and Is. x. 15, and uniformly for kar-dóm (No. 7, above).—The Gr. pelekus, translated “ax” in Bar. vi. 15 (Ep. Jer. i. 14 in Gr.), and used in the LXX. for garzen once (1 K. vi. 7) and for cashshil (No. 3, above) in Ps. lxxiv. 6 (lxxiii. 6 in Gr.) = an axe or hatchet, usually a carpenter’s axe (L. & S.).

• Ax-le-tree is the translation in the A. V. of—1. Heb. plural of yád (literally, hand) (1 K. vii. 32, 33). —2. Gr. axón (Ecclus. xxxiii. 5). CART; CHARIOT; LAVER; WAGON.

A’za-el = ASAHEL 4.

Az-a-el’s, probably merely a repetition of the preceding name ESRIL (1 Esd. ix. 34); perhaps = AZAREEL 4.

A’zal (fr. Heb. = side, near, Vulg., Henderson), a name mentioned (Zech. xiv. 5 only) as the limit to which the ravine of the Mount of Olives will extend when “Jehovah shall go forth to fight.” Several commentators agree with the Vulgate in taking Azal as an appellative.

Az-a-h’ah (Heb. whom Jehovah has reserved, Ges.), father of Shaphan the scribe (2 K. xxii. 3; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8).

Az-a-ni’ah (Heb. whom Jehovah hears, Ges.), a Levite, father of Jeshua in Nehemiah’s time (Neh. x. 9).

A-za’phi-on (1 Esd. v. 33), possibly a corruption of SOPHERETH.

Az-a-ra, one of the “servants of the Temple” (1 Esd. v. 31); not in Ezra.

Az-a-ra-el (Heb. = AZAREEL), a Levite-musician (Neh. xii. 36).

Az-a-re-el (Heb. whom God helps, Ges.). 1. A Korhite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 6). —2. A Levite musician in David’s time; son of Heman (xxv. 18); called UZZIEL in xxv. 4.—3. Son of Jeroham, and prince of Dan under David (xxvii. 22).—4. A son or descendant of Bani, who put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 41); probably = ESRIL or AZARIEL in 1 Esd. ix. 34.—5. A priest, father of Amashai (Neh. xi. 13).

Az-a-ri’ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah helps, Ges.; L. and Gr. AZARIAS). 1. Son of AHMAAZ (1 Chr. vi. 9). He appears from 1 K. iv. 2, to have succeeded his grandfather ZADOK as HIGH-PRIEST in Solomon’s reign. To him probably (so Lord A. C. Hervey), instead of to his grandson (No. 6), belongs the notice in 1 Chr. vi. 10, “He it is that executed the priest’s office in the temple that Solomon built at Jerusalem.”—2. A chief officer of Solomon’s, the son of Nathan; perhaps David’s grandson (1 K. iv. 6).—3. Tenth king of Judah, more frequently called UZZIAH (2 K. xiv. 21, xv. 1, 6, 7, 8, 17, 23, 27; 1 Chr. iii. 12).—4. Son of Ethan, and great-grandson of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 8).—5. A captain of Judah at the inauguration of Joash; son of Jehu, and grandson of Obed (1 Chr. ii. 38, 39; 2 Chr. xxiii. 1); compare No. 13.—6. Son of Johanan (1 Chr. vi. 10, 11); probably high-priest (see No. 1, above) in the reigns of Abijah and Asa, as his son Amariah was in the days of Jehoshaphat; but we know nothing of his character or acts.—7. Son of HILKIAH 2, the high-priest, and father of SERAJAH 2 (1 Chr. vi. 13). This Azariah is by some considered different from the ancestor of Ezra in 1 Chr. ix. 11 and Ezr. vii. 1.—8. Son of Zephaniah, a Kohathite, and ancestor of Samuel the prophet (1 Chr. vi. 36).—9. Son of Oded (2 Chr. xv. 1), called simply ODED in ver. 8, a prophet, and a contemporary of Azariah 6, and of Hanani the seer. His brief but pithy exhortation (ver. 2-7) moved king Asa and the people of Judah and Benjamin to put away idolatry and renew the national covenant with Jehovah, in which reformation many from the northern kingdom joined them.—10. Son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (2 Chr. xxi. 2).—11. Another son of Jehoshaphat, and brother of No. 10 (ib.).—12. In 2 Chr. xxii. 6, Azariah = AHAZIAH 2.—13. A captain of Judah in Athaliah’s time; son of Jeroham (2 Chr. xxiii. 1); compare No. 6.—14. The HIGH-PRIEST in the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Chr. xxvi. 17-20). When King Uzziah, elated by his great prosperity and power, “transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the altar of incense,” Azariah the priest, with eighty of his brethren, went in boldly after him, withstood him, and thrust him out after he was smitten with leprosy. Azariah was contemporary with the prophets Isaiah, Amos, and Joel, and doubtless witnessed the great earthquake in Uzziah’s reign (Am. i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5).—15. Son of Johanan; one of the Ephraimite princes in Pekah’s time who succored and sent back the captives from Judah (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).—16. A Kohathite, father of Joel in Hezekiah’s time (xxix. 12).—17. A Merarite in Hezekiah’s time; son of Jehalelel (xxix. 12).—18. The HIGH-PRIEST in the days of Hezekiah (xxxi. 10, 13). He appears to have cooperated zealously with the king in the thorough purification of the Temple and restoration of the temple-services.—19. One who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem in Nehemiah’s time; son of Mauseiah (Neh. iii. 23, 24).—20. One of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (vii. 7); also called SERAJAH (Ezr. ii. 2) and ZACHARIAS (1 Esd. v. 8).—21. An expounder of the law with Ezra; = AZARIAS 3; probably a Levite (Neh. viii. 7).—22. A priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 2), and probably the same who assisted in the dedication of the city wall (xii. 33).—23. JEZANIAH (Jer. xliii. 2).—24. The original name of ABED-NEGO, one of Daniel’s three friends (Dan. i.-iii.). (MESHACH; SHADRACH).—25. A priest, father of AMARIAH 1, and grandfather of AHITUB 2 (Ezr. vii. 3).

Az-a-ri’as (L. and Gr. = AZARIAH). 1. UZZIAH 3 (1 Esd. ix. 21).—2. URIJAH 3 (ix. 43; compare Neh. viii. 4).—3. AZARIAH 21 (1 Esd. ix. 48).—4. Priest in the line of Esdras (2 Esd. i. 1); = AZARIAH 7 and

EZERIAS.—5. Name assumed by the angel Raphael (Tob. v. 12, vi. 6, 18, vii. 8, ix. 2).—6. A captain under Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. v. 18, 56, 60).—7. AZARIAH 24 (Sg. 3 H. Ch. 2, 26, 66).

A'ZAZ (Heb. strong, Ges.), a Reubenite, father of Bela (1 Chr. v. 8).

* A-za'zel (Lev. xvi. 8, marg.). ATONEMENT, DAY OF, VI.

Az-a-z'd'ah (Heb. whom Jehovah strengthens, Ges.). 1. A Levite in the reign of David, appointed to play the harp when the ark was brought up from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chr. xv. 21).—2. Father of Hoshea, prince of Ephraim under David (xxvii. 20).—3. One of the Levites in Hezekiah's reign, who had charge of the tithes, &c. (2 Chr. xxxi. 18).

Az'buk (Heb. strong devastation, Ges.), father of NEHEMIAH 3 (Neh. iii. 16).

A-ze'kah (Heb. a field dug over or broken up, Ges.), a town of Judah with dependent villages, lying in the lowland (PLAIN 6) near SOCOH 1 (Josh. xv. 35). Joshua's pursuit of the Canaanites after the battle of Beth-horon extended to Azekah (Josh. x. 10, 11). Between Azekah and Socoh the Philistines encamped before the battle in which Goliath was killed (1 Sam. xvii. 1). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 9), was still standing at the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxiv. 7), and was reoccupied by the Jews after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 30). The site of Azekah is possibly (so Schwarz) at Tell Zakariya, a hill near Ain-shems (Beth-shemesh).

A'zel (fr. Heb. = noble, Ges.), a descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 37, 38, ix. 43, 44).

A'zem (fr. Heb. = bone, Ges.), a city in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 29), afterward allotted to Simeon (xix. 3); = EZEM. Wilton (The Negeb) and Rowlands (in Fairbairn under "S. Country") connect Azem with the preceding word in xv. 29 as one name (lim-azem or lje-azem), which they identify with el-'Aujeh or el-'Abdeh, a site with extensive ruins, including a church, strong fortresses, &c., now the headquarters of the Azazimeh Arabs, thirty to thirty-five miles S.W. of Beer-sheba. Robinson identifies this place with the Eboda of Ptolemy.

Az-e-phu'rith, or more properly Ar-el-phu'rith, a name which, in the LXX. of 1 Esd. v. 16, occupies the place of JORAH in Ezr. ii. 18, and of HARIPH in Neh. vii. 24; perhaps a corrupt combination of these names.

A-ze'tas (Gr.). "Sons of Ceilan and Azetas" returned with Zerubbabel according to 1 Esd. v. 15, but are not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

Az'gad (Heb. strong in fortune, Ges.), ancestor of a family, of whom 1,222 (2,322, so Neh. vii. 17) returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 12); 110, with Johanan at their head, with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 12). With the other heads of the people they, or one of this name, joined in the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 15). The name is SADAS in 1 Esd. v. 13, and the number of the family is there given 3,222. In 1 Esd. viii. 38, it is ASTATH.

A-zi'a, a "servant of the temple" (1 Esd. v. 31), = UZZA 8.

A-zi'e-l (2 Esd. i. 2), ancestor of Esdras; = AZARIAH 25 and EZIAS.

A'zi-el (Heb.) = JAAZIEL (1 Chr. xv. 20).

A-zi'za (Heb. strong, Ges.), a son of Zattu in Ezra's time, husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 27); = SARDEUS in 1 Esd. ix. 28.

Az-ma'veth (Heb. strong as death? Ges.). 1. One of David's "valiant men," a native of Bahurim (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chr. xi. 33); probably a Benjamite.—2. A descendant of Mephibosheth, or Merib-baal (1 Chr. viii. 36, ix. 42).—3. Father of Jeziel and Pelet, Benjamite slingers and archers who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 3); perhaps = No. 1. Possibly "sons of Azmaveth" here denotes natives of the place of that name (see next article).—4. Overseer of the royal treasures in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxvii. 25).

Az-ma'veth (Heb.; see above), a place, probably in Benjamin; according to Mr. Finn, at the modern village of Himeh S. E. of er-Râm. (RAMAH 1.) Forty-two of "the children of Azmaveth" (= "men of BETH-AZMAVETH," in Neh.) returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 24). The "sons of the singers" seemed to have settled round it (Neh. xii. 29).

Az'mon (fr. Heb. = strong), a place named on the S. boundary of Palestine, between Kadesh and "the river of Egypt" (Wady el-Arish) (Num. xxxiv. 4, 5; Josh. xv. 4); identified by Wilton (in Fairbairn, art. Karkaa) with Wady el-Kundimeh, about forty-five miles S. S. W. of Beer-sheba.

Az'noth-in'bor (Heb. cave [i. e. possibly, summits] of Tabor), a place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34); not identified; mentioned by Eusebius as in the plain in the confines of Diocæsarea (Sepphoris).

A'zor (Gr. and L. fr. Heb. = AZUR), son of Eliakim, in the line of our Lord (Mat. i. 13, 14).

A-ze'tus (L.) = ASHDOD.

A-ze'tus (L. = ASHDOD), Mount. In the battle in which Judas Maccabeus fell, he broke the right wing of Bacchides' army, and pursued them to Mount Azotus (1 Mc. ix. 15), which is supposed (Rbn. Phys. Geog., p. 47) to be the low round hill on which Azotus (Ashdod) was, and still is, situated.

Az'ri-el (Heb., help of God, Ges.). 1. A chieftain and warrior of Manasseh E. of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).—2. A Naphtalite, father of Jerimoth in David's time (1 Chr. xxvii. 19).—3. Father of Seraiah, an officer of Jehoiaquim (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

Az-ri'kam, compare AHIKAM (Heb. help against the enemy, Ges.). 1. A descendant of Zerubbabel, and son of Neariah (1 Chr. iii. 23).—2. Eldest son of Azel, and descendant of King Saul (viii. 38, ix. 44).—3. A Levite, ancestor of Shemaiah in Nehemiah's time (ix. 14; Neh. xi. 15).—4. Governor of the house, or prefect of the palace to King Ahaz; slain by Zichri in Pekah's invasion of Judah (2 Chr. xxviii. 7).

A-za'bah (Heb. forsaken, deserted, Ges.). 1. Wife of Caleb, son of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 18, 19).—2. Mother of King Jehoshaphat (1 K. xxii. 42; 2 Chr. xx. 31).

A'zur (Heb. AZZUR = helper, Ges.). 1. A Benjamite (priest? so Hitzig) of Gibeon, and father of Hananiah the false prophet (Jer. xxviii. 1).—2. Father of the Jaazaniah against whom Ezekiel prophesied (Ez. xi. 1).

A-za'ran, ancestor of 432 enumerated in 1 Esd. v. 15, among those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel; not in Ezr. ii. and Neh. vii., perhaps = AZZUR.

Az'zah (Heb. strong, fortified, Ges.) = GAZA (Deut. ii. 23; 1 K. iv. 24; Jer. xxv. 20).

Az'zan (Heb. strong or sharp, Fñ.), a man of Issachar; father of Paltiel (Num. xxxiv. 26).

Az'zur (Heb. helper, Ges.; = AZUR), a chief who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 17); probably a family name.

B

Ba'al (Heb. lord, master, possessor, owner, Ges.).
 1. Father of the Reubenite prince Beerah (1 Chr. v. 5).—2. A Benjamite, son of Jehiel, the father or founder of Gibeon (viii. 30, ix. 36).

Ba'al (Heb.; see above), the supreme male divinity of the Phœnician and Canaanitish nations, as ASHTORETH was their supreme female divinity. Both names are used in the plural to designate, not, as Gesenius maintains, statues of the divinities, but different modifications of the divinities themselves. The plural BAALIM is found frequently alone (Judg. ii. 11, x. 10; 1 K. xviii. 18; Jer. ix. 14; Hos. ii. 17), as well as in connection with ASHTORETH (Judg. x. 6; 1 Sam. vii. 4) and with ASHERAH (A. V. "the groves," Judg. iii. 7; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 3). There can be no doubt of the very high antiquity of the worship of Baal. We find it established among the Moabites and their allies the Midianites in the time of Moses (Num. xxii. 41), and through these nations the Israelites were seduced to the worship of this god under the particular form of Baal-peor (Num. xxv. 3-18; Deut. iv. 3). Notwithstanding the fearful punishment which their idolatry then brought upon them, the succeeding generation returned to the worship of Baal (Judg. ii. 10-13), and, with the exception of the period when Gideon was judge (vi. 25, &c., viii. 33), this form of IDOLATRY seems to have prevailed among them up to the time of Samuel (x. 10; 1 Sam. vii. 4), at whose rebuke the people renounced the worship of Baalim. Yet afterward the worship of Baal spread greatly, and with that of Asherah became the religion of the court and people of the ten tribes under Ahab and Jezebel (1 K. xvi. 31-33, xviii. 19, 22; Rom. xi. 4). (ELIJAH.) And though this idolatry was occasionally put down (2 K. iii. 2, x. 28), it appears never to have been permanently abolished among them (xvii. 16). In the kingdom of Judah also Baal-worship extensively prevailed. During the reign of Ahaziah and the usurpation of his mother Athaliah, Ahab's sister, it appears to have been the religion of the court (viii. 27; comp. xi. 18), as afterward under Ahaz (xvi. 3; 2 Chr. xxviii. 2), and Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 3). The worship of Baal among the Jews seems to have been with much pomp and ceremonial. Temples were erected to him (1 K. xvi. 32; 2 K. xi. 18); his images were set up (x. 26); his altars were very numerous (Jer. xi. 13), were erected particularly on lofty eminences (1 K. xviii. 20; HIGH PLACES), and on the roofs of houses (Jer. xxxii. 29); there were priests in great numbers (1 K. xviii. 19), and of various classes (2 K. x. 19); the worshippers appear to have been arrayed in appropriate robes (x. 22); the worship was performed by burning incense (Jer. vii. 9) and offering burnt-sacrifices, occasionally of human victims (xix. 5). The officiating priests danced with frantic shouts around the altar, and cut themselves with knives to excite the attention and compassion of the god (1 K. xviii. 26-28). Through all the Phœnician colonies we find traces of the worship of this god, in names, as Asdrubal, Hanni-bal, &c., and in inscriptions; nor need we hesitate to regard the Babylonian Bel (Is. xlvi. 1) or Belus, as essentially = Baal, though perhaps under some modified form. The same perplexity occurs respecting the connection of this god with the heavenly bodies, as in regard to ASHTORETH. Creuzer and Movers declare Baal to be the Sun-god; on the other hand, Herodotus makes Bel = the Greek

Zeus (= Roman JUPITER), and there seems to be no doubt that Bel-Merodach is the planet Jupiter. Probably the symbol of Baal as well as of Ashtoreth varied at different times and in different localities. Among the compounds of Baal in the O. T. are:—1. Ba'al-be'rith (Heb. covenant-Baal, the god who comes into covenant with the worshippers). This form of Baal was worshipped at Shechem by the Israelites after the death of Gideon (Judg. viii. 33, ix. 4).—2. Ba'al-ze'bub (Heb. Baal, or Lord, of the fly), worshipped at Ekron (2 K. i. 2, 3, 16). The Greeks gave a similar epithet to Zeus (JUPITER), and Pliny speaks of a Fly-god. The name in the N. T. is BEELZEBUB.—3. Ba'al-ha'nun (Heb. Baal is gracious). a. An early king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 38, 39; 1 Chr. i. 49, 50). b. David's superintendant of his olive and sycamore plantations (1 Chr. xxvii. 28); "the GEDERITE," perhaps of Canaanitish origin.—4. Ba'al-pe'or (Heb. Lord of opening, in obscene sense, Ges.). We have already referred to the worship of this god. The narrative (Num. xxv.) seems clearly to show that this form of Baal-worship was connected with licentious rites. Baal-peor was identified by the Rabbins and early Fathers with Priapus, the god of procreation.

Ba'al (see above), geography. This word, the prefix or suffix to the names of several places in Palestine, never seems to have become a naturalized Hebrew word (compare Hos. ii. 16); and such places called by this name or its compounds as can be identified, were either near Phœnicia, or in proximity to some other acknowledged seat of heathen worship. The places in the names of which Baal forms a part are:—1. Ba'al, a town of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 33 only), apparently = BAALATH-BEER.—2. Ba'al-ah (Hebrew fem. of BAAL). (a.) Another (probably the earlier or Canaanite) name for KIRJATH-JEARIM, or KIRJATH-BAAL. It is mentioned in Josh. xv. 9, 10; 1 Chr. xiii. 6. In Josh. xv. 11, it is called Mount Baalhah, and in xv. 60, and xviii. 14, Kirjath-Baal. In 2 Sam. vi. 2, the name is "Baale (Heb. pl. of Baal; = Baalim) of Judah." Robinson (Phys. Geog., p. 47) supposes Mount Baalah = a short line of hills, nearly parallel with the coast, and not far W. of Ekron. (b.) A town in the S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 29), called also (xix. 3) BALAH, and (1 Chr. iv. 29) BILHAH. (BIZJOTHJAH).—3. Ba'al-ath (Heb. = BALAH), a town of Dan named with Gibbethon, Gath-rimmon, and other Philistine places (Josh. xix. 44); probably = the Baalath afterward built or rebuilt by Solomon (1 K. ix. 18; 2 Chr. viii. 6).—4. Ba'al-ath-be'er (Heb. Baal of the well = Holy-well) = BAAL I, a town in the S. part of Judah, given to Simeon, which also bore the name of RAMATH OF THE SOUTH.—5. Ba'al-gad (Heb. Baal the Fortune bringer), used to denote the most N. (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7) or perhaps N. W. (xiii. 5) point to which Joshua's victories extended; probably a Phœnician or Canaanite sanctuary of Baal under the aspect of GAD, or Fortune; supposed by some = Baalbek; more probable (so Schwarz, Rbn., &c.) at the modern Banids. (CESAREA PHILIPPI).—6. Ba'al-hamon (Heb. Baal of multitude), a place at which Solomon had a vineyard, evidently of great extent (Cant. viii. 11). The only clew to its situation is the mention in Jd. viii. 8, of a Belamôn or Balamôn (A. V. BALAMO) near Dothaim; and therefore in the mountains of Ephraim, not far N. of Samaria. Rosenmüller, Wilson, &c., suppose Baal-hamon = Baal-gad (above) and Baalbek; Ewald supposes it = HAMMON I.—7. Ba'al-ha'zor (Heb. Baal's village), a place "by (A. V. "beside") Ephraim," where Absalom appears to have had a sheep-farm, and where Amnon was murdered (2 Sam. xiii. 23).—8. Mount Ba'al-her-mon (Judg. iii. 3), and simply Baal-hermon (1 Chr. v. 23). This is usually considered as a distinct place from Mount Hermon; but we know that this mountain had at least three names (Deut. iii. 9), and Baal-hermon may have been a fourth in use among the Phenician worshippers of Baal (so Mr. Grove). Gesenius and Robinson make Baal-hermon=Baal-gad (No. 6, above), and Mount Baal-hermon=an adjacent mountain near (or part of) Mount Hermon.—9. Ba'al-me'on (Heb.; Meon = dwelling, habitation, Ges.), one of the towns built or rebuilt by the Reubenites, named with Nebo (Num. xxxii. 38; 1 Chr. v. 8); probably = BETH-BAAL-MEON, BEON, and BETH-MEON. In the time of Ezekiel it was Moabite, one of the cities which were "the glory of the country" (Ez. xxv. 9). In the days of Eusebius and Jerome it was still called Balmano, nine miles from Heshbon, and reputed to be the native place of Elisha. The site is supposed to be at Mā'in, a ruined place of considerable size, one hour S. of Heshbon (Rbn., Phys. Geog., 61).—10. Ba'al-per'a-zim (Heb.; Perazim = bursts or destructions), the scene of a victory of David over the Philistines, and of a great destruction of their images (2 Sam. v. 20; 1 Chr. xiv. 11); perhaps previously the seat of a high place or sanctuary of Baal. (PERAZIM, MOUNT).—11. Ba'al-shal'i-sha (fr. Heb.; see SHALISHA), a place named only in 2 K. iv. 42; apparently not far from Gilgal (compare ver. 38); possibly in the district, or "land," of SHALISHA.—12. Ba'al-ta'mar (Heb. high place [or sanctuary] of the palm), a place (Judg. xx. 33 only) near Gibeah of Benjamin. The palm-tree of Deborah (iv. 5) was in this region, and is possibly alluded to.—13. Ba'al-zephon (Heb. place of Zephon, i. e. of a watch-tower, R. S. Poole; place of Typhon or sacred to Typhon, Ges.), a place in Egypt near where the Israelites crossed the Red Sea (Ex. xiv. 2, 9; Num. xxxiii. 7). From the position of GOSHEN and the indications afforded by the narrative of the route of the Israelites, Mr. R. S. Poole places Baal-zephon on the W. shore of the Gulf of Suez, a little below its head, which at that time was about thirty or forty miles N. of the present head. (PI-HAHIROTH; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF.)

Ba'al-Im, Hebrew plural of BAAL.

Ba'al-Is (Heb. son of exultation, Ges.) king of the Ammonites when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xl. 14). ISHMAEL 6.

Ba'al-na (Heb. son of affliction, Ges.) 1. Solomon's commissary in Jezreel and the N. of the Jordan valley W. of the river; son of Ahilud (1 K. iv. 12).—2. Father of Zadok in Nehemiah's time (Neh. iii. 4).—3. BAANAH 4 (1 Esd. v. 8).

Ba'al-nah (Heb. son of affliction, Ges.) 1. Son of Rimmon; a Benjamite captain who with his brother Rechab murdered Ish-bosheth. For this they were killed by David, and their mutilated bodies hung up over the pool at Hebron (2 Sam. iv. 2, 5, 6, 9).—2. A Netophathite, father of David's warrior Heleb or Heled (xxiii. 29; 1 Chr. xi. 30).—3. Son of Hushai; Solomon's commissary in Asher (1 K. iv. 16).—4. A man who accompanied Zerubbabel on his return from the Captivity (Ezr. ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7); possibly the chief who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 27). BAANA 3.

Ba'al-ni'as (1 Esd. ix. 26) = BENAIAH 3, a.

Ba'a-ra (Heb. brutish, Ges.), one of the wives of the Benjamite Shabaraim (1 Chr. viii. 8).

Ba-a-sei'ah [-see'yah] (Heb. work of Jehovah, Ges.), a Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph (1 Chr. vi. 40, Heb. 25).

Ba'a-sha (Heb.; from a root signifying to be bad, offensive, Ges.; in the work, or he who seeks and lays waste, Calmet), third sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, and the founder of its second dynasty. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) He was son of Ahijah of the tribe of Issachar, and conspired against King Nadab, son of Jeroboam, when he was besieging the Philistine town of Gibbethon (1 K. xv. 27), and killed him with his whole family. He appears to have been of humble origin (xvi. 2). It was probably in the thirteenth year of his reign that he made war on ASA, and began to fortify Ramah. He was defeated by the unexpected alliance of Asa with Ben-hadad I. of Damascus. Baasha died in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, and was honorably buried in the beautiful city of Tirzah, which he had made his capital (xvi. 6; 2 Chr. xvi. 1-6).

* Babe. CHILD.

Babel (Heb. confusion, Ges.; Chal. Babil = the gate of the god Il, or the gate of God, Chaldee etymology, so Rawlinson), Bab'y-lon (L. form), is properly the capital city of the country, which is called in Genesis SHINAR, and in the later Scriptures CHALDEA, or the land of the Chaldeans. The architectural remains discovered in S. Babylonia, taken in conjunction with the monumental records, seem to indicate (Rawlinson's views are given in this article and the next; compare ASSYRIA and NINEVEH) that it was not at first the capital, nor, indeed, a town of very great importance. Erech, Ur, and Ellasar appear to have been all more ancient than Babylon, and were capital cities when Babil was a provincial village. The first rise of the Chaldean power was in the region close upon the Persian Gulf; thence the nation spread N. up the course of the rivers, and the seat of government moved in the same direction, being finally fixed at Babylon, perhaps not earlier than B. C. 1700.—I. Topography of Babylon—Ancient Descriptions of the City.—The descriptions of Babylon in classical writers are derived chiefly from Herodotus and Ctesias. According to Herodotus, the city, which was built on both sides of the Euphrates, formed a vast square, enclosed within a double line of high walls, the extent of the outer circuit being 480 stades, or about 56 miles. The entire area included would thus have been about 200 square miles. The houses, which were frequently three or four stories high, were laid out in straight streets crossing each other at right angles. In each division of the town there was a fortress or stronghold, consisting in the one case of the royal palace, in the other of the great temple of Belus. The two portions of the city were united by a bridge, composed of a series of stone piers with movable platforms of wood stretching from one pier to another. According to Ctesias, the circuit of the city was 360 stades, a little under 42 miles. It lay, he says, on both sides of the Euphrates, and the two parts were connected together by a stone bridge 5 stades (above 1,000 yards) long and 30 feet broad, of the kind described by Herodotus. At either extremity of the bridge was a royal palace, that in the E. city being the more magnificent. The two palaces were joined, not only by the bridge, but by a tunnel under the river! Ctesias's account of the temple of Belus has not come down to us.—In examining these dethe Euphrates, occurs a series of artificial mounds of enormous size. They consist chiefly of three great masses of building—the high pile (A) of unbaked brickwork called by Rich 'Mujellibe,' but known to the Arabs as 'Babil'; the building denominated the 'Kasr' or palace (B); and a lofty mound (C), upon which stands the modern tomb of Amrām-ibn-'Alī. Besides these principal masses the most remarkable features are two parallel lines of rampart (FF) bounding the chief ruins on the E., some similar but inferior remains on the N. and W. (I I and H), an embankment along the river-side (E), a remarkable isolated heap (K) in the middle of a long valley, which seems to have been the ancient bed of the stream, and two long lines of rampart (G G), meeting at a right angle, and with the river forming an irregular triangle, within which all the ruins on this side (except Babil) are enclosed. On the W., or right bank, there is the appearance of an enclosure, and of a building of moderate size within it (D), but there are no other ruins near the river. Scattered over the country on both sides of the Euphrates, are a number of remarkable mounds, usually standing single, which are plainly of the same date with the great mass of ruins upon the river bank. Of these, by far the most striking is the vast ruin called the Birs-Nimrud. (BABEL, TOWER OF.)—III. Identification of Sites.—On comparing the existing ruins with the accounts of ancient writers, the great difficulty which meets us is the position of the remains almost exclusively on the left bank of the river. All the old accounts agree in representing the Euphrates as running through the town, and the principal buildings as placed on the opposite sides of the stream. Perhaps the most probable solution is to be found in the fact, that a large canal (called Shebil) intervened in ancient times between the Kasr mound (B) and the ruin now called Babil (A), which may easily have been confounded by Herodotus with the main stream. If this explanation be accepted as probable, we may identify the principal ruins as follows:—1. The great mound of Babil = the ancient temple of Belus. It is an oblong mass, about 200 yards long, 140 yards broad, and 140 feet high, composed chiefly of unbaked brick, but originally coated with fine-burnt brick laid in mortar. It formed the tower of the temple, and was surmounted by a chapel, but the main shrine, the altars, and no doubt the residences of the priests, were at the foot, in a sacred precinct. 2. The mound of the Kasr = the site of the great palace of NEBUCHADNEZZAR. It is an irregular square of about 700 yards each way, and apparently chiefly formed of the old palace-platform, on which are still standing certain portions of the ancient palace or “Kasr.” The walls are of pale yellow burnt bricks of excellent quality, laid in fine lime cement. No plan of the palace is to be made out from the existing remains, which are tossed in apparent confusion on the highest point of the mound. 3. The mound of Amrām is thought by M. Oppert = the “hanging gardens” of Nebuchadnezzar; but as they were only 400 feet each way, it is much too large for them; and most probably it = the ancient palace, coeval with Babylon itself, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks in his inscriptions as adjoining his own more magnificent residence. 4. The ruins marked D D on either side of the Euphrates, together with all the other remains on the right bank, may = the lesser palace of Ctesias, which is said to have been connected with the greater by a bridge across the river, as well as by a tunnel under the channel of the stream. 5. The two long parallel lines of embankment on the E. (F F in the plan), may = the lines of an outer and inner enclosure, of which Nebuchadnezzar speaks as defences of his palace; or = the embankments of an enormous reservoir, which is often mentioned by that monarch as adjoining his palace toward the E. 6. The embankment (E) is composed of bricks marked with the name of Labynetos or Nabunt, and is undoubtedly a portion of the work which Berosus ascribes to the last king. The most remarkable fact connected with the magnificence of Babylon, is the pooriness of the material with which such wonderful results were produced. With bricks (BRICK) made from the soil of the country, and at first only “SLIME for mortar” (Gen. xi. 3), were constructed edifices so vast that they still remain among the most enormous ruins in the world.—IV. History of Babylon.—Scripture represents the “beginning of the kingdom” as in the time of NIM ron, the grandson of Ham (Gen. x. 6-10). The most ancient inscriptions appear to show that the primitive inhabitants of the country were really Cushite, i. e. identical in race with the early inhabitants of S. Arabia and of Ethiopia. The seat of government was then, as has been stated, in lower Babylonia, ERĒCH and UR being the capitals. The country was called SHINAR, and the people the Akkadm. (ACCAD.) Of the art of this period we have specimens in the ruins of the ancient capitals, which date from at least the twentieth century B. C. The early annals of Babylon are filled by Berossus, the native historian, with three dynasties; one of forty-nine Chaldean kings, who reigned 458 years; another of nine Arab kings, who reigned 245 years; and a third of forty-nine Assyrian monarchs, who held dominion for 526 years. It would appear then as if Babylon, after having had a native Chaldean dynasty (CHEDORLAOMER), fell wholly under Shemitic influence, becoming subject first to Arabia for two centuries and a half, and then to Assyria for above five centuries, and not regaining even a qualified independence till the time marked by the close of the Upper and the formation of the Lower Assyrian empire. But the statement is too broad to be exact; and the monuments show that Babylon was at no time absorbed into ASSYRIA, or even for very many years together a submissive vassal. The line of Babylonian kings becomes exactly known to us from the era of Nabonassar, B. C. 747. The "Canon of Ptolemy" gives us the succession of Babylonian monarchs, with the exact length of the reign of each, from B. C. 747, when Nabonassar mounted the throne, to B. C. 331, when the last Persian king was dethroned by Alexander. Of the earlier kings of the Canon, the only one worthy of notice is Mardocepalus (B. C. 721), the MERODACH-BALADAN of the Scriptures; but with Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, a new era in the history of Babylon commences. He was appointed to the government of Babylon by the last Assyrian king, when the Medes were about to make their final attack (NINEVEH): whereupon, betraying the trust reposed in him, he went over to the enemy, arranged a marriage between his son Nebuchadnezzar and the daughter of the Median leader, and joined in the last siege of the city. On the success of the confederates (B. C. 625) Babylon became not only an independent kingdom, but an empire. The Jews with others then passed from dependency on Assyria to dependency on Babylon. At a later date hostilities broke out with Egypt. Nechoh (PHARAOH 9) invaded the Babylonian dominions on the S. W. (2 K. xxiii. 29, &c., xxiv. 7; 2 Chr. xxxv. 20). Nabopolassar was now advanced in life; he therefore sent his son Nebuchadnezzar against the Egyptians, and the battle of Carchemish restored to Babylon the former limits of her territory (compare 2 K. xxiv. 7 with Jer. xlvi. 2-12). NEBUCHADNEZZAR, by far the most remarkable of all the Babylonian monarchs, was acknowledged king upon his father's death, B. C. 604. He died B. C. 561, having reigned forty-three years, and was succeeded by EVIL-MERODACH, his son, called in the Canon ILLOARUDAMUS. This prince was murdered two years afterward, by Neriglissar, his brother-in-law—the Nerigassolassar of the Canon = (apparently) the "NERGAL-SHAR-EZER, RAB-MAG" of Jer. xxxix. 3, 13. Neriglissar built the palace at Babylon, which seems to have been placed originally on the right bank of the river. He reigned but four years, and left the crown to his son, Laborosoarchod. This prince, when he had reigned nine months, became the victim of a conspiracy. Nabonidus (or Labynetus), one of the conspirators, succeeded B. C. 555, very shortly before the war broke out between CYRUS and CROESUS. Having entered into alliance with the latter of these monarchs against the former, he provoked the hostility of Cyrus, who, B. C. 539, advanced at the head of his irresistible hordes, but wintered upon the Diyaleh or Gyndes, making his final approaches in the ensuing spring. Nabonidus took the field in person at the head of his army, leaving his son BELSHAZZAR to command in the city. He was defeated and forced to shut himself up in Borsippa (marked now by the Birs-Nimrud), till after the fall of Babylon. Belshazzar guarded the city, but allowed the enemy to enter the town by the channel of the river. Babylon was thus taken by a surprise, as Jeremiah had prophesied (li. 31)—by an army of Medes and Persians, as intimated one hundred and seventy years earlier by Isaiah (xxi. 1-9), and, as Jeremiah had also foreshown (li. 39), during a festival. In the carnage which ensued upon the taking of the town, Belshazzar was slain (Dan. v. 30). According to Dan. v. 31, it would seem as if Babylon was taken, not by Cyrus, king of Persia, but by a Median king, named DARIUS. There is, however, sufficient indication that "DARIUS THE MEDE" was not the real conqueror, but a monarch with a certain delegated authority (see Dan. v. 31, and ix. 1). With the conquest by Cyrus commenced the decay and ruin of Babylon, though it continued a royal residence through the entire period of the Persian empire. The defences and public buildings suffered grievously from neglect during the long period of peace after the reign of XERXES. After the death of Alexander the Great, the removal of the seat of empire to Antioch under the Seleucidæ gave the finishing blow to the prosperity of the place. Since then Babylon has been a quarry from which all the tribes in the vicinity have derived the bricks with which they have built their cities (Seleucia, Ctesiphon, Bagdad, Hillah, &c.). The "great city," "the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency," has thus emphatically "become heaps" (Jer. li. 37). Her walls have altogether disappeared—they have "fallen" (li. 44), been "thrown down" (l. 15), been "utterly broken" (li. 58). "A drought is upon her waters" (l. 39); for the system of irrigation, on which, in Babylonia, fertility altogether depends, has long been laid aside (CHALDEA); "her cities" are everywhere "a desolation" (li. 43); her "land a wilderness;" "wild beasts of the desert lie there;" and "owls dwell there" (compare Layard, Nin. and Bab., p. 484, with Is. xiii. 21, 22, and Jer. l. 39); the natives regard the whole site as haunted, and neither will the "Arab pitch tent, nor the shepherd fold sheep there" (Is. xiii. 20).

Ba'bel (Heb.; see above), Tower of. The "tower of Babel" is only mentioned once in Scripture (Gen. xi. 4-9), and then as incomplete. (TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.) It was built of bricks, and the "slime" used for mortar was probably bitumen. (BRICK; MORTAR; SLIME.) A Jewish tradition declared that fire fell from heaven, and split the tower through to its foundation; while Alexander Polyhistor and the other profane writers who noticed the tower, said that it had been blown down by the winds. Such authorities therefore as we possess, represent the building as destroyed soon after its erection (so Rawlinson). When the Jews, however, were carried captive into Babylonia, they were struck with the vast magnitude and peculiar character of certain of the Babylonian temples in one or other of which they thought to recognize the very tower itself. The predominant opinion was in favor of the great temple of Nebo at Borsippa, the modern Birs-Nimrud, although the distance of that place from Babylon is an insuperable difficulty in the way of the identification (see below). The Birs-Nimrud appears to have been a sort of oblique pyramid built in seven receding stages. Upon a platform of crude brick, raised a few feet above the level of the alluvial plain, was built of burnt brick the first or basement stage—an exact square, 272 feet each way, and 26 feet in perpendicular height. Upon this stage was erected a second, 230 feet each way, and likewise 26 feet high; which, however, was not placed exactly in the middle of the first, but considerably nearer to the S. W. end or back of the building. The other stages were arranged similarly—the third being 188 feet, and again 26 feet high; the fourth, 146 feet square, and 15 feet high; the fifth, 104 feet square, and 15 feet high; the sixth, 62 feet square, and 15 feet high; and the seventh 20 feet square, and 15 feet high. On the seventh stage was probably placed the ark or tabernacle, which seems to have been again 15 feet high, and must have nearly, if not entirely, covered the top of the seventh story. The entire original height, allowing 3 feet for the platform, would thus have been 156 feet, or, without the platform, 153 feet. The whole formed a sort of oblique pyramid, the gentler slope facing the N. E., and the steeper inclining to the S. W. On the N. E. side was the grand entrance, and here stood the vestibule, a separate building, the ruins of which having joined those from the temple itself, fill up the intermediate space, and very remarkably prolong the mound in this direction. (See Rawlinson's Hitt. ii. 483.) The Birs temple, called the "Temple of the Seven Spheres," was ornamented with the planetary colors, but this was most likely a peculiarity. The other chief features of it seem to have been common to most, if not all of the Babylonian temple-towers.—To the preceding description, from Rawlinson, may here be added the following from Professor Oppert. The history of the confusion of languages was preserved at Babylon, as we learn from classical and Babylonian authorities. The Talmudists say that the true site of the Tower of Babel was at Borsif, the Greek Borsippa, the Birs-Nimrud,  $7\frac{1}{2}$  miles S. W. from Hillah, and nearly 11 miles from the N. ruins of Babylon. The Babylonian name of this locality is Barsip or Barzipa = Tower of Tongues. This building, erected by Nebuchadnezzar, and named the temple of the Seven Lights of the Earth, i. e. the planets, is the same that Herodotus describes as the Tower of Jupiter Belus. The temple consisted of a large substructure, a stade (600 Babylonian feet) in breadth, and 75 feet in height, over which were built seven other stages of 25 feet each. The top was the temple of Nebo. Nebuchadnezzar thus notices this building in the Borsippa inscription:—"We say for the other, i. e. this edifice, the house of the Seven Lights of the Earth, the most ancient monument of Borsippa: A former king built it (they reckon forty-two ages) but he did not complete its head. Since a remote time people had abandoned it, without order expressing their words. Since that time the earthquake and the thunder had dispersed its sun-dried clay; the bricks of the casing had been split, and the earth of the interior had been scattered in heaps. Merodach, the great lord, excited my mind to repair this building. I did not change the site, nor did I take away the foundation-stone . . . . . As it had been in former times, so I founded, I made it: as it had been in ancient days, so I exalted its summit."—It is not necessary (so Rawlinson) to suppose that any real idea of "scaling heaven" was present to the minds of those who raised the Tower of Babel or any other of the Babylonian temple-towers. The expression used in Gen. xi. 4, is a mere hyperbole for great height (compare Deut. i. 28; Dan. iv. 11, &c.), and should not be taken literally. Military defence was probably the primary object of such edifices in early times: but with the wish for this may have been combined further secondary motives, which remained when such defence was otherwise provided for. Diodorus states that the great tower of the temple of Belus was used by the Chaldeans as an observatory, and the careful emplacement of the Babylonian temples with the angles facing the four cardinal points, would be a natural consequence, and may be regarded as a strong confirmation of the reality of this application.

Ba'bi (1 Esd. viii. 37) = BEDAI.

Bab'y-lon (L. fr. Gr. Babulón; see BABEL). 1. The occurrence of this name in 1 Pet. v. 13 has given rise to a variety of conjectures, viz.—a. That Babylon tropically denotes Rome (so Ecumenius, Jerome, Grotius, Lardner, Cave, Whitby, Macknight, Hales, Horne, &c.). In support of this opinion is brought forward a tradition recorded by Eusebius (H. E. ii. 15), on the authority of Papias and Clement of Alexandria, that 1 Peter was composed at Rome. But there is nothing to indicate that the name is used figuratively, and the subscription to an epistle is the last place we should expect to find a mystical appellation.—b. Cappellus and others take Babylon, with as little reason, to mean Jerusalem.—c. Bar-Hebræus understands by it the house in Jerusalem where the apostles were assembled on the day of Pentecost.—d. Others place it on the Tigris, and identify it with Seleucia or Ctesiphon, but for this there is no evidence.—e. That Babylon = the small fort of that name which formed the boundary between Upper and Lower Egypt. Its site is marked by the modern Baboul in the Delta, a little N. of Fostat, or old Cairo. According to Strabo it derived its name from some Babylonian deserters who had settled there. In his time it was the headquarters of one of the three legions which garrisoned Egypt. Josephus (ii. 15, § 1) says it was built on the site of Letopolis, when Cambyzes subdued Egypt. That this is the Babylon of 1 Peter is the tradition of the Coptic Church, and is maintained by Le Clerc, Mill, Pearson, &c. There is, however, no proof that the apostle Peter was ever in Egypt, and a very slight degree of probability is created by the tradition that his companion Mark was bishop of Alexandria.—f. The most natural supposition of all (adopted by Erasmus, Drusius, Beza, Lightfoot, Bengel, Wetstein, A. Clarke, Barnes, Davidson, Tregelles, Wordsworth, &c.) is that Babylon here = the old Babylon on the Euphrates (BABEL), which was largely inhabited by Jews at the time in question (Jos. xv. 3, § 1). The only argument against this view is the negative evidence supplied by the silence of historians as to St. Peter's having visited Babylon, but this cannot be allowed to have much weight. In support of it, Lightfoot suggests that this city "was one of the greatest knots of Jews in the world," and St. Peter was the minister of the circumcision.—g. In the Apocalypse, the symbolical name by which Rome is denoted (Rev. xiv. 8, xvii., xviii.). The power of Rome was regarded by the later Jews as that of Babylon by their forefathers (compare Jer. li. 7 with Rev. xiv. 8), and hence, whatever the people of Israel be understood to symbolize, Babylon represents the antagonistic principle. ANTI-CHRIST; REVELATION.

Bab'y-lo'ni-ans = inhabitants of Babylon (BABEL), who were among the colonists planted in the cities of Samaria by the conquering Assyrians (Ezr. iv. 9). Afterward, when the warlike Chaldeans asquired the predominance in the seventh century B. C.; "Chaldean" and "Babylonian" became almost synonymous (Ez. xxiii. 14, 15, 17; compare Is. xlviii. 14, 20).

Bab-y-lo'nish Gar'ment, literally "robe of Shinar" (Job. vii. 21). An ample robe, probably made of the skin or fur of an animal (compare Gen. xxv. 25), and ornamented with embroidery, or perhaps a variegated garment with figures inwoven in the fashion for which the Babylonians were celebrated. DRESS; EMBROIDERER.

Ba'ca (Heb. weeping, lamentation, Ges.), the Val'ley of (Heb. 'emek; see VALLEY 1), a valley somewhere in Palestine, through which the exiled Psalmist sees in vision the pilgrims passing in their march toward the sanctuary of Jehovah at Zion (Ps. lxxxiv. 6); translated by the Targum, GEHENNA (HINNOM, VALLEY OF), by the Vulgate, "vale of tears." The explanation of Baca, as = the Valley of Mulberry-Trees (Heb. bécâm; 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chr. xiv. 13, 14) is now very commonly abandoned for the one given in the ancient versions, the "vale of weeping" or "of sorrow," a beautiful poetical description of the present life as one of suffering (J. A. Alexander on Ps. lxxxiv.).

Bac'hí-des (Gr. son of Bacchus), a friend of Antiochus Epiphanes and governor of Mesopotamia, commissioned by Demetrius Soter to investigate the charges which Alcimus preferred against Judas Maccabeus. After the defeat and death of Nicanor, he led a second expedition into Judea. Judas Maccabeus fell in battle (B. C. 161), and Bacchides reestablished the supremacy of the Syrian faction. Bacchides next attempted to surprise Jonathan, but he escaped across the Jordan. Having completed the pacification of the country, Bacchides returned to Demetrius (B. C. 160). After two years he came back at the request of the Syrian faction, but, meeting with ill success, he turned against those who had induced him to undertake the expedition, and sought an honorable retreat. When this was known by Jonathan he sent envoys to Bacchides and concluded a peace, B. C. 158 (1 Mc. vii. ix.).

Bac-chu rus [-ku-] (L. fr. Gr.), one of the "holy singers," who had taken a foreign wife (1 Esd. ix. 24); not in Ezr. x.

Bac'chus [-kus] (L. fr. Gr. Bakchos; also written in L. Iacchus, Dionysus, fr. Gr. Iakchos, Dionusos), properly the god of wine, in Roman and Greek mythology, said to have been the son of JUPITER and Semele. In later times the most varied attributes were centred in him as the source of luxuriant fertility of nature, and the god of civilization, gladness, and inspiration. His worship was greatly modified by the introduction of Eastern elements, and assumed the twofold form of wild orgies and mystical rites. "The feast of Bacchus" called Dionysia or Bacchanalia (2 Mc. vi. 7), was celebrated, especially in later times, with wild extravagance and licentious enthusiasm. Women, as well as men, joined in the processions, acting the part of Bacchantes, crowned with ivy and bearing the thyrsus. Before the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, 168 B. C., in which "the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Bacchus, carrying ivy," the secret celebration of the Bacchanalia in Italy had been revealed to the Roman senate (B. C. 166), and a decree was passed forbidding its observance in Rome or Italy. To the Jews Bacchus would necessarily appear as the embodiment of paganism in its most revolting shape, sanctioning the most tumultuous passions and the worst excesses. Nicanor is said to have threatened to erect a temple of Bacchus on the site of the Temple at Jerusalem (xiv. 38).

Ba-ee'mor [-see-] (L. fr. Gr.), apparently a captain of horse under Judas Maccabeus (2 Mc. xii. 35).

Bach'rites [bak-] (fr. Heb.), the = the family of BECHER, son of Ephraim (Num. xxvi. 35).

Bad'ger-skins. The Heb. tahash or tachash, which the A. V. renders badger, occurs with the Heb. 'ór, 'óróth (= "skin," "skins"), in Ex. xxv. 5, xxvi. 14, xxxv. 7, 23, xxxvi. 19, xxxix. 34; Num. iv. 6, 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, and without 'ór, 25. In Ez. xvi. 10, it is mentioned as the substance out of which women's shoes were made; in the former passages the skins are named in relation to the tabernacle, ark, &c., and appear to have formed the exterior covering of these sacred articles. There is much obscurity as to the meaning of the Hebrew word; the ancient versions seem nearly all agreed that it denotes not an animal, but a color, either black or sky-blue; but this interpretation has no ground either in its etymology or in the cognate languages. Some versions, as the German of Luther and the A. V., have supposed that it denotes the badger, but the badger is a quadruped not found in the Bible lands. Whatever is the substance indicated by the Hebrew word, it evidently (Ex. xxxv. 28) was some material in frequent use among the Israelites during the Exodus, and the construction of the sentences where the name occurs seems to imply that the skin of some animal and not a color is denoted by it. The Arabian duhash or tuchash denotes a dolphin, but probably is not restricted in its application, but may refer to either a seal or a cetacean. The skin of the dugong, which is a cetacean, allied to the dolphins, from its hardness would be well suited for making soles for shoes, and the Arabs near Cape Mussendum employ the skins of these animals for a similar purpose. The "Dugong of the Red Sea" was named by Professor Rüppell Halcore Tabernaculi, under the impression that it was the animal whose skin was used to cover the tabernacle, &c. Perhaps the animal was a seal, the skin of which would suit all the demands of the Scriptural allusions (so Mr. Houghton), Colonel C. H. Smith (in Kitto), and Mr. P. H. Gosse (in Fairbairn) suppose it some species of antelope, probably of an iron-gray or slate color, and adduce the ceremonial uncleanness of seals and cetaceans (Lev. xi. 10-12) as an argument that their skins would not be used to cover the tabernacle and its holy vessels (compare ver. 31-47). PALESTINE, Zoology.

Bag is the A. V. rendering of several words. 1. Heb. hárútm or chárútm, the "bags" in which Naaman bound up the two talents of silver for Gehazi (2 K. v. 23), probably so called, according to Gesenius, from their long, cone-like shape. The word only occurs besides in Is. iii. 22 (A. V. "crispings-pins"), and there denotes the reticules carried by the Hebrew ladies. 2. Heb. ás, a bag for carrying weights (Deut. xxv. 13; Prov. xvi. 11; Mic. vi. 11), also used as a purse (Prov. i. 14; Is. xli. 6). 3. Heb. clí or clí, translated "bag," in 1 Sam. xvii. 40, 49, is a word of most general meaning, commonly translated "vessel" or "instrument." (FURNITURE 1.) In Gen. xlii. 25, it is the "sack" in which Jacob's sons carried the corn from Egypt, and in 1 Sam. ix. 7, xxi. 5 (Heb. 6), it denotes a bag, or wallet, for carrying food (A. V. "vessel;" compare Jd. x. 5, xiii. 10, 15). The shepherd's "bag" (marg. "vessel," 1 Sam. xvii. 40) of David seems to have been worn by him as necessary to his calling, and was probably (compare Zech. xi. 15, 16, where A. V. "instruments" is the same Hebrew word) for carrying the lambs which were unable to walk or were lost, and contained materials for healing such as were sick, and binding up those that were broken (compare Ez. xxiv. 4, 16); so Mr. W. A. Wright; but see ARMS I. 3; SCRIP. 4. Heb. tešôr, properly a "bundle" (Gen. xlii. 35; 1 Sam. xxv. 29), appears to have been used by travellers for carrying money during a long journey (Prov. vii. 20; Hag. i. 6; compare Lk. xii. 33; Tob. ix. 5). In such "bundles" the priests bound up the money contributed for the restoration of the Temple under Jehoiada (2 K. xii. 10, A. V. "put up in bags"). Job (xiv. 17) represents his sin as sealed up in a "bag," i. e. carefully put up and kept as treasure by the Almighty.—The Gr. péra, translated "bag" in Jd. x. 8, xiii. 10, 15, is translated "SCRIP" in N. T. The Gr. thulakion (= little bag, L. and S.) occurs in the plural in Tob. ix. 5 (A. V. "bags") as used for holding money. The "bag" (Gr. glôssokomon, used for "chest" in LXX. in 2 Chr. xxiv. 8, 10, 11) which Judas carried was probably a small box or chest (Jn. xii. 6, xiii. 29). The Gr. balantion, translated in the plural "bags" (Lk. xii. 33), is elsewhere in the N. T. translated "PURSE," and in the LXX. = tešôr (No. 4 above; Job. xiv. 17), and = cis (No. 2, above; Prov. i. 14).

Bag'o (Gr.) = BIGVAI 1 (1 Esd. viii. 40).

Bag'o-as (Gr. fr. Pers. = eunuch, Pliny; happy, fortunate, Pott; protected by the gods, Oppert, Rln.), the eunuch in attendance upon Holofernes, who had charge of all that he had, and was the first to discover his master's assassination (Jl. xii. 11, 13, 15, xiii. 1, 3, xiv. 14).

Bag'o-l (Gr.) = BIGVAI 1 (1 Esd. v. 14).

Bag-ha-ra'mite (fr. Heb.), the. BAHURIM.

Bag-hu'rim (Heb. young men's village, Ges.), a village, apparently on, or close to the road leading up from the Jordan valley to Jerusalem. Shimei the son of Gera resided here (2 Sam. xvi. 5; 1 K. ii. 8). Here in the court of a house was the well in which Jonathan and Ahimaaz eluded their pursuers (2 Sam. xvii. 18). Here Phaltiel, the husband of Michal, bade farewell to his wife when on her return to King David at Hebron (iii. 16). Bahurim must have been very near the S. boundary of Benjamin, and Dr. Barclay conjectures that the place lay where some ruins still exist close to a Wady Ruwaby, which runs in a straight course for three miles from Olivet directly toward Jordan. AZMAVETH "the Barhumite" (xxiii. 31), or "the Baharumite" (1 Chr. xi. 33), is the only native of Bahurim that we hear of except Shimei.

Bag'ith (fr. Heb. = the house), referring to the "temple" of the false gods of Moab, as opposed to the "high places" (Is. xv. 2; compare xvi. 12).

Bak-bak'kar (Heb., perhaps = wasting of the mountain, Ges.), a Levite, apparently a descendant of Asaph (1 Chr. ix. 15).

Bak-bak (Heb. bottle, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Bak-ba-k'lah (Heb. emptying [i. e. wasting] of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A prominent Levite in Nehemiah's time (Neh. xi. 17, xii. 9).—2. A Levite porter, apparently = No. 1 (xii. 25).

Ba'king. BREAD.

Ba'laam [-lam] (Heb., perhaps = foreigner, stranger, Ges.; lord of the people, Vitringa; destruction of the people, Sim.), the son of Beor, a man endowed with the gift of prophecy (Num. xxii. 5), and occupying a prominent place in O. T. history (xxii.-xxiv., xxi. 8, 16, &c.). He was son of Beor (compare BELA 2), and seems to have lived at Pethor, a city of Mesopotamia (Deut. xxiii. 4). He himself speaks of being "brought from Aram out of the mountains of the E." (Num. xxiii. 7). Balaam is one of those instances in Scripture of persons dwelling among heathens but possessing a certain knowledge of the one true God. He was a poet and a prophet, apparently celebrated for wisdom and sanctity. At this time the Israelites were encamped in the plains of Moab. Balak, the king of Moab, having witnessed the discomfiture of his neighbors, the Amorites, by this people, entered into a league with the Midianites against them, and dispatched messengers to Balaam with the rewards of divination in their hands. (MA-GIC.) When the elders of Moab and Midian told him their message, he seems to have had some misgivings as to the lawfulness of their request, for he invited them to tarry the night with him that he might learn how the Lord would regard it. These misgivings were confirmed by God's express prohibition of his journey. Balaam reported the answer, and the messengers of Balak returned. The king of Moab, however, not deterred by this failure, sent again more and more honorable princes to Balaam. The prophet again refused, but notwithstanding invited the embassy to tarry the night with him, that he might know what the Lord would say unto him further; and thus by his importunity he obtained from God the permission he desired, but was warned at the same time that his actions would be overruled according to the Divine will. Balaam therefore proceeded on his journey with the messengers of Balak. But God's anger was kindled at this manifestation of determined self-will, and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him. "The dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet" (2 Pet. ii. 16). It is evident that Balaam, although acquainted with God, was desirous of throwing an air of mystery round his wisdom, from the instructions he gave Balak to offer a bullock and a ram on the seven altars he everywhere prepared for him. His religion, therefore, was probably the natural result of a general acquaintance with God not confirmed by any covenant. There is an allusion to Balaam in Mic. vi. 5, where Bishop Butler thinks that a conversation is preserved which occurred between him and the king of Moab upon this occasion. But such an opinion is hardly tenable. "The doctrine of Balaam" is spoken of in Rev. ii. 14, where an allusion has been supposed to Nicolas, the founder of the sect of the NICOLAITANS, the two names being probably similar in signification. Balaam's love of the wages of unrighteousness and his licentious counsel are referred to in 2 Pet. ii. 15 and Jude 11; compare Rev. ii. 14. Though the utterance of Balaam was overruled so that he could not curse the children of Israel, he nevertheless suggested to the Moabites the expedient of seducing them to commit fornication. The effect of this is recorded in Num. xxv. A battle was afterward fought against the Midianites, in which Balaam sided with them and was slain by the sword of the people whom he had endeavored to curse (Num. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 22). MESSIAH; PROPHET.

Ba'lae (Rev. ii. 14) = BALAK.

Ba'a-dan (Heb. Bel is his lord, worshipper of Bel, Ges.; having power and riches, Fû.). MERODACH-BALADAN.

Ba'lah (Heb.) = BAAL, geography, 2, b, and BIL-HAH 2 (Josh. xix. 3).

Ba'lak (Heb. empty, vacant, Ges.), son of Zippor, king of the Moabites, at the time when the children of Israel were bringing their journeyings in the wilderness to a close. Balak entered into a league with Midian and hired BALAAM to curse the Israelites; but his designs were frustrated (Num. xxii.-xxiv.). He is mentioned also at Josh. xxiv. 9; Judg. xi. 25; Mic. vi. 5; Rev. ii. 14 ("Balac," A. V.).

Bal'a-mo (fr. Gr.). BAAL, geography, 6.

Balance or Bal'an-ces, is the translation in the A. V. of two Hebrew and two Greek words. 1. Heb. môzênayim, the dual form of which points to the double scales (Lev. xix. 36; Job xxxi. 6, &c.). The balance in this form is found on the Egyptian monuments as early as Joseph's time. The weights used were at first probably stones, and hence "stone" = any weight whatever, though afterward made of lead (Lev. xix. 36; Deut. xxv. 13, 15; Prov. xi. 1, xx. 10, 23; Zech. v. 8). These weights were carried in a BAG. (MONEY).—2. Heb. kâneh, translated "balance" in Is. xlv. 6, generally = a measuring-rod, and it also = the tongue or beam of a balance.—3. Gr. plastigx, originally applied to the scale-pan alone, = "balance" in Wis. xi. 22 (Gr. 23); 2 Mc. ix. 8.—4. Gr. zugos, literally a yoke, is translated "a pair of balances" in Rev. vi. 5, "a balance" in Eccles. xxi. 25, xxviii. 25. This (also the neuter zugon) is used in the LXX. as = No. 1.—The balance is a well-known symbol of strict justice (Job xxxi. 6; Dan. v. 27, &c.); but in Rev. vi. 5, many consider it a symbol of famine (compare ver. 6, and Lev. xxvi. 26). SCALES; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Ba-las'a-mus (fr. Gr.) = MAASEIAH 6 (1 Esd. ix. 43).

Bald'ness. There are two kinds of baldness, viz., artificial and natural. The latter seems to have been uncommon, since it exposed people to public derision, and is perpetually alluded to as a mark of squalor and misery (2 K. ii. 23; Is. iii. 24, "instead of well-set hair, baldness, and burning instead of beauty;" Is. xv. 2; Jer. xlvii. 5; Ez. vii. 18, &c.). For this reason it seems to have been included under the disqualifications for priesthood (Lev. xxi. 20, LXX., Jewish interpretation). In Lev. xiii. 29, &c., very careful directions are given to distinguish "a plague upon the head and beard," from mere natural baldness which is pronounced to be clean, ver. 40. (LEPER.) Artificial baldness marked the conclusion of a Nazarite's vow (Acts xviii. 18; Num. vi. 9, 18), and was a sign of MOURNING. It is often alluded to in Scripture; as in Mic. i. 16; Am. viii. 10, &c.; and in Deut. xiv. 1, 2, the reason for its being forbidden to the Israelites is their being "a holy and peculiar people." (See Lev. xix. 27, and Jer. ix. 26, marg.) The practices alluded to in the latter passages were adopted by heathen nations in honor of various gods. BEARD; HAIR; IDOLATRY.

Balm [bahm] (Heb. tsôri, tsêri) occurs in Gen. xxxvii. 25, as one of the substances which the Ishmaelites were bringing from Gilead to take into Egypt; in Gen. xliii. 11, as one of the presents which Jacob sent to Joseph; in Jer. viii. 22, xlv. 11, li. 8, where it appears that the balm of Gilead had a medicinal value; in Ez. xxvii. 17 (margin, "rosin") as an article of commerce brought by Judah into Tyre. It is impossible to identify it with any certainty. Perhaps it does not refer to an exudation from any particular tree, but was intended to denote any resinous substance which had a medicinal value. If the produce of any particular tree is intended by the word, it was probably either MAS-TICH, or the "Balm of Gilead," also known as balsam of Mecca, or opobalsam. (SPICE 1.) The latter is highly esteemed by the Arabs as a stomachic and as an external remedy for wounds.

Bal-nu'us (fr. Gr.) = BINNUI 2 (1 Esd. ix. 31).

Bal-tha'sar (fr. Gr.) = BELSHAZZAR (Bar. i. 11, 12).

Ba'mah (Heb. high place), appears in its Hebrew form only in one passage (Ez. xx. 29), very obscure, and full of paronomasia: "What is the high-place whereunto ye hie (A. V. "go")? and the name of it is called Bamah (= high place) unto this day." HIGH PLACES.

Ba'moth (Heb. heights, Ges.), a halting-place of the Israelites on their way to Canaan (Num. xxi. 18, 19), situated in the Amorite country N. of the Arnon, between Nahaliel and Pishgah; = BAMOTH-BAAL, and identified with a site marked by stone heaps on Jebel Aulûris (so Knobel).

Ba'moth-Ba'al (Heb. high places of Baal), a sanctuary of Baal in the country of Moab (Josh. xiii. 17); probably = the "high places" in Is. xv. 2, A. V., in the enumeration of the towns of Moab.

Ban (fr. Gr.) = TOBIAH 1 (1 Esd. v. 37).

Ba-nal'as (Gr.) = BENALIAH 8, d (1 Esd. ix. 35).

* Band. ARMY; CHAIN; CHILDREN; CORD; PUNISHMENTS; SHIP; TROOP, &c.

Ba'ni (Heb. built, Ges.). 1. A Gadite, one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 36; MIBHAR).—2. A Levite of the line of Merari, and ancestor of Ethan (1 Chr. vi. 46).—3. A man of Judah of the line of Pharez (ix. 4).—4. "Children (or 'sons') of Bani" returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 10, x. 29, 34; 1 Esd. v. 12); supposed by some to be represented collectively in Neh. x. 14. (BINNUI 4; MANI; MAANI).—5. An Israelite "of the sons of Bani" (Ezr. x. 38; BANNUS).—6. A Levite, father of Rehun (Neh. iii. 17).—7. A Levite in Nehemiah's time (viii. 7; ix. 4, 5; x. 13); possibly = No. 6, if the name is that of a family. (ANTS).—8. Another Levite, of the sons of Asaph (xi. 22).

Ba'nid (Gr. Banias; L. Bania), (1 Esd. viii. 36), represents a name which some suppose has escaped from the present Hebrew text (see Ezr. viii. 10).

* Bank. MONEY-CHANGERS; WAR.

Ban-na'l'a (fr. Gr.) = ZABAD 5 (1 Esd. ix. 33).

Ban'nus (fr. Gr.) = BANI 5, or BINNUI 3 (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Ban'quets [bank'wets], among the Hebrews, were not only a means of social enjoyment, but were a part of the observance of religious festivity. At the three solemn FESTIVALS, when all the males appeared before the Lord, the family also had its domestic feast (Deut. xvi. 11). Probably both males and females went up (1 Sam. i. 9) together, to hold the festival. Sacrifices, both ordinary and extraordinary, as in heathen nations (Ex. xxxiv. 15; Judg. xvi. 23), included a banquet, and Eli's sons made this latter the prominent part. Besides religious celebrations, weaning a son and heir, a MARRIAGE, the separation or reunion of friends, sheep-hearing, &c., were customarily attended by a banquet or revel (Gen. xxi. 8, xxix. 22, xxxi. 27, 54; 1 Sam. xxv. 2, 36; 2 Sam. xiii. 23). Birthday-banquets are mentioned in the cases of Pharaoh and Herod (Gen. xl. 20; Mat. xiv. 6; BIRTHDAYS). The usual time of the banquet was the evening, and to begin early was a mark of excess (Is. v. 11; Eccl. x. 16). The most essential materials of the banqueting-room, next to the viands and wine, which last was often drugged with spices (Prov. ix. 2; Cant. viii. 2), were perfumed ointments, garlands or loose flowers, white or brilliant robes; after these, exhibitions of music, singers, and dancers, riddles, jesting and merriment (Is. xxviii. 1; Wis. ii. 7; 2 Sam. xix. 35; Is. xxv. 6, v. 12; Judg. xiv. 12; Neh. viii. 10; Eccl. x. 19; Am. vi. 5, 6; Mat. xxii. 11; Lk. xv. 25). Seven days was a not uncommon duration of a festival, especially for a wedding, but sometimes fourteen (Gen. xxix. 27; Judg. xiv. 12; Tob. viii. 19); but if the bride were a widow, three days formed the limit. There seems no doubt that the Jews of the O. T. period used a common table for all the guests. In Joseph's entertainment a ceremonial separation prevailed; but the common phrase to "sit at table," or "eat at any one's table," shows the originality of the opposite usage. The posture at table in early times was sitting, and the guests were ranged in order of dignity (Gen. xliii. 33; 1 Sam. ix. 22): the words which imply the recumbent posture belong to the N. T. In religious banquets the wine was mixed, by rabbinical regulation, with three parts of water, and four short forms of benediction were pronounced over it. DRINK, STRONG; FOOD; MEALS; PASSOVER; RECHABITES; WINE.

Ban'-as (1 Esd. v. 26), probably a corruption of Heb. benéy = sons or "children" (of Hodaviah); compare Ezr. ii. 40 and Neh. vii. 43.

Bap'tism (fr. Gr.; see VII. below). I. It is well known that ablution or bathing was common in most ancient nations as a preparation for prayers and sacrifice or as expiatory of sin. There is a natural connection in the mind between the thought of physical and that of spiritual pollution. In warm countries this connection is probably even closer than in colder climates; and hence the frequency of ablution in the religious rites throughout the East.—II. The history of Israel and the Law of Moses abound with such illustrations (Gen. xxxv. 2; Ex. xix. 10; Lev. xiii. xiv., xv., xvi. 26, 28, xvii. 15, xxii. 4, 6; Num. xix.). Before great religious observances such purifications were especially solemn (Jn. xi. 55); and in the later times of the Jewish history there appear to have been public baths and buildings set apart for this purpose, one of which was probably the pool of BETHESDA (v. 2). It was natural that, of all people, the priests most especially should be required to purify themselves in this manner. The consecration of the high-priest was first by baptism, then by unction, and lastly by sacrifice (Ex. xxix. 4, xl. 12; Lev. viii.). The spiritual significance of all these ceremonial washings was well known to the devout Israelite. "I will wash my hands in innocence," says the Psalmist, "and so will I compass thine altar" (Ps. xxvi. 6; compare li. 2, lxxiii. 13). The prophets constantly speak of pardon and conversion from sin under the same figure (Is. i. 16, iv. 4; Jer. iv. 14; Zech. xiii. 1). From the Gospel history we learn that at that time ceremonial washings had been greatly multiplied by traditions of the doctors and elders (Mk. vii. 3, 4), and the testimony of the Evangelist is fully borne out by that of the later writings of the Jews. The most important and probably one of the earliest of these traditional customs was the baptizing of PROSELYTES. There is a universal agreement among later Jewish writers (Talmud, Maimonides, &c.) that all the Israelites were brought into covenant with God by circumcision, baptism, and sacrifice, and that the same ceremonies were necessary in admitting proselytes (so Bishop E. H. Browne, the original author of this article).—III. The Baptism of John.—These usages of the Jews will account for the readiness with which all men flocked to the baptism of John the Baptist. Corresponding with the custom of cleansing by water from legal impurity and with the baptism of proselytes from heathenism to Judaism, it seemed to call upon them to come out from the unbelieving and sinful habits of their age, and to enlist themselves into the company of those who were preparing for the manifestation of the deliverance of Israel. John's baptism appears to have been a kind of transition from the Jewish baptism to the Christian. All ceremonial ablutions under the Law pictured to the eye that inward cleansing of the heart which can come only from the grace of God, and which accompanies forgiveness of sins. So John's baptism was a "baptism of repentance for remission of sins" (Mk. i. 4); it was accompanied with confession (Mat. iii. 6); it was a call to repentance; it conveyed a promise of pardon; and the whole was knit up with faith in Him that should come after, even Christ Jesus (Acts xix. 4). Jesus himself deigned to be baptized with it, and perhaps some of His disciples received no other baptism but John's until they received the special baptism of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost. Yet John himself speaks of it as a mere baptism with water unto repentance, pointing forward to Him who should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Mat. iii. 11). And the distinction between John's baptism and Christian baptism appears in the case of Apollos (Acts xviii. 26–27), and of the disciples at Ephesus (xix. 1–6). We cannot but draw from this history the inference that there was a deeper spiritual significance in Christian baptism than in John's baptism, and that, as John was a greater prophet than any that before him had been born of women, and yet the least in the kingdom of heaven was greater than he (Mat. xi. 11), so his baptism surpassed in spiritual import all Jewish ceremony, but fell equally short of the sacrament ordained by Christ.—IV. The Baptism of Jesus.—Plainly the most important action of John as a baptist was his baptism of Jesus. No doubt it was the will of Christ in the first place, by so submitting to baptism, to set His seal to the teaching and the ministry of John. Again, as He was to be the Head of His Church and the Captain of our salvation, He was pleased to undergo that rite which He afterward enjoined on all His followers. And, once more, His baptism consecrated the baptism of Christians forever; even as afterward His own partaking of the Eucharist gave still further sanction to His injunction that His disciples ever after should continually partake of it. But, beyond all this, His baptism was His formal setting apart for His ministry, and was a most important portion of His consecration to be the High Priest of God. He was just entering on the age of thirty (Lk. iii. 23), the age at which the LEVITES began their ministry and the rabbis their teaching. It has been mentioned (II. above) that the consecration of Aaron to the high-priesthood was by baptism, unction, and sacrifice (Lev. viii.). All these were undergone by Jesus. First, He was baptized by John. Then, just as the high-priest was anointed immediately after his baptism, so when Jesus had gone up out of the water, the heavens were opened unto Him, and the Spirit of God descended upon Him (Mat. iii. 16); and thus "God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power" (Acts x. 38). The sacrifice indeed was not till the end of His earthly ministry, when He offered up the sacrifice of Himself; and then at His resurrection and ascension He fully took upon Him the office of priesthood, entering into the presence of God for us, pleading the efficacy of His sacrifice, and blessing those for whom that sacrifice was offered. Baptism, therefore, was the beginning of consecration; unction was the immediate consequent upon the baptism; and sacrifice was the completion of the initiation, so that He was thenceforth perfected, or fully consecrated as a Priest for evermore (Heb. vii. 28).—V. Baptism of the Disciples of Christ.—Whether our Lord ever baptized has been doubted. The only passage which may distinctly bear on the question is Jn. iv. 1, 2, where it is said "that Jesus made and baptized more disciples than John, though Jesus Himself baptized not, but His disciples." We necessarily infer from it, that, as soon as our Lord began His ministry, and gathered to Him a company of disciples, He, like John the Baptist, admitted into that company by the administration of baptism. The making disciples and the baptizing them went together. After the resurrection, when the Church was to be spread and the Gospel preached, our Lord's own commission conjoins the making of disciples with their baptism (Mat. xxviii. 19; compare Acts ii. 38, viii. 12, 36, 38, ix. 18, x. 47, 48, xvi. 16, 33, &c.). Baptism then was the initiatory rite of the Christian Church, as circumcision was of Judaism. As circumcision admitted to the Jewish covenant—to its privileges and responsibility—so baptism, which succeeded it, was the mode of admission to the Christian covenant, to its graces and privileges, duties and service.—VI. The Types of Baptism.—1. In 1 Pet. iii. 21, the deliverance of Noah in the Deluge is compared to the deliverance of Christians in baptism. The connection in this passage between baptism and "the resurrection of Jesus Christ" may be compared with Col. ii. 12.—2. In 1 Cor. x. 1, 2, the passage of the Red Sea and the shadowing of the miraculous cloud are treated as types of baptism. The passage from the condition of bondmen in Egypt was through the Red Sea and with the protection of the luminous cloud. It is sufficiently apparent how this may resemble the enlisting of a new convert into the body of the Christian Church.—3. Another type of, or rather a rite analogous to, baptism was circumcision (Col. ii. 11). The obvious reason for the comparison is, that circumcision was the entrance to the Jewish Church and the ancient covenant, baptism to the Christian Church and to the new covenant.—4. In more than one instance death is called a baptism (Mat. xx. 23, 23; Mk. x. 38, 39; Lk. xii. 50). It is generally thought that baptism here = an inundation of sorrows, and that our Lord meant to indicate that He Himself had to pass through "the deep waters of affliction." Is it not probable that some deeper significance attaches to the comparison of death, especially of our Lord's death, to baptism, when we consider too that the connection of baptism with the death and resurrection of Christ is so much insisted on by St. Paul?—VII. Names of Baptism.—1. "Baptism" (Gr. baptisma): the Greek baptismos occurs only four times, viz.: Mk. vii. 4, 8; Heb. vi. 2, ix. 10). The Greek verb baptizein (fr. baptein, to dip), is the rendering by the LXX. in 2 K. v. 14 of the Heb. ṭābal = "dip" in A. V. In Dan. iv. 33 (Gr. 30) baptein in the LXX. corresponds to "wet" in A. V. The Latin Fathers render baptizein by tingere (= to wet, moisten, bathe with or in any liquid, Andrews' L. Lex.), mergere (= to dip, dip in, immerse, Andrews' L. Lex.), and mergitare (= to dip in, immerse, Andrews' L. Lex.). By the Greek Fathers, the word baptizein is often used, frequently figuratively, for to immerse or overwhelm with sleep, sorrow, sin, &c. Hence baptisma properly and literally = immersion (so Bishop Browne).<sup>1</sup>—2. "The Water" (A. V. "water") is a name of baptism in Acts x. 47. With this phrase "the water," used of baptism, compare "the breaking of bread" as a title of the Eucharist (Acts ii. 42).—3. "The Washing of Water" (literally "the bath of the water") is another Scriptural term, by which baptism is signified (Eph. v. 26). There appears clearly in these words a reference to the bridal bath (MARRIAGE III.); but the allusion to baptism is clearer still.—4. "The washing of regeneration" (literally "the bath of regeneration") is a phrase (Tit. iii. 5) naturally connected with the foregoing. All ancient and most modern commentators have interpreted it of baptism. There is so much resemblance, both in the phraseology and in the argument, between Tit. iii. 5 and 1 Cor. vi. 11, that the latter ought by all means to be compared with the former. Another passage containing very similar thoughts, clothed in almost the same words, is Acts xxii. 16.—5. "Illumination" (Gr. phōtismos). It has been much questioned whether "enlightened" (Gr. phōtizesthai), in Heb. vi. 4, x. 32, be used of baptism or not. Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, and almost all the Greek Fathers, use phōtismos as = baptism. This use is now very commonly considered entirely ecclesiastical, not Scriptural. But the Greek phōtagōgia (= illumination) was a term for admission into the ancient mysteries. Baptism was without question the initiatory rite in reference to the Christian faith. Now, that Christian faith is more than once called by St. Paul the Christian "mystery" (Eph. i. 9, iii. 4, vi. 19; Col. iv. 3). Hence, as baptism is the initiatory Christian rite, admitting us to the service of God and to the knowledge of Christ, it may not improbably have been called phōtismos, and afterward phōtagōgia, as having reference, and as admitting, to the mystery of the Gospel, and to Christ Himself, who is the Mystery of God (Col. i. 27, ii. 2).—VIII. Other Prominent Texts referring to Baptism.—1. The passage in Jn. iii. 5—"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God"—has been a well-established battle-field from the time of Calvin. Stier quotes with entire approbation the words of Meyer (on Jn. iii. 5):—"Jesus speaks here concerning a spiritual baptism, as in chapter vi. concerning a spiritual feeding; in both places, however, with reference to their visible auxiliary means."—2. The prophecy of John the Baptist, that our Lord should baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Mat. iii. 11), may be interpreted (so Bp. Browne) by a hendiadys. The water of John's baptism could but wash the body; the Holy Ghost with which Christ was to baptize, should purify the soul as with fire. Many commentators, ancient and modern, understand this verse thus: He will either overwhelm (richly furnish) you with all spiritual gifts, or overwhelm with fire unquenchable (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).—3. Gal. iii. 27: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ." The contrast is between the Christian and the Jewish church: one bond, the other free; one infant, the other adult. And the transition-point is naturally that at which by baptism the service of Christ is undertaken and the promises of the Gospel are claimed. This is represented as putting on Christ and in Him assuming the position of full-grown men. In this more privileged condition there is the power of obtaining justification by faith, a justification which the Law had not to offer.—4. 1 Cor. xii. 13: "For by one Spirit (or, in one spirit) we were all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free, and were all made to drink of one Spirit." The resemblance of this passage to the last is very clear. In the old dispensation there was a marked division between Jew and Gentile (GREEK): under the Gospel there is one body in Christ. Possibly there is an allusion to both sacraments. Both our baptism and our partaking of the cup in the communion are tokens and pledges of Christian unity.—5. Rom. vi. 4 and Col. ii. 12, are so closely parallel that we may notice them together. Probably, as in the former passages St. Paul had brought forward baptism as the symbol of Christian unity, so in these he refers to it as the token and pledge of the spiritual death to sin and resurrection to righteousness; and of the final victory over death in the last day, through the power of the resurrection of Christ.

—IX. Recipients of Baptism.—The command to baptize was co-extensive with the command to preach the Gospel. All nations were to be evangelized; and they were to be made disciples, admitted into the fellowship of Christ's religion, by baptism (Mat. xxviii. 19). Whosoever believed the Gospel was to be baptized (Mk. xvi. 16). On this command the apostles acted. Every one who received as truth the teaching of the first preachers of the Gospel, and was willing to enroll himself in the company of the disciples, appears to have been admitted to baptism on a confession of his faith. There is no distinct evidence in the N. T. that there was in those early days a body of catechumens gradually preparing for baptism, such as existed in the ages immediately succeeding the apostles. The great question has been, whether the invitation extended, not to adults only, but to infants also. The universality of the invitation, Christ's declaration concerning the blessedness of infants and their fitness for His kingdom (Mk. x. 14), the admission of infants to circumcision and to the baptism of Jewish proselytes, the mention of whole households, and the subsequent practice of the Church, have been principally relied on by the advocates of infant baptism. The silence of the N. T. concerning the baptism of infants, the constant mention of faith as a pre-requisite or condition of baptism, the great spiritual blessings which seem attached to a right reception of it, and the responsibility entailed on those who have taken its obligations on themselves, seem the chief objections urged against pædo-baptism. But here we must leave ground which has been so extensively occupied by controversialists.—X. The Mode of Baptism.—The language of the N. T. and of the primitive Fathers sufficiently points to immersion as the common mode of baptism. But in the case of the family of the jailer at Philippi (Acts xvi. 33), and of the 3,000 converted at Pentecost (Acts ii.), it seems hardly likely that immersion should have been possible. Moreover the ancient Church, which mostly adopted immersion, was satisfied with affusion in case of clinical baptism—the baptism of the sick and dying.

—Questions and Answers.—In the early times of the Christian Church we find the catechumens required to renounce the devil and to profess their faith in the Holy Trinity and in the principal articles of the Creed. It is supposed by many that St. Peter (1 Pet. iii. 21) refers to a custom of this kind as existing from the first (compare 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim.

i. 13).—XI. The Formula of Baptism.—It would seem from our Lord's own direction (Mat. xxviii. 19) that the words made use of in the administration of baptism should be those generally retained: "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—The expressions in Acts ii. 38, viii. 16, x. 48, xix. 5—"in the name of Jesus Christ," "of the Lord Jesus," "of the Lord"—mean only that those who were baptized with Christian baptism were baptized into the faith of Christ, not that the form of words was different from that enjoined in Matthew.—Sponsors.—There is no mention of sponsors in the N. T. In very early ages of the Church sponsors were in use both for children and adults.—XII. Baptism for the Dead.—1 Cor. xv. 29. "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? Why are they then baptized for the dead?" 1. Tertullian tells us of a custom of vicarious baptism as existing among the Marcionites; and Chrysostom relates of the same heretics, that, when one of their catechumens died without baptism, they used to put a living person under the dead man's bed, and asked whether he desired to be baptized; the living man answering that he did, they then baptized him in place of the departed. Epiphanius relates a similar custom among the Cerinthians, which, he said, prevailed from fear that in the resurrection those should suffer punishment who had not been baptized. The question naturally occurs, Did St. Paul allude to a custom of this kind, which even in his days had begun to prevail among heretics and ignorant persons? If so, he no doubt adduced it as an argumentum ad hominem (i. e. an argument founded on principles, right or wrong, which the reader admitted). "If the dead rise not at all, what benefit do they expect who baptize vicariously for the dead?" Perhaps the greater number of modern commentators have adopted this, as the simplest and most rational sense of the apostle's words. It is, however, equally conceivable that the passage in St. Paul gave rise to the subsequent practice among the Marcionites and Cerinthians. 2. Chrysostom (and so Tertullian, Theodoret, &c.) believes the apostle to refer to the profession of faith in baptism, part of which was "I believe in the resurrection of the dead." Robinson (N. T. Lex.) explains "baptized for the dead" as = baptized on account of the dead, i. e. into a belief of the resurrection of the dead; but says some explain it as = baptized (overwhelmed) with calamities for the dead, i. e. exposed to great suffering in the hope of a resurrection. —3. "What shall they do, who are baptized when death is close at hand?" (Epiphanius.)—4. "Over the graves of the martyrs." Vossius adopted this interpretation; but it is very unlikely that the custom prevailed in the days of St. Paul.—5. "On account of a dead Saviour."—6. "What shall they gain, who are baptized for the sake of the dead in Christ?"—7. "What shall they do, who are baptized in the place of the dead?" i. e. who, as the ranks of the faithful are thinned by death, come forward to be baptized, that they may fill up the company of believers (Le Clerc, Döderlein, Olshausen, Fairbairn, &c.).

• Baptist. JOHN THE BAPTIST.

Bar-ab-bas (Gr. fr. Aram.; = son of ABBA, Sim., or son of the father, Rbn.), a robber, who had committed murder in an insurrection in Jerusalem, and was lying in prison at the time of the trial of Jesus before Pilate. He instead of Jesus was released by Pilate at the request of the Jewish multitude (Mat. xxvii. 16-26; Mk. xv. 7-15; Lk. xxiii. 18-25; Ju.

xviii. 40). His name in Mat. xxvii. 16, 17, according to many of the cursive, or later, MSS., was Jesus Barabbas. THIEVES, THE TWO.

Bar-a-chel [-kel] (Heb. whom God hath blessed, Ges.), "the Buzite," father of ELIHU 1 (Job xxxiii. 2, 6). Buz 1.

* Bar-a-chlah, in some editions for BERECHIAH (Zech. i. 1, 7).

Bar-a-chias (Gr.) = BARACHIAH OR BERECHIAH (Mat. xxiii. 35). ZACHARIAS.

Bar'ak (Heb. lightning), son of Abinoam of Kedesh-naphtali (KEDESH 3), incited by DEBORAH 2 to deliver Israel from the yoke of JABIN (Judg. iv. 6 ff.; Heb. xi. 32). Accompanied, at his express desire, by DEBORAH, Barak led his rudely-armed force of 10,000 men from Naphtali and Zebulun to an encampment on the summit of Tabor, and utterly routed the unwieldy host of the Canaanites in the plain of Jezreel (Esdraelon), "the battle-field of Palestine." The victory was decisive, Harosheth taken (Judg. iv. 16), SISERA murdered, and Jabin ruined. The victors composed a splendid ode in commemoration of their deliverance (v.). Lord A. C. Hervey supposes the narrative to be a repetition of Josh. xi. 1-12, but there are geographical and other difficulties in the way. Compare Josh. xi. 7-9 with Judg. iv. 6, 7, 12-16 and v. 18-21.

Bar-bar'ian (fr. Gr.). "Every one not a Greek is a barbarian" is the common Greek definition, and in this strict sense the word is used in Romans i. 14, "I am debtor both to Greeks and barbarians." "Greeks and barbarians" is the constant division found in Greek literature, but Thucydides points out that this distinction is subsequent to Homer. It often retains this primitive meaning, as in 1 Cor. xiv. 11 (of one using an unknown tongue), and Acts xxviii. 2 ("barbarous people," A. V.), 4 (of the Maltese, who spoke a Punic dialect). The ancient Egyptians, like the modern Chinese, had an analogous word (Hdt. ii. 158). So completely was the term "barbarian" accepted, that even Josephus and Philo scruple as little to reckon the Jews among them, as the early Romans did to apply the term to themselves. Afterward only the savage nations were called barbarians. Compare GENTILES; HEATHEN.

* Bar'ber. HANDICRAFT; RAZOR.

Bar-bu'mite (fr. Heb.), the. BAHURIM.

Bar-ri'ah (Heb. fugitive, Ges.), a son of Shemaiah, a descendant of the royal family of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 22).

Bar-Je'sus (fr. Heb. = son of [Jesus, or] Joshua). ELYMAS.

Bar-Jo'na (fr. Heb. or Aram. = son of Jonas or of Jonah, Rbn. N. T. Lex., &c.; others make it = son of Joanna or of Johanan). PETER.

Bar'kes (Heb. painter, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 53; Neh. vii. 55).

Bar'ley (Heb. se'ôrâh), the well-known cereal, often mentioned in the Bible. It was grown by the Hebrews (Lev. xxvii. 16; Deut. viii. 8; Ru. ii. 17; 2 Chr. ii. 10, 15, &c.), who used it for baking into bread, chiefly amongst the poor (Judg. vii. 13; 2 K. iv. 42; Jn. vi. 9, 13): for making into bread by mixing it with wheat, beans, lentils, millet, &c. (Ez. iv. 9); for making into cakes (12); and as fodder for horses (1 K. iv. 28). The barley harvest is mentioned Ru. i. 22, ii. 23; 2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10. It takes place in Palestine in March and April, and in the hilly districts as late as May; but the period of course varies according to the localities. The barley harvest always precedes the wheat harvest, in some places by a week, in others by fully three weeks (Rbn. i. 430, 551). In Egypt the barley is about a month earlier than the wheat, whence its total destruction by the hail-storm (Ex. ix. 31). Barley was sown at any time between November and March, according to the season. Barley bread is even to this day little esteemed in Palestine. This fact elucidates some passages in Scripture. Why, e. g., was barley meal, and not the ordinary meal-offering of wheat flour, to be the jealousy-offering (Num. v. 15)? Because thereby is denoted the low reputation in which the implicated parties were held. The homer and a half of barley, as part of the purchase-money of the adulteress (Hos. iii. 2), has doubtless a similar typical meaning. With this circumstance in remembrance, how forcible is the expression (Ez. xiii. 19), "Will ye pollute me among my people for handfuls of barley?" The knowledge of this fact aids to point out the connection between Gideon and the barley-cake, in the dream which the "man told to his fellow" (Judg. vii. 13). Gideon's "family was poor in Manasse—and he was the least in his father's house;" and doubtless the Midianites knew it. "If the Midianites were accustomed in their extemporaneous songs to call Gideon and his band 'eaters of barley bread,' as their successors the haughty Bedawin often do to ridicule their enemies, the application would be all the more natural" (Thn. ii. 166). AGRICULTURE; BREAD; FOOD.

* Barn. The words "barn," "garner," "storehouse," appear to be used indiscriminately in the A. V. to represent a number of Hebrew and Greek words. 1. Heb. gôren, usually translated "threshing-floor," is translated "barn" in Job xxxix. 12, and "barn-floor" in 2 K. vi. 27.—2. Heb. mêgûrâh is translated "barn" (Hag. ii. 19).—3. Heb. plural ôsânim is translated "storehouses" in Deut. xxviii. 8, and "barns" in the margin and in Prov. iii. 10.—4. Heb. plural mamgûrâh is translated "barns" (Joel i. 17).—5. Heb. ôsâr, usually translated "treasure" or "treasury" is in the plural translated "storehouses" (1 Chr. xxvii. 25, &c.), and "garners" (Joel i. 17).—6. Heb. mezcv is in the plural translated "garners" (Ps. cxliv. 13).—7. Heb. maâ-bûis is in the plural translated "storehouses" (Jer. l. 26).—8. Heb. plural miscôdh or miscênôdh (2 Chr. xxxii. 28) is translated "storehouses".—9. Gr. apolhékê is translated "barn" (Mat. vi. 26, xiii. 30; Lk. xii. 18, 24) and "garner" (Mat. iii. 12; Lk. iii. 17); in LXX. = No. 7, above.—10. Gr. tameion is translated "storehouse" (Ecclus. xxix. 12; Lk. xii. 24), and in LXX. = No. 3 above.—Barns for storing HAY are unknown in the East, but buildings, chambers, cells, &c., for storing wheat and other produce, often under ground, are common. Domestic animals are often sheltered in the same room or enclosure with their master. AGRICULTURE; FOOD; GRASS; HOUSE; INN; MANGER; OX; STRAW, &c.

Bar'na-bas (Gr. fr. Heb. = son of prophecy, or of exhortation, or, but less probably, of consolation, as A. V.), a name given by the apostles (Acts iv. 36) to JESUS, a Levite of the island of Cyprus, who was early a disciple of Christ. He introduced (ix. 27) the newly-converted Saul to the apostles at Jerusalem, in a way which seems to imply previous acquaintance between the two. On tidings coming to the church at Jerusalem that men of Cyprus and Cyrene had been preaching to Gentiles at Antioch, Barnabas was sent thither (xi. 19-26), and went to Tarsus to seek Saul, as one specially raised up to preach to the Gentiles (xxvi. 17). Having brought Saul to Antioch, he was sent with him to Jerusalem with relief for the brethren in Judea (xi. 30). On their return to Antioch, they (xiii. 2) were solemnly set apart by the church for the missionary work, and sent forth (A. D. 45). From this time Barnabas and Paul enjoy the title and dignity of apostles (xiv. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 6; APOSTLE). Their first missionary journey (Acts xiii., xiv.) was confined to Cyprus and Asia Minor. After their return to Antioch (A. D. 47 or 48), they were sent (A. D. 50), with some others, to Jerusalem, to determine with the apostles and elders the difficult question respecting the necessity of circumcision for the Gentile converts (xv.; Gal. ii.). On that occasion Paul and Barnabas were recognized as the apostles of the uncircumcision. After another stay in Antioch on their return, a variance took place between Barnabas and Paul on the question of taking with them, on a second missionary journey, John Mark, sister's son to Barnabas (Acts xv. 36, ff.). "The contention was so sharp, that they parted asunder," and Barnabas took Mark and sailed to Cyprus, his native island. He is mentioned afterward only in 1 Cor. ix. 6; Gal. ii. 1, 9, 13; Col. iv. 10. As to his further labors and death, traditions differ. Some say that he went to Milan, and became first bishop of the church there. There is extant an apocryphal work, probably of the fifth century, Acta et Passio Barnabae in Cypro; and a still later encomium of Barnabas by a Cyprian monk Alexander. We have an epistle in twenty-one chapters called by the name of Barnabas. Its authenticity has been defended by some great writers; but it is very generally given up now, and the epistle is believed to have been written early in the second century (so Dr. Alford).

Bar-rôdis (Gr.), a name inserted among those "servants of Solomon" whose "sons" returned with Zerobabel (1 Esd. v. 34); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

* Bar-ren-ness. CHILDREN; PALESTINE.

Bar'sa-bas (fr. Heb. = son of Sabas or of Suba). JOSEPH BARSABAS; JUDAS BARSABAS.

Bar'ta-us (fr. Gr.), father of Apame, the concubine of King Darius (1 Esd. iv. 29). "The admirable" was probably an official title belonging to his rank.

Bar-thol'o-mew (Gr. Bartholomaios; L. Bartholomæus; fr. Heb. = son of Talmi or of Tolmai), one of the twelve apostles of Christ (Mat. x. 3; Mk. iii. 18; Lk. vi. 14; Acts i. 13); probably = NATHANAEL 1. If this may be assumed, he was born at Cana, of Galilee; and is said to have preached the Gospel in India, i. e. probably Arabia Felix. Some allot Armenia to him as his mission field, and report him to have been there flayed alive and then crucified with his head downward.

Bar-ti-mæ-us (L.) = BARTIMEUS.

Bar-ti-mæ-us (L. Bartimeus; fr. Heb. = son of TIMEUS, or Timai), a blind beggar of Jericho who (Mk. x. 46 ff.) sat by the wayside begging as our Lord was passing, and was miraculously healed by Him of his blindness. Mark may be reconciled with Mat. xx. 29 ff. and Lk. xviii. 35 ff., in several ways. Some suppose our Lord remained several days in Jericho, and healed Bartimeus while returning from an excursion out of the city; others translate in Lk. xviii. 35 "was nigh" instead of "was come nigh," and consider Lk. xix. 1, a mere passing announcement not defining the time of the miracle as previous or of the visit to Zaccheus as subsequent to his entering and passing through Jericho; others still suppose Bartimeus cried out to Jesus as He was entering the city and again as He was leaving it, and was healed perhaps a day or more after his first outcry upon a second more importunate one, &c. The mention of Bartimeus or of one beggar in Matthew and Mark is, of course, not inconsistent with the mention of two in Luke; the second may have been less prominent, or even absent altogether at the first outcry. JESUS CHRIST.

Ba'ruch [-ruk] (Heb. blessed = Benedict). 1. Son of Neriah, the friend (Jer. xxxii. 12), amanuensis (xxxvi. 4-32), and faithful attendant of JEREMIAH (xxxvi. 10 ff.) in the discharge of his prophetic office. He was of a noble family (compare Jer. li. 59; Bar. i. 1), and of distinguished acquirements; and his brother Seraiah was a court officer of Zedekiah. His enemies accused him of influencing Jeremiah in favor of the Chaldeans (Jer. xliii. 3; compare xxxvii. 13); and he was thrown into prison with that prophet, where he remained till the capture of Jerusalem, B. C. 586. By the permission of Nebuchadnezzar he remained with Jeremiah at Mizpeh (Jos. x. 9, § 1); but was afterward forced to go down to Egypt (Jer. xliii. 6). According to one tradition he went after Jeremiah's death to Babylon, and died there; according to another (Jerome) Baruch and Jeremiah both died in Egypt.—2. Son of Zabbai; an earnest laborer with Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 20).—3. A priest, or family of priests, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 6).—4. Son of Col-hozel, a descendant of Judah through Perez, or Pharez (xi. 5).

Ba'ruch, the Book of, is remarkable as the only book in the APOCRYPHA which is formed on the model of the prophets; and though wanting in originality, it presents a vivid reflection of the ancient prophetic fire. It may be divided into two main parts, (1.) i.-iii. 8, and (2.) iii. 9-end. The first consists of an introduction (i. 1-14), followed by a confession and prayer (i. 15-iii. 8). The second opens with an abrupt address to Israel (iii. 9-iv. 30), pointing out their sin in neglecting the divine teaching of Wisdom (iii. 9-iv. 8), and introducing a noble lament of Jerusalem over her children, through which hope still gleams (iv. 9-30); afterward the writer addresses Jerusalem in words of triumphant joy, and paints in glowing colors the return of God's chosen people and their abiding glory (iv. 30-v. 9).—1. The book at present exists in Greek, and in several translations made from the Greek. Of the two Old Latin versions which remain, that which is incorporated in the Vulgate is generally literal; the other is more free. The vulgar Syriac and Arabic follow the Greek text closely.—2. The assumed author is undoubtedly the companion of Jeremiah, but the details of the book are inconsistent with the assumption. It exhibits not only historical inaccuracies, but also evident traces of a later date than the beginning of the Captivity (iii. 9 ff., iv. 22 ff.; i. 3 ff.; compare 2 K. xxv. 27).—3. The book was held in little esteem among the Jews; though it is stated in the Greek text of the Apostolical Constitutions that it was read, together with the Lamentations, "on the tenth day of the month Gorpiazus" (i. e. the Day of Atonement). From the time of Irenæus it was frequently quoted both in the East and in the West, and generally as the work of Jeremiah. It was, however, "obelized" throughout in the LXX. as deficient in the Hebrew. At the Council of Trent it was admitted into the Roman Catholic canon; but the Protestant churches have unanimously placed it among the Apocryphal books.—4. Considerable discussion has been raised as to the original language of the book. Those who advocated its authenticity generally supposed that it was first written in Hebrew. Others again have maintained that the Greek is the original text. The truth appears to lie between these extremes. The two divisions of the book are distinguished by marked peculiarities of style and language. The Hebraic character of the first part is such as to mark it as a translation and not as a work of a Hebraizing Greek. The second part, on the other hand, closely approaches the Alexandrine type. (ALEXANDRIA.)—5. The most probable explanation of this contrast is gained by supposing that some one thoroughly conversant with the Alexandrine translation of Jeremiah found the Hebrew fragment which forms the basis of the book already attached to the writings of that prophet, and wrought it up into its present form.—6. There are no certain data by which to fix the time of the composition. The Hebrew portion may be assigned to the close of the Persian period (4th cent. B. C.); but the present book must be placed considerably later, probably about the time of the war of liberation (B. C. 160), or somewhat earlier.—7. The Epistle of Jeremiah, which, according to the authority of some Greek MSS., stands in the A. V. as the sixth chapter of Baruch, is the work of a later period. It may be assigned probably to the first century B. C.—8. A Syriac first Epistle of Baruch “to the nine and a half tribes” is found in the London and Paris Polyglots. Fritzsche considers it to be the production of a Syrian monk.

Barze-lai (1 Esd. v. 38, marg.). ADDUS 2; BARZILLAI 1, 2.

Bar-zil'-ai or Bar-zil'-lal [Heb. iron]. 1. A wealthy Gileadite who showed hospitality to David when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 27; 1 K. ii. 7). On the score of his age, and probably from a feeling of independence, he declined the king's offer of ending his days at court (2 Sam. xix. 31-39).—2. The husband of a daughter of No. 1, whose descendants were unable, after the captivity, to prove their priestly genealogy (Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63). (ADDUS; ATGIA.)—3. A Meholahite, whose son Adriel married Michal, Saul's daughter (2 Sam. xxi. 8).

Ba'sa-loth (1 Esd. v. 31) = BAZLITH.

Ba'sa-ma (L. fr. Gr.), a place in Gilead where Jonathan Maccabeus was killed by Tryphon (1 Mc. xiii. 23); site unknown.

Bashan (Heb. light sandy soil, Ger.; basalt-land, Fil.), an extensive district, embracing all the N. part of the land possessed by the Israelites on the E. of Jordan. It is sometimes spoken of as “the land of Bashan” (1 Chr. v. 11; compare Num. xxi. 33, xxxii. 33), and sometimes as “all Bashan” (Deut. iii. 10, 13; Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 11, 30), but most commonly as “Bashan” simply. It was taken by the children of Israel after their conquest of the land of Sihon from Arnon to Jabbok. They “turned” from their road over Jordan and “went up by the way of Bashan” to EDELE. Here they encountered Og, king of Bashan, who “came out,” probably from the natural fastnesses of Argob, only to meet the entire destruction of himself, his sons, and all his people (Num. xxi. 33-35; Deut. iii. 1-3). The limits of Bashan are very strictly defined. It extended from the “border of Gilead” on the S. to Mount Hermon on the N. (Deut. iii. 3, 10, 14; Josh. xii. 5; 1 Chr. v. 23), and from the Jordan valley on the W. to Salchah and the border of the Geshurites, and the Maachathites on the E. (Josh. xii. 3-5; Deut. iii. 10). This important district was bestowed on the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 29-31), together with “half GILEAD.” It is named in the list of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 13). It was devastated by Hazael in the reign of Jehu (2 K. x. 33). It was famous for its oaks (Is. ii. 13; Ez. xxvii. 6; Zech. xi. 2) and rich pasture lands and superior cattle (Ps. xxii. 12; Jer. l. 19; Ez. xxxix. 18, &c.). Stanley (114, n.) supposes “the hill (literally “mount”) of Bashan” in Ps. lxxviii. 15 = Antilibanus, of which Mount Hermon is the highest part. After the Captivity, Bashan was divided into four provinces—Gaulanitis (GOLAN), Auranitis (HAURAN), Trachonitis (ARGOB), and Batanæa, or Ard-el-Bathanyeh, which lies E. of the Lejah and N. of the range of Jebel Hauran or ed-Druze.

Ba'shan-ha'voth-Ja'ir (fr. Heb. = Bashan of the villages of Jair), a name given to Argob after its conquest by Jair (Deut. iii. 14). HAVOTH-JAIR.

Bash e-math (fr. Heb. = fragrant), daughter of Ishmael, and the third of Esau's three wives (Gen. xxxvi. 3, 4, 13), from whose son, Reuel, four tribes of the Edomites were descended. When first mentioned she is called MAHALATH (xxviii. 9); whilst, on the other hand, the name Bashemath is in the narrative (xxvi. 34) given to another of Esau's wives, the daughter of Elon the Hittite. (ADAH 2.) The Samaritan text seeks to remove this difficulty by reading Mahalath instead of Bashemath in the genealogy. We might with more probability suppose that this name (Bashemath) has been assigned to the wrong person in one or other of the passages; but if so it is impossible to determine which is erroneous. ANO-IBAMAH.

Ba'sin. Four Hebrew words (mizrák, aggán, céphór or cphór [see FROST 3], saph), and one Greek word (niptér) are translated “basin,” “basins,” in the A. V.; but between the “basin,” “BOWL,” “CHARGER,” “CUP,” “DISH,” “GOBLLET,” it is scarcely possible now to ascertain the precise distinction. Their form and material can only be conjectured from the analogy of ancient Assyrian and Egyptian specimens of works of the same kind, and from modern Oriental vessels for culinary or domestic purposes. Among the smaller vessels for the Tabernacle or Temple service, many must have been required to receive from the sacrificial victims the blood to be sprinkled for purification. Moses, on the occasion of the great ceremony of purification in the wilderness, put half the blood in “the basins,” or bowls, and afterward sprinkled it on the people (Ex. xxiv. 6, 8). Among the vessels cast in metal, whether gold, silver, or brass, by Hiram, for Solomon, besides the laver and great sea, mention is made of basins, bowls, and cups. Of the first (margin, bowls) he is said to have made one hundred (2 Chr. iv. 8, 11, 22; 1 K. vii. 40, 45, 46, 50; compare Ex. xxv. 29 and 1 Chr. xxviii. 14, 17). The “basin” from which our Lord washed the disciples' feet (Gr. niptér, Jn. xiii. 5), was probably deeper and larger than the hand-basin for sprinkling. WASHING THE HANDS AND FEET.

Bas'ket. The five following Hebrew terms = “basket,” “baskets,” in the A. V.: (1.) Sal, so called from the twigs of which it was originally made, specially used for holding bread (Gen. xl. 16 ff.; Ex. xxix. 3, 23; Lev. viii. 2, 26, 31; Num. vi. 15, 17, 19). The form of the Egyptian bread-basket is delineated in Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, iii. 226, after the specimens represented in the tomb of Rameses III. These were of gold, and hence the term sal must have passed from its strict etymological meaning to any vessel applied to the purpose. In Judg. vi. 19, meat is served up in a sal, which could hardly have been of wickerwork. The "white baskets" (Gen. xl. 16) are supposed to be baskets of white (peeled) twigs (so Rashi), or baskets of white bread (Ges.), or baskets "full of holes" (marg.), i. e. open-work baskets. (2.) Salsillôth, a word of kindred origin, applied to the basket used in gathering grapes (Jer. vi. 9). (3.) Tene, in which the first-fruits of the harvest were presented (Deut. xxvi. 2, 4). From its being coupled with the kneading-bowl (A. V. "store," Deut. xxviii. 5, 17), we may infer that it was also used for household purposes, perhaps to bring the corn to the mill. (4.) Celûb or clûb, so called from its similarity to a bird-cage or trap, probably in regard to its having a lid: it was used for carrying fruit (Am. viii. 1, 2). CAGE. (5.) Dûd, used for carrying fruit (Jer. xxiv. 1, 2), as well as on a larger scale for carrying clay to the brick-yard (Ps. lxxxi. 6; "pots," A. V.), or for holding bulky articles (2 K. x. 7).—In the N. T. the three Greek terms, kophinos, spuris, sarganê = "basket." The last occurs only in 2 Cor. xi. 33, in describing St. Paul's escape from Damascus, for which Acts ix. 25 uses the second. The first is exclusively used in the description of the miracle of feeding the five thousand (Mat. xiv. 20, xvi. 9; Mk. vi. 43; Lk. ix. 17; Jn. vi. 13); the second is used in that of the four thousand (Mat. xv. 37; Mk. viii. 8): the distinction between these is most definitely brought out in Mat. xvi. 9, 10 and Mk. viii. 19, 20. HANDICRAFT.

Bas'math (Heb. fragrant), daughter of Solomon, married to his commissary, Ahimaaz (1 K. iv. 15).

* Bas'on = BASIN.

Bas'sa (Gr.) = BEZAI (1 Esd. v. 16).

Bas'tai (fr. Gr.) = BESAI (1 Esd. v. 31).

Bastard. Among those who were excluded from entering the congregation, even to the tenth generation, was the one called in Heb. manzêr (A. V. "bastard"), who was classed in this respect with the Ammonite and Moabite (Deut. xxiii. 2). The term is not, however, applied indefinitely to any illegitimate offspring, but, according to the rabbins, to one born of relations between whom marriage is forbidden, or one whose parents are liable to the punishment of "cutting off" by the hands of Heaven, or one whose parents are liable to death by the house of judgment, as, e. g. the offspring of adultery. The ancient versions (LXX., Vulgate, Syriac) add another class, the children of a harlot, and in this sense the term manzer or manzer survived in the Latin Pontifical law. The child of a non-Israelite and a manzêr was also reckoned by the Talmudists as a manzêr, as was the issue of a slave and a manzêr, and of a manzêr and female proselyte. The term also occurs in Zech. ix. 8, "a bastard shall dwell in Ashdod," where it seems to denote a foreign race of mixed and spurious birth. Dr. Geiger infers from this passage that manzêr specially signifies the issue of such marriages between the Jews and the women of Ashdod as are alluded to in Neh. xiii. 23, 24, and applies it exclusively to the Philistine bastard.—"Bastards" (Gr. nothoi) in Heb. xii. 8, figuratively = those whom God regards as not His true children or people.

Bat (Heb. 'âlallêph; Gr. nukteris). There is no doubt that the A. V. is correct in its rendering of these words. In the A. V. of Lev. xi. 19, and Deut.

Bat.—(Tuphous perforatus.)

xiv. 18, the "bat" closes the lists of "fowls that shall not be eaten;" but it must be remembered that the ancients considered the bat to partake of the nature of a bird, and the Heb. ôph translated "fowls" (literally = a wing) might be applied to any winged creature (compare Lev. xi. 20). Besides the passages cited above, the bat is mentioned in Is. ii. 20: "In that day a man shall cast his idols . . . to the moles and to the bats;" and in Bar. vi. 22, in the passage that so graphically sets forth the vanity of Babylonish idols: "Their faces are blacked through the smoke that cometh out of the temple. Upon their bodies and heads sit bats, swallows, and birds, and the cats also." Many travellers have noticed the immense numbers of bats found in caverns in the East, and Layard says that on the occasion of a visit to a cavern these noisome beasts compelled him to retreat.

Bath, Bathing. This was a prescribed part of the Hebrew ritual of purification in cases of accidental, leprous, or ordinary uncleanness (Lev. xv., xvi. 26, 28, xvii. 15, 16, xxii. 6; Num. xix. 7, 8, 19; 2 Sam. xi. 2, 4; 2 K. v. 10); as also after mourning, which always implied defilement (Ru. iii. 3; 2 Sam. xii. 20; WASHING). The high-priest at his inauguration (Lev. viii. 6) and on the day of atonement, once before each solemn act of propitiation (xvi. 4, 24), was also to bathe. A bathing-chamber was probably included in houses even of no great rank in cities from early times (2 Sam. xi. 2); much more in those of the wealthy in later times; often in gardens (Sus. 15). With bathing, ANOINTING was customarily joined; the climate making both these essential alike to health and pleasure, to which luxury added the use of perfumes (Sus. 17; Jd. x. 3; Esth. ii. 12). The "pools," such as that of Siloam, and Hezekiah (Neh. iii. 15, 16; 2 K. xx. 20; Is. xxii. 11; Jn. ix. 7), often sheltered by porticoes (Jn. v. 2), are the first indications we have of public bathing accommodation.

Bath (Heb.). WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

bon (Cant. vii. 4, 5 Heb.). The "Gate of Bath-rabbim" at Heshbon would, according to the Oriental custom, be the gate pointing to a town of that name. The only place in this neighborhood at all resembling Bath-rabbim in sound is Rabbah. Future investigations may settle this point.

Bath-she'ba (Heb. daughter of the oath, or daughter of seven, sc. years, Ges.; 2 Sam. xi. 3, &c.; also called Bath-shua in 1 Chr. iii. 5), the daughter of ELIAM (2 Sam. xi. 3), or Ammiel (1 Chr. iii. 5), and wife of URIAH the Hittite. The child which was the fruit of her adulterous intercourse with DAVID died; but after marriage she became the mother of four sons, Solomon, Shimea, Shobab, and Nathan. When Adonijah attempted to set aside in his own favor the succession promised to Solomon, Bath-she'ba was employed by Nathan to inform the king of the conspiracy (1 K. i. 11-31). After the accession of Solomon, she, as queen-mother (MOTHER; QUEEN), requested permission of her son for Adonijah to take in marriage Abishag the Shunamite (1 K. ii. 13-22).—Jewish tradition ascribes Prov. xxxi. to Bath-she'ba. LEMUEL.

Bath-zach-a-ri'as (fr. Heb. = house of Zechariah), a place, named only in 1 Mc. vi. 32, 33, to which Judas Maccabeus marched from Jerusalem, and where he encamped for the relief of Bethsura. (BETH-ZUR.) The two places were seventy stadia apart, and the approaches to Bath-zacharias were intricate and confined. This description is met in every respect by the modern Beit Sakarieh, about eight English miles N. of Beit Sur, the ancient Bethzur (Rbn. iii. 283, 284).

* Bat'ter-ing-Ram. RAM, BATTERING.

* Bat'tle. ARMS; ARMY; WAR.

* Bat'tle-axe. Jer. li. 20. AXE; MAUL.

* Bat'tle-ments. FENCED CITY; HOUSE.

* Batus (Gr. batos, fr. Heb. bath). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, at end.

Ba'vai or Ba'a-i (fr. Pers. = BEBAI, Ges.), son of Henadad; ruler of the district of Keilah (HALF-PART) in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 18).

* Bay. COLORS.

Bay-tree (Heb. ezrah or ezrach). Most of the Jewish doctors understand by this Hebrew word in Ps. xxxvii. 35 (instead of "bay-tree," A. V., which is a species of laurel, Laurus nobilis) "a tree which grows in its own soil"—one that has never been transplanted, and is consequently flourishing and vigorous; which is the interpretation given in the margin of the A. V. The Hebrew word literally = "a native," in contradistinction to "a stranger," or "a foreigner."

Baz'lith (fr. Heb. = a stripping, nakedness, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 54); = BAZLUTH (Ezr. ii. 52), and BASALOTH (1 Esd. v. 31).

Baz'luth (fr. Heb.) = BAZLITH.

Bdell'ium [del'yum] (Heb. bdôlah or bdôlach), a precious substance, the name of which occurs in Gen. ii. 12, with "gold" and "onyx stone," as one of the productions of the land of Havilah, and in Num. xi. 7, where numma is in color compared to bdellium. It is impossible to say whether the Hebrew word denotes a mineral, or an animal production, or a vegetable exudation. Bochart, Gesenius, &c., make it = "pearls," but the balance of probabilities seems to favor the translation of the A. V. (so Mr. Houghton, with Josephus, Aquila, Celsius, Sprengel, &c.). Bdellium is an odoriferous exudation from a tree which is (so Kaempfer) the Borassus flabelliformis, Linnæus, of Arabia Felix.

Be-a-l'ah (Heb. whose lord [BAAL] is Jehovah, Ges.), a Benjamite, who went over to David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5).

Be'a-loth (Heb. pl. fem. of BAAL), 2 town in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 24). ALOTH; TELEM.

Be'an, Child'ren of, a tribe, apparently of predatory Bedouin habits, destroyed by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. v. 4). The name perhaps = BEON.

Beans (Heb. pól; 2 Sam. xvii. 28; Ez. iv. 9). Beans are cultivated in Palestine. (AGRICULTURE.) Beans are in blossom in January; they have been noticed in flower at Lydda on the 23d, and at Sidon and Acre even earlier; they continue in flower till March. In Egypt beans are sown in November and reaped in the middle of February, but in Syria the harvest is later.

Bear (Heb. and Chal. dôb; Gr. arktos or arkos). The Syrian bear (Ursus Syriacus), which is without doubt the "bear" of the Bible, is still found on the higher mountains of Palestine. During the summer months these bears keep to the snowy parts of Lebanon, but descend in winter to the villages and gardens; it is probable also that at this period in former days they extended their visits to other parts of Palestine. We read of bears being found in a wood between Jericho and Bethel (2 K. ii. 24); it is not improbable therefore that the destruction of the forty-two children who mocked Elisha took place some time in the winter, when these animals inhabited the lowlands of Palestine. The ferocity of the bear when deprived of its young is alluded to in 2 Sam. xvii. 8; Prov. xvii. 12; Hos. xiii. 8; its attacking flocks in 1 Sam. xvii. 34, &c.; its craftiness in ambush in Lam. iii. 10, and its being a dangerous enemy to man in Am. v. 19. The passage in Is. lix. 11, would be better translated, "we groan like bears," in allusion to the animal's plaintive groaning noise. The bear is mentioned also in Dan. vii. 5; Wis. xi. 17; Eccles. xlvii. 3; Rev. xiii. 2.

Beard. Western Asiatics have always cherished the beard as the badge of the dignity of manhood, and attached to it the importance of a feature. The Egyptians, on the contrary, sedulously, for the most part, shaved the hair of the face and head and compelled their slaves to do the like. They, however, wore a false beard of plaited hair, and of varying length and form, according to the wearer's rank. The enemies of the Egyptians, including probably many of the nations of Canaan, Syria, and Armenia, &c., are represented nearly always bearded. In the Ninevite monuments is a series of battle-views from the capture of Lachish by Sennacherib, in which the captives have beards like some of those in the Egyptian monuments. There is, however, an appearance of conventionalism both in Egyptian and Assyrian treatment of the hair and beard on monuments, which prevents our accepting it as characteristic. Nor is it possible to decide with certainty the meaning of the precept (Lev. xix. 27, xxi. 5) regarding the "corners of the beard." Probably the Jews retained the hair on the sides of the face between the ear and the eye, which the Arabs and others shaved away. Size and fulness of beard are said to be regarded, at the present day, as a mark of respectability and trustworthiness. The beard is the object of an oath, and that on which blessings, shame, &c., are spoken of as resting. The custom was and is to shave or pluck it and the hair out in mourning (Is. i. 6, xv. 2; Jer. xli. 5, xlviii. 37; Ezr. ix. 3; Bar. vi. 31); to neglect it in seasons of permanent affliction (2 Sam. xix. 24), and to regard any insult to it as the last outrage which enmity can inflict (x. 4; compare Is. vii. 20). The beard was the object of salutation (2 Sam. xx. 9). The dressing, trimming, anointing, &c., of the beard, was performed with much ceremony by persons of wealth and rank (Ps. cxxxiii. 2). The removal of the beard was a part of the ceremonial treatment proper to a leper (Lev. xiv. 9).

Beast, the representative in the A. V. of the following Hebrew and Greek words: 1. Heb. bēhēmāh, the general name for domestic cattle of any kind, also = any large quadruped, as opposed to fowls and creeping things (Gen. i. 24, 25, A. V. "cattle" in both, vi. 7, 20, "cattle" A. V., vii. 2; Ex. ix. 25; Lev. xi. 2 [the latter "beasts"]; 1 K. iv. 33 [v. 13, Heb.]; Prov. xxx. 30, &c.); or = beast of burden, horse, mule, &c. (1 K. xviii. 5; Neh. ii. 12, 14, &c.); or = wild beast (Deut. xxxii. 24; Hab. ii. 17; 1 Sam. xvii. 44).—2. Heb. bē'ir denotes all kinds of cattle, like the L. pecus (Ex. xxii. 5 [4, Heb.]; Num. xx. 4, "cattle" A. V., 8, 11; Ps. lxxviii. 48, "cattle" A. V.), or specially beast of burden (Gen. xlv. 17).—3. Heb. hayyāh or chayyāh (properly fem. adj. = living, Ges.) = any animal (Gen. i. 24, 25, 30, ii. 19; Lev. xi. 2 [the former "beasts"]; &c.). It, however, very frequently = wild beast, when the meaning is often more fully expressed by the addition of the Hebrew word hamsādh = "of the field" (Gen. iii. 1; Ex. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxvi. 22; Deut. vii. 22; Hos. ii. 12 [14, Heb.], xiii. 8; Jer. xii. 9, &c.).—4. Heb. ziz, translated "wild beasts" (Ps. i. 11), "wild beast" (lxxx. 13, Heb. 14); = any moving thing, Ges.—5. Heb. plural tiyīm, translated "wild beasts of the desert" (Is. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 14, margin "ziim" in both; Jer. l. 39); = inhabitants of the desert (so Gesenius), whether men (A. V. "they that dwell in the wilderness," Ps. lxxii. 9 and Is. xxiii. 13; "the people inhabiting the wilderness," Ps. lxxiv. 14), or animals, i. e. jackals, ostriches, wild beasts (see above, and compare No. 6).—6. Heb. plural iyūn, translated "wild beasts of the islands" (Is. xiii. 22, margin, "Iim," xxxiv. 14, margin, "Ijim"; Jer. l. 39); = howlers, i. e. jackals, Ges. (compare No. 5).—7. Heb. plural of adj. mēri (= fat, fatled, Ges.), translated "fat beasts" (Am. v. 22), "fed beasts" (Is. i. 11); elsewhere translated "fatlings," "fat cattle," and in singular, "fatling." (See Ox.)—8. Heb. reesh. (DROMEDARY).—9. Heb. plural cirdārōth, translated "swift beasts" (Is. lxxvi. 20); = dromedaries, or swift camels, Bochart, Gesenius, &c. (CAMEL).—10. Gr. ktēnos (literally, possession, property) = a "beast," a domestic animal as bought or sold (Rev. xviii. 13), as yielding meat (1 Cor. xv. 39), as used for riding, burdens, &c. (Lk. x. 34; Acts xxiii. 24); in LXX. = No. 1 and 2 above (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).—11. Gr. thērion = "beast," "wild beast," any wild animal (Wis. xii. 9, xvi. 5, xvii. 19 [Gr. 18]; 1 Mc. vi. 35 ff.; 2 Mc. xv. 20, 21; Mk. i. 13; Acts x. 12, xi. 6, xxviii. 4, 5; Heb. xii. 20; Jas. iii. 7; Rev. vi. 8); used figuratively and symbolically (Tit. i. 12; Rev. xi. 7, xiii. 1 ff., xiv. 9, 11, &c.); in LXX. = No. 1 and 3. The Greek primitive thēr occurs in Wis. xi. 18 (Gr. 19) in the plural = "wild beasts."—12. Gr. plural tetrapoda = "four-footed beasts," quadrupeds (Acts x. 12, xi. 6; Rom. i. 23); in LXX. = No. 1 and 3.—13. Gr. aphagion = a "slain beast," a victim slaughtered in sacrifice (Acts vii. 42).—14. Gr. zōon, a "beast," properly a living thing, an animal (Wis. xi. 15 [Gr. 16], xiii. 14, xv. 18, 19, xvii. 19 [Gr. 18]; Ecclus. xiii. 15; Heb. xiii. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 12; Jude 10); used symbolically (Rev. iv. 6-9, v. vi., vii. 11, xiv. 3, xv. 7, xix. 4); in LXX. = No. 3 (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).—15. Gr. knōdalon = "beast," a wild animal, especially one that is dangerous or harmful (Wis. xi. 15 [Gr. 16], xvi. 1, xvii. 9).

* Beau-ti-ful Gate (Acts iii. 2, 10). TEMPLE.

Be'bal or Beb'a-l (Heb. fr. Pehlvi bab = father, Ges.).—1. Ancestor of 623 (Ezr. ii. 11; 1 Esd. v. 13; 628 in Neh. vii. 16) who returned with Zerubbabel; of 28 who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 11); of 4 who had taken foreign wives (x. 28; 1 Esd. ix. 29). The name either of the family or of an individual occurs also among those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 15).—2. Father of the Zechariah who was leader of the 28 mentioned above (Ezr. viii. 11).

Be'bal or Beb'a-l (Gr.), a place named only in Jd. xv. 4.

Be'cher [-ker] (Heb. first-born; young camel, Ges.). 1. The second son of Benjamin, according to Gen. xlv. 21, and 1 Chr. vii. 6; but omitted in 1 Chr. viii. 1. Lord A. C. Hervey regards the Hebrew bēchôrô (translated in A. V. "his first-born") in 1 Chr. viii. 1, as a corruption of Becher, so that the genuine reading would be Benjamin begat Bela, Becher, and Ashbel, in exact agreement with Gen. xlv. 21. He suggests another view as possible, viz., that 1 Chr. viii. 1, is right, and that in Gen. xlv. 21, and 1 Chr. vii. 8, Becher, as a proper name, is a corruption of bēchôr (= first-born), so that Benjamin had no son Becher. But, he thinks, it can scarcely be doubted, that Becher was one of Benjamin's three sons (Bela, Becher, Ashbel), and came down to Egypt with Jacob, being one of the fourteen descendants of Rachel who settled in Egypt (Gen. xlv. 20, 21). As no Becher or family named after Becher appears among the Benjamites in Num. xxvi.

38-41, Lord A. C. Hervey supposes the Becher and Bachrites among the sons of Ephraim (ver. 35) to be the same person and his family, and thus explains: The slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the men of Gath, who came to steal their cattle out of the land of Goshen, in that border affray related in 1 Chr. vii. 21, had sadly thinned the house of Ephraim of its males. The daughters of Ephraim must therefore have sought husbands in other tribes, and in many cases must have been heiresses. Probably, therefore, Becher, or his heir and head of his house, married an Ephraimitish heiress, daughter of SHUTHELAH (1 Chr. vii. 20, 21), and so his house was reckoned in the tribe of Ephraim, just as JAIR, the son of Segub, was reckoned in the tribe of Manasseh (ii. 22; Num. xxxii. 40, 41). Dr. P. Holmes, in Kitto, edition 1866, however, maintains that neither Becher the Benjamite nor his heir could become an heir of Ephraim by marriage (compare Num. xxxvi.); but that the clause "of Becher the family of the Bachrites" should be transferred from Num. xxvi. 35 to ver. 38, and that Becher's family became insignificant or extinct at or before the Captivity, and for this reason Becher is not mentioned in 1 Chr. viii. The junior branches of Becher's family (1 Chr. vii. 8) would, of course, according to Lord A. C. Hervey, continue in the tribe of Benjamin.—2. Son of Ephraim (Num. xxvi. 35); perhaps = BERED 2; see No. 1 above.

Be-cho'ra'h [-ko-] (Heb. first-birth, first-born, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of APHIAH, and ancestor of King SAUL (1 Sam. ix. 1).

Be'ti-leth (fr. Syr. = house of slaughter), the plain of, mentioned in Jd. ii. 21, as lying between Nineveh and Cilicia. The name has been compared with Baktaialla, a town of Syria named by Ptolemy, Bactalia in the Peutinger Tables, which place it twenty-one miles from Antioch. Perhaps, if an historical word, it is a corruption of Hebrew bik'ah. PLAIN 2.

Bed and Bed-chamber [-chame-]. We may distinguish in the Jewish bed five principal parts:—1. the mattress; 2. the covering; 3. the pillow; 4. the bedstead or support for one; 5. the ornamental portions.

Beda—(From Fellows, Asia Minor.)

—1. This portion of the bed was limited to a mere mat, or one or more quilts.—2. A quilt finer than those used in No. 1. In summer a thin blanket or the outer garment worn by day (1 Sam. xix. 13) sufficed. The latter often, in the case of the poor, formed No. 1 and 2. The common bed or couch in modern Palestine is merely a thickly-padded quilt (Thn. ii. 7; compare Mat. ix. 2 ff.; Mk. ii. 4 ff.; Lk. v. 18 ff.; Jn. v. 8 ff.). Hence the law provided that it should not be kept in pledge after sunset, that the poor man might not lack his needful covering (Deut. xxiv. 13).—3. The only material mentioned for this is that named in 1 Sam. xix. 13, and the word used is of doubtful meaning, probably = some fabric woven or plaited of goat's-hair. It is clear, however, that it was something hastily adopted to serve as a pillow, and is not decisive of the ordinary use. In Ez. xiii. 18, occurs the Hebrew word ceseth, which seems to be the proper term. Such pillows are common to this day in the East, formed of sheep's fleece or goat's-skin, with a stuffing of cotton, &c.—4. The bedstead was not always necessary, the divan, or platform along the side or end of an Oriental room, sufficing as a support for the bedding, and the same article being used for a covering by night and a garment by day. Yet some slight and portable frame seems implied among the senses of the Hebrew mittah, which is used for a "bier" (2 Sam. iii. 31), for the ordinary bed (1 Sam. xix. 13; 2 K. iv. 10), for the litter on which a sick person might be carried (1 Sam. xix. 15; compare Cant. iii. 7), for Jacob's bed of sickness (Gen. xlvii. 31), and for the couch on which guests reclined at a banquet (Esth. i. 6; Ez. xxiii. 41).—5. The ornamental portions were pillars and a CANOPY (Jd. xiii. 9), ivory carvings, gold and silver, and probably mosaic work, purple and fine linen (Esth. i. 6; Cant. iii. 9 ["CHARIOT," A. V.; "bed," marg.], 10). The ordinary furniture of a bedchamber in private life is given in 2 K. iv.

Bed and Head-rest—(Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians.)

10. The "bedchamber" in the Temple where Joash was hidden, was, probably, a store-chamber for keeping beds (2 K. xi. 2; 2 Chr. xxii. 11). The position of the bedchamber in the most remote and secret parts of the palace seems marked in Ex. viii. 3; 2 K. vi. 12.

Be'dad (Heb. separation, part, Ges.), father of Hadad king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chr. i. 46).

Be'dan (Heb. son of Dan, viz. Samson, Chaldees and Rabbins; servile = ABDON, Ges., Ewald). 1. In 1 Sam. xii. 11, a judge of Israel between Jerubbaal (Gideon) and Jephthah. Some make Bedan = the Jair of Judg. x. 3. The LXX, Syriac, and Arabic all have Barak, a very probable correction except for the order of the names.—2. A Manassite, son of Ulam (1 Chr. vii. 17).

Be-del'ah [-dee'yah] (Heb. probably = servant of Jehovah, Ges.), a son of Bani in Ezra's time, husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 35).

Bee (Heb. deb'rah; Deut. i. 44; Judg. xiv. 8; Ps. cxviii. 12; Is. vii. 18). That Palestine abounded in bees is evident, for it was a land "flowing with milk and HONEY." (Wax.) Modern travellers (Maundrell, Hackett, &c.) allude to the bees of Palestine. Thomson (i. 460) speaks of immense swarms of bees which made their home in a gigantic cliff of Wady Kurn. "The people of Ma'ia, several years ago," he says, "let a man down the face of the rock by ropes. He was entirely protected from the assaults of the bees, and extracted a large amount of honey; but he was so terrified by the prodigious swarms of bees that he could not be induced to repeat the exploit." This forcibly illustrates Deut. xxxii. 13, and Ps. lxxxi. 16, as to "honey out of the rock," and the two passages from Psalms and Judges quoted above, as to the fearful nature of the attacks of these insects when irritated. English naturalists know little of the species of bees found in Palestine. Mr. F. Smith, our best authority on the Hymenoptera, who has described seventeen species of true honey-bees (the genus Apis), is inclined to believe that the honey-bee of Palestine is distinct from the honey-bee (A. mellifica) of this country (so Mr. Houghton, original author of this article). There can be no doubt that the attacks of bees in Eastern countries are more to be dreaded than in more temperate climates. Swarms in the East are far larger than with us, and, on account of the heat of the climate, one can readily imagine that their stings must give rise to very dangerous symptoms. We can well, therefore, understand the full force of the Psalmist's complaint, "They compassed me about like bees." The passage about the swarm of bees and honey in the lion's carcass (Judg. xiv. 8) admits of easy explanation. The lion which Samson slew had been dead some little time before the bees took up their abode in the carcass, for it is expressly stated that "after a time" Samson returned and saw the bees and honey in the lion's carcass, so that "if any one here represents to himself a corrupt and putrid carcass, the occurrence ceases to have any true similitude, for it is well known that in these countries at certain seasons of the year, the heat will in the course of twenty-four hours so completely dry up the moisture of dead camels, and that without their undergoing decomposition, that their bodies long remain, like mummies, unaltered and entirely free from offensive odor" (Oedmann). Probably, also, ants would help to consume the carcass, and soon leave little but the skeleton. Is. vii. 18, "the Lord shall hiss for the bee that is in the land of Assyria," has been understood by some to refer to the practice of "calling out the bees from their hives by a hissing or whistling sound to their labor in the fields, and summoning them again to return" in the evening; but probably it has reference "to the custom of the people in the East of calling the attention of any one by a significant hiss or rather hiss" (Mr. Denham, in Kitto).

Be-e-li'a-da (Heb. known by Baul; whom the Lord knows and cares for, Ges.), son of David, born in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xiv. 7); = ELIADA.

Be-el'sa-rus (fr. Gr.) = BILSHAN (1 Esd. v. 8).

Be-el-teth'mus (fr. Gr.; see below), an officer of Artaxerxes residing in Palestine (1 Esd. ii. 16, 25). The name is a corruption of the Chaldee title of Rehum (= lord of judgment, A. V. "chancellor," Ezr. iv. 8).

* Be-el'ze-bub (L.). BEELZEBUL.

Be-el'ze-bul (see below), the title of a heathen deity, to whom the Jews ascribed the sovereignty of the evil spirits (Mat. x. 25, xii. 24, 27; Mk. iii. 22; Lk. xi. 15 ff.). The correct reading is without doubt Beelzebub, and not Beelzebub as given in the Syriac, Vulgate, A. V., &c. 1. The explanations offered in reference to the change of the final letter of the name BAAL-ZEBUB (see under BAAL; but some disbelieve this supposed connection between Beelzebub and Baal-zebub) may be ranged into two classes, according as they are based on the sound, or the meaning of the word. The former proceeds on the assumption that the name Beelzebub was for some reason offensive to the Greek ear. The second class of explanations carries the greatest weight of authority with it; these proceed on the ground that the Jews intentionally changed the pronunciation of the word, so as either to give a significance to it adapted to their own ideas, or to cast ridicule upon the idolatry of the neighboring nations (compare Sychar for Sychem, Bethaven for Bethel). Some connect the term with the Hebrew zebul = habitation, thus making Beelzebub = the lord of the dwelling (A. V. "the master of the house," Mat. x. 25), whether as the "prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2), or as the prince of the lower world, or as inhabiting human bodies, or as occupying a mansion in the seventh heaven, like Saturn in Oriental mythology. Others derive it from the Hebrew zebel = dung, thus making Beelzebub, literally = the lord of dung, or the dung-hill; and in a secondary sense (as zebel was used by the Talmudical writers as = idol or idolatry) = the lord of idols, prince of false gods. It is generally held that the former of these two senses is more particularly referred to in the N. T.: the latter, however, is adopted by Lightfoot and Schleusner. Hug ingeniously conjectures that the fly, under which Baal-zebub was represented, was the Scarabeus pillularius or dung-hill beetle, in which case Baal-zebub and Beelzebub might be used indifferently.—2. The Jewish reference to Baal-zebub in Mat. x. 25 may have originated in a fancied resemblance between the application of Ahaziah to Baal-zebub, and that of the Jews to our Lord for the ejection of the unclean spirits. The title, "prince of the devils," may have special reference to the nature of the disease in question as incurable by any human power, or it may have been educed from the name itself by a fancied or real etymology. The notices of Beelzebub are exclusively connected with the subject of DEMONIACS, a circumstance which may account for the subsequent disappearance of the name.

Beer (Heb. well; compare AIN). 1. One of the latest halting-places of the Israelites, lying beyond the Arnon, and so called from the well there dug by the "princes" and "nobles" of the people, and celebrated in a fragment of poetry (Num. xxi. 16-18); possibly = BEER-ELIM.—2. A place to which Jotham, the son of Gideon, fled for fear of his brother Abimelech (Judg. ix. 21); according to Eusebius and Jerome, ten miles N. of Eleutheropolis. Here is now a deserted village el-Bireh near Ain-Shems (Beth-shemesh). But perhaps Beer = BEEROTH (Rbn. i. 452).

Be'e-ra (Heb. well, Ges.), son of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 37).

Be'er-ah (Heb. well, Ges.), prince of the Reubenites, carried away by Tiglath-pileser (1 Chr. v. 6).

Be'er-elim (Heb. well of heroes, Ges.), a spot named in Is. xv. 8 as on the "border of Moab." BEER 1.

Be'er-l (Heb. of, or from, a well, Ges.; illustrious, Fül.). 1. Father of Esau's wife, Judith (Gen. xxvi. 34; ANAH).—2. Father of the prophet Hosea (Hos. i. 1).

Be'er-la-hai'-rol [-hay'roy] (Heb. well of the living and seeing, sc. God; well of life of vision, i. e. of life after a vision of God, Ges.), a well, or rather a living spring (A. V. "fountain," Gen. xvi. 7), between Kadesh and Bered, in the wilderness, "in the way to Shur," and therefore in the "S. country," which was so named by Hagar, because God saw her there (Gen. xvi. 14). By this well Isaac dwelt both before and after the death of his father (xxiv. 62, xxv. 11). In both these passages the A. V. has "the well Lahai-roi." Mr. Rowlands announces the discovery of the well Lahai-roi at Moyle or Moilahi (Ar. el-Mu-veleh = salt-places, Rbn.), a station on the road to Beer-sheba, ten hours S. W. of Ruhaibeh (ancient Rehoboth?), and about fifty miles S. W. from Beer-sheba; near which is a hole or cavern bearing the name of Beit Hagar (Ritter, Sinai, 1086, 7); but this requires confirmation.

Beer-oth (Heb. wells), one of the four cities of the Hivites who deluded Joshua into a treaty of peace with them; the other three being Gibeon, Chephirah, and Kirjath-jearim (Josh. ix. 17). Beeroth was with the rest of these allotted to Benjamin (xviii. 25), in whose possession it continued at the time of David, the murderers of Ish-bosheth belonging to it (2 Sam. iv. 2). It is again named with Chephirah and Kirjath-jearim in the list of those who returned from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29; BEROth). Beeroth was probably at the modern el-Bireh, a village about ten miles N. of Jerusalem by the great road to Nablus, just below a ridge which bounds the prospect N. from the Holy city. As this is the first halting-place of caravans going N. from Jerusalem, it is not improbably, as is claimed by monastic tradition, the place where the "parents" of Jesus "sought Him," and whence "they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking Him" (Lk. ii. 44, 45; Stl. 210). Nahari "the Beerothite" (2 Sam. xxiii. 37), or "the Berothite" (1 Chr. xi. 29), was one of David's valiant men.

Beer-oth (Heb. wells, Ges.) of the Children of Jaakan = the wells of the tribe descended from JAAKAN; one of the halting-places of the Israelites in the desert (Deut. x. 6). In Num. xxxiii, the name is BENE JAAKAN only.

Beer-she'ba (Heb. well of swearing, or of seven), one of the oldest places in Palestine, forming the S. limit of the country. There are two not inconsistent accounts of the origin of the name.—1. ABRAHAM dug the well, and gave the name, because there he and Abimelech, the king of the Philistines, "swore" both of them (Gen. xxi. 31). But the compact was ratified by the setting apart of "seven ewe lambs;" and as the Hebrew word for "seven" is Sheba, some suppose that this is the meaning of the name. In chapters xxi., xxii. it is spelt in the Heb. Beer-shaba.—2. In an occurrence almost precisely similar, a Philistine king, ABIMELECH, and a PRICHOLO, his chief captain, are again concerned, but with ISAAC instead of ABRAHAM (xxvi. 31–33; SHEBAH). In xxvi. 18, we are told, "Isaac digged again the wells of water which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham; and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them."—There are at present on the spot two principal wells, and five smaller ones (Bonar). The two principal wells are on or close to the N. bank of the Wady es-Seba'. They lie just 100 yards apart, and are visible from a considerable distance. The E., and larger of the two is, according to the careful measurements of Robinson (i. 204), 12½ feet in diameter, and at the time of his visit (April 12) was 44½ feet to the surface of the water: the masonry which encloses the well reaches downward for 28½ feet. The other well is 5 feet in diameter, and was 42 feet to the water. The curb-stones round the mouth of both wells are worn into deep grooves by the action of the ropes of so many centuries, and "look as if fluted or fluted all round." The five lesser wells are in a group in the bed of the wady (V. de V. ii. 136). On some low hills N. of the large wells are scattered the foundations and ruins of a town of moderate size. There are no trees or shrubs near the spot.—From the time of Jacob (Gen. xxviii. 10, xli. 1, 5) till the conquest of the country we only catch a momentary glimpse of Beer-sheba in the lists of the cities in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 28) given to the tribe of Simeon (xix. 2; 1 Chr. iv. 28). Samuel's sons were judges there (1 Sam. viii. 2). There Elijah halted on his way to Horeb, and left his servant (1 K. xix. 3). "From Dan to Beer-sheba" (Judg. xx. 1, &c.), or "from Beer-sheba to Dan" (1 Chr. xxi. 2; compare 2 Sam. xxiv. 2) = the whole of the promised land; just as "from Geba to Beer-sheba" (2 K. xxiii. 8), or "from Beer-sheba to Mount Ephraim" (2 Chr. xix. 4) = the S. kingdom after the disruption. After the return from the Captivity the formula is narrowed still more, and becomes "from Beer-sheba to the Valley of Hinnom" (Neh. xi. 30). In the time of Amos, Beer-sheba, like Bethel and Gilgal, was the seat of an idolatrous worship, apparently connected in some intimate manner with the N. kingdom (Am. v. 5, viii. 14). After this, with the mere mention that Beer-sheba and the villages round it were reinhabited after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 30), the name dies entirely out of the Bible record. In the time of Jerome it was still a considerable place; and later it is mentioned as an episcopal city under the bishop of Jerusalem. It retains its ancient name as nearly in sound as an Arabic signification will permit—Bir es-Seba' = the "well of the lion," or "of seven."—"The wilderness of Beer-sheba" (Gen. xxi. 14) "probably denotes the desert country S. of Beer-sheba toward the wilderness of PARAN" (Bush on Gen. i. c.).

Be-es'h'te-rah (Heb. house, or temple, of Ashloreh, Ges.), one of the two cities allotted to the sons of Gershom, out of the tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan (Josh. xxi. 27); apparently = ASHTAROTH 2.

Bee'tle. LOCUST 3.

* Beeves. BULL; OX.

* Beg'gar. ALMS; POOR.

* Be-got'ten. The phrases "only-begotten" (Jn. i. 14, 18, iii. 16, 18; 1 Jn. iv. 9) and "first-begotten" (Heb. i. 6; Rev. i. 5) especially designate the Lord JESUS CHRIST, the SON OF GOD.

Be-head'ing. PUNISHMENTS.

Be-he-moth or Be-he'moth (Heb. pl. of majesty [fr. bēhēmāh; see BEAST 1] = the great beast, Ges.). There can be little or no doubt, that by this word (Job xl. 15–24) the hippopotamus (L. fr. Gr. = river-horse) is intended, since all the details descriptive of the bēhēmōth accord entirely with the ascertained habits of that animal (so Mr. Houghton, with Bochart, Shaw, Rosenmüller, Harmer, Gesenius, Fürst, most English commentators, &c.). The hippopotamus is an aquatic African quadruped, larger than the ox, but more closely allied to the rhinoceros and hog. Since in the first part of Jehovah's discourse (Job xxxviii., xxxix.) land animals and birds are mentioned, it suits the general purpose of that discourse better to suppose that aquatic or amphibious creatures are spoken of in the last half of it; and since the "leviathan," by almost universal consent = the crocodile, the "behemoth" seems clearly = the hippopotamus, anciently (see EGYPT) his associate in the Nile. The description of the animals lying under "the shady trees," amongst the "reeds" and willows, is peculiarly applicable to the hippopotamus. It has been argued that such a description is equally applicable to the elephant; but this is hardly the case, for though the elephant is fond of frequent ablutions, and is frequently seen near the water, yet the constant habit of the hippopotamus, as implied in verses 21, 22, seems to be especially made the subject to which the attention is directed.

Hippopotamus (Hippopotamus amphibius).

Be'kah (Heb. a part, half, Ges.). WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Bel. BAAL.

Bel and Dragon. DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO.

Bela (Heb. a swallowing up, or destruction). 1. One of the five cities of "the plain" (PLAIN 3), which was spared at the intercession of Lot, and named ZOAR (Gen. xiv. 2, 8, xix. 22). The king of Bela is the only one of the five confederates whose name is not given, and this suggests the probability of Bela having been his own name, as well as the name of his city, which may have been so called from him.—2. Son of Beor, and king of Edom, eight generations before Saul, king of Israel, or about the time of the Exodus (Gen. xxxvi. 32 ff.; 1 Chr. i. 43 ff.). Bernard Hyde, following some Jewish commentators (Sim. Onom. 112, n.), identifies this Bela with Balaam the son of Beor; but the evidence from the name does not prove more than identity of family and race. There is nothing to guide us as to the age of Beor, or Bosor, the founder of the house from which Bela and Balaam sprang. The name Beor is of a decidedly Chaldee or Aramean form; and we are expressly told that Balaam the son of Beor dwelt in Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, i. e. the river Euphrates; and he himself describes his home as being in Aram (Num. xxii. 5, xxiii. 7). Hence not improbably Bela the son of Beor, who reigned over Edom in the city of Dinhabah, was a Chaldean by birth, and reigned in Edom by conquest. He may have been contemporary with Moses and Balaam.—3. Eldest son of Benjamin (Gen. xlii. 21; A. V. "Belah;"; Num. xxvi. 38, 40; 1 Chr. vii. 6, viii. 1), and head of the family of the BELAITES.—4. Son of Azaz, a Reubenite (1 Chr. v. 8).

Belah. BELA 3.

Bel'e-mus (1 Esd. ii. 16) = BISHLAM.

Bel'ial (fr. Heb., see below). The A. V., following the Vulgate, frequently treats this word as a proper name in the O. T., particularly where it is connected with man of, or son of: in other instances it is translated "wicked," "evil," "naughty," "ungodly" (Deut. xv. 9; Ps. xli. 8, ci. 3; Prov. vi. 12, xvi. 27, xix. 28; Nah. i. 11, 15); "ungodly men" (Ps. xviii. 4, A. V.). Unquestionably, however, the word is not a proper name in the O. T.; it = worthlessness, and hence recklessness, lawlessness. A son or man or child of Belial = a worthless, lawless fellow: it occurs frequently in this sense in the historical books (Judg. xix. 22, xx. 13; 1 Sam. i. 16 ["daughter of Belial" = worthless, or wicked woman, Ges.], ii. 12, x. 27, xxv. 17, 25, xxx. 22; 2 Sam. xvi. 7, xx. 1; 1 K. xxi. 10; 2 Chr. xiii. 7), only once in the earlier books (Deut. xiii. 13). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 6, and Job xxxiv. 18 (A. V. "wicked"), Belial stands by itself, as a term of reproach. In 2 Cor. vi. 15, the term in the Greek, according to Griesbach and others, is Beliar, a Syriac form (Rbn. N. T. Lex.), not, as in the A. V., Belial; and here it is generally considered an appellative of SATAN, as the personification of all that was bad: Bengel explains it of Antichrist, as more strictly the opposite of Christ.

* Be'lieve, to, in the N. T., especially denotes to exercise faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, to be a Christian (Acts xiii. 35, xxi. 20, 25; Rom. x. 4, 10; 1 Cor. i. 21, &c.). FAITH.

* Be-lievers = Christians (Acts v. 14; 1 Tim. iv. 12). BELIEVE.

* Bell. BELLS.

Bellows (Heb. mappuah or mappuah). The word occurs only in Jer. vi. 29, "The bellows are burned;" where their use is to heat a smelting furnace. A picture of two different kinds of bellows, both ingeniously constructed, may be found in Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, iii. 338. "They consisted," he says, "of a leather, secured and fitted into a frame, from which a long pipe extended for carrying the wind to the fire. They were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them, with one under each foot, and pressing them alternately while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string he held in his hand. In one instance we observe from the painting, that when the man left the bellows, they were raised as if inflated with air; and this would imply a knowledge of the valve. The pipes even in the time of Thothmes II., (supposed to be) the contemporary of Moses, appear to have been simply of reed, tipped with a metal point to resist the action of the fire." HANDICRAFT.

Egyptian Bellows. (F. Caillard, Recherches sur les Arts des Anciens Egyptiens.)

Bells. There are two Hebrew words thus translated in the A. V., viz. pa'amôn (Ex. xxviii. 33, 34, xxxix. 25, 26) and metallôth (Zech. xiv. 20; A. V. margin, "bridles"). In Exodus the bells were golden, according to the Rabbis seventy-two in number, which alternated with the three-colored pomegranates round the hem of the high-priest's ephod. The object of them was that his sound might be heard when he went in unto the holy place, and when he came out, that he die not (Ex. xxviii. 34; Eccles. xlv. 9). No doubt they answered the same purpose as the bells used by the Brahmins in the Hindoo ceremonies, and by the Roman Catholics during the celebration of mass. To this day bells are frequently attached to the anklets of women. (ANKLET.) The little girls of Cairo wear strings of them round their feet. In Zech. xiv. 20 the "bells of the horses" (A. V.) probably = concave or flat pieces of brass, which were sometimes attached to horses for ornament.

Bel men (apparently fr. ABEL-MAIM), a place named among the towns of Samaria, as lying between Beth-horon and Jericho (Jd. iv. 4).

Bel-shaz'zar (fr. Chal.; prob. = BELTESHAZZAR, Ges., Fü.; Bel has formed a king, Dr. E. Hincks), the last king of Babylon. During a splendid feast in his palace he was affrighted by a mysterious handwriting on the wall. After applying in vain to other wise men, he sent for DANIEL, who holdly rebuked him for his pride and impiety, and then interpreted the Divine message to him. Belshazzar was slain the same night (see Dan. v.) Xenophon also tells us that Babylon was taken by Cyrus in the night, while the inhabitants were engaged in feasting and revelry, and that the king was killed. On the other hand, the narratives of Berosus in Josephus and of Herodotus differ from the above account in some important particulars. Berosus calls the last king of Babylon Nabonnedus or Nabonadius, and says that in the seventeenth year of his reign Cyrus took Babylon, the king having retired to the neighboring city of Borsippus or Borsippa. Being blockaded in that city Nabonnedus surrendered, his life was spared, and a principality or estate given to him in Carmania, where he died. According to Herodotus the last king was called Labynetus, a name easy to reconcile with the Nabonnedus of Berosus, and the Nabannidochus of Megasthenes. Cyrus, after defeating Labynetus in the open field, appeared before Babylon, within which the besieged defied attack and even blockade. But he took the city by drawing off for a time the waters of the Euphrates, and then marching in with his whole army along its bed during a great Babylonian festival. These discrepancies have lately been cleared up by the discoveries of Sir Henry Rawlinson. From the inscriptions on some cylinders found at Mugheir (see UR), it appears that the eldest son of Nabonnedus was called Bel-shar-ezar, contracted into Belshazzar, and admitted by his father to a share in the government. Sir Henry Rawlinson says, "We can now understand how Belshazzar, as joint king with his father, may have been governor of Babylon, when the city was attacked by the combined forces of the Medes and Persians, and may have perished in the assault which followed; while Nabonnedus leading a force to the relief of the place was defeated, and obliged to take refuge in Borsippa, capitulating after a short resistance, and being subsequently assigned, according to Berosus, an honorable retirement in Carmania." Belshazzar's position as joint ruler with his father harmonizes with Daniel's being the "third ruler in the kingdom" (Dan. v. 16, 29), the highest position then tenable by a subject (G. Rawlinson, Hist. Evidences, 442). In Dan. v. 2, Nebuchadnezzar is called the father of Belshazzar. This, of course, need only mean grandfather or ancestor. Rawlinson connects Belshazzar with Nebuchadnezzar through his mother, thinking it probable that Nabunahit (= Nabonnedus) would strengthen his position by marrying the daughter of that king, who would thus be Belshazzar's maternal grandfather. A totally different view is taken by Marcus Niebuhr, who considers Belshazzar to be another name for Evil-merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar. On Rawlinson's view, Belshazzar died B. C. 538; on Niebuhr's, B. C. 559.

* Bel-te-shaz'zar, an Assyrio-Babylonish name (= Bel's prince, i. e. whom Bel favors, Ges.; Bel, or maintainer, of the lord, Fü.) given to DANIEL (Dan. i. 7, &c.).

Ben (Heb. son), a Levite "of the second degree," one of the porters appointed by David for the ark (1 Chr. xv. 18).

* Ben-a-bin'a-dab (Heb.) = "son of Abinadab" (1 K. iv. 11, marg.). ABINADAB 4.

Be-nal'ah [-na'yah] (fr. Heb. whom Jehovah hath built, Ges.). 1. Son of Jehoiada the chief priest (1 Chr. xxvii. 5), and therefore of the tribe of Levi, though a native of Kabzeel (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chr. xi. 22) in the S. of Judah; set by David (xi. 25) over his body-guard of Cherethites and Pelethites (2 Sam. viii. 18; 1 Chr. xviii. 17; 2 Sam. xx. 23), and occupying a middle rank between the first three of the "mighty men," and the thirty "valiant men of the armies" (2 Sam. xxiii. 22, 23; 1 Chr. xi. 25, xxvii. 6.) The exploits which gave him this rank are narrated in 2 Sam. xxiii. 20, 21; 1 Chr. xi. 22 ff. He was captain of the host for the third month (1 Chr. xxvii. 5). Benaiah remained faithful to Solomon during Adonijah's attempt on the crown (1 K. i.); he put to death, at the king's command, Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei; and was raised into the place of Joab as commander-in-chief of the whole army (ii. iv. 4). He appears to have had a son, called after his grandfather, Jehoiada, who succeeded Ahithophel about the person of the king (1 Chr. xxvii. 34). But this is possibly a copyist's mistake for "Benaiah the son of Jehoiada."—2. "Benaiah the PIRATHONITE;" an Ephraimite, one of David's thirty "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chr. xi. 31), and captain of the eleventh monthly course (xxvii. 14).—3. A Levite in David's time, who "played with a psalter on Alamoth" (xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—4. A priest in David's time, appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark (xv. 24, xvi. 6).—5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chr. xx. 14).—6. A Levite in Hezekiah's time, one of the "overseers of offerings" (xxxi. 13).—7. A prince of Simeon in Hezekiah's time, participant in the extermination of the shepherds of Gedor (1 Chr. iv. 36).—8. Four laymen in Ezra's time, who had taken strange wives:—a. A descendant of Parosh (Ezr. x. 25). BAANIAS.—b. A descendant of Puhath-moab (x. 30). NAIDUS.—c. A descendant of Bani (x. 35). MARDAI.—d. A descendant of Nebo (x. 43). BANAIAS.—9. Father of PELATIAH 4 (Ez. xi. 1, 13).

Ben-am'mi (Heb. son of my kindred), son of Lot by his younger daughter, and progenitor of the Ammonites (Gen. xix. 38).

* Bench'es, the A. V. translation in Ez. xxvii. 6 of the Hebrew keresh (margin "hatches"; literally = a "board" or plank, Ex. xxvi. 15 ff. &c.). Hitzig, Fairbairn (on Ez.), &c., suppose the proper translation in Ezekiel to be "thy deck." BOX-TREE.

* Ben-de'kar (Heb. lance-bearer, Fü.) = "son of DEKAR" (1 K. iv. 9, margin).

Be-ne-be'rak (Heb. sons of lightning, Ges.), a city of the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 45 only); at the modern Ibn Abrak, a few miles from el-Yehüdiyeh (Jehud)? (Scholz, Kitto).

* Ben-e-fac'tor (L. a doer of good = Gr. euergetēs), a title of honor given to kings, &c. (Lk. xxii. 25). Thus Vespasian was styled by the people of Tiberias (Jos. B. J. iii. 9, § 8). EUERGETES.

Be-ne-ja'a-kan (Heb. sons of Jaakan), a tribe who gave their name to certain wells in the desert which formed one of the halting-places of the Israelites on their journey to Canaan (Num. xxxiii. 31, 32); also called BEEROOTH OF THE CHILDREN OF JAKAN. See DRUTERONOMY, B., 1, 5.

* Ben-ge'ber (Heb.) = "son of GEBER" (1 K. iv. 13, margin).

Ben-ha'dad or Ben'-ha-dad (Heb. son [i. e. worshipper] of Hadad, a Syrian god), the name of three kings of Damascus. (For their dates, compare ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.)—1. Ben-hadad I. was either son or grandson to REZON, and in his time Damascus was supreme in Syria. His alliance was courted both by Baasha of Israel and Asa of Judah (1 K. xv. 18 ff.; 2 Chr. xvi. 2 ff.). He finally closed with the latter on receiving a large amount of treasure, and conquered a great part of the N. of Israel, thereby enabling Asa to pursue his victorious operations in the S. From 1 K. xx. 34, it would appear that he continued to make war upon Israel in Omri's time, and forced him to make "streets" in Samaria for Syrian residents. (AHAB.)—2. Ben-hadad II., son of the preceding, and also king of Damascus. Long wars with Israel characterized his reign (1 K. xx., &c.), of which the earlier campaigns are described under AHAB. His power and the extent of his dominion are proved by the thirty-two vassal kings who accompanied him to his first siege of Samaria. Some time after Ahab's death, Ben-hadad renewed the war with Israel (2 K. vi., &c.), attacked Samaria a second time, and pressed the siege so closely that there was a terrible famine in the city. But the Syrians broke up in the night in consequence of a sudden panic. Soon after Ben-hadad fell sick, and sent HAZAEL to consult ELISHA as to the issue of his malady. On the day after Hazael's return Ben-hadad was murdered, as is commonly thought, by Hazael (viii. 15). Ewald thinks that one or more of Ben-hadad's own servants were the murderers. Ben-hadad probably reigned some thirty years.—3. Ben-hadad III., son of Hazael, and his successor on the throne of Syria (xiii. 3, &c.). His reign was disastrous for Damascus, and the vast power wielded by his father sank into insignificance. When he succeeded to the throne, Jehoash recovered the cities which the Syrians had taken from Jehoahaz, and beat him in Aphek (xiii. 17, 25). Jehoash gained two more victories, but did not restore the dominion of Israel on the E. of Jordan. This glory was reserved for his successor. His misfortunes in war are noticed, Am. i. 4.

Ben-ha'll (Heb. son of the host, i. e. warrior), one of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 7).

Ben-ha'nun (Heb. son of one gracious, Ges.), son of Shimon, in the line of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 20).

* Ben-he'sed (Heb.) = "son of HESSED" (1 K. iv. 10, margin).

* Ben-hur (Heb.) = "son of Hur" (1 K. iv. 8, margin). HUR 5.

Ben-i'mu (Heb. our son, Ges.), a Levite who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 13, Heb. 14).

Ben'ja-min (Heb. Binyāmin = son of the right hand, i. e. fortunate, dexterous, Vulgate, A. V. margin, Ges.; Binyāmin = son of days, i. e. son of my old age [compare Gen. xlv. 20], Sam. Codex, Philo, Aben-ezra, &c.). 1. The youngest of Jacob's children, and the only one of the thirteen who was born in Palestine. His birth took place on the road between Bethel and Bethlehem, a short distance from the latter, and his mother Rachel died in giving him birth, naming him with her last breath Ben-oni (= son of my sorrow). This was by Jacob changed into Benjamin (Gen. xxxv. 16-18). In 1 Sam. ix. 1, margin, the name appears as JEMINI. Until the journeys of Jacob's sons and of Jacob himself into Egypt, we hear nothing of Benjamin, and as far as he is concerned those well-known narratives (Gen. xlii.-xlv.) disclose nothing beyond the very strong affection entertained toward him by his father and his whole-brother Joseph, and the relation in which he stood, as if a mere darling child to the whole of his family. Even the harsh natures of the elder patriarchs relaxed toward him. But Benjamin can hardly have been the "lad" which we commonly imagine him to be, for, at the time that the patriarchs went down to reside in Egypt, when "every man with his house went with Jacob," ten sons are ascribed to Benjamin—a larger number than to any of his brothers—and two of these (Muppim, Huppim), from the plural formation of their names, were themselves apparently families (xlv. 21). Jacob's prophecy in respect to the tribe was, "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf; in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil" (xlix. 27). Benjamin is in the lists of the tribes in Ex. i.; Num. i., ii., xiii., xxvi., xxxiv.; Deut. xxvii., xxxiii.; 1 Chr. ii., viii., &c. The proximity of Benjamin to Ephraim during the march to the Promised Land (Num. ii. 18-24) was maintained in the territories allotted to each (Josh. xviii. 11 ff.). Benjamin lay immediately to the S. of Ephraim, between him and Judah. The situation of this territory was highly favorable. It formed almost a parallelogram, of about twenty-six miles in length by twelve in breadth. Its E. boundary was the Jordan, and from thence it extended to the wooded district of Kirjath-jearim, about eight miles W. of JERUSALEM, while in the other direction it stretched from the valley of Hinnom, under the "Shoulder of the Jebusite" (A. V. "side of Jebusi") on the S., to Bethel on the N. Thus Dan intervened between Benjamin and the Philistines, while the communications with the valley of the Jordan were in their own power. On the S. the territory ended abruptly with the steep slopes of the hill of Jerusalem,—on the N. it melted imperceptibly into the possessions of the friendly Ephraim. The smallness of this district (=less than one-fourth of the State of Rhode Island) was, according to Josephus, compensated for by the excellence of the land.—(1.) The general level of this part of Palestine is very high, not less than 2,000 feet above the maritime plain of the Mediterranean on the one side, or than 3,000 feet above the deep valley of the Jordan on the other; and besides, this general level or plateau is surmounted, in this district, by a large number of eminences, almost every one of which has borne some part in the history of the tribe.—(2.) No less important than these eminences are the torrent-beds and ravines by which the upper country breaks down into the deep tracts on each side of it. They formed then, as they do still, the only mode of access from the plains of Philistia and Sharon on the W., or the deep valley of the Jordan on the E.—The passes on the E. side are much more difficult and intricate than those on the W. The principal one, which, now unfrequented, was doubtless in ancient times the main ascent to the interior, leaves the Arabah behind the site of Jericho, and breaking through the barren hills with many a wild bend and steep slope, extends to and indeed beyond the very central ridge of the table-land of Benjamin, to the foot of the eminence on which stand the ruins of Birch, the ancient Beeroth. Another of these passes is that which, since the time of our Saviour, has been the regular road between Jericho and Jerusalem, the scene of the parable of the Good Samaritan.—Such were the limits and the character of the possession of Benjamin as fixed by those who originally divided the land. But in 1 Chr. viii. 12, 13, we find mention of Benjamites who built Lod and Ono, and of others who were founders of Ajjalon, all which towns were beyond the spot named above as the W. point in their boundary. These places too were in their possession after the return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 35).—The contrast between the warlike character of the tribe and the peaceful image of its progenitor comes out in many scattered notices. Benjamin was the only tribe which seems to have pursued archery to any purpose, and their skill in the bow and the sling was celebrated. Ehud the son of Gera accomplished his purpose on Eglon with less risk, owing to his proficiency in using his left hand, a practice apparently confined to Benjamites (Judg. iii. 15, and see xx. 16; 1 Chr. xii. 2). Baanah and Rechab, “the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite of the children of Benjamin” (2 Sam. iv. 2), are the only Israelites W. of the Jordan named in the whole history as captains of marauding predatory bands. (ROBBERY; THIEVES.) The dreadful deed recorded in Judg. xix., though repelled by the whole country, was unhesitatingly adopted and defended by Benjamin with an obstinacy and spirit truly extraordinary. That frightful transaction was indeed a crisis in the history of the tribe: the six hundred who took refuge in the cliff Rimmon were the only survivors. A long interval must have elapsed between so abject a condition and the culminating point at which we next meet with the tribe. Several circumstances may have conduced to its restoration to that place which it was now to assume. The Tabernacle was at Shiloh in Ephraim during the time of the last Judge; but the Ark was in Benjamin at Kirjath-jearim. Ramah, the official residence of Samuel, and containing a sanctuary greatly frequented (1 Sam. ix. 12, &c.),—Mizpeh, where the great assemblies of “all Israel” were held (vii. 5),—Bethel, perhaps the most ancient of all the sanctuaries of Palestine, and Gibeon, “the great high place” (1 K. iii. 4), were all in the land of Benjamin. The people who resorted to these various places must gradually have been accustomed to associate the tribe with power and sanctity. The struggles and contest which followed Saul’s death arose from the natural unwillingness of the tribe to relinquish its position at the head of the nation, especially in favor of Judah. Had it been Ephraim, the case might have been different, but Judah had as yet no connection with the house of Joseph, and was besides the tribe of David, whom Saul had pursued with such unrelenting enmity. The tact and sound sense of Abner, however, succeeded in overcoming these difficulties. Still the insults of Shimei and the insurrection of Sheba are indications that the soreness still existed, and we do not hear of any cordial coöperation or firm union between the two tribes until the disruption of the kingdoms (1 K. xii. 21; 2 Chr. xi. 1). The alliance was further strengthened by a covenant solemnly undertaken (xv. 9), and by the employment of Benjamites in high positions in the army of Judah (xvii. 17). But what above all must have contributed to strengthen the alliance was the fact that the Temple was the common property of both tribes. Henceforward the history of Benjamin becomes merged in that of the S. kingdom. (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) Not only SAUL 2, the king, but MORDECAI and ESTHER and Saul (“who also is called PAUL”) the apostle, were Benjamites.—2. A man of the tribe of Benjamin, son of Bilhan, and the head of a family of warriors (1 Chr. vii. 10).—3. A son of Harim in Ezra’s time, husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 32).—4. A contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 23, xii. 34).

Ben’ja-min, Gate of, a gate on the N. side of Jerusalem; probably = the gate of Ephraim (so Ges.) (Jer. xxxvii. 13, xxxviii. 7; Zech. xiv. 10). “The high gate of Benjamin” (Jer. xx. 2) may have been a corresponding gate of the temple (compare 2 K. xv. 35), (Henderson on Jer. l. c.).

* Ben’ja-mite (for Benjaminite; fr. Heb.) = descendant of BENJAMIN 1 (Judg. iii. 15, xix. 16; 1 Sam. ix. 1, 4, 21, &c.).

Be’no (Heb. his son), a Levite of the sons of Merari (1 Chr. xxiv. 26, 27).

Ben-o’ni (Heb. son of my sorrow, A. V. marg., or son of my strength, i. e. of my last effort, Hiller), the name given by the dying Rachel to her newly-born son, but changed by his father into BENJAMIN (Gen. xxxv. 18).

Ben-zo’heth (Heb. son of Zoheth), a name occurring among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 20).

Be’on (Heb.), a place on the E. of Jordan (Num. xxxii. 3), doubtless a contraction of BAAL-MEON (compare ver. 38).

Be’or (Heb. torch, lamp, Ges.). 1. Father of the Edomite king BELA 2 (Gen. xxxvi. 32; 1 Chr. i. 43).

—2. Father of Balaam (Num. xxii. 5, xxiv. 3, 15, xxxi. 8; Deut. xxiii. 4; Josh. xiii. 22, xxiv. 9; Mic. vi. 5); = No. 1?; called BOSOR in the N. T.

Be’ra (Heb. son of evil, Ges.), king of Sodom at the invasion of Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2; also 17 and 21).

Be’ra-chah [-kah] (Heb. blessing, Ges.), a Benjamite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 8).

Be’ra-chah [-kah] (Heb. blessing), Valley of, a valley so named because there Jehoshaphat and his people assembled to “bless” Jehovah after the overthrow of the hosts of Moabites, Ammonites, and Meunim, who had come against them (2 Chr. xx. 26). The name of Bereikút (probably = Berachah) is now attached to ruins in a valley of the same name lying between Tekoa and the main road from Bethlehem to Hebron.

Be’ra-chi’ah [-ki-] (fr. Heb. = BERECHIAH), a Gershonite Levite (1 Chr. vi. 39); = BERECHIAH 6.

Be’ra-l’ah or Be’ra-l’ah (Heb. whom Jehovah created, Ges.), a Benjamite chief, son of Shimbi (1 Chr. viii. 21).

Be-re’a (L. Berea, fr. Gr. Beroia; named from the abundance of its waters? Conyb. and H. i. 339).

1. A city of Macedonia, to which St. Paul retired with Silas and Timotheus, in the course of his first visit to Europe, on being persecuted in Thessalonica, and from which, on being again persecuted by emissaries from Thessalonica, he withdrew to the sea for the purpose of proceeding to Athens (Acts xvii. 10 ff.). The community of Jews must have been considerable in Berea, and their character is described in very favorable terms (11). Sopater, one of St. Paul’s missionary companions, was from Berea (Acts xx. 4). Berea, now Verria or Kara-Verria, is forty-five miles W. S.W. from Thessalonica, on the E. slope of the Olympian mountain-range, commanding an extensive view of the plain of the Axios and Haliacmon, and had in 1854 about six thousand inhabitants, one-quarter Turks, about two hundred Jews, and the rest Greeks (Rev. E. M. Dodd in B. S. xi. 833). A few ancient remains, Greek, Roman, and Byzantine, still exist here.—2. A city of Syria, the modern Aleppo (2 Mc. xiii. 4).—3. A place in Judea, apparently not very far from Jerusalem (1 Mc. ix. 4).

Be-re-ehi'ah [-ki-] (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah hath blessed, Ges.). 1. Son of ZERUBBABEL (1 Chr. iii. 20).—2. Father of MESHULLAM 13 (Neh. iii. 4, 30; vi. 18).—3. A Levite of the line of Elkanah (1 Chr. ix. 16).—4. A doorkeeper for the ark (1 Chr. xv. 23).—5. A prince of Ephraim in Pekah's reign, who with others succored the captives from Judah (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).—6. Father of Asaph the singer (1 Chr. xv. 17); = BERACHIAH.—7. Father of Zechariah the prophet (Zech. i. 1, 7).

Be-red (Heb. hail, Ges.). 1. A place in the S. of Palestine, between which and Kadesh lay the well Lahai-roi (Gen. xvi. 14); according to some = Elusa, now el-Khulasah (BETHUL).—2. A son or descendant of Ephraim (1 Chr. vii. 20); supposed by Lord A. C. Hervey = BECHER (?).

Be-re-ni'ee = BERNICE.

Be-ri (Heb. = BEERI, Ges.), son of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 36).

Be-ri'ah (Heb. in civil, or a gift; see below). 1. Son of Asher (Gen. xlii. 17; Num. xxvi. 44, 45), from whom descended the "family of the Berites" (44).—2. Son of Ephraim, so named on account of the state of his father's house when he was born (see 1 Chr. vii. 20–23). This notice refers to a period of Hebrew history, respecting which the Bible affords us no other like information—the time between Jacob's death and the beginning of the oppression. Apparently some of Ephraim's sons had attained to manhood, and the Hebrews were still free. (SHUTHELAN.) The men of Gath were probably born in the E. part of Lower Egypt, if not in Goshen itself. At this time very many foreigners must have been settled in Egypt (compare Gen. xlii. 34). Or these men of Gath may have been mercenaries like the Cherethim (in Egyptian Shayratana, see PELETHITES), who were in the Egyptian service at a later time, as in David's, and to whom lands were probably allotted as to the native army.—3. A Benjamite. He and his brother Shema were ancestors of the inhabitants of Ajalon, and expelled the inhabitants of Gath (1 Chr. viii. 13, 16).—4. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (1 Chr. xiii. 10, 11).

Be-ri'ites (fr. Heb.) = descendants of BERIAH 1.

Be-rites (Heb. Bërim = wells, a place or district, Ges.; or descendants of BERI?), the, = a tribe or people named with Abel and Beth-maachah—and therefore doubtless situated in the N. of Palestine—mentioned only as visited by Joab in his pursuit after Sheba the son of Bichri (2 Sam. xx. 14).

Be-ri'ith, the god (Judg. ix. 46) = BAAL-BERITH. See under BAAL 1.

Be-ri'ee [as an Eng. word usually pron. ber'nis] (L. fr. Gr. = carrying off victory, victorious, L. & S.), also written BERNICE, eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I. She was first married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, and after his death (A. D. 48) she lived under circumstances of great suspicion with her own brother Agrippa II., in connection with whom she is mentioned (Acts xxv. 13, 23, xxvi. 30) as having visited Festus on his appointment as Procurator of Judea. She was a second time married, to Polemon, king of Cilicia, but soon left him, and returned to her brother. She afterward became the mistress of Vespasian, and of his son Titus.

Be-ro-dach-Bal'a-dan [-dak] (Heb.) = MERODACH-BALADAN (2 K. xx. 12).

Be'roth (1 Esd. v. 19) = BEEROTH.

Be-ro'thah (Heb. wells, Fü.), Be-ro'thal (Heb. my wells, Ges.; wells of Jehovah, Sim.; the deity worshipped in the cypress, Fü.). The first of these two names, each of which occurs once only, is given (Ez. xlvii. 16) in connection with Hamath and Damascus as forming part of the N. boundary of the promised land. The second is mentioned (2 Sam. viii. 8) as a city of Zobah taken by David, also in connection with Hamath and Damascus. The well-known city Beirut (ancient Berytus) naturally suggests itself as identical with one at least of the names; but in each instance the circumstances of the case seem to require a position further E. Fürst regards Be-ro'thah and Be-ro'thai as distinct places, and makes Berothah = Berytus. Van de Velde suggests Tell el-Byruth, between Tadmor and Hamath (Kitto).

* Ber'ies are mentioned in the A. V. only in Is. xvii. 6 and Jas. iii. 12 as the fruit of the olive-tree. OLIVE.

Ber'yl (Heb. tarshish, supposed to be named fr. TARSHISH), occurs in Ex. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Cant. v. 14; Ez. i. 16, x. 9, xxviii. 13 (marg. chrysolite); Dan. x. 6. There is little or nothing in these passages to lead us to any satisfactory conclusion as to its identity, except in Cant. v. 14: "His hands are orbs of gold adorned with the tarshish stone" (A. V. "gold rings set with the beryl"). The orbs or rings of gold refer not to rings on the fingers, but to the fingers themselves, as they gently press upon the thumb and thus form the figure of an orb or a ring. The latter part is the causal expletive of the former. In this passage not only are the hands called orbs of gold, but the reason why they are thus called is immediately added—specially on account of the beautiful chrysolites with which the hands were adorned. Pliny says of the ancient chrysolite, "it is a transparent stone with a refugence like that of gold." Since then the golden stone (= chrysolite) is admirably suited to the above passage in Canticles, the ancient chrysolite, which is the modern yellow topaz, appears to have a better claim than any other gem to represent the Heb. tarshish.—The Greek berullos, from which "beryl" is derived, is found in Tob. xiii. 17 and Rev. xxi. 20. Tob. xiii. 17 declares "the streets of Jerusalem shall be paved with beryl and carbuncle and stones of Ophir." In Rev. xxi. 20 "beryl" is the eighth foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem. The beryl is identical with the EMERALD except in its color, which is green or bluish-green.

Ber-ze'lus (1 Esd. v. 38) = BARZILLAI 1.

Be'sal (Heb. fr. Sansc. = victory? Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 49; Neh. vii. 52). BASTAI.

* Be-sieged Pla'ces. The Heb. midsôr, thus translated in 2 K. xix. 24 and Is. xxvii. 35, also translated "defence" in Is. xix. 6, and "fortified cities" in Mic. vii. 12, is supposed = Mizraim, i. e. EGYPT (Boch., Ges., Keil, &c.). FENCED CITY.

Be-so-del'ah [-dee'yah] (fr. Heb. = in the intimacy of Jehovah, i. e. confidant of Jehovah, Ges.), father of MESHULLAM 14 (Neh. iii. 6).

* Be'som [-zum], a broom or brush of twigs, used figuratively in Is. xiv. 23. The instrument is mentioned in this passage only, but sweeping is spoken of in Mat. xii. 44; Lk. xi. 25, xv. 8.

Be'sor (Heb. cool, cold, Ges.), the brook, a torrent-bed or wady in the extreme S. of Judah (1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21 only). It must have been S. of Ziklag, and is supposed (Rbn. Phys. Geog. 121-3) = Wady Ar'arah running from Ar'arah (AROER 4) to Beer-sheba.

* Be-stead' [-sted], an old English word compounded of the prefix be and stead, i. e. place; compare belated, benighted, bestowed, bewitched, &c. "Hardly bestead" (Is. viii. 21) = in a state of hardship, in distressed circumstances, afflicted, oppressed.

* Be-stow' [-sto], to, in the A. V., as now, = to give, grant, or confer (Ex. xxxii. 29, &c.); also to stow away or lay up in store, to deposit or store (2 K. v. 24; Lk. xii. 17, 18, &c.).

Be'tah (Heb. trust, confidence, Ges.), a city belonging to Hadadcezer, king of Zobah, mentioned with Berothai (2 Sap. viii. 8); = TIBHATH; site unknown.

Beth-a-ne (Gr.), a place apparently S. of Jerusalem (Jd. i. 9); possibly = Bethanin of Eusebius, two miles from the Terebinth or Oak of Abraham and four from Hebron. This has been variously identified with Betharath, Bethainum (BETH-ANOTH), and Betaneh or Ecbatana in Syria, placed by Pliny on Carmel.

Beten (Heb. belly, perhaps = valley, Ges.), a city on the border of Asher (Josh. xix. 25); identified by Eusebius with a place then called Bebeten, eight miles E. of Ptolemais.

Beth, the English form of the Heb. béyth, from bayith, which is the most general Hebrew word for a house or habitation. Strictly speaking it has the force of a settled dwelling, as in Gen. xxxiii. 17, where the building of a "house" marks the termination of a stage of Jacob's wanderings; but it is also employed for a dwelling of any kind, even for a tent, as in Gen. xxiv. 32, Judg. xviii. 31, 1 Sam. i. 7. From this general force the transition was natural to a "house" in the sense of a family. Like Ades in Latin and Dom in German, Beth has the special meaning of a temple or house of worship. Beth is not found in the A. V., except (1.) as the name of the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.; NUMBER; WRITING), and (2.) in combination with other words to form the names of places (see below).

Beth-ab'a-ra (Gr. fr. Heb. = house of the ford or ferry), a place beyond Jordan, in which, according to the Received Text of the N. T., John was baptized (Jn. i. 28), apparently at the time that he baptized Christ (compare ver. 29, 39, 35). If this reading be correct, Bethabara may = BETH-BARAH (Rbn. Phys. Geog. 168; V. de V. ii. 271), or = BETHNIM-RAH (Mr. Grove). But the oldest MSS. (A B, see NEW TESTAMENT) and the Vulgate have in Jn. i. 28 not Bethabara but Bethany.

Beth'-a-nath (L. fr. Heb. = house of response, perhaps, of echo, Ges.), one of the "fenced cities" of Naphtali, named with Beth-shemesh (Josh. xix. 38); from neither of them were the Canaanites expelled (Judg. i. 33). It is supposed = the modern village Ain'ata, a half hour north of Bint Jebail, between Tyre and the waters of Merom (Thn. i. 315; V. de V. i. 170).

Beth'-a-noth (L. fr. Heb. = BETH-ANATH, Ges.), a town in the mountainous district of Judah, named with Halhul, Beth-zur, &c., in Josh. xv. 59 only; probably at the ruins called Beit'-ainún, between Hebron and Halhul; compare BETANE.

Beth'a-ny (fr. Aram. = house of dates, Lightfoot, Reland). I. A village intimately associated with the most familiar acts and scenes of the last days of the life of Christ. Here He raised LAZARUS from the dead; from Bethany He commenced His triumphal entry into Jerusalem; at Bethany was His nightly resting-place during the time immediately preceding His passion; here at the houses of MARTHA and MARY and of SIMON THE LEPER we are admitted to view Him, more nearly than elsewhere, in the circle of His domestic life; somewhere here, on these wooded slopes beyond the ridge of Olivet, the apostles stood when "He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven" (Mat. xxi., xxvi.; Mk. xi., xiv.; Lk. xix., xxiv.; Jn. xi., xii.). Bethany was situated "at" the Mount of Olives (Mk. xi. 1; Lk. xix. 29), about fifteen stadia (A. V. "furlongs") from Jerusalem (Jn. xi. 18), on or near the usual road from Jericho to the city (Lk. xix. 29, compare 1; Mk. xi. 1, compare x. 46), and close by and W. (?) of BETHPHAGE, the two being several times mentioned together.—There never appears to have been any doubt as to the site of Bethany, which is now known by a name derived from Lazarus—el-'Azariyeh or Lazariyeh. It lies on the E. slope of the Mount of Olives, fully one mile beyond the summit, and not very far from the point at which the road to Jericho begins its more sudden descent toward the Jordan valley.—El-'Azariyeh is a ruinous and wretched village, a wild mountain hamlet of some twenty families. In the village are shown the traditional sites of the house and tomb of Lazarus, and of the house of Simon the leper.—2. (fr. Heb.; see above; house of shipping, Tholuck; boat-house, Fbn.). A place beyond Jordan, known only from Jn. i. 28. BETH-ABARA.

Beth-ar'a-bah (fr. Heb. = house of the desert), one of the six cities of Judah in the ARABAH (Josh. xv. 61), on the N. border of the tribe, and apparently between Beth-hoglah and the high land W. of the Jordan valley (xv. 6); also included in the list of the towns of Benjamin (xviii. 22).

Beth-aram (L. fr. Heb. = house of the height, or mountain-house, Ges.), a town of Gad, E. of the Jordan, in "the VALLEY" 1 (Josh. xiii. 27), and no doubt = BETH-HARAN. Eusebius and Jerome report that in their day its appellation was Bethramphtha, and that, in honor of Augustus, Herod had named it Libias. Josephus says that Herod (Antipas), on taking possession of his tetrarchy, fortified Sepphoris and the city of Betharamphtha, building a wall round the latter, and calling it Julius in honor of the emperor's wife (viz. Julia; previously called Livia). Jerome describes it as between Jericho and Heshbon, and it is said there are ruins er-Ram a few miles E. of Jordan in this direction (Ptr. in Kit.). BETH-JESHIMOTH.

Beth-ar-bel (fr. Heb. = house of God's ambush, Ges.), the scene of a sack and massacre by Shalman or Shalmaneser (Hos. x. 14); supposed = the ancient stronghold of ARBELA in Galilee (so Gesenius, Robinson, &c.), or an Arbela near Pella (so Hit-zig).

Beth-a'ven (L. fr. Heb. = house of naught, i. e. badness), a place on the mountains of Benjamin, E. of Bethel (Josh. vii. 2, xviii. 12), and lying between that place and Michmash (1 Sam. xiii. 5, xiv. 23). In Hos. iv. 15, v. 8, x. 5, the name is transferred, with a play on the word very characteristic of this prophet, to the neighboring Bethel—once the "house of God," but then the house of idols, of "naught."

Beth-az-ma'veth (fr. Heb.; see AZMAVETH) (Neb. vii. 28 only) = AZMAVETH, and BETHSAMOS.

Beth-ba'al-me'on (fr. Heb.; see BAAL-MEON, under BAAL), a city of Reuben, on the "PLAIN" 4, E. of Jordan (Josh. xiii. 17); = BAAL-MEON, BEON, and BETH-MEON. See BAAL-MEON, under BAAL, Geog., 9.

Beth-ba'rah (fr. Heb. = house of passage, or of the ford), named only in Judg. vii. 24, as a point apparently S. of the scene of Gideon's victory. Beth-barah derives its chief interest from the possibility that its more modern representative may have been BETHBARA where John baptized. It was probably the chief ford of the district.

Beth-ba'si (fr. a Gr. form of Heb. ?), a town in which Jonathan and Simon Maccabeus took refuge from Bacchides (1 Mc. ix. 62, 64); probably in the Jordan valley not far from Jericho; possibly = "the valley of KEZIZ."

Beth-bl'r'e-l (fr. Heb. = house of my creation, Ges.), a town of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 31), apparently = BETH-LEBAOTH.

Beth'-ear (fr. Heb. = house of lamba; house of pasture, Ges.), a place named as the point to which the Israelites pursued the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 11); perhaps at the ruined village Beit-far about three miles N. W. of 'Ain-Sheims or Beth-shemesh (Ptr. in Kit.). Josephus says that the stone EBENEZER was set up here.

Beth-da'gon (L. fr. Heb. = house of DAGON). 1. A city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41), and therefore not far from the Philistine territory, with which its name implies a connection. Caphardagon existed as a very large village between Diospolis (Lydda) and Jamnia in the time of Jerome. A place called Beit Dajan has been found between Lydda and Jaffa (Rbn. iii. 298), but this appears too far N. (see No. 3).—2. A town, apparently near the coast, on the boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 27); probably a Philistine colony.—3. A house or temple of Dagon at Ashdod (1 Mc. x. 83, 84). Dr. P. Holmes (in Kitto) supposes this Beth-dagon a city, perhaps = Caphardagon and Beit Dajan (see No. 1 above).

Beth-dib-lathaim (fr. Heb. = house of the double cake, sc. of figs), a town of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 22); apparently = ALMON-DIBLATHAIM.

* Beth-e'den (fr. Heb. = house of pleasantness, Ges.) (Am. i. 5, marg.). EDEN 3.

* Beth-e'ked (Heb.) = "SHEARING-HOUSE."

Beth-el (fr. Heb. = house of God). 1. A well-known city and holy place in central Palestine. Jacob twice solemnly gave this name after his meeting with God. (1.) Under the awe inspired by the nocturnal vision of God, when on his journey from his father's house at Beer-sheba to seek his wife in Haran (Gen. xxviii. 19). This verse indicates a distinction between the early Canaanite "city" Luz, and the "place," as yet marked only by the "stone," or the heap erected by Jacob to commemorate his vision.—(2.) After Jacob's return from Padan-aram, on the occasion of God's blessing him and confirming to him the name of Israel (xxxv. 14, 15).—In xii. 8, the name of Bethel is given to this spot by anticipation (so Bush, Kitto, &c.) in narrating the removal of Abram from the oaks of Moreh to "the' mountain on the E. of Bethel," with "Bethel on the W. and Hai on the E." Here he built an altar; and hither he returned from Egypt with Lot before their separation (xii. 3, 4).—No mention is made in the above narratives of any town or buildings at Bethel at that early period, and a marked distinction is drawn in them between the "city" of Luz and the consecrated "place" in its neighborhood (compare xxxv. 7). In the ancient chronicles of the conquest the two are still distinguished (Josh. xvi. 1, 2); and the appropriation of the name of Bethel to the city appears not to have been made till it was taken by the tribe of Ephraim; after which the name of Luz occurs no more (Judg. i. 22-26).—After the conquest Bethel is frequently heard of. In the troubled times when there was no king in Israel, the people went up in their distress to Bethel to ask counsel of God (xx. 18, 26, 31, xxi. 2; A. V. "house of God"). Here was the ark of the covenant under the charge of Aaron's grandson Phinehas (xx. 26-28, xxi. 4); and the mention of a regular road or causeway between it and the great town of Shechem is doubtless an indication that it was already in much repute. Later we find it named as one of the holy cities to which Samuel went in circuit (1 Sam. vii. 16). Here Jeroboam placed one of the two calves of gold (CALF; IDOLATRY), and built a "house of high places" and an altar of incense, by which he himself stood to burn (1 K. xii. 29 ff.); as we see him in the familiar picture of 1 K. xiii. Toward the end of Jeroboam's life Bethel fell into the hands of Judah (2 Chr. xiii. 19). Elijah visited Bethel, and we hear of "sons of the prophets" resident there (2 K. ii. 2, 3), two facts apparently incompatible with the active existence of the calf-worship. The mention of the bears so close to the town (iii. 23, 25), looks too as if the neighborhood were not much frequented at that time. But, after the destruction of the Bual worship by Jehu, Bethel comes once more into view (x. 29). Under the descendants of this king the place and the worship must have greatly flourished, for by the time of Jeroboam II. the rude village was again a royal residence with a "king's house" (Am. vii. 13) and altars (iii. 14). (Amos.)—How this prosperity came to its doom we are not told. After the desolation of the N. kingdom by the king of Assyria, Bethel still remained an abode of priests, who taught the wretched colonists "how to fear Jehovah," "the God of the land" (2 K. xvii. 28, 27). In the account of Josiah's iconoclasm (xxiii.) we catch one more glimpse of the altar of Jeroboam, with its last loathsome fire of "dead men's bones" burning upon it. It is curious that men of Bethel and Ai returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 28; Neh. vii. 32); and that they returned to their ancestral place whilst continuing their relations with Nehemiah and the restored worship (Neh. xi. 31). In 1 Esdras the name appears as BETOLITHS. In later times Bethel is only named once, amongst the strong cities in Judea repaired by Bacchides during the struggles of the times of the Maccabees (1 Mc. ix. 50).—Bethel receives a bare mention from Eusebius and Jerome, as twelve miles from Jerusalem on the right hand of the road to Sichem; and here its ruins still lie under the scarcely altered name of Beitln. They cover a space of three or four acres, upon the front of a low hill between the heads of two hollow wadys which unite and run off into the main valley es-Sucreiat. The round mount S. E. of Bethel must be the "mountain" on which Abram built the altar (Gen. xii. 8).—2. A town in the S. of Judah, named in Josh. xii. 16, and 1 Sam. xxx. 27; probably = CHESIL, BETHUL, and BETHUEL.

Beth-el-lite (fr. Heb.) = one from BETHEL. Hiel the Bethelite rebuilt Jericho (1 K. xvi. 34).

Beth-emek (fr. Heb. = house of the valley), a place on or near the border of Asher, on the N. side of which was the ravine of Jiphthah-el (Josh. xix. 27). Robinson (iii. 103, 108) discovered an 'Amkah about eight miles N. E. of 'Akka; but if Jefât = Jiphthah-el, the site of Beth-emek must be farther S. than 'Amkah.

Bether (Heb. section, i. e. a region cut up by mountains and valleys, rough, craggy, precipitous, Ges.), the Mountains of. Bether in Cant. ii. 17 ("division," margin) "may best be taken as an appellation." (See above from Ges.) If, however, it be a proper name, the position of the mountains of Bether is utterly unknown (Rbn. Phys. Geog. 69).

Be-thes-da [-thez-] (fr. Syr. = house of mercy, or fr. Heb. = place of the flowing of water), the Greek form of the Hebrew name of a reservoir or tank, with five "porches," close upon the sheep-gate or "market" (SHEEP-MARKET) in Jerusalem (Jn. v. 2). The porches—i. e. cloisters or colonnades—were extensive enough to accommodate a large number of sick and infirm people, whose custom it was to wait there for the "troubling of the water." Eusebius describes it as existing in his time as two pools, the one supplied by the periodical rains, while the water of the other was of a reddish color, due, as the tradition then ran, to the fact that the flesh of the sacrifices was anciently washed there before offering. See, however, the comments of Lightfoot on this view, in his Exercit. on St. John, v. 2. Eusebius's statement is partly confirmed by the Bordeaux Pilgrim (A. D. 333). The large reservoir called the Birket Israil, within the walls of the city, close by the St. Stephen's Gate, and under the N. E. wall of the Haram area, is generally considered to be the modern representative of Bethesda. Robinson (i. 342-3) suggests that Bethesda may = the "fountain of the Virgin," in the valley of the Kidron, a short distance above the Pool of SILOAM.

Beth-e-zei (fr. Heb. = house of firm root, i. e. fixed dwelling, Ges.), a place (Mic. i. 11 only) doubtless in the plain of Philistia.

Beth-ga'der (L. fr. Heb. = house of the wall, Ges.), doubtless a place, though it occurs in the genealogies of Judah as if a person (1 Chr. ii. 51; compare Bethlehem and other names of places in the context); possibly = GEDER.

Beth-ga'mul (L. fr. Heb. = house of the weaned, Ges.; house of the camel?), a town of Moab, in the "plain country" (PLAIN 4) E. of Jordan (Jer. xlviii. 23, compare 21); apparently a place of late date, since there is no trace of it in Num. xxxii. 34-38, and Josh. xiii. 16-20; supposed by Dr. Eli Smith (and so Porter and Winer) to have been at the modern Um el-Jemâl, eight or ten miles S. W. from Bosra. BOZRAH 2.

Beth-hac'ce-rem [-hak'se] (fr. Heb. = house of the vine), a place (PART with a ruler or prince in Nehemiah's time (Neh. iii. 14); situated near Tekoa, and used as a beacon-station (Jer. vi. 1). By Jerome a village named Bethacharma is said to have been on a mountain between Tekoa and Jerusalem, a position in which the eminence known as the Frank mountain (Herodium) stands conspicuous; and this has accordingly been suggested as Beth-hacerem.

Beth-hag-gan (Heb.) = "GARDEN HOUSE."

Beth-ha-ran (fr. Heb. = BETH-ARAM, Ges.), one of the fenced cities E. of the Jordan, built by the Gadites (Num. xxxii. 36); = BETH-ARAM.

Beth-hog'la and Beth-hog'lah (fr. Heb. = partridge-house, Ges.), a city of Benjamin on the border of Judah (Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 19, 21). A magnificent spring and a ruin between Jericho and the Jordan still bear the names of 'Ain-hajla and Kusr Hajla (Rbn. i. 544-6), and are doubtless on or near the old site. ATAD.

Beth-ho'ren (L. fr. Heb. = house of caverns or holes; house of the hollow, Ges.), the name of two towns or villages, an "upper" and a "nether" (Josh. xvi. 3, 5; 1 Chr. vii. 24), on the road from Gibeon to Azekah (Josh. x. 10, 11) and the Philistine plain (1 Mc. iii. 24). Beth-horon lay on the boundary-line between Benjamin and Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3, 5, xviii. 13, 14), was counted to Ephraim (Josh. xxi. 22; 1 Chr. vii. 24), and given to the Kohathites (Josh. xxi. 22; 1 Chr. vi. 68, 53 Heb.). There is no room for doubt that the two Beth-horons still survive in the modern villages of Beit-Ur, et-Tahta (= the lower), and el-Foka (= the upper), which were first noticed by Dr. Clarke. The road connecting them is memorable for the victories of Joshua over the five kings of the Amorites (Josh. x.; Ecclus. xlvi. 6) and of Judas Maccabeus over the Syrians under Seron (1 Mc. iii.). The importance of this road, the main approach to the interior of the country from the hostile districts on both sides of Palestine, at once explains and justifies the frequent fortification of these towns at different periods of the history (1 K. ix. 17; 2 Chr. viii. 5; 1 Mc. ix. 50; J.D. iv. 4 ["Bethoron"]; compare 5). This road is still "the great road of communication and heavy transport between Jerusalem and the sea-coast." The Upper Beth-horon was twelve Roman miles (100 stadia, so Josephus) from Jerusalem (Rbn. ii. 252). From Gibeon to the Upper Beth-horon is a distance of about four miles of broken ascent and descent. The ascent, however, predominates, and this therefore appears to be the "going up" to Beth-horon which formed the first stage of Joshua's pursuit of the Amorites (Josh. x. 10). With the upper village the descent commences; the road rough and difficult even for the mountain-paths of Palestine. This rough descent from the upper to the lower Beit-Ur is the "going down to Beth-horon" (x. 11).

Beth-jesh'i-moth or Beth-jes'i-moth (both fr. Heb. = house of the wastes), a town or place E. of Jordan, on the lower level at the S. end of the Jordan valley (Num. xxxiii. 49); named with Ashdod-pisgah and Beth-peor (Josh. xiii. 20). It was one of the limits of the encampment of Israel before crossing the Jordan. It was allotted to Reuben (Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 20), but came afterward into the hands of Moab, and formed one of the cities which were "the glory of the country" (Ez. xxv. 9). Schwarz (228) quotes "a Beth-jisinuth as still known at the N. E. point of the Dead Sea half a mile from the Jordan;" but this requires confirmation. Tristram (525) supposes Beth-jeshimoth was at the ruins of er-Rameh, about five miles N. E. of the mouth of the Jordan.

Beth-leb'a-oth (L. fr. Heb. = house of lionesses), a town of Simeon (Josh. xix. 6); probably = LEB-AOTH, and BETH-BIREI.

Beth'le-hem (L. fr. Heb. = house of bread). 1. One of the oldest towns in Palestine, especially celebrated as the birth-place of David and of the Lord Jesus Christ. Near it Benjamin was born, and Rachel died (Gen. xxxv. 19; xlviii. 7). Its earliest name was EPHRATH or EPHRATAH, and it is not till long after the occupation of the country by the Israelites that we meet with it under its new name of Bethlehem (Ru. i. 19, 22, ii. 4, iv. 11; 1 Sam. xvi.

Ru. i. 1, 2; 1 Sam. xvii. 12), possibly, though hardly probably, to distinguish it from the small and remote place of the same name in Zebulun (see No. 2 below). Though not named as a Levitical city, it was apparently a residence of Levites, for from it came Jonathan, the son of Gershom, who became the first priest of the Danites at their new settlement (Judg. xvii. 7, xviii. 30), and from it also came the concubine of the other Levite whose death at Gibeah caused the destruction of the tribe of Benjamin (xix. 1 ff.). The Book of Ruth is a page from the domestic history of Bethlehem: the names, almost the very persons, of the Bethlehemites are there brought before us; we are allowed to assist at their most peculiar customs, and to witness the very springs of those events which have conferred immortality on the name of the place. The elevation of David to the kingdom does not appear to have affected the fortunes of his native town.—The residence of Saul acquired a new title specially from him (2 Sam. xxi. 6), but David did nothing to dignify Bethlehem, or connect it with himself. The only touch of recollection which he manifests for it, is that recorded in the well-known story of his sudden longing for the water of the well by the gate of his childhood (xxiii. 14 ff.; 1 Chr. xi. 16 ff.).—The few remaining casual notices of Bethlehem in the O. T. may be quickly enumerated. It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 6). By the time of the Captivity, the Inn of Chimham by Bethlehem appears to have become the recognized point of departure for travellers to Egypt (Jer. xli. 17)—a caravanserai or khan, perhaps the identical one which existed there at the time of our Lord, like those which still exist all over the East at the stations of travellers. Lastly, "Children of Bethlehem," to the number of one hundred and twenty-three, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 21; Neh. vii. 26).—In the N. T. Bethlehem retains its distinctive title "Bethlehem of Judea," = Bethlehem-judah in O. T. (Mat. ii. 1, 5), and it is also styled the "city of David" (Lk. ii. 4, 11; compare Jn. vii. 42). The passages just quoted and the few which follow, exhaust the references to it in the N. T. (Mat. ii. 6, 8, 16; Lk. ii. 15). (ANGELS; HEROD; MAGI; MANGER; STAR OF THE WISE MEN.) After this nothing is heard of it till near the middle of the second century, when Justin Martyr speaks of our Lord's birth as having taken place "in a certain cave very close to the village." There is nothing in itself improbable in the supposition that the place in which Joseph and Mary took shelter, and where was the "manger" or "stall," was a cave in the limestone rock of which the eminence of Bethlehem is composed. But the step from the belief that the Nativity may have taken place in a cavern, to the belief that the present subterranean vault or crypt is that cavern, is a very wide one. The Emperor Hadrian, among other desecrations, had actually planted a grove of Adonis at the spot. This grove remained at Bethlehem from A. D. 135 till 315. The Church of the Nativity was built here, it is said, by the Empress Helena in the fourth century. The

4, &c.). (HUR 2; SALMA.) It is called BETHLEHEM EPHRATAH (Ru. iv. 11; Mic. v. 2). It is frequently entitled BETHLEHEM-JUDAH (Judg. xvii. 7 ff., xix. 1 ff.;

Crusaders took possession of Bethlehem on their approach to Jerusalem. King Baldwin I. erected Bethlehem into a bishopric A. D. 1110. Like Jerusalem it was destroyed by the Kharismians in 1244 (Rbn. i. 471-2).—The modern town of Beit Lahm lies to the E. of the main road from Jerusalem to Hebron, six miles S. from the former. It covers the E. and N. E. parts of the ridge of a long gray hill of Jura limestone, which stands nearly due E. and W., and is about one mile in length. The hill has a deep valley on the N. and another on the S. The monks have fixed the spot where the angels appeared to the shepherds, in a valley about half an hour E. from Bethlehem (Rbn.). The village lies in a kind of irregular triangle, at about 150 yards from the apex of which, and separated from it by a vacant space on the extreme E. part of the ridge, spreads the noble Basilica of St. Helena, "half church, half fort," now embraced by its three convents—Greek, Latin, and Armenian. One fact of great interest is associated with a portion of the crypt of this church, viz., that here, "beside what he believed to be the cradle of the Christian faith," St. Jerome lived for more than thirty years, leaving a lasting monument of his sojourn in the Vulgate translation of the Bible.—The population of Beit Lahm is about three thousand souls, entirely nominal Christians. All travellers remark the good looks of the women, the substantial clean appearance of the houses, and the general air of comfort for an Eastern town which prevails.—2. A town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15 only); situated at the modern Beit Lahm, a miserable village about six miles W. of Nazareth (Rbn. iii. 113).

• Beth-le-hem Eph'ra-tah (fr. Heb.)=BETHLEHEM 1, and EPHRATAH.

Beth-le-hem-ite (fr. Heb.=one from BETHLEHEM) (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18, xvii. 58; 2 Sam. xxi. 19).

• Beth-le-hem-ju'dah (fr. Heb.)=BETHLEHEM 1. Beth-lo'mon (1 Esd. v. 17)=BETHLEHEM 1.

Beth-ma'a-chah [-kah] (fr. Heb.=house of Maachah, Ges.), a place named only in 2 Sam. xx. 14, 15, in defining the position of ABEL; perhaps = MAACHAH, or ARAM-MAACHAH, one of the petty Syrian kingdoms in the N. of Palestine. Beth-maachah is supposed by Thomson (i. 326) to have been at the modern Hunin, three or four miles from Abil (Abel). But see BETH-REHOB.

Beth-mar'ca-both (fr. Heb.=house of the chariots), a town of Simeon, situated in the extreme S. of Judah, with Ziklag and Hormah (Josh. xix. 5; 1 Chr. iv. 31); perhaps = MADMANNAH. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, under "S. country") suggests that the name may be retained in Wady el-Murtabeh, about ten miles S. W. of Beer-sheba. But see MADMANNAH.

Beth-me'on (fr. Heb.=house of habitation, Ges.) (Jer. xlviii. 23), contracted from BETH-BAAL-MEON.

• Beth-mil'lo (Heb.) (2 K. xii. 20, margin) = "house of Millo." MILLO, THE HOUSE OF, 2.

Beth-nim'rah (fr. Heb.=house of limpid and sweet waters, Ges.), a fenced city E. of the Jordan taken and built by the tribe of Gad (Num. xxxii. 36), described as lying in the valley beside Beth-haran (Josh. xiii. 27); also called NIMRAH; identified with the ruins of Nimrin, at the lower end of the Wady Sha'ib, at the mouth of which, a few miles above Jericho, is one of the regular fords of the Jordan (Rbn. i. 551). BETHABARA.

Beth-o'ron = BETH-HORON (Jd. iv. 4).

Beth-pa'let (fr. Heb.=house of flight), a town in the extreme south of Judah, named (Josh. xv. 27) with Moladah and Beer-sheba; = BETH-PHELET; at a ruin called Jerrah? (so Wilton in Neyeb). HAZAR-GADDAH.

Beth-paz'zez (fr. Heb.=house of dispersion, Ges.), a town of Issachar named with Eng-anuim and En-haddah (Josh. xix. 21).

Beth-pe'or (fr. Heb.=temple of Peor, i. e. of Baal-peor, Ges.), a place, no doubt dedicated to the god Baal-peor, on the E. of Jordan, opposite Jericho, and six miles above Libias or Beth-haran. It was in the possession of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 20). One of the last halting-places of the children of Israel is designated—"the ravine ("valley," A. V.) over against Beth-peor" (Deut. iii. 29, iv. 46).

Beth-phage [-fa-je, or -faje] (L. fr. Heb.=house of unripe figs), a place on the mount of Olives, on the road between Jericho and Jerusalem; apparently close to BETHANY (Mat. xxi. 1; Mk. xi. 1; Lk. xix. 29), and from its being named first in the narrative of a journey from E. to W., it has been supposed (Rbn., &c.) E. of Bethany. No remains, however, which could answer to this position have been found, and the traditional site is above Bethany, half-way between that village and the top of the mount. Schwarz (263, 4), Van de Velde (ii. 257), and Barclay, in his map, appear to agree in placing Bethphage on the S. shoulder of the "Mount of Offence," above the village of Siloam, and therefore W. of Bethany (for this compare Jn. xii. 1-12 with Mat. xxi. 1).

Beth-phe'let (fr. Heb. = BETH-PALET) (Neh. xi. 26) = BETH-PALET.

Beth-ra'pha (L. fr. Heb. = house of Rapha, or of the giant), a name which occurs in the genealogy of Judah as the son of Esh-ton (1 Chr. iv. 12).

Beth-re'hob (fr. Heb. = house of Rehob, or of room), a place mentioned as having near it the valley in which lay the town of Laish or Dan (Judg. xviii. 28). It was one of the little kingdoms of Aram or Syria (2 Sam. x. 6), also called REHOB. Robinson supposes (iii. 371) that Beth-rehob was at the modern Hünin, a large ruined fortress commanding the plain of the Hüleh, in which the city of Dan (Tell el-Kädy) lay; Thomson (i. 326, 376) supposes Beth-rehob to have been at the modern Bünas, where is also an ancient castle commanding the pass from the Hüleh over Hermon to Damascus and the E.

Beth-sa'l-da (L. fr. Heb. = house of fish). 1. "Bethsaida of Galilee" (Jn. xii. 21), a city which was the native place of Andrew, Peter, and Philip (Jn. i. 44, xii. 21) in the land of Gennesaret (Mk. vi. 45; compare 53), and therefore on the W. side of the lake. It was evidently near to Capernaum, and Chorazin (Mat. xi. 21; Lk. x. 13; and compare Mk. vi. 45, with Jn. vi. 17), and, if the interpretation of the name is to be trusted, close to the water's edge. Robinson (ii. 405-6, iii. 359) places Bethsaida at 'Ain el-Tubighah, a small village with a copious stream and immense fountains, about two-thirds of a mile N. of Khän Mīnyeh, which he identifies with Capernaum.—2. By comparing the narratives in Mk. vi. 31-53, and Lk. ix. 10-17, in the latter of which "a desert place, belonging to the city called Bethsaida," is named as the spot at which the miracle of feeding the five thousand took place, while in the former the disciples are said to have been constrained by Jesus: "to get into the ship and to go to the other side before unto Bethsaida" (verse 45), and then, after the gale, to have come (verse 53) "into the land of Gennesaret," Reland concluded that the Bethsaida mentioned in Lk. ix. 10 must have been a second place of the same name on the E. of the lake. Such a place there was at the N. E. extremity, formerly a village, but rebuilt and adorned by Philip the Tetrarch, and raised to the dignity of a town under the name of Julius, after the daughter of the emperor. Here in a magnificent tomb Philip was buried. Of this Bethsaida we have certainly one and probably two mentions in the Gospels:—(a.) That named above (Lk. ix. 10).—(b.) The other, most probably, in Mk. viii. 22.—Until the latter part of the eighteenth century there was supposed to be only one Bethsaida, viz. at the entrance of the Jordan into the lake or sea of Gennesaret. Reland's assumption of two Bethsidas, given above, though now adopted by many (Robinson, Winer, Kitto, Fairbairn, Mr. Grove, &c.), is not accepted by some of the best investigators (Hug, Thomson, E. S. xviii. 251, &c.). There are remains of ancient buildings on both sides of the Jordan at and above its entrance into the lake of Gennesaret. Those on the W. side are supposed by Thomson (ii. 9) to mark that part of Bethsaida which was in Galilee; those on the E. side to belong to that part which Philip repaired and called Julius. The "desert place" where the five thousand were fed was probably the modern Bulaiha, a smooth, grassy plain at the N.E. part of the lake (Thomson ii. 29). (See Map under JORDAN.)

Beth'sa-mos (1 Esd. v. 18) = BETH-AZMAVETH.

Beth'san (L. form of BETH-SHEAN) (1 Mc. v. 52; xii. 40, 41) = BETH-SHEAN.

Beth-shan (fr. Heb. = BETH-SHEAN, Ges.) (1 Sam. xxxi. 10, 12; 2 Sam. xxi. 12) = BETH-SHEAN.

Beth-she'an (fr. Heb. = house of quiet, Ges.), or in Samuel, BETH-SHAN, and in 1 Mc. BETHSAN, a city, which, with its dependent towns, belonged to Manasseh (1 Chr. vii. 29), though within the limits of Issachar (Josh. xvii. 11), and therefore on the W. of Jordan (compare 1 Mc. v. 52)—but not mentioned in the lists of the latter tribe. The Canaanites were not driven out from the town (Judg. i. 27). In Solomon's time it seems to have given its name to a district extending from the town itself to Abel-meholah; and "all Beth-shean" was under charge of one of his commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 12). The corpses of Saul and his sons were fastened up to the wall of Beth-shean by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 10, 12) in the open "street" or space, which—then as now—fronted the gate of an Eastern town, and were taken away by the men of Jabesh-Gilead (2 Sam. xxi. 12). In connection with the Maccabees it is mentioned in a cursory manner (1 Mc. v. 52, xii. 40, 41). The name of SCYTHOPOLIS (Jd. iii. 10; 2 Mc. xii. 29) has not survived to the present day; and the place is still called Baisán. The village and ruins are on the brow, just where the great plain of Jezreel descends, some three hundred feet, to the level of the Ghór or Jordan valley, about twelve miles S. of the sea of Galilee, and four miles W. of the Jordan.

Beth-she-mesh or Beth-she'mesh (fr. Heb. = house of the sun). 1. A town on the N. boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 10). It was between Kirjath-jearim and Timnah, and near the low-country of Philistia. Beth-shemesh was one of the cities of Judah allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 16; 1 Chr. vi. 59); and it is named in one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 9). When the Philistines sent back the ark, it came from Ekron to Beth-shemesh, and the men of Beth-shemesh (probably the number 50,070 is erroneous; see ABIJAH) were smitten for looking into the ark (1 Sam. vi.). At Beth-shemesh Amaziah, king of Judah, was defeated and taken by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 K. xiv. 11, 13; 2 Chr. xxv. 21, 23). Beth-shemesh was taken and occupied by the Philistines in the days of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 18). Beth-shemesh probably = IR-SHEMESH (compare Josh. xv. 10, xix. 41, 43; 1 K. iv. 9). Beth-shemesh is now 'Ain-Shems, a ruined village about two miles from the great Philistine plain, and three and two-thirds hours = eleven miles S. E. from Ekron (Rbn. ii. 224-6, 573).—2. A city on the border of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22).—3. A "fenced city" of Naphtali, from which the Canaanites were not expelled; twice named (Josh. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33) with BETH-ANATH.—4. An idolatrous temple or place in Egypt (Jer. xliii. 13); = ON, or Heliopolis, called by the Arabs in the middle ages 'Ain-Shems.

Beth-she-mite or Beth-she'mite (fr. Heb. = one from BETH-SHEMESH) (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18).

Beth-shit'tah (fr. Heb. = house of the acacia), one of the spots to which the flight of the host of the Midianites extended after their discomfiture by Gideon (Judg. vii. 22); conjectured to have been at the modern Shutta, between Mount Tabor and Bethshean (Itin. ii. 356).

Beth-sa'ra (L.) = BETH-ZUR (1 Mc. iv. 29, 61, vi. 7, 26, 31, 49, 50, ix. 52, x. 14, xi. 65, xiv. 7; 2 Mc. xi. 5, xiii. 19, 22).

Beth-tap'pu-ah (fr. Heb. = house of the apple, or cidron; see APPLE), a town in the mountains of Judah, near Hebron (Josh. xv. 53; compare 1 Chr. ii. 43); at the modern village of Teffüh, an hour and three-quarters, or say five miles, W. of Hebron, on a ridge of high table-land. TAPPUAH.

Beth-u'el (Heb. man of God, Ges.), son of Nahor by Milcah; nephew of Abraham, and father of Itebekah (Gen. xxii. 22, 23, xxiv. 15, 24, 47, xxviii. 2). In xxv. 20, and xxviii. 5, he is called "Bethuel the Syrian." Though often referred to as above in the narrative, Bethuel only appears in person once (xiv. 50). Prof. Blunt ingeniously conjectures (Coincidences, I. § iv.) that he was the subject of some imbecility or other incapacity.

Beth-u'el (Heb. abode of God, Ges.) = BETHUEL (1 Chr. iv. 30). BETHUEL 2.

Bethul (Heb. abode of God, Ges.), a town of Simeon in the S., named with El-tolad and Hormah (Josh. xix. 4); = CHESIL and BETHUEL; probably = BETHUEL 2; supposed by Rowlands to have been at the ruins el-Khulawah (ancient Elusa), about twelve miles S.W. from Beer-sheba; by others at Beit Ula, six or eight miles E. from Beit Jibrin (ancient Eleutheropolis).

Beth-u'li-a (L.; Gr. Betulona; fr. Heb. = the virgin of Jehovah, Westcott), the city which was the scene of the chief events of the Book of JUDITH, in which book only the name occurs. Its position is described with very minute detail. It was near to Dothaim (iv. 6), on a hill which overlooked the plain of Esdraelon (vi. 11, 13, 14, vii. 7, 10, xiii. 10) and commanded the passes from that plain to the hill country of Manasseh (iv. 7, vii. 1), in a position so strong that Holofernes abandoned the idea of taking it by attack, and determined to reduce it by possessing himself of the two springs or wells which were "under the city," in the valley at the foot of the eminence on which it was built, and from which the inhabitants derived their chief supply of water (vi. 11, vii. 7, 13, 21). Notwithstanding this detail, however, the identification of the site of Bethulia is one of the greatest puzzles of sacred geography. Von Raumer (Ful. 135, 6) suggests Sânûr, which is perhaps the nearest to probability. This is a village with an old castle on a steep lofty rock, about two miles from Dothan, and seven from Jenin (Engannim) (V. de V. i. 366), which stand on the very edge of the great plain of Esdraelon.

Beth-zach-a-ri-as. BATHZACHARIAS.

Beth-zur (fr. Heb. = house of rock), a town in the mountains of Judah, named between Halbul and Gedor (Josh. xv. 58); probably founded by the people of Maon (1 Chr. ii. 45), and fortified by Rehobam (2 Chr. xi. 7). After the Captivity the ruler of the district (A. V. "half part;" see PART) of Bethzur assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 16). Before Beth-zur Judas Maccabeus gained one of his earliest victories over Lysias (1 Mc. iv. 29). It was strongly fortified by Judas and his brethren as a defence against Idumea (verse 61), and afterward was besieged and taken by Antiochus Eupator (vi. 31, 50), and Simon Maccabeus (xi. 65). (BETHISURA.) The recovery of the site of Beth-zur, under the almost identical name of Beit-Sûr

(B. S. 1843, p. 56), explains its impregnability, and also the reason for the choice of its position, since it commands the road from Beer-sheba and Hebron, which has always been the main approach to Jerusalem from the S.

Beth-to'li-us (1 Esd. v. 21) = BETHEL 1.

Beth-o-mes'tham and Beth-o-mas'them (fr. Gr.), a town "over against Esdraelon, facing the plain that is near Dothaim" (Jd. iv. 6, xv. 4). No attempt to identify it has been hitherto successful.

Beth-o-nim (Heb. = pistachio nuts), a town of Gad, apparently on the N. boundary (Josh. xiii. 26).

* Beth-ray', to, in A. V. = to deliver into an enemy's power by treachery or violation of obligation (1 Chr. xii. 17; Mat. x. 4, &c.). JUDAS ISCARIOT.

Beth-troth'ing. MARRIAGE.

Beu'lah [bu-] (Heb. married), the name which the land of Israel is to bear, when "the land shall be married" (Is. lxii. 4). The marriage relationship sets forth the covenant of grace (Fairbairn). MARRIAGE, V.

* Be-wall', to. MOURNING.

* Be-wray', to, an old English verb = to betray, expose, or make known (Is. xvi. 3; Mat. xxvi. 73, &c.).

* Be-yond'. The phrase "beyond JORDAN" in the Pentateuch (written E. of Jordan) = W. of Jordan (Gen. i. 10, 11; Deut. iii. 25); in Is. ix. 1 and Mat. iv. 15 = beyond the sources of the Jordan (so Lange on Mat. i. c.; Galilee extended N. of the Jordan); elsewhere in A. V. usually = E. of Jordan (Josh. ix. 10, xiii. 8; Jn. i. 28, &c.). So also "on yonder side Jordan," "on the other side Jordan," &c., usually = W. of Jordan in the Pentateuch, but E. of Jordan elsewhere (Num. xxxii. 19; Deut. xi. 30; Josh. xii. 1; Mk. x. 1, &c.). To "go beyond" (Num. xxii. 18, xxiv. 13; 1 Th. iv. 6) = to overpass or overgo, to transgress.

Be'zai (Heb. prob. = BESAI, Ges.), ancestor of 323 (Ezr. ii. 17; 324 in Neh. vii. 23), who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel. (BASSA.) The name occurs again among those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 18).

Bez'a-leel (fr. Heb. = in the shadow of God, i. e. in his protection, Ges.). 1. The artificer to whom was confided by Jehovah the design and execution of the works of art required for the tabernacle in the wilderness (Ex. xxxi. 1-6, xxxv. 30 ff., xxxvi., xxxvii., xxxviii.). His charge was chiefly in all works of metal, wood, and stone. AHOLIAB was associated with him for the textile fabrics. Bezaleel was of the tribe of Judah, the son of Uri the son of Hur (1 Chr. ii. 20).—2. A son of Pahath-moab who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30); called SESTHEL in 1 Esdras.

Be'zek (Heb. lightning, Ges.). 1. The residence of ADONI-BEZEK (Judg. i. 5); in the lot of Judah (verse 3), and inhabited by Canaanites and Perizzites (verse 4). This must have been distinct from—2. The place where Saul numbered the forces of Israel and Judah before going to the relief of Jabesh-Gilead (1 Sam. xi. 8). This cannot have been more than a day's march from Jabesh; and was therefore doubtless somewhere in the centre of the country, near the Jordan valley. Eusebius and Jerome mention two places of this name close together, seventeen miles from Neapolis (Shechem) on the road to Beth-shean; but neither has been identified in modern times.

Be'zer (fr. Heb. = ore of gold and silver, precious metals in the rude state as cut or dug out of mines, Ges.) in the wilderness, a city of the Reubenites, with suburbs, set a part by Moses as one of the three cities of refuge E. of the Jordan, and allotted to the Merarites (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8, xxi. 36; 1 Chr. vi. 78); probably=Boson 1; probably situated S.E. of Heshbon on the borders of the desert (Porter in Kitto).

Be'zer (fr. Heb.; see above), son of Zophah; a chief of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 37).

Be'zeth (Gr.), a place at which Bacchides encamped after leaving Jerusalem (1 Mc. vii. 19). By Josephus the name is given as "the village Bethzetho" (compare Beth-Zaith, a Syriac name of the Mount of Olives). The name may thus refer either to the main body of the Mount of Olives, or to that branch of it N. of JERUSALEM, which at a later period was called Bezetha.

Bi'a-tas (1 Esd. ix. 48) = PELATAH 2.

Bible [-bl] (fr. the Gr. pl. biblia = small books).

I. The application of the word Biblia, as a distinctive term, to the collected books of the O. T. and N. T. is not to be traced further back than the fifth century. Greek writers enumerate "the books" (ta biblia) of the O. T. and N. T.; and as these were contrasted with the apocryphal books circulated by heretics, there was a natural tendency to the appropriation of the word as limited by the article to the whole collection of the canonical Scriptures. (CANON; INSPIRATION; NEW TESTAMENT; OLD TESTAMENT; SCRIPTURE; WRITING.) The liturgical use of the Scriptures, as the worship of the Church became organized, would naturally favor this application. The MSS. from which they were read would be emphatically the books of each church or monastery. And when this use of the word was established in the East, it would naturally pass gradually to the Western Church. It is however worthy of note, as bearing on the history of the word in our own language, and on that of its reception in the Western Church, that "Bible" is not found in Anglo-Saxon literature. In R. Brunne (p. 290), Piers Ploughman (1916, 4271), and Chaucer (Prolog. 437), it appears in its distinctive sense. From that time (fourteenth century) the higher use prevailed to the exclusion of any lower; and the choice of it, rather than of any of its synonyms, by the great translators of the Scriptures, Wicliffe, Luther, Coverdale, fixed it beyond all possibility of a change.—II. The history of the growth of the collections known as the O. T. and N. T. respectively, will be found under CANON. The two were looked on as of coördinate authority, and therefore as parts of one whole. (INSPIRATION.) The earliest records of the worship of the Christian Church indicate the liturgical use of writings of the N. T., as well as of the O. T. Theophilus of Antioch, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, all speak of the N. T. writings as making up with the O. T. the whole of SCRIPTURE.—III. The existence of a collection of sacred books recognized as authoritative, leads naturally to a more or less systematic arrangement. The Prologue to Ecclesiasticus mentions "the law and the prophets and the other Books." In the N. T. there is the same kind of recognition. "The Law and the Prophets" is the shorter (Mat. xi. 13, xxii. 40; Acts xiii. 15, &c.); "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms" (Lk. xxiv. 44), the fuller statement of the division popularly recognized. The arrangement of the books of the Hebrew text under these three heads requires, however, a further notice.—1. The Tôrâh (Heb. = Gr. nomos = "Law") naturally continued to occupy the position which it must have held from the first as the most ancient and authoritative portion (PENTATEUCH). In the Hebrew classification the titles of the five distinct portions of "the Law" (Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy) were taken from the initial words of the books, or from prominent words in the initial verse: in that of the LXX., and so in the Vulgate and A.V., they were intended to be significant of the subject of each book.—2. The next group (Heb. Nebi'im = "the Prophets") presents a more singular combination. The arrangement stands as follows: a. The Elder or Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel, 2 Samuel, 1 Kings, 2 Kings).—b. The Later Prophets, viz., the Major, i. e. Greater (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel), and the Lesser, i. e. the twelve Minor Prophets (= Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, Malachi). The Hebrew titles of these books correspond to those of the English bibles. The grounds on which books simply historical were classed under the same name as those which contained the teaching of Prophets, in the stricter sense of the word, are not at first sight obvious, but the O. T. presents some facts which may suggest an explanation. The Sons of the Prophets (PROPHET; SAMUEL) (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 K. v. 22, vi. 1) living together as a society, almost as a caste (Am. vii. 14), trained to a religious life, cultivating sacred minstrelsy, must have occupied a position as instructors of the people, even in the absence of the special calling which sent them as God's messengers to the people. A body of men so placed become naturally, unless intellectual activity is absorbed in asceticism, historians and annalists. The references in the historical books of the O. T. show that they actually were so. Nathan the prophet, Gad, the seer of David (1 Chr. xxix. 29), Ahijah and Iddo (2 Chr. ix. 29), Isaiah (2 Chr. xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32), are cited as chroniclers.—3. Last in order came the group known as Cithubim (Heb. = writings; in Gr. graphêis [= writings], hagiographa [a word transferred into Latin and English] = sacred writings), including the remaining books of the Hebrew Canon, arranged in the following order, and with subordinate divisions: (a) Psalms, Proverbs, Job. (b) Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, called "the five rolls" (Heb. megillôth). (c) Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, 1 Chronicles, 2 Chronicles.—The LXX. placed "the Law" first, but did not recognize the distinctions between the Greater and Lesser Prophets, and between the Prophets and the Hagiographa. Daniel, with the apocryphal additions, follows Ezekiel; the Apocryphal first or third Esdras comes as a second, following the Canonical Ezra. Tobit and Judith are placed after Nehemiah; Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus after Canticles; Baruch before and the Epistle of Jeremiah after Lamentations; the twelve Lesser Prophets before the four Greater, and 1 and 2 Maccabees at the close of all. The Latin version follows nearly the same order, inverting the relative position of the Greater and Lesser Prophets. The separation of the APOCRYPHA then left the others in the order of the A. V. The history of the arrangement of the Books of the N. T. also presents some variations. The four GOSPELS (probably arranged according to their traditional dates) and the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES uniformly stand first. They are so far to the N. T. what the Pentateuch was to the O. T. The position of the Acts as an intermediate book, the sequel to the Gospels, the prelude to the Epistles, was obviously natural. After this we meet with some striking differences. The order in the Alexandrian, Vatican and Ephraem MSS. (A B C) (NEW TESTAMENT, I. 28) gives precedence to the Catholic or "General" Epistles (Jas., 1 Pet., 2 Pet., 1 Jn., 2 Jn., 3 Jn., Jude), and this appears to have been characteristic of the Eastern Churches. The Western Church, on the other hand, as represented by

Jerome, Augustine, &c., gave priority of position to the Pauline Epistles (PACL), those addressed to churches being arranged according to their relative importance before those addressed to individuals. The Apocalypse (REVELATION OF ST. JOHN), as might be expected from the peculiar character of its contents, occupied a position by itself. Its comparatively late recognition may have determined the position which it has uniformly held as the last of the Sacred Books.—IV. Division into Chapters and Verses.—1. The Hebrew of the O. T. It is hardly possible to conceive of the liturgical use of the books of the O. T., without some kinds of recognized division. The references, however, in Mk. xii. 26 and Lk. xx. 37, Rom. xi. 2 and Acts viii. 32, indicate a division which had become familiar, and show that some at least of the sections were known popularly by titles taken from their subjects. In like manner the existence of a cycle of lessons is indicated by Lk. iv. 17; Acts xiii. 15, xv. 21; 2 Cor. iii. 14. The Talmudic division is on the following plan. "The Law" was in the first instance divided into fifty-four sections (Heb. parshiyóth) so as to provide a lesson for each Sabbath in the Jewish intercalary year. Coexisting with this there was a subdivision into lesser sections. The lesser sections themselves were classed under two heads—the open (Heb. pitúhóth or pitúchóth), which served to indicate a change of subject analogous to that between two paragraphs in modern writing, and began accordingly a fresh line in the MSS.; and the shul (Heb. sithumóth), which corresponded to minor divisions, and were marked only by a space within the line. The sections (Heb. haphláróth) of "the Prophets" were intended to correspond with the larger sections of "the Law," and thus furnish a lesson for every Sabbath; but the traditions of the German and the Spanish Jews present a considerable diversity in the length of the divisions. Of the traditional divisions of the Hebrew Bible, however, that which has exercised the most influence in the received arrangement of the text, was the subdivision of the larger sections into verses (Heb. pisúkim). These do not appear to have been used till the post-Talmudic recension of the text by the Masoretes of the ninth century. The chief facts that remain to be stated as to the verse divisions of the O. T. are, that it was adopted by Stephens in his edition of the Vulgate, 1555, and by Frellon in that of 1556; that it appeared for the first time in an English translation, in the Geneva Bible of 1560, and was thence transferred to the Bishop's Bible of 1568, and the Authorized Version of 1611. In Coverdale's Bible we meet with the older notation, which was in familiar use for other books, and retained in some instances (e.g. in references to Plato) to the present times. The letters A B C D are placed at equal distances in the margin of each page, and the reference is made to the page (or, in the case of Scripture, to the chapter) and the letter accordingly. A more systematic division into chapters was generally adopted in the thirteenth century, and is traditionally ascribed to Stephen Langdon, archbishop of Canterbury, or to Cardinal Hugo = Hugh de St. Cher. As regards the O. T., the present arrangements grow out of the union of Cardinal Hugo's capitular division and the Masoretic verses. The Apocryphal books, to which of course no Masoretic division was applicable, did not receive a versicular division till the Latin edition of Pagninus in 1528, nor the division now in use till Stephens's edition of the Vulgate in 1545.—2. In the N. T., as in the O. T., the system of notation grew out of the necessities of study. The comparison of the Gospel narratives gave rise to attempts to exhibit the harmony between them. Of these, the first of which we have any record, was the Diatessaron of Tatian in the second century. This was followed by a work of like character from Ammonius of Alexandria in the third. The system adopted by Ammonius, however, was practically inconvenient. The search after a more convenient method of exhibiting the parallelisms of the Gospel led Eusebius to form the ten Canons which bear his name, and in which the sections of the Gospels are classed according as the fact narrated is found in 1, 2, 3, or 4 of the Evangelists. The Epistles of St. Paul were first divided in a similar manner by the unknown bishop to whom Euthalius assigns the credit of it (about 396), and he himself, at the instigation of Athanasius, applied the method of division to the Acts and the Catholic Epistles. Andrew, bishop of Cesarea in Cappadocia, completed the work by dividing the Apocalypse (about 500). With the N. T., however, as with the O. T., the division into chapters, adopted by Cardinal Hugo in the thirteenth century, superseded those that had been in use previously, appeared in the early editions of the Vulgate, was transferred to the English Bible by Coverdale, and so became universal. The notation of the verses in each chapter naturally followed on the use of the Masoretic verses for the O. T. The whole work of subdividing the chapters of the N. T. into verses was accomplished by Robert Stephens in 1548, during his journey from Paris to Lyons. While it was in progress men doubted of its success. No sooner was it known than it met with universal acceptance. The edition in which this division was first adopted was published in 1551; another came from the same press in 1555. It was used for the Vulgate in the Antwerp edition of Hentenius in 1559, for the English version published in Geneva in 1560, and from that time, with slight variations in detail, has been universally recognized. The convenience of this division for reference is obvious; but it may be questioned whether it has not been purchased at a great sacrifice of the perception by ordinary readers of the true order and connection of the narrative or thought of the sacred writers. The original is more faithfully represented in the Paragraph Bibles and in the Greek Testament as edited by Hahn, Lachmann, Tischendorf, &c.

Bleh'ri [bik-] (Heb. first-born, Sim.; youthful, Ges., Fñ.; perhaps son of Becher, Ld. A. C. H.), ancestor of Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 1, &c.).

Bld'kar (Heb. son of stabbing, i. e. stabber, Ges.), Jehu's "captain," originally his fellow-officer (2 K. ix. 25); who completed the sentence on Jehoram son of Ahab by casting his body into the field of Naboth.

Bler. BURIAL 2.

Big'tha (Heb. perhaps = garden, gardener, or fr. Pers. and Sansc. = given by fortune, Ges.; probably = ABAGTHA), one of the seven chamberlains or eunuchs of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Big'than and Big'tha-na (both Heb. = BIGHA, Ges.), a eunuch ("chamberlain," A. V.) in the court of Ahasuerus, one of those "who kept the door" and conspirator with Teresh against the king's life (Esth. ii. 21). The conspiracy was detected by Mordecai, and the eunuchs hung. Prideaux supposes that these officers had been partially superseded by the degradation of Vashti, and sought revenge by the murder of Ahasuerus.

Big'val or Big'va-l (Heb. perhaps = husbandman, gardener, or [so Bohlen] fr. Sansc. = happy, Ges.). 1. Ancestor of 2,066 (Neh. 2,067) who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 14; Neh. vii. 19), and of 72 with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 14). (BAGO; BAGOI.)—2. Apparently a chief of Zerubbabel's expedition (Ezr. ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7), who afterward signed the covenant (Neh. x. 16).

Bik'ath-A'ven (Heb.) (Am. i. 5, margin). AVEN 1.

Bil'dad (Heb. son of contention, Ges.), the second of Job's three friends; called "the SHUHITE" (Job ii. 11, &c.). Job.

Bil'e-am (Heb. = BALAAM), a town in the western half of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. vi. 70 only), given to the Kohathites. In Josh. xvii. and xxi. IBLEAM and GATH-RIMMON 2 are substituted for it.

Bil'gah (Heb. cheerfulness, Ges.). 1. A priest in David's time; head of the fifteenth course for the Temple service (1 Chr. xxiv. 14).—2. A priest who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 6, 18); probably = BILGAI.

Bil'gal or Bil'ga-i (Heb. = BILGAH, Ges.), a priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 8). BILGAH 2.

Bil'hah (Heb. bashfulness? Ges.). 1. Handmaid of Rachel (Gen. xxix. 29), and concubine of Jacob, to whom she bore Dan and Naphtali (Gen. xxx. 3-8, xxxv. 25, xli. 25; 1 Chr. vii. 13). Reuben afterward lay with her (Gen. xxxv. 22).—2. A town of the Simconites (1 Chr. iv. 29); also called BAALAH and BALAH.

Bil'han (Heb. perhaps bashful, modest, Ges.). 1. A Horite chief, son of Ezer, dwelling in Mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 27; 1 Chr. i. 42).—2. A Benjamite, son of Jediel (1 Chr. vii. 10).

* Bill. DIVORCE; LOAN; WRITING.

Bil'shan (Heb. son of the tongue, i. e. eloquent, Ges.), a companion of Zerubbabel on his expedition from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).

Bim'hal (Heb. son of circumcision, i. e. circumcised, Ges.), an Asherite, son of Japhlet (1 Chr. vii. 33).

Bin'e-a (Heb. a gushing forth, fountain, Sim., Ges.), son of Moza, descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 37, ix. 43).

Bin'nu-i (Heb. a building, Ges.). 1. A Levite, father of NOADIAH 1 (Ezr. viii. 33).—2. A son of Pahath-moab; husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30); = BALNURS.—3. A son of Bani; husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 38).—4. BANI 4 (Neh. vii. 15).—5. A Levite, son of Henadad, who assisted in repairing the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 24, x. 9); possibly = Binnui in xii. 8, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah.

Bird is the representative in the A. V. of the following:—1. Heb. 'ôph (Gen. xl. 17, 19, &c.), literally wing = any winged animal; often translated "FOWL."—2. Heb. tsippôr (Gen. vii. 14, xv. 10; Lev. xlv. 4 ff.; Deut. xiv. 11, &c.) = a small bird, and generally any bird.—3. Heb. 'ayit (Is. xlvii. 11; Jer. xii. 9; Ez. xxxix. 4) = a "ravenous bird."—4. Gr. pteleinos (Eccles. xxvii. 9, 19, xliii. 17; Mat. viii. 20, &c.); usually in pl. = "birds," winged animals; compare No. 1.—5. Gr. ptêna, pl. adj. fr. ptênos (1 Cor. xv. 39) = winged animals, "birds."—6. Gr. orncon (Wis. v. 11, xvii. 18, Gr. 17; Rev. xviii. 2) = "bird."—Most of the above Hebrew and Greek words are also translated "fowl."—In modern zoology, birds constitute a class of vertebrate animals, warm-blooded, oviparous, feathered, with beak, two feet, and two wings adapted more or less perfectly for flight. Birds are often noticed in the Scriptures. Ravenous birds and some others were accounted unclean by the Mosaic Law, while most granivorous and granivorous birds appear to have been reckoned CLEAN (Lev. xi. 13-20; Deut. xiv. 11-20). BIRTERN; CAGE; DOVE; FOOD; FOWL; GIN; HYENA; NEST; NET; OSTRICH; PARTRIDGE; PURIFICATION; QUAILS; SACRIFICE; SNARE; SPARROW; TURTLE, &c.

* Birth. CHILDREN.

Birth'day. The custom of observing birthdays is very ancient (Gen. xl. 20; Jer. xx. 15); and in Job i. 4, &c., we read that Job's sons "feasted every one his day." In Persia they were celebrated with peculiar honors and banquets, and in Egypt the kings' birthdays were kept with great pomp. (BANQUETS.) Probably in consequence of the ceremonies usual in their celebration, the Jews regarded their observance as an idolatrous custom (Lightfoot). Many suppose that in Mat. xiv. 6 and Mk. vi. 21 the feast to commemorate Herod's accession is intended, for such feasts were common, and were called "the day of the king" (Hos. vii. 5); but it is supposed by Robinson (N. T. Lex.), Kitto, Meyer, Barnes, &c., to have been on the anniversary of his birth.

Birth right. FIRST-BORN.

Bir'za-vith (Heb. holcs, wounds, or well of olives? Ges.), a name, probably of a place, occurring in the genealogies of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 31; compare ii. 50, 51, ix. 35, &c.). MALCHIEL.

Bish'lam (Heb. son of peace, Ges.), apparently an officer or commissioner of Artaxerxes in Palestine at the return of Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezr. iv. 7); called BELEMUS in 1 Esdras.

Bish'op (fr. Gr. episkopos = "overseer"; L. episcopus). The word episkopos, applied in the N. T. to the officers of the church who were charged with certain functions of superintendence, had been in use before as a title of office. The inspectors or commissioners sent by Athens to her subject-states were episkopoi (Aristoph. Av. 1022). The title was still current and beginning to be used by the Romans in the later days of the republic (Cic. ad Att. vii. 11). The Hellenistic Jews found it employed in the LXX., though with no very definite value, for officers charged with certain functions (Num. iv. 16 [of Eleazar's office], xxxi. 14 ["officers," A. V.]; Ps. cix. 8 [Gr. episkopê = episcopate, "office" in A. V.]; Is. lx. 17 ["exactors," A. V.]). When the organization of the Christian churches in Gentile cities involved the assignment of the work of pastoral superintendence to a distinct order, the title episkopos presented itself as at once convenient and familiar, and was therefore adopted as readily as the word ELDER (Gr. presbuteros) had been in the mother church of Jerusalem. That the two titles were originally equivalent is clear from the following facts (so Professor Plumptre, original author of this article):—1. Bishops and elders are nowhere named together as orders distinct from each other.—2. Bishops and deacons are named as apparently an exhaustive division of the officers of churches addressed by St. Paul as an apostle (Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 1, 8).—3. The same persons are described by both names (Acts xx. 17, 28; Tit. i. 5, 7).—4. Elders discharge functions essentially episcopal, i. e. involving pastoral superintendence (1 Tim. v. 17; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2 [Gr. episkoporentes = "taking the oversight," A. V.]).—Assuming as proved the identity of the bishops and elders of the N. T., we inquire into—I. The relation between the two titles. II. The functions and mode of appointment of the men to whom both titles were applied.—I. There can be no doubt that “elders” had the priority in order of time. The order itself is recognized in Acts xi. 30, and in Acts xv. It is transferred by Paul and Barnabas to the Gentile churches in their first missionary journey (Acts xiv. 23). The earliest use of “bishops,” on the other hand, is in the address of St. Paul to the elders of Miletus (Acts xx. 28 [“overseers,” A. V.]), and there it is rather descriptive of functions than given as a title. The earliest epistle in which it is formally used as = “elders” is Philippians, as late as the time of his first imprisonment at Rome.—II. Of the order in which the first elders were appointed, as of the occasion which led to the institution of the office, we have no record. From the analogy of the seven in Acts vi. 5, 6, it would seem probable that they were chosen by the members of the church collectively, and then set apart to their office by the laying on of the apostles’ hands. In the case of Timothy (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6) the “presbytery,” probably the body of the elders at Lystra, had taken part with the apostle in this act of ordination. (EVANGELIST.) The conditions to be observed in choosing these officers, as stated in the pastoral epistles, are, blameless life and reputation among those “that are without” as well as within the church, fitness for the work of teaching, the wide kindness of temper which shows itself in hospitality, the “being the husband of one wife” (i. e., most probably, not divorced and then married to another), showing powers of government in his own household as well as in self-control, not being a recent and, therefore, an untried convert. When appointed, the duties of the bishop-elders appear to have been as follows:—1. General superintendence over the spiritual well-being of the flock (1 Pet. v. 2). 2. The work of teaching, both publicly and privately (1 Th. v. 12; 1 Tim. v. 17; Tit. i. 9). 3. The work of visiting the sick appears in Jas. v. 14, as assigned to the elders of the church. 4. Among other acts of charity, that of receiving strangers occupied a conspicuous place (1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8).—The mode in which these officers of the church were supported or remunerated varied probably in different cities. At Miletus St. Paul exhorts the elders of the church to follow his example and work for their own livelihood (Acts xx. 34). In 1 Cor. ix. 14, and Gal. vi. 6, he asserts the right of the ministers of the church to be supported by it. In 1 Tim. v. 17, he gives a special application of the principle in the assignment of a double allowance to those who have been conspicuous for their activity (so Professor Plumptre, &c.; Conybeare and Howson translate “twofold honor,” implying reward; Bloomfield says, “no doubt respect is included, as well as provision”; Robinson [N. T. Lex.] translates “double [i. e. any greater relative amount of] honor;” compare the A. V. “double honor”). Collectively at Jerusalem, and probably in other churches, the body of bishop-elders took part in deliberations (Acts xv. 6–22, xxi. 18), addressed other churches (xv. 23), were joined with the apostles in the work of ordaining by the laying on of hands (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 16).—There is no doubt that after the apostolic age the “bishop” had authority over the “elders,” but how far this ecclesiastical preëminence is sanctioned by the N. T. or by apostolic practice is a matter of controversy between the supporters and opposers of diocesan episcopacy, the discussion of which is foreign to the object of this Dictionary of the Bible. APOSTLE; DEACON; ELDER; EVANGELIST; MINISTER; ORDAIN; PASTOR.

* Bit. HORSE.

Bi-thi'ah (fr. Heb. = daughter [i. e. worshipper] of Jehovah; see ASENATH), daughter of a Pharaoh, and wife of Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 18). The Scriptures, as well as the Egyptian monuments, show that the Pharaohs intermarried with foreigners; but such alliances seem to have been contracted with royal families alone. It may be supposed that Bithiah was taken captive.

Bith'ron (Heb. properly, section, i. e. a region cut up with mountains and valleys; or better, a valley cutting into mountains = a craggy valley, mountain gorge, defile, Ges.; compare BETHER), probably a district in the Jordan valley (PLAIN 5), on the E. side of the river (2 Sam. ii. 29). Some take Bithron as a proper name; others (Gesenius, Robinson, &c.; see above) as an appellation of a rugged district, or of a ravine, e. g. Wady Adjlin.

Bi-thyn'i-a (L. fr. Gr.; named from the Bithyni, a Thracian people from the Strymon, a province of Asia Minor mentioned only in Acts xvi. 7, and 1 Pet. i. 1. Bithynia, considered as a Roman province, was on the W. contiguous to ASIA. On the E. its limits underwent great modifications. The province was originally inherited by the Roman republic (B. C. 74) as a legacy from Nicomedes III., the last of an independent line of monarchs, one of whom had invited into Asia Minor those Gauls who gave the name of GALATIA to the central district of the peninsula. On the death of Mithridates, king of Pontus, B. C. 63, the W. part of the Pontic kingdom was added to the province of Bithynia, which again received further accessions on this side under Augustus, A. D. 7. Pliny the younger governed Bithynia as pro-consul when he wrote his celebrated letter to the Emperor Trajan respecting the persecution of Christians; and the Nicene creed owes its origin and name to the general Council held at Nice, the chief town in Bithynia, A. D. 325.

Bitter Herbs (Heb. môrôrim; in Lam. iii. 15 translated “bitterness”). The Israelites were commanded to eat the Paschal lamb “with unleavened bread and with bitter herbs” (Ex. xii. 8; Num. ix. 11). According to Aben Ezra the ancient Egyptians always placed different kinds of herbs upon the table with mustard, and dipped morsels of bread into this salad. That the Jews derived this custom of eating herbs with their meat from the Egyptians is extremely probable. The “bitter herbs” probably = the various edible kinds of bitter plants, whether cultivated or wild, which the Israelites could obtain with facility, particularly bitter cruciferae and other cruciferous plants, or the chicory group of the compositae, the hawkweeds, sow-thistles, and wild lettuces which grow abundantly in the peninsula of Sinai, in Palestine, and in Egypt.

* Bitter Water. ADULTERY; WATER OF JEALOUSY.

Bit'tern (Heb. kippôd). The Hebrew word has been variously translated, the old versions generally (and so Gesenius, Winer, Fürst, &c.) sanctioning “hedgohog” or “porcupine;” “tortoise,” “beaver,” “otter,” “owl,” have also all been conjectured, but without reason. Philological arguments appear to be rather in favor of the “hedgohog” or “porcupine,” for the Heb. kippôd appears = kunfud, the Arabic word for the hedgohog; but zoologically, the hedgohog or porcupine is quite out of the question. The word occurs in Is. xiv. 23, xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14. The former passage would seem to point to some solitude-loving aquatic bird, and so the A. V. translation "bittern" is probably correct. This bird has a habit of erecting and bristling out the feathers of the neck, which gives it some resemblance to a porcupine. Col. H. Smith, in Kitto, says, "though not building like the stork on the tops of houses, it resorts like the heron to ruined structures, and we have been informed that it has been seen on the summit of Tank Kisma at Ctesiphon." The bittern (Botaurus stellaris) belongs to the heron family of birds; it has a wide range, being found in Russia and Siberia as far N. as the river Lena, in Europe generally, in Barbary, S. Africa, Trebizond, and in the countries between the Black and Caspian Seas, &c.

Bi-tu'men. SLIME.

Biz-joth'jah (fr. Heb. = contempt of Jehovah, Ges.), a town in the S. of Judah named with BEER-SHEBA and BAALAH (Josh. xv. 28). Wilton (The Negeb) and Rowlands (in Fairbairn under "S. Country") connect this with the following "Baalah" as a compound name. The former supposes it at the modern village Deir el-Belâh, on the coast, nine or ten miles S. W. from Gaza; the latter possibly at Bawdty, an ancient site in the plain fifteen or twenty miles nearly S. from Gaza.

Biz'tha (Heb. prob. fr. Pers., denoting his condition as a eunuch, Ges.), the second of the seven eunuchs of King Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Black. COLORS.

Blains (Heb. aba'bu'ôth, fr. bûa', to boil up), violent ulcerous inflammations. It was the sixth plague of Egypt (Ex. ix. 9, 10), and hence is called in Deut. xxviii. 27, 35, "the botch of Egypt." MEDICINE.

Blas'phe-my, in its technical English sense, signifies the speaking evil of God, and in this sense it is found Ps. lxxiv. 18; Is. lii. 5; Rom. ii. 24, &c. But according to its Greek derivation it may mean any species of calumny and abuse (or even an unlucky word, Euripides, Ion. 1187): see 1 K. xxi. 10; Acts xviii. 6; Jude 9, "railing," A. V., &c. Blasphemy was punished with stoning, which was inflicted on the son of Shelomith (Lev. xxiv. 11). On this charge both our Lord and St. Stephen were condemned to death by the Jews. When a person heard blasphemy he laid his hand on the head of the offender, to symbolize his sole responsibility for the guilt, and rising on his feet, tore his robe, which might never again be mended. "The blasphemy against the Holy Ghost" has been a fruitful theme for speculation and controversy (Mat. xii. 31; Mk. iii. 29). It consisted in attributing to the power of Satan those unquestionable miracles, which Jesus performed by "the finger of God," and the power of the Holy Spirit; nor have we any safe ground for extending it to include all sorts of willing (as distinguished from wilful) offences, besides this one limited and special sin.

* Blast'ing (Heb. shiddâphôn), a scorching or blight of grain by the influence of the E. wind, &c. (Deut. xxviii. 22; 1 K. viii. 37, &c.; compare Gen. xli. 6 ff.). WINDS.

Blas'tus (L. fr. Gr. = a bud, sprout), the chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I., made by the people of Tyre and Sidon a mediator between them and the angry king (Acts xii. 20).

* Blem'ish (Heb. mûm; Gr. mómos). All officiating priests and all victims for sacrifice were required to be without blemish, i. e. without bodily defect (Lev. xxi. 17 ff., xxii. 17 ff.; Deut. xv. 21, 22, &c.). Both the Hebrew and Greek words are used figuratively of moral defects or faults (Deut. xxxii. 5, A. V. "spot," margin "blot;" Ecclus. xviii. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 13). Jesus Christ is compared to "a lamb without blemish (Gr. a-mómos) and without spot" (1 Pet. i. 19). ATONEMENT; PRIEST; SACRIFICE.

* Bless'ing, in the Scriptures, may come (1.) to men, &c., from God, when He confers on them any favor or benefit (Gen. i. 28; Ps. iii. 8, &c.); (2.) to God from men, &c., when they thankfully acknowledge His goodness and praise Him for His excellence (Ps. ciii. 1, 2, 20-22; Rev. v. 13, &c.); (3.) to man from man, when one prays for or declares God's favor toward the other (Gen. xxvii. xlviii., xlix.; Deut. xxxiii., &c.), or pronounces him favored (Ps. x. 3, &c.); (4.) to man from himself, when he prays for God's favor or pronounces himself prosperous or happy without reference to it (Deut. xxix. 19; Is. lxxv. 16, &c.), &c. PRAYER.

Blind'ing. PUNISHMENTS.

Blind'ness is extremely common in the East from many causes. (MEDICINE.) Blind men figure repeatedly in the N. T. (Mat. ix. 27 ff., xi. 5, xii. 22, xx. 30 ff.; Mk. viii. 22 ff.; Lk. vii. 21; Jn. v. 3, ix. 1 ff. &c.), and "opening the eyes of the blind" is mentioned in prophecy as a peculiar attribute of the Messiah (Is. xxix. 18, &c.). (MIRACLES.) The Hebrews were specially charged to treat the blind with compassion and care (Lev. xix. 14; Deut. xxvii. 18). (POOR.) Blindness is several times mentioned in the Bible as miraculously sent upon enemies of God's people (Gen. xix. 11; 2 K. vi. 18-22; Acts ix. 9). Blindness wilfully inflicted for political or other purposes was common in the East (1 Sam. xi. 2; Jer. xxxix. 7). PUNISHMENTS.

Blood. To blood is ascribed in Scripture the mysterious sacredness which belongs to life, and God reserves it to Himself when allowing man the dominion over and the use of the lower animals for food. Thus reserved, it acquires a double power: 1, that of sacrificial atonement (SACRIFICE); and 2, that of becoming a curse when wantonly shed, unless duly expiated (Gen. ix. 4; Lev. vii. 26, xvii. 11-14). As regards 1, the blood of sacrifices was caught by the Jewish priest from the neck of the victim in a basin, then sprinkled seven times (in case of birds at once squeezed out on the altar, but that of the pass-over on the lintel and door-posts, Ex. xii.; Lev. iv. 5-7, xvi. 14-19). In regard to 2, it sufficed to pour the animal's blood on the earth, or to bury it, as a solemn rendering of the life to God; in case of human bloodshed (MURDER) a mysterious connection is observable between the curse of blood and the earth or land on which it is shed (Gen. iv. 10, ix. 4-6; Num. xxxv. 33; Deut. xxi. 1 ff.; Ps. cvi. 38). That "blood and water" came out from our Lord's side when the soldier pierced Him on the cross, is explained by Dr. W. A. Nicholson (in Kitto) on the supposition that some effusion had taken place in the cavity of the chest, and that the spear penetrated below the level of the fluid. On this supposition, the wound being inflicted shortly after death, blood would also have trickled down with the water, or, at any rate, have appeared at the mouth of the wound, though none of the large vessels had been wounded.

Blood, A-ven'ger of, or Re-ven'ger of. It was, and even still is, a common practice among nations of patriarchal habits, that the nearest of kin should, as a matter of duty, avenge the death of a murdered relative (MURDER). Compensation for murder is allowed by the Koran. Among the Bedouins, and other Arab tribes, should the offer of blood-money be refused, the 'Thar,' or law of blood, comes into operation, and any person within the fifth degree of blood from the homicide may be legally killed by any one within the same degree of consanguinity to the victim. Frequently the homicide will wander from tent to tent over the Desert, or even rove through the towns and villages on its borders with a chain round his neck and in rags, begging contributions from the charitable to pay the apportioned blood-money. Three days and four hours are allowed to the persons included within the 'Thar' for escape. The right to blood-revenge is never lost, except as annulled by compensation: it descends to the latest generation. Similar customs with local distinctions are found in Persia, Abyssinia, and among the Druses and Circassians. The law of Moses was very precise in its directions on the subject of Retaliation.—1. The wilful murderer was to be put to death without permission of compensation. The nearest relative of the deceased became the authorized avenger of blood (Heb. gôel; Num. xxxv. 19), and was bound to execute retaliation himself if it lay in his power. The king, however, in later times, appears to have had the power of restraining this license. The shedder of blood was thus regarded as impious and polluted (Num. xxxv. 16-31; Deut. xix. 11-13; 2 Sam. xiv. 7, 11, xvi. 8, and iii. 29, with 1 K. ii. 31, 33; 2 Chr. xxiv. 22-25).—2. The law of retaliation was not to extend beyond the immediate offender (Deut. xxiv. 16; 2 K. xiv. 6; 2 Chr. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxi. 29, 30; Ez. xviii. 20).—3. The involuntary shedder of blood was permitted to take flight to one of six Cities of Refuge (Num. xxxv. 22 ff.; Deut. xix. 4-6). CITY OF REFUGE.

Blood, Is'sue of. The menstuous discharge or an unnatural discharge of blood from the womb (Lev. xv. 19-30; Mat. ix. 20; Mk. v. 25; Lk. viii. 43). (MEDICINE.) The latter caused a permanent legal uncleanness, the former a temporary one, mostly for seven days; after which the woman was to be purified by the customary offering. PURIFICATION.

Blood, Re-ven'ger of. BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

* Blood'y Flux. FLUX, BLOODY; MEDICINE.

* Blood'y Sweat. SWEAT, BLOODY.

* Blot, in A.V. fig. = blame or blameworthiness (Job xxxi. 7; Prov. ix. 7). To "blot out," fig. = to cancel, remove, destroy (Deut. ix. 14; Ps. li. 1; Rev. iii. 5, &c.). ATONEMENT.

Blue. COLORS.

Bo-an-er'ges [-jeez] (Gr. form of Aram. = sons of thunder), a name given by our Lord to the two sons of Zebedee, James and John (Mk. iii. 17). Probably the name had respect to the fiery zeal of the brothers, signs of which we may see in Lk. ix. 54; Mk. ix. 38; compare Mat. xx. 20 ff.

Boar. SWINE.

* Boat. EGYPT; SHIP.

Bo'az (Heb. fleetness; alacrity, Ges.). 1. A wealthy Bethlehemite, kinsman to Naomi's husband, Elimelech (Ru. ii. 1, &c.). Finding that the kinsman of RUTH, who stood in a still nearer relation than himself, was unwilling to perform the office of the nearest kinsman (Heb. gôel), he had those obligations publicly transferred with the usual ceremonies to his own discharge; and hence it became his duty by the "levirate law" to marry Ruth, and to redeem the estates of her deceased husband Mahlon (iv. 1 ff.) (MARRIAGE, II. ii. 1.). He gladly undertook these responsibilities, and their happy union was blessed by the birth of Obed from whom in a direct line our Lord was descended. Boaz is mentioned in the genealogy (Mat. i. 5; Lk. iii. 32; "Booz" in both), but there is great difficulty in assigning his date. If Boaz = IBZAN, as is stated with some shadow of probability by the Jerusalem Talmud and various Rabbis, several generations must be inserted. Even if we shorten the period of the Judges to 240 years (CHRONOLOGY; JUDGES), we must suppose that Boaz was the youngest son of Salmon, and that he did not marry till the age of sixty-five.—2. One of Solomon's brazen pillars erected in the Temple porch. (JACHIN; TEMPLE.) It stood on the left, and was 18 cubits high (1 K. vii. 15, 21; 2 Chr. iii. 15 ff.; Jer. lii. 21). The apparent discrepancies (18 and 35 cubits high) arise from including or excluding the ornament which united the shaft to the chapter, &c.

Boe'cas (1 Esd. viii. 2) = BURKE.

Boch'e-ru [bok-] (Heb. the first-born is he, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Azel (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44); translated in LXX. "his first-born."

Bo'chim [-kim] (Heb. = the weepers; the weeping, Ges.), a place W. of Jordan, above Gilgal (Judg. ii. 1, 5).

Bo'han (Heb. thumb, Ges.), a Reubenite, after whom was named a stone on the border of the territories of Benjamin and Judah, between Beth-arabah and Beth-hogla on the E., and Adummim and En-she-mesh on the W. (Josh. xv. 6, xviii. 17).

Boll. MEDICINE.

* Bolled [o as in hole] = formed into seed-vessels, going to seed (Ex. ix. 31). Gesenius makes the Hebrew = in flower.

Bol'ster. BED; PILLOW.

* Bond. CHAIN; CORD; LAW; PUNISHMENTS; SLAVE; TRIAL.

Bond'age. SLAVE.

Bon'net. HEAD-DRESS.

Book. WRITING.

Booths. SUCCOTH; TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.

Boo'ty consisted of captives of both sexes, cattle, and whatever a captured city might contain, especially metallic treasures. Within the limits of Canaan no captives were to be made (Deut. xx. 14, 16). (ANATH-EMA.) Beyond those limits, in case of warlike resistance, all the women and children were to be made captives, and the men put to death. The law of booty was that it should be divided equally between the army who won it and the people of Israel, but of the former half one head in every five hundred was reserved to God, and appropriated to the priests, and of the latter one in every fifty was similarly reserved and appropriated to the Levites (Num. xxxi. 26-47). As regarded the army, David added a regulation that the baggage-guard should share equally with the troops engaged (1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25). WAR.

Bo'oz (Gr. fr. Heb.) = BOAZ 1 (Mat. i. 5; Lk. iii. 32).

Bo'rith (2 Esd. i. 2) = BUKRI.

Bor'row-lag. LOAN.

Bos'cath (fr. Heb.) = BOZKATH (2 K. xxii. 1).

* Bo'som [boo'zum]. ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; DRESS.

Bes'or (Gr. and L. fr. Heb.). 1. A large fortified city on the E. of Jordan in the land of Gilead (1 Mc. v. 26, 36); probably = BEZER.—2. The Aramaic pronunciation of BEOR, the father of Balaam (2 Pet. ii. 15).

Bes'o-ra, a strong city in Gilead taken by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. v. 26, 28); doubtless = Bostra. See BOZRAH 2.

* Boss. ARMS, II. 5.

Botch. BLAINS; MEDICINE.

Bot'tle. Four Hebrew words (hémeth or chémeth, nébel or nebel, bakbūk, nôl) and the Greek askos are translated "bottle" in the A. V. (CRUSE 2; PITCHER.) Bottles in Scripture are of two kinds, both of them capable of being closed from the air: 1. The skin bottle; 2. The bottle of earthen or glass ware.—1. The Arabs, and all that lead a wandering life, keep their water, milk, and other liquors, in leathern bottles. These are made of goatskins. When the animal is killed, they cut off its feet and head, and draw it in this manner out of the skin, without opening its belly. In Arabia they tan these skins with acacia-bark and the hairy part is left outside. They afterward sew up the places where the legs were cut off and the tail, and when it is filled they tie it about the neck. The great leathern bottles are made of the skin of a he-goat, and the small ones, that serve instead of a bottle of water on the road, are made of a kid's skin. Bruce gives a description of a vessel of the same kind, but larger, made of an ox's skin. Wine-bottles of skin are mentioned as used by Greeks, Romans, and Egyptians, by Homer (Od. vi. 78; Il. iii. 247); by Herodotus (ii. 121), as used in Egypt; and by Virgil (Georg. ii. 384). Skins for wine or other liquids are in use to this day in Spain, where they are called borrachas. The effect of external heat (rather, of smoke) upon a skin-bottle is indicated in Ps. cxix. 83, "a bottle in the smoke," and of expansion or strain produced by fermentation in Mat. ix. 17, "new wine in old bottles."—2. Vessels of metal, earthen, or glass ware for liquids were in use among the Greeks, Egyptians, Etruscans, and Assyrians, and also no doubt among the Jews, especially in later times. Thus Jer. xix. 1, "a potter's earthen bottle." The Jews probably borrowed their manufactures in this particular from Egypt, which was celebrated for GLASS work.

Bow. ARMS, I. 3.

* Bow'els, in Scripture, = the inward parts, often particularly denoting the upper viscera, i. e. the heart, &c.; hence, figuratively, the inner man, the soul, thoughts, affections, tender feelings, love, mercy, &c. Compare the English breast, heart, &c.

* Bow'ing. ADORATION.

Bowl. The Hebrew words translated "bowl" in the A. V. are mizrák, saph, gulláh, séphel, gibíá, mínakkíth; see also CUP; DISH; POT. On the uncertainty as to the precise form and material, see BASIN. Bowls would probably be used at meals for liquids, or broth, or pottage (2 K. iv. 40). Modern Arabs are content with a few wooden bowls. In the British Museum are several terra-cotta bowls with Chaldean inscriptions of a superstitious character, expressing charms against sickness and evil spirits, which may possibly explain the "divining cup" of Joseph (Gen. xlv. 5). The bowl was filled with some liquid which was drunk off as a charm against evil. On "the golden bowl" (Eccl. xii. 6), see under MEDICINE.

* Box. ALABASTER; VIAL.

Box'-tree or Box, the translation in the A. V. of the Hebrew tashshúr (Is. xli. 19, ix. 13). The Talmudical and Jewish writers generally, with the A. V. and other modern versions, Rosenmüller, Parkhurst, &c., are of opinion that the box-tree is intended. The Syriac and the Arabic version of Saadias, with Gesenius and First, understand by it a species of cedar called sherbin, distinguished by its small cones and upright branches. Although the claim of the box-tree to represent the Hebrew tashshúr is far from being satisfactorily established, yet the evidence rests on a better foundation than that which supports the claims of the sherbin (so Mr. Houghton). Bochart, Rosenmüller, &c., suppose box-trees to be meant in Ez. xxvii. 6, where the A. V. has "the company of the Ashurites," and thus translate: "Thy BENCHES have they made of IVORY, inlaid with box-wood from the isles of Chittim." Box-wood writing tablets are alluded to in 2 Esd. xiv. 24.

Bo'zez (fr. Heb. = shining, glittering, Ges.), one of the two "sharp rocks" (Heb. = "teeth of the cliff") "between the passages" by which Jonathan entered the Philistine garrison at Michmash. It seems to have been that on the N. (1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5).

Boz'kath (fr. Heb. = stony region, high, Ges.), a city of Judah in the lowlands (VALLEY 5; Josh. xv. 39); the native place of King Josiah's mother (2 K. xxii. 1, A. V. "Boscath"); site unknown.

Boz'rah (fr. Heb. = a fold, sheepfold, fortress, stronghold, Ges.). 1. In EDOM—the city of King Jobab the son of Zerah (Gen. xxxvi. 33; 1 Chr. i.

44); doubtless the place mentioned in later times in connection with Edom (Is. xxiv. 6, lxiii. 1; Jer. xlix. 13, 22; Am. i. 12; Mic. ii. 12). There is no reason to doubt that the modern representative of Bozrah is el-Busairch, a village first visited by Burckhardt, on the mountain district S. E. of the Dead Sea, between Tufileh and Petra, about half-way between the latter and the Dead Sea.—2. Among the cities of the land of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 24) is a Bozrah apparently in the “plain country” (PLAIN 4; ver. 21). Here lay Heshbon, Nebo, Kiriathaim, Diblathaim, and the other towns named in this passage, and probably here (so Mr. Grove) Bozrah should be sought, and not, as has been lately suggested (Ptr. ii. 162, &c.), at Bostra, the Roman city in Bashan full sixty miles from Heshbon. Yet Bostra (the modern Busrah, now mostly in ruins) was certainly at a later date an important city; it is in a fertile region; it is not elsewhere mentioned in the Scriptures; the catalogue in Jeremiah includes cities “far or near;” and this may have been a city of Moab at that time.

Bozrah, the ancient Bostra — Bozrah I

Brace'let, the translation in the A. V. of the Heb. et'adiah (ARMLER), tsamid (Gen. xxiv. 22, 30, &c.), shérá (Is. iii. 19), and pdthil (Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25;

ARMLER an account is given of these ornaments, the materials of which they were generally made, the manner in which they were worn, &c. Bracelets of fine twisted Venetian gold are still common in Egypt. Men as well as women wore bracelets. Layard says of the Assyrian kings: “The arms were encircled by armlets, and the wrists by bracelets.”

Bram'ble. THORNS.

* Branch = a limb or shoot of a tree, vine, &c. (Gen. xl. 10, 12; Ps. civ. 12, &c.); often figuratively = that which is closely united to something else, like a branch to a tree, as descendants to an ancestor, kindred to a family, Christians to Jesus Christ, &c. (Jn. xv. 5; Rom. xi. 16 ff., &c.). JESUS CHRIST himself, as a descendant of DAVID and the MESSIAH, is especially so called (Is. iv. 2, xi. 1; Jer. xxiii. 5, xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12; NAZARENK). To “put the branch to the nose” (Ez. viii. 17) is supposed to refer to some idolatrous ceremony, and to indicate insolent or contemptuous feeling (Fairbairn).

Brass. The Heb. nēhōsheth or nēchōsheth is improperly translated “brass,” since the Hebrews were not acquainted with the compound of copper and zinc known by that name. The Hebrew word is often translated “brazen” (Ex. xxxviii. 4, 30; 1 K. xiv. 27; Jer. xv. 20, &c.), once “COPPER” (Ez. viii. 27, margin “brass”), once “STEEL” (Jer. xv. 12). The kindred Heb. adj. nāhūsh or nāchūsh is translated “of brass,” margin “brazen” (Job vi. 12); the feminine nēhūshāh or nēchūshāh is translated “brass” (Lev. xxvi. 19; Job xxviii. 2, &c.), and “steel” (2 Sam. xxii. 35; Job xx. 24; Ps. xviii. 34, Heb. 35). In most places of the O. T. the correct translation would be copper, although it may sometimes = bronze, a compound of copper and tin. Indeed, a simple metal was obviously intended, as we

the Hebrew word here probably = “a string by which a seal-ring was suspended;” see LACZ). Under see from Deut. viii. 9, xxxiii. 25, and Job xxviii. 2. Copper was known at a very early period, and the invention of working it is attributed to Tubal-cain (Gen. iv. 22). Its extreme ductility made its application almost universal among the ancients. The Gr. chalkos is translated "brass" (Mat. x. 9, here = MONEY; Rev. xviii. 12) and "money" (Mk. vi. 8, xii. 41). Two kindred words are also used, viz. chalkeos, A. V. "of brass" (Rev. ix. 20), and plural of chalkron, A. V. "brazen vessels" (Mk. vii. 4). "Sounding brass" (Gr. chalkos; 1 Cor. xiii. 1) = an instrument made of brass or copper, i. e. a trumpet or cymbal (Rbn. N. T. Lex.). It often occurs in metaphors, e. g. Lev. xxvi. 19; Deut. xxviii. 23; Job vi. 12; Jer. vi. 28. It is often used as an emblem of strength, Zech. vi. 1; Jer. i. 18. The Gr. chalkolibanon in Rev. i. 15, ii. 18 (A. V. "fine brass"), has excited much difference of opinion. Some suppose it = orichalcum, a mixed metal (see AMBER) more valuable than gold. It may perhaps be deep-colored frankincense (so Mr. Farrar).

* Bravery, in Isa. iii. 18, A. V. = beauty, splendor.

* Bray, to = make a harsh noise like an ass (Job vi. 5, &c.); also, to pound, mash, or break in pieces (Prov. xxvii. 22). PUNISHMENTS.

* Brazen Sea. SEA, MOLTEN.

Brazen Serpent. SERPENT, BRAZEN.

* Breaches, in Judg. v. 17 (Heb. pl. of miphráts, literally a rent, breach, notch, sc. in the coast, Ges.), probably = havens, harbors. See also FENCED CITY; HOUSE; WAR, &c.

Bread (Heb. lehem or lechem; Gr. artos). The preparation of bread as an article of food dates from a very early period: the earliest undoubted instance of its use is found in Gen. xviii. 6. "Bread" in the Scriptures often = food in general (Gen. xviii. 5; Ex. xvi. 4, 15, 29; Lev. xxi. 8, 17; Neh. v. 18; Mat. vi. 11, xv. 26, &c.). "To eat bread" commonly in the Scriptures = to eat food, to take a meal (Gen. iii. 19, xxviii. 20, xxxi. 54; Ps. xli. 9, cii. 4; Mat. xv. 2; Jn. xiii. 18; 2 Th. iii. 8, 12, &c., &c.). The corn or grain employed for making bread was of various sorts: the best bread was made of WHEAT, which after being ground produced the "flour" or "meal" (Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 24; 1 K. iv. 22, xvii. 12, 14), and when sifted the "fine flour" (Ex. xlix. 2; Gen. xviii. 6) usually employed in the sacred offerings (Ex. xxix. 40; Lev. ii. 1; Ez. xvi. 14), and in the meals of the wealthy (1 K. iv. 22; 2 K. vii. 1; Ez. xvi. 13, 19; Rev. xviii. 13). BARLEY was used chiefly by the poor, or in times of scarcity (2 K. iv. 38, 42; Rev. vi. 6, &c.). "Spelt" (Rye) was also used both in Egypt (Ex. ix. 32) and Palestine (Is. xxviii. 25; Ez. iv. 9). Occasionally the grains above mentioned were mixed, and other ingredients, such as beans, lentils, and millet, were added (Ez. iv. 9; compare 2 Sam. xvii. 28); the bread so produced is called "barley cakes" (Ez. iv. 12, "as barley cakes," A. V.), inasmuch as barley was the main ingredient. The amount of meal for a single baking was an ephah or three measures (Gen. xviii. 6; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 24; Mat. xiii. 33). The baking was done in primitive times by the mistress of the house (Gen. xviii. 6) or one of the daughters (2 Sam. xiii. 8); female servants were however employed in large households (1 Sam. viii. 13). Baking as a profession, was carried on by men (Gen. xl. 1 ff.; Hos. vii. 4, 6). In Jerusalem the bakers congregated in one quarter of the town, as we may infer from the names "bakers' street" (Jer. xxxvii. 21), and "tower of the ovens" (Neh. iii. 11, xii. 38, "furnaces," A. V.). The bread taken by persons on a journey (Gen. xlv. 23; Josh. ix. 12) was probably a kind of biscuit. The process of making bread was as follows:—the flour was first mixed with water, or perhaps milk; it was then kneaded with the hands (in Egypt with the feet also) in a small wooden bowl or "kneading-trough" ("store," A. V. in Deut. xxviii. 5, 17), until it became dough (Ex. xii. 34, 39; 2 Sam. xiii. 8; Jer. vii. 18; Hos. vii. 4). LEAVEN was generally added: but when the time for preparation was short, it was omitted, and unleavened cakes, hastily baked, were eaten, as is still the prevalent custom among the Bedouins (Gen. xviii. 6, xix. 3;

Egyptians making cakes of bread sprinkled with seeds.—(Wilkinson.)

Ex. xii. 39; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24; PASS-OVER). The leavened mass was allowed to stand for some time (Mat. xiii. 33; Lk. xiii. 21). The dough was then divided into round cakes (Ex. xxix. 23; Judg. vii. 13, viii. 5; 1 Sam. x. 3; Prov. vi. 26), not unlike flat stones in shape and appearance (Mat. vii. 9; compare iv. 3), about a span in diameter and a finger's breadth in thickness. The cakes were sometimes punctured, and hence called in Hebrew halláh or challáh (A. V. "cake," "cakes;" Ex. xxix. 2, 23; Lev. ii. 4, viii. 26, xxiv. 5; Num. vi. 15, 19, xv. 20; 2 Sam. vi. 19), and mixed with oil. Sometimes they were rolled out into wafers (Ex. xxix. 2, 23; Lev. ii. 4; Num. vi. 15–19), and merely coated with oil. The cakes were now taken to the oven, having been first, in Egypt, gathered into "white (?) baskets" (Gen. xl. 16; BASKET 1).

An Egyptian carrying cakes to the oven.—(Wilkinson.)

The baskets were placed on a tray and carried on the baker's head (Gen. xl. 16). The methods of baking were, and still are, very various in the East, adapted to the various styles of life; in ovens, fixed or portable (FIRE; OVEN); in holes dug in the ground, &c. Among the pastoral Jews, as among the modern Bedouins, the cakes were spread upon heated stones, or thrown into the heated embers of the fire itself, or roasted by being placed between layers of dung, which burns slowly, and is therefore specially adapted for the purpose (Ez. iv. 12, 15). The cakes required to be carefully turned during the process (Hos. vii. 8). Some kinds of bread were baked on a PAN; such cakes appeared to have been chiefly used as sacred offerings (Lev. ii. 5, vi. 21 [Heb. 14], vii. 9; 1 Chr. xxiii. 29). A similar cooking utensil was used by Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 9). A different kind of bread, probably resembling the flita of the Bedouins, a pasty substance, was prepared in a saucepan (frying-pan, A. V.); this was also reserved for sacred offerings (Lev. ii. 7; vii. 9). SHEWBREAD.

Breast plate. ARMS, II. 1; HIGH-PRIEST, I. 2, a.

* Breec'h'es. HIGH-PRIEST; PRIEST.

* Breth'ren. BROTHER.

* Bribe. Magistrates were expressly forbidden to take bribes or gifts (Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. xvi. 19, &c.), lest justice should thus be perverted. Samuel's sons took bribes, and in consequence the Israelites desired a king (1 Sam. viii. 3 ff.; comp. xii. 3 ff.). See GIRTS; also Job xv. 34; Ps. xxvi. 10; Is. xxxiii. 15; Am. v. 12.

* Brick. Herodotus (i. 179), describing the mode of building the walls of Babylon, says that the clay dug out of the ditch was made into bricks as soon as it was carried up, and burnt in kilns. The brick were cemented with hot bitumen, and at every thirtieth row crates of reeds were stuffed in. This account agrees with the history of the building of the Tower of BABEL, in which the builders used brick instead of stone, and SLIME for mortar (Gen. xi. 3). The Babylonian bricks were more commonly burnt in kilns than those used at Nineveh, which are chiefly sun-dried like the Egyptian. They are usually from twelve to thirteen inches square, and three and a half inches thick, and most of them bear the name, inscribed in cuneiform character, of Nebuchadnezzar, whose buildings, no doubt, replaced those of an earlier age. They thus possess more of the character of tiles (Ez. iv. 1). They were sometimes glazed and enamelled with patterns of various colors. The Israelites, in common with other captives, were employed by the Egyptian monarchs in making bricks and in building (Ex. i. 14, v. 7). Egyptian bricks were not generally dried in kilns, but in the sun, and even without straw are as firm as when first put up in the reigns of the Amunophs and Thothmes whose names they bear. When made of the Nile mud, they required straw to prevent cracking; and crude brick walls had frequently the additional security of a layer of reeds and sticks, placed at intervals to act as binders. A brick-kiln is mentioned as in Egypt (Jer. xliii. 9). A brick pyramid is mentioned (Herodotus, ii. 136) as the work of King Asychis. The Jews learned the art of brick-making in Egypt, and we find the use of the brick-kiln in David's time (2 Sam. xii. 31), and a complaint that the people built altars of brick (Is. lxx. 3). ALTAR, C, 1; POTTERY.

Bride, Bridegroom. MARRIAGE.

Bridge. The only mention of a bridge in the Canonical Scriptures is indirectly in the proper name GESHUR. Judas Maccabeus is said to have intended to make a bridge in order to besiege the town of Caspis, situated near a lake (2 Mc. xii. 13). Though the ARCH was known and used in Egypt as early as the fifteen century B. C., the Romans were the first constructors of arched bridges. They made bridges over the Jordan and other rivers of Syria, of which remains still exist. A stone bridge over the JORDAN, about two miles below the lake of the Huleh, called the bridge of the daughters of Jacob, is mentioned by B. de la Brocquière, A. D. 1432, and a portion of one by Arculf, A. D. 700. The bridge connecting the Temple with the upper city, of which Josephus speaks, seems to have been an arched viaduct.

Bri'er. THORNS.

Brim-an-dine. ARMS, II. 1.

Brimstone (Heb. gophrit; Gr. theion), a well-known inflammable substance = sulphur (Deut. xxix. 23; Job xviii. 15, &c.) It is found in considerable quantities on the shores of the Dead Sea, and in different parts of the world, usually in volcanic districts; also in combination with metals, &c. "Brimstone and fire" (= burning brimstone, Bush; sulphurous flames, Rbn.) are associated in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix. 24; Lk. xvii. 29), and in the punishment of the wicked (Ps. xi. 6; Ez. xxxviii. 22; Rev. xiv. 10, xix. 20, &c.; compare 2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude 7).

* Broid'ered, an obsolete English word = embroidered. (See EMBROIDERER.) "Broidered hair" (1 Tim. ii. 9, marg. "plaited") is the A. V. translation of Gr. plegma (= a braid of hair, braided hair, Rbn. N. T. Lex.). Some copies have "broided hair" or "braided hair." HAIR.

Brook, the A. V. translation of—1. Hebrew aphik, properly = a violent torrent, sweeping through a mountain gorge (Ps. xlii. 1, Heb. 2); elsewhere translated "stream," "channel," "river."

—2. Heb. yéor, an Egyptian word (in the plural = the branches and canals of the Nile, Ges.) (Is. xix. 6-8); elsewhere translated "river," "flood."—3. Heb. michal, probably = a rivulet, or small stream (2 Sam. xvii. 20 only).—4. Heb. nahal or nachal =

the dry torrent-bed (VALLEY 3), and the torrent itself (1 Sam. xvii. 3, &c.; see RIVER 2); = Ar. wady, and Gr. cheimarrhos or cheimarrhos; also translated "river," "stream," "valley."—5. Gr. cheimarrhos (Jd. ii. 8; 1 Mc. v. 37 ff.; Jn. xviii. 1) = Heb. nahal, No. 4 above.—6. Gr. *dióru*x (Ecclus. xxiv. 30, 31) = something dug, a trench or canal.—7. Gr. rheuma (Ecclus. xxxix. 13) = that which flows, a stream.

* Broth, or soup, is mentioned only in Judg. vi. 19, 20, and Is. lxx. 4. FOOD.

Broth'er. The Hebrew áh or ách is used in various senses in the O. T. besides its strict sense of brother (Gen. iv. 2 ff., xix. 20, xlix. 5, &c.), and the less exact sense of half-brother (Gen. xlii. 15, 16; Judg. vii. 19; 2 Sam. xiii. 7 ff., &c.), as 1. A kinsman, and not a mere brother; e. g. nephew (Gen. xiv. 16, xlii. 8; xxix. 12, 15); cousin (1 Chr. xxiii. 22). 2. One of the same tribe (2 Sam. xix. 12, Heb. 13). 3. Of the same people (Ex. ii. 11), or even of a cognate people (Num. xx. 14). 4. An ally (Am. i. 9; see marg.). 5. Any friend (Job vi. 15). 6. One of the same office (1 K. ix. 13). 7. A fellow-man (Lev. xix. 17). 8. Metaphorically of any similarity. It is a very favorite Oriental metaphor, as in Job xxx. 29, "I am a brother to dragons;" see DRAGON 1.—The Gr. adelphos has a similar range of meanings in the N. T., and is also used for a disciple (Mat. xxv. 40, &c.); a fellow-worker (1 Cor. i. 1, &c.), and especially a Christian. Indeed, it was by this name that Christians usually spoke of each other (Acts ix. 30, xi. 29, &c.). The Jewish schools distinguish between "brother" and "neighbor;" "brother" = an Israelite by blood, "neighbor" = a proselyte. They allowed neither title to the Gentiles; but Christ and the apostles extended the name "brother" to all Christians, and "neighbor" to all the world (1 Cor. v. 11; Lk. x. 29 ff.). The question as to who were "the brethren of the Lord," is discussed under JAMES.

* Brown. COLORS.

* Brut (pron. brute), an old English and French word = rumor or news (Jer. x. 22; Nah. iii. 19).

Bu-bas'tis (L.) = PI-BESETH.

* Buck'ler. ARMS, I. 2, c, and II. 5, b.

* Bu'f'et, to (Gr. kolaphizó) = to smite with the fist, to box on the ear, to cuff; in a wider sense, to smite, to maltreat (Mat. xxvii. 67; Mk. xiv. 65; 1 Cor. iv. 11; 2 Cor. xii. 7; 1 Pet. ii. 20).

* Build'ing. ARCHITECTURE; BARN; HOUSE; TEMPLE.

Buk'ki (Heb. = BEKKIAH, Ges.). 1. Son of Abishua and father of Uzzi; fourth after Aaron in the line of the high-priests in 1 Chr. vi. 5, 51 (v. 31, vi. 36 Heb.), and in the genealogy of Ezra (Ezr. vii. 4); called in 1 Esd. viii. 2, BOCCAS, corrupted to BORITH, 2 Esd. i. 2. Whether Bukki ever was high-priest, we are not informed in Scripture. Josephus mentions him in one place (v. 11, § 5) as high-priest, in another (viii. 1, § 3) as the first of those who lived a private life, while the pontifical dignity was in the house of Ithamar. (HIGH-PRIEST).—2. Son of Jogli and prince of Dan; assistant to Joshua and Eleazar in the division of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 22).

Buk'ki'ah (fr. Heb. = wasting from Jehovah, Ges.), a Kohathite Levite, of the sons of Heman, musician in the Temple (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 13).

Bul [u as in dul]. MONTH.

Bull, Bull'ock, terms used synonymously with ox, oxen, in the A. V. as the representatives of several Hebrew words. The plural of the Greek tauros is translated "bulls" in Heb. ix. 13, x. 4.—The Hebrew bakár is properly a generic name for horned cattle when of full age and fit for the plough. Accordingly

It is variously rendered bullock (Is. lxx. 25), cow (Ez. iv. 15), oxen (Gen. xii. 16), beeves (Lev. xxii. 19, 21), &c.—The Hebrew shôr almost always = one head of horned cattle, without distinction of age or sex (Ex. xxi. 28 ff., "ox" A. V.; Lev. xxii. 23, 28, &c.). It is very seldom used collectively. The Chaldee form, tôr, occurs in Ezr. vi. 9, 17, vii. 17; Dan. iv. 25 (22 Heb.), &c.—The Hebrew 'égel, fem. 'eglah = a calf male or female, properly of the first year. The word is used of a trained heifer (Hos. x. 11), of one giving milk (Is. vii. 21, compare 22), of one used in ploughing (Judg. xiv. 18), and of one three years old (Gen. xv. 9).—The Hebrew par = a bull, bullock, especially a young bullock, a steer (Ex. xxix. 1; Lev. iv. 3 ff., &c.), Ges.; once (Judg. vi. 25) possibly a bull of seven years old.—The Hebrew plural abbirim (literally strong ones) is used for bulls in Ps. xxii. 12 (A. V. "strong bulls"; 13 Heb.), 1. 13, lxxviii. 30, Heb. 31; Is. xxxiv. 7; Jer. l. 11.—The Hebrew tô is translated "wild bull" in Is. li. 20, and "wild ox" in Deut. xiv. 5. It was possibly one of the larger species of antelope, and took its name from its swiftness. Robinson (iii. 396) mentions large herds of black and almost hairless buffaloes as still existing in Palestine, and these may be the animal indicated. AGRICULTURE; CALF; CLEAN; FOOD: HEIFER; HERD; OX; SACRIFICE.

Bul'rush [u as in bull, full]. REED.

• Bul'warks. FENCED CITY; WAR.

Bun'ah (Heb. discretion, Ges.), son of Jerahmeel, and descendant of Pharez and Judah (1 Chr. ii. 25).

Bun'ni (Heb. built, Ges.). 1. A Levite in Nehemiah's time (Neh. ix. 4).—2. A chief of the people in Nehemiah's time (x. 15).—3. A Levite, ancestor of Shemaiah in Nehemiah's time (xi. 15).

Bur'ial [ber're-al]. The Jews uniformly disposed of the corpse by entombment where possible, and failing that, by interment; extending this respect to the remains even of the slain enemy and malefactor (1 K. xi. 15; Deut. xxi. 23), in the latter case by express provision of law.—1. The Place of Burial. A natural cave enlarged and adapted by excavation, or an artificial imitation of one, was the standard type of sepulchre. (TOMB.) This was what the structure of the Jewish soil supplied or suggested. Sepulchres, when the owner's means permitted it, were commonly prepared beforehand, and stood often in gardens (GARDEN), by roadsides, or even adjoining houses. Kings and prophets alone were probably buried within towns (1 K. ii. 10, xvi. 8, 28; 2 K. x. 35, xiii. 9; 2 Chr. xvi. 14, xxviii. 27; 1 Sam. xxv. 1, xxviii. 3). Sarah's tomb and Rachel's seem to have been chosen merely from the place of death; but the successive interments at the former (MACPPELAH) are a chronicle of the strong family feeling among the Jews. It was deemed a misfortune or an indignity not only to be deprived of burial (Is. xiv. 20; Jer. vii. 33, viii. 1, 2, &c.; 2 K. ix. 10), but in a lesser degree to be excluded from the family sepulchre (1 K. xiii. 22; 2 Chr. xxvi. 23, xxxiii. 20; compare 2 Sam. xxi. 14). Similarly it was a mark of a profound feeling toward a person not of one's family to wish to be buried with him (Ru. i. 17; 1 K. xiii. 31), or to give him a place in one's own sepulchre (Gen. xxiii. 6; compare 2 Chr. xxiv. 16). Cities soon became populous and demanded cemeteries, which were placed without the walls; such a one seems intended by "the graves of the children of the people" (2 K. xxiii. 6), situated in the valley of the Kidron or of Jehoshaphat. Jeremiah (vii. 32, xix. 11) threatens that TOPHET should be polluted by burying there (compare 2 K. xxiii. 16). Such was also the "POTTER'S FIELD" (Mat. xxvii. 7). Sepulchres were marked sometimes by pillars, as that of Rachel (Gen. xxxv. 20), or by pyramids as those of the Asmoneans at Modin (1 Mc. xiii. 28), and had places of higher and lower honor. Such as were not otherwise noticeable were scrupulously "whited" (Mat. xxiii. 27) once a year, after the rains before the passover, to warn passers by of defilement.—2. The Mode of Burial. While the O. T. notices the burial of persons of rank or public eminence, the N. T. takes its examples from private station. But in both cases "the manner of the Jews" included the use of spices, where they could command the means. Thus Asa lay in a "bed of spices" (2 Chr.

xvi. 14). A portion of these were burnt in honor of the deceased, and to this use was probably destined part of the one hundred pounds' weight of "myrrh and aloes" in our Lord's case. On high state occasions the vessels, bed, and furniture used by the deceased were burnt also. Such was probably the "great burning" made for Asa. If a king was unpopular or died disgraced (2 Chr. xxi. 19), this was not observed. In no case, save that of Saul and his sons, were the bodies burned (compare Am. vi. 7-10); and even then the bones were interred, and reëxhumed for solemn entombment. It was the office of the next of kin to perform and preside over the whole funeral office; but a company of public buriers (Ez. xxxix. 12-14) had apparently become customary in the times of the N. T. (Acts v. 6, 10). Coffins were but seldom used, and if used were open; but fixed stone sarcophagi were common in tombs of rank. The bier, the word for which in the O. T. also = "BEN," was borne by the nearest relatives, and followed by any who wished to do honor to the dead. The grave-clothes were probably of the fashion worn in life, but swathed and fastened with bandages, and the head covered separately. Previously to this, spices were applied to the corpse in the form of ointment, or between the folds of the linen; hence our Lord's remark, that the woman had anointed his body, "with a view to dressing it in these grave-clothes." (EMBALMING; MOURNING.) —3. Prevalent Notions in regard to Burial. The precedent of Jacob's and Joseph's remains being returned to the land of Canaan was followed, in wish at least, by every pious Jew. Following a similar notion, some of the Rabbins taught that only in that land could those who were buried obtain a share in the resurrection which was to usher in Messiah's reign on earth. Tombs were, in popular belief, led by the same teaching, invested with traditions (compare ABEL; EZRA; TOMB, &c.).

* Burn'ing. BURIAL; PUNISHMENTS.

* Burn'ing A'gue (Lev. xxvi. 16). FEVER.

Burnt'-offer'ing (Heb. usually 'ôlâh, literally that which is made to go up; Gr. holokautōma, that which is wholly burnt, a holocaust) in A. V. = the offering (ATONEMENT; SACRIFICE), which was wholly consumed by fire on the altar, and the whole of which, except the refuse ashes, "ascended" in the smoke to God. Every sacrifice was in part a "burnt-offering," because, since fire was the chosen manifestation of God's presence, the portion of each sacrifice especially dedicated to Him was consumed by fire. The burnt-offering is first named in Gen. vii. 20, as offered after the Flood. Throughout the whole of Genesis (see xv. 9, 17, xxii. 2 ff.) it appears to be the only sacrifice referred to; afterward it became distinguished as one of the regular classes of sacrifice under the Mosaic law. Now all sacrifices are divided (see Heb. v. 1) into "gifts" and "sacrifices for sin" (i. e. eucharistic and propitiatory sacrifices), and of the former of these the burnt-offering was the choicest specimen. (SIN-OFFERING, &c.) The meaning of the whole burnt-offering was that which is the original idea of all sacrifice, the offering by the sacrificer of himself, soul and body, to God, the submission of his will to the Will of the Lord. It typified (see Heb. v. 1, 3, 7, 8) our Lord's offering (as especially in the temptation and the agony), the perfect sacrifice of His own human will to the Will of His Father. In accordance with this principle it was enacted that with the burnt-offering a "meat-offering" (of flour and oil) and "drink-offering" of wine should be offered, as showing that, with themselves, men dedicated also to God the chief earthly gifts with which He had blessed them (Lev. viii. 18, 22, 26, ix. 16, 17, xiv. 20; Ex. xxix. 40; Num. xxviii. 4, 5). The ceremonial of the burnt-offering is given in detail in Lev. i., vii. 8, viii. 18 ff., &c. For the public burnt-offerings, see SACRIFICE, D, a. Private burnt-offerings were appointed at the consecration of priests (Ex. xxix. 15 ff.; Lev. viii. 18 ff., ix. 12 ff.), at the purification of women (Lev. xii. 6, 8), at the cleansing of the lepers (xiv. 19 ff.), and removal of other ceremonial uncleanness (xv. 15, 30), on any accidental breach of the Nazaritic vow, or at its conclusion (Num. vi.; compare Acts xxi. 26), &c. But freewill burnt-offerings were offered and accepted by God on any solemn occasions, e. g. at the dedication of the tabernacle (Num. vii.) and of the temple (1 K. viii. 64), when they were offered in extraordinary abundance.

Bush. 1. The Hebrew word sēneh ("bush," A. V.) occurs only in those passages which refer to Jehovah's appearance to Moses, "in the flame of fire in the bush" (Ex. iii. 2-4; Deut. xxxiii. 16). The Greek word is batos both in the LXX. and in the N. T. (Mk. xii. 26; Lk. xx. 37; Acts vii. 30, 35; in Lk. vi. 44, "bramble bush" A. V.). The Gr. batos = rubus, Vulgate; and both in ancient writers = the different kinds of brambles or species of the genus Rubus (raspberry and blackberry bush, &c.). Celsus has argued that the Rubus vulgaris, i. e. Rubus fruticosus, the bramble or blackberry bush, = the sēneh, and traces the etymology of Mount "Sinai" to this name. Sprengel identifies the sēneh with what he terms the Rubus sanctus ("a variety," says Dr. J. D. Hooker, "of Rubus fruticosus"), and says it grows abundantly near Sinai. It is impossible to say what kind of thorn bush is intended by seneh; but Sinai is almost beyond the range of the genus Rubus.—2. The Heb. siah or siach, plural sichim or sichim, is translated "bushes" in Job xxx. 4, 7, "plant" in Gen. ii. 5, "shrubs" in Gen. xxi. 15. Gesenius translates "a shrub, bush."

Bush'el. See at end of WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

* But'ler. CUP-BEAKER.

But'ter. Gesenius supposed that the Heb. hemáh or chemáh (hemáh or chemáh in Job xxix. 6), translated "butter" uniformly in the A. V., generally means curdled milk, curds; poetically, milk in general; once (Prov. xxx. 33) cheese; but never butter in the Scriptures. It occurs in Gen. xviii. 8; Deut. xxxii. 14; Judg. v. 25; 2 Sam. xvii. 29; Job xx. 17, xxix. 6; Ps. lv. 21 (Heb. 22); Prov. xxx. 33; Is. vii. 15, 22. Hasselquist says the Arab women "made butter in a leather bag, hung on three poles erected for the purpose, in the form of a cone, and drawn to and fro by two women." The butter of modern Palestine, after being thus made, is boiled or melted, and put in goat-skin bottles. "In winter it resembles candied honey, in summer it is mere oil" (Thn. i. 293). CHEESE; MILK.

* Buy'ing [by-]. AGRICULTURE; COMMERCE; JUBILEE, THE YEAR OF; SLAVE.

Buz (Heb. coulémp). 1. The second son of Milcah and Nahor (Gen. xxii. 21). Elihu, called "the Buzite" of the kindred of Ram, i. e. Aram, was probably a descendant of Buz, whose family seems to have settled in Arabia Deserta or Petrea (Jer. xxv. 23).—2. A name in the genealogies of the tribe of Gad (1 Chr. v. 14).

Bu'zi (Heb. = Buzite, Ges.), father of EZEKIEL the prophet (Ez. i. 3).

Buz'ite (fr. Heb.) = descendant of Buz 1 (Job xxxii. 2, 6).

* By is used in 1 Cor. iv. 4 A. V. in the now obsolete sense of against; "I know nothing by myself," i. e. I am not conscious of wrong doing.

Bys'sas (L. fr. Gr.). LINEN.

C

Cab. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Cab'bon (Heb. cake, Ges.), a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 40 only).

* Cab'ins (Jer. xxxvii. 16; margin "cells") probably = the arched cavities on vaults, in which prisoners were lodged, round the sides of the "dungeon" or pit (Henderson on Jer. i. c.).

Ca'bul (Heb. limit, border, LXX., Boch.; as something exhaled, as nothing, Hiller), a place on the boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 27); probably at the modern village of Kabul, a small village eight or nine miles E. of 'Akka (Rbn. iii. 88). Being thus on the very borders of Galilee, probably this place has some connection with the district containing twenty cities, presented by Solomon to Hiram, king of Tyre (1 K. ix. 11-14).

Ca'dis, surname of JOANNAN, the eldest brother of Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. ii. 2).

Ca'des (1 Mc. xi. 63, 73) = KEDESH 3.

Ca'des-bar'ne (Jd. v. 14) = KADESH-BARNEA.

Cad'mi-el (1 Esd. v. 28, 58) = KADMIEL.

Cæ'sar [see zar] (L.) = CESAR.

Cæs-a-ræ'a [sæs-a-ree'a] (L.) = CESAREA.

Cæs-a-ræ'a Phil'ippi (L.) = CESAREA PHILIPPI.

* Cage. 1. The Heb. cêlib or clûb, translated "cage" in Jer. v. 27 (margin "coop"), is a trap-cage, contrived for keeping in it a decoy bird, and furnished with valves or clappers which shut as soon as a bird has entered (so Gesenius). (BASKET 4).—2. The Gr. kartallós, translated "cage" in Eccles. xi. 30, = a basket with a pointed bottom (L. & S.).—3. The Gr. phulaké, literally a watching or guarding (L. & S.), translated in Rev. xviii. 2, "cage" and "hold," is usually in N. T. translated "prison" (Mat. v. 25, xiv. 3, 10, &c.). Robinson (N. T. Lex.) translates it here watch-post, station, haunt.

Cal'a-phas [kay'ya-fas] (fr. Gr. form of Aram. = depression, Buxtorf), in full Jo'seph Cal'a-phas, high-priest of the Jews under Tiberius during our Lord's public ministry, and at the time of His condemnation and crucifixion (Mat. xxvi. 3, 57; Jn. xi. 49, xviii. 13, 14, 24, 28; Acts iv. 6). The Procurator Valerius Gratus appointed him to the dignity. He held it during the whole procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, but was deposed by the Proconsul Vitellius (A. D. 36). He was son-in-law of ANNAS 2. HIGH-PRIEST; JESUS CHRIST.

Cain (L. fr. Heb. = what is gotten, acquisition; or a spear, Ges. [see ARMS, I. 2, g]; or a smith, Von Bohlen). The historical facts in the life of Cain (Gen. iv.) are briefly these:—He was the eldest son of Adam and Eve; he followed the business of agriculture; in a fit of jealousy, roused by the rejection of his own sacrifice and the acceptance of Abel's, he committed the crime of murder (ABEL), for which he was expelled from Eden, and led the life of an exile; he settled in the land of Nod, and built a city which he named after his son Enoch; his descendants are enumerated, together with the inventions for which they were remarkable. References to Cain occur in Heb. xi. 4; 1 Jn. iii. 12; Jude 11. The following points deserve notice in connection with the Biblical narrative:—1. The position of the land of Nod (Heb. = flight, wandering, Ges.), which it seems vain to attempt to identify with any special locality. 2. The "mark set upon Cain" probably means that Jehovah gave a sign to Cain, very much as signs were afterward given to Noah (Gen. ix. 13), Moses (Ex. iii. 2, 12), Gideon (Judg. vi. 17, 21), Elijah (1 K. xix. 11), Ahaz (Is. vii. 10-14), and Hezekiah (Is. xxxviii. 7, 8). 3. The narrative implies the existence of a considerable population in Cain's time (ver. 14). 4. The descendants of Cain are enumerated to the sixth generation. Some commentators (Knobel, Von Bohlen) have traced an artificial structure in this genealogy, by which it is rendered parallel to that of the Sethites; but the differences far exceed the points of similarity. 5. The social condition of the Cainites is prominently brought forward in the history. Cain founded the first city; Lamech instituted polygamy; Jabel introduced the nomadic life; Jubal invented musical instruments; Tubal-cain was the first smith; Lamech's language takes the stately tone of poetry; and even the names of the women, Naamah (pleasant), Zillah (shadow), Adah (ornamental), seemed to bespeak an advanced state of civilization. But along with this, there was violence and godlessness; Cain and Lamech furnish proof of the former, while the concluding words of Gen. iv. 26 imply the latter. 6. The contrast established between the Cainites and the Sethites appears to have reference solely to the social and religious condition of the two races.

Cal'nán or Cal'nán (L. fr. Heb. = possessor, Fù.;

smith, perhaps lancer, Ges.). 1. Son of Enos; and great-grandson of Adam through Seth; father at seventy years of Mahalalcel; = KENAN. He died aged 910 (Gen. v. 9-14; Lk. iii. 37). The rabbinical tradition was that he first introduced idol-worship and astrology—a tradition which the Hellenists transferred to the post-diluvian Cainan.—2. Son of Arphaxad, and father of Sala, according to Lk. iii. 35, 36, and usually called the second Cainan. He is also found in the present copies of the LXX. in Gen. x. 24, xi. 12, but is nowhere named in the Hebrew MSS., nor in the Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, Vulgate, &c., versions. It seems certain that his name was introduced into the genealogies of the Greek O. T., in order to bring them into harmony with the genealogy of Christ in St. Luke's Gospel, where Cainan was found in the time of Jerome. Probably Cainan was not inserted in Lk. iii. 36 by St. Luke himself (it is not in the Codex Bezae; see NEW TESTAMENT), but was afterward added, either by accident, or to make up the number of generations to seventeen, or from some other cause which cannot now be discovered.

Cakes. BREAD; QUEEN OF HEAVEN.

Cal'ah (Heb. completion, old age, Ges.), one of the most ancient cities of Assyria. Its foundation is ascribed to the patriarch Asshur (Gen. x. 11). (NIMROD.) According to Rawlinson, the site of Calah is marked by the Nimrud ruins (NINEVEH). If this be regarded as ascertained, Calah must be considered to have been at one time (about B. C. 930-720) the capital of the empire. Dr. H. Løbdell (in B. S. xiv. 236) supposed Calah to be at Kalah Sherrghat (see ASSYRIA, § 7). Bochart, Gesenius, &c., make Calah = HALAH.

Cal-a-mol'a-lus (1 Esd. v. 22), a corrupt name, apparently from ELAM, LOD, and HADID.

Cal'a-mus. REED 4.

Cal'col (Heb. sustenance? Ges.), a man of Judah, son or descendant of Zerach (1 Chr. ii. 6); probably = CHALCOL. DARDA; MAHOL.

Cal'dron, a vessel for boiling flesh, either for ceremonial or domestic use. It is the translation in A. V. of four Hebrew words, viz., agmôn (Job xli. 20; see REED 1), dûd (2 Chr. xxxv. 13; see BASKET 5; Por 3), sir (Jer. lii. 18, 19; Ez. xi. 3, 7, 11; see Por 4), kallahath or kallachath (1 Sam. ii. 14; Mic. iii. 3).

Bronze Caldron from Egyptian Thebes.—(British Museum.)

Cal'eb (Heb. dog? Ges.; the bold, the valiant, i. e. a hero, Fii.). 1. According to 1 Chr. ii. 9, 18, 19, 42, son of Hezron, the son of Pharez, the son of Judah, and the father of Hur by Ephrath or Ephratah. His brothers, according to the same authority, were Jerahmeel and Ram; his wives Azubah, Jerioth, and Ephrath; and his concubines Ephah and Machah (ver. 9, 18, 19, 46, 48). Lord A. C. Hervey regards the text in 1 Chr. ii. as corrupt in many places. Keil maintains that Caleb the son (i. e. the descendant) of Hezron = Caleb the son of Jephun-neh (?); compare Josh. xv. 16 and 1 Chr. ii. 49.

—2. "Son of Jephunneh," by which patronymic the illustrious spy is usually designated (Num. xiii. 6, and ten other places), with the addition of "the Kenezite" (= son of Kenaz) in Num. xxxii. 12; Josh. xiv. 6, 14. Caleb is first mentioned in the list of the rulers or princes sent to search the land of Canaan in the second year of the Exodus. Caleb was a prince or chief in the tribe of Judah, perhaps as chief of the family of the Hezronites. He and JosUITA the son of Nun were the only two of the whole number who, on their return from Canaan to Kadesh-Barnea, encouraged the people to enter in boldly to the land, and take possession of it; for which act of faithfulness they narrowly escaped stoning at the hands of the infuriated people. In the plague that ensued, while the other ten spies perished, Caleb and Joshua alone were spared. Forty-five years afterward, when some progress had been made in the conquest of the land, Caleb came to Joshua and claimed possession of the land of the Anakims, Kirjath-Arba, or Hebron, and the neighboring hill country (Josh. xiv.). This was immediately granted to him, and the following chapter relates how he took possession of Hebron, driving out the three sons of Anak; and how he offered Achsah his daughter in marriage to whoever would take Kirjath-Sepher, i. e. Debir; and how when OTHNIEL, his younger brother or nephew, had performed the feat, he not only gave him his daughter to wife, but with her the upper and nether springs of water which she asked for. After this we hear no more of Caleb, nor is the time of his death recorded. Though Hebron became a city of the priests, the surrounding territory continued to be in Caleb's possession, at least till David's time (1 Sam. xxv. 3, xxx. 14). "The S. of Caleb" (xxx. 14) = that portion of the "S. land" (Josh. xv. 19) of Palestine occupied by Caleb and his descendants. A very interesting question arises as to the birth and parentage of Caleb. He is, as we have seen, styled "the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite," and Othniel, afterward the first Judge, is also called "the son of Kenaz" (Josh. xv. 17; Judg. i. 13, iii. 9, 11). On the other hand the genealogy in 1 Chr. ii. makes no mention whatever of either Jephunneh or Kenaz, but represents Caleb, though obscurely (ver. 50; so Lord A. C. Hervey), as a son of Hur and grandson of No. 1 (see, too, chapter iv. and No. 3 below). Again in Josh. xv. 13, we have this singular expression, "Unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah;" and in xiv. 14, the no less significant one, "Hebron became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite, because that he wholly followed JEHOVAH, God of Israel." It becomes therefore quite possible, but not at all certain, that Caleb was a foreigner by birth; a proselyte, incorporated into the tribe of Judah.—3. Son of Hur. His descendants in 1 Chr. ii. 50 ff. appear to be a different family from the sons of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, in iv. 15. Bezalcel, the grandson of Hur (ii. 20; Ex. xxxv. 30, &c.), was contemporary with the spies, who thus seem to have been a generation later than Caleb the son of Hur (so Dr. P. Holmes, in Kitto).—4. Cal'eb-Eph'ra-tah, according to the present text of 1 Chr. ii. 24, the name of a place where Hezron died. But Lord A. C. Hervey regards the present text as corrupt, and the reading which Jerome's Hebrew Bible had, and which is preserved in the LXX., as probably the true one, "Caleb came in unto Ephratah."

Calf. In Ex. xxxii. 4, we are told that Aaron, constrained by the people in the absence of Moses, made a molten calf (Heb. 'egel; see BULL) of the golden ear-rings of the people, to represent the ELOHIM (A. V. "gods") which brought Israel out of Egypt. It does not seem likely that the ear-rings would have provided the enormous quantity of gold required for a solid figure. More probably it was a wooden figure laminated with gold, a process known to have existed in Egypt. "A gilded ox covered with a pall" was an emblem of Osiris (Wilkinson, iv. 335). To punish the apostasy Moses burnt the calf, and then grinding it to powder scattered it over the water, where, according to some, it produced in the drinkers effects similar to the water of jealousy (Num. v.). He probably adopted this course as the deadliest and most irreparable blow to their superstition, or as an allegorical act (Job xv. 16), or with reference to an Egyptian custom in honor of Apis (Hdt. ii. 41; Poole's Synopsis on Ez. xxxii. 20). The process which he used is difficult of explanation. Bochart and Rosenmüller think that he merely cut, ground, and filed the gold to powder (MINES). It has always been a great dispute respecting this calf and those of Jeroboam, whether, I. the Jews intended them for some Egyptian god, or II. for a mere cherubic symbol of Jehovah. Of the various sacred cows of Egypt, those of Isis, of Athor, and of the three kinds of sacred bulls, Apis (MEMPHIS), Basia, and Mnevis, Sir G. Wilkinson fixes on the latter as the prototype of the golden calf; "the offerings, dancings, and rejoicings practised, on that occasion were doubtless in imitation of a ceremony they had witnessed in honor of Mnevis" (Ancient Egyptians, v. 197). It seems to us more likely that in this calf-worship the Jews merely or in other words, adopted a well-understood cherubic emblem. The prophet Hozai is full of denunciations against the calf-worship of Israel (Hos. viii. 8, 6, x. 6), and mentions the curious custom of kissing them (xiii. 2). His change of Bethel into Beth-aven possibly arose from contempt of this idolatry. The calf at Dan was carried away by Tiglath-Pileser, and that of Bethel ten years after by his son Shalmaneser (Prideaux, Conn. i. 15). In the expression "the calves of our lips" (Hos. xiv. 2), "calves" metaphorically = victims or sacrifices, and the passage signifies either "we will render to thee sacrifices of our lips," i. e. "the tribute of thanksgiving and praise," or "we will offer to thee the sacrifices which our lips have vowed." BULL; CHERUBIM; IDOLATRY; OX.

"Likened their Maker to the graven ox;"

Cal'i-tas (L.) = KELITA (1 Esd. ix. 23, 48).

Cal'is-the-nes (L. fr. Gr. = adorned with strength, L. & S.), a partisan of Nicanor, burnt by the Jews on Nicanor's defeat for setting fire to "the sacred portals" (2 Mc. viii. 33).

Cal'neh or Cal'no (both Heb. in form, probably = the fort of the Babylonish god Ana or Anu) appears in Gen. x. 10 among the cities of Nimrod "in the land of Shinar." Rawlinson identifies Calneh with the modern Niffer, about sixty miles S. E. of Babylon, on the E. bank of the Euphrates, where are extensive ruins. We may gather from Scripture that in the eighth century B. C. Calneh was taken by one of the Assyrian kings, and never recovered its prosperity (Is. x. 9; Am. vi. 2). The Targums, Eusebius and Jerome, &c., identified Calneh with the ancient Ctesiphon, on the E. bank of the Tigris, eighteen or twenty miles below Bagdad.

Cal'no = CALNEH (Is. x. 9).

Cal'phi (L.), father of Jonathan's captain JUDAS 3 (1 Mc. xi. 70).

Cal'va-ry (fr. L. calvaria = a bare skull = GOLGOTHA), a word, not a proper name, occurring in the A. V. only in Lk. xxiii. 33, and denoting the place of the crucifixion of Jesus Christ. The popular expression "Mount Calvary" is not warranted by any statement in the accounts of the place of our Lord's crucifixion. GOLGOTHA.

Cam'el. The Heb. gāmāl, Gr. kamēlos, L. camelus, are used to express the genus "camel," irrespective of any difference of species, age, or breed. It is clear from Gen. xii. 16 and Ex. ix. 3 that camels were early known to the Egyptians, though no representation of this animal has yet been discovered in the paintings or hieroglyphics. The Ethiopians had "camels in abundance" (2 Chr. xiv. 15); the queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem "with camels that bare spices and gold and precious stones" (1 K. x. 2); the men of Kedar and of Hazor possessed camels (Jer. xlix. 29, 32); David took away camels from the Geshurites and the Amalekites (1 Sam. xxvii. 9, compare xxx. 17); Ben-hadad, king of Syria, sent to Elshah forty camels' burden of good things (2 K. viii. 9); the Ishmaelites trafficked with Egypt in the precious gums of Gilead, carried on the backs of camels (Gen. xxxvii. 25); the Midianites and the Amalekites possessed camels "as the sand by the sea-side for multitude" (Judg. vii. 12); Job had three thousand camels before his affliction (Job i. 3), and six thousand afterward (xlii. 12). The camel was used for riding (Gen. xxiv. 64; 1 Sam. xxx. 17); as a beast of burden generally (Gen. xxxvii. 25; 2 K. viii. 9; 1 K. x. 2, &c.); and for draught purposes (Is. xxi. 7). From 1 Sam. xxx. 17 we learn that camels were used in war. John the Baptist wore a garment made of camel's hair (Mat. iii. 4; Mk. i. 6), and some have supposed that Elijah "was clad in a dress of the same stuff." (DRESS; SACKCLOTH.) Chardin (in Harmer's Observ. ii. 487) says the people in the East make vestments of camel's hair, which they pull off the animal at the time it is changing its coat. Camel's milk was much esteemed by Orientals, and was probably used by the Hebrews, though no distinct reference to it is made in the Bible. Camel's flesh, although much esteemed by the Arabs, was forbidden as food to the Israelites (Lev. xi. 4; Deut. xiv. 7), because, though the camel "cheweth the cud, it divideth not the hoof." Dr. Kitto (Phys. Hist. of Pal., p. 391) says, "the Arabs adorn the necks of their camels with a band of cloth or leather, upon which are strung small shells called cowries in the form of half-moons;" this very aptly illustrates Judg. viii. 21, 26, with reference to the moon-shaped ornaments on the necks of the camels which Gideon took from Zebah and Zalmunna. From the temperate habits of the camel with regard to its requirements of food and water, and from its wonderful adaptation, both structurally and physiologically, to traverse the arid regions which for miles afford but a scanty herbage, we can readily give credence to the immense numbers which Scripture speaks of as the property either of tribes or individuals. The three thousand camels of Job may be illustrated to the very letter by a passage in Aristotle (H. A. ix. 37, § 5): "Now some men in upper Asia possess as many as three thousand camels."—2. The Hebrew masculine bécher, feminine bichrah, occur only in Is. lx. 6 and Jer. ii. 23, and are translated in the A. V. "dromedary." Bochart (and so Gesenius) contends that the Hebrew word is indicative only of a difference in age, and adduces the Arabic becra in support of his opinion that a young camel is signified by the term. Etymologically the Hebrew word is more in favor of the "dromedary." So, too, are the old versions.—3. As to the Hebrew circaróth (Is. lxvi. 20; A. V. "swift beasts") there is some difference of opinion. The explanation given by Bochart after some of the Rabbis, and adopted by Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Lee, &c., that "dromedaries" are meant, is not satisfactory to Mr. Houghton, who prefers, with Michaelis and Parkhurst, to understand the "panniers" or

"baskets" carried on the backs of camels or mules, and to refer the word to its unreduplicated form (Hebrew car, A. V. "furniture," i. e. the camel's saddle with a kind of canopy over it) in Gen. xxxi. 34.—4. The Hebrew plural áhashéránim or áhashéránim, translated "camels" in Esth. viii. 10, 14, A. V., = mules (so Bochart, Gesenius, &c.).—The species of camel in common use among the Jews and the heathen nations of Palestine was the Arabian or one-humped camel (Camelus Arabicus). With feet admirably formed for journeying over dry and loose sandy soil; with an internal reservoir for a supply of water when the ordinary sources of nature fail; with a hump of fat ready on emergencies when even the prickly thorns and mimosas of the desert cease to afford food; with nostrils which can close valve-like when the sandy storm fills the air, this valuable animal well deserves the title of the ship of the desert. The dromedary is a swifter animal than the baggage-camel, and is used chiefly for riding purposes; it is merely a finer breed than the other: the Arabs call it the Heirie. The speed of the dromedary has been greatly exaggerated, the Arabs asserting that it is swifter than the horse; eight or nine miles an hour is the utmost it is able to perform; this pace, however, it is able to keep up for hours together.—The Bactrian camel (Camelus Bactrianus), the only other known species, is found in China, Russia, and Central Asia, and has two humps; it is not capable of such endurance as its Arabian cousin; it was known to the Assyrians, &c., and doubtless to the Jews also in their later history; it is employed by the Persians in war to carry one or two guns which are fixed to the saddle. According to Burckhardt, breeders often extirpate the forward hump of this species, and thus procure more space for the pack-saddle and load, and make the animal like the Arabian species (Col. C. H. Smith, in Kitto).—The camel, as may be readily conceived, is the subject among Orientals of many proverbial expressions; many are cited by Bochart (Hicroz. i. 30); compare Mat. xxiii. 24, and xix. 24, where there can be no doubt of the correctness of the A. V., notwithstanding the attempts made from time to time to explain away the expression; the very magnitude of the hyperbole is evidence in its favor: with the Talmuds "an elephant passing through a needle's eye" was a common figure for any thing impossible.

Ca'mon (Heb. full of stalks or grain? Ges.), the place in which JAIR the Judge was buried (Judg. x. 5); a city of Gilead (so Josephus). Eusebius and Jerome make Camon = CYAMON.

Camp. ENCAMPMENT.

Camp'hire (Heb. cópher) no doubt is an incorrect rendering of the Heb. term (ATONEMENT 3; PITCH), which = some aromatic substance only in Cant. i. 14, iv. 13: the margin in both passages has "cypress," imitating kupros in the LXX. and cyprus in the Vulgate in form but not in signification. Camp'hire, or, as it is now generally written, camphor, is the product of a tree largely cultivated in the island of Formosa, the Camphora officinarum, allied to the laurel. From the expression "cluster of cópher in the vineyards of En-gedi," in Cant. i. 14, the Chaldee version reads "bunches of grapes." The substance really denoted by the Hebrew cópher is the Lawsonia alba of botanists, the henna of Arabian naturalists. The inhabitants of Nubia call the henna plant Khofreh. Hasselquist, speaking of this plant, says "the leaves are pulverized and made into a paste with water; the Egyptians bind this paste on the nails of their hands and feet, and keep it on all night: this gives them a deep yellow, which is greatly admired by Eastern nations. The color lasts for three or four weeks before there is occasion to renew it. The custom is so ancient in Egypt that I have seen the nails of the mummies dyed in this manner." Not only the nails, but the hair, beard, &c., were also dyed with henna. The beard dyed with henna is afterward made black by the application of indigo. Sonnini says the women are fond of decorating themselves with the flowers of the henna plant; but they take them in their hand and perfume their bosoms with them. Compare with this Cant. i. 13.—The Lawsonia alba when young is without thorns, and when older is spinous, whence Linnaeus's names, Lawsonia inermis and Lawsonia spinosa; he regarding his specimens as two distinct species. The henna plant grows in Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and N. India. The flowers are white, and grow in clusters, and are very fragrant. The whole shrub is from four to six feet high.

Ca'na (L. fr. Heb. kāndh [Robinson, N. T. Lex.] = place of reeds, Ges.) of Gal'i-lee, once Ca'na in Gal'i-lee, a village or town not far from Capernaum, memorable as the scene of Christ's first miracle (Jn. ii. 1, 11, iv. 46), as well as of a subsequent one (iv. 46–54), and the native place of NATHANAEL i (xxi. 2). The traditional site is at Kefr Kenna, a small village about four and a half miles N. E. of Nazareth. It now contains only the ruins of a church said to stand over the house in which the miracle was performed, and—doubtless much older—the fountain from which the water for the miracle was brought. The tradition identifying Kefr Kenna with Canā existed in the time of Willibald (the latter half of the eighth century), and of Phocas (twelfth century). But the claims of another site have been brought forward with much force (Rbn. ii. 346–9, iii. 108). The rival site is a village situated further N., about five miles N. of Seffurieh (Sepphoris) and nine of Nazareth, near the present Jefat, the Jotapata of the Jewish wars. The village still bears the name of Kūna-el-jelū = "Cana of Galilee" in Arabic. The Gospel history will not be affected whichever site may be the real one. FOUNTAIN.

Ca'naan [ka'nan] (Heb. Cēna'an or Cna'an, fr. a verb denoting to be bowed down, to be low, Ges.; Gr. & L. Chanaîn). 1. Fourth son of HAM (Gen. x. 6; 1 Chr. i. 8); the progenitor of the Phenicians ("Zidon"), and of the various nations who before the Israelite conquest peopled the sea-coast of Palestine, and generally the whole of the country W. of the Jordan (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 13; CANAAN, LAND OF; CANAANITES). In Gen. ix. 20–27 a curse is pronounced on Canaan (as many have maintained) for Ham's unfilial and irreverential conduct; but Professor Bush (Notes, l. c.) remarks, that Ham's act was rather the occasion than the cause of the prediction against Canaan (compare Is. xxxix. 6),—that here, as often in the Scriptures, individuals are not so much contemplated as the nations, &c., descended from them, and the special sins of the Canaanites (licentiousness, &c.; compare Lev. xviii. 24 ff.) were closely allied to Ham's sin in Gen. ix. 22,—that Ham as a father was affected by the curse on Canaan,—and that the curse did not necessarily come upon righteous descendants of Canaan (e. g. Melchizedek, Abimelech), nor upon the Canaanites in general any further than as their own sins were the procuring causes of it (Sodom; GIBEONITES, &c.).—2. "Canaan" sometimes (e. g. Zeph. ii. 5) = the country itself—more generally styled "the land of Canaan." (See next article.) We also find "Language of Canaan" (Is. xix. 18): "Wars of Canaan" (Judg. iii. 1): "Inhabitants of Canaan" (Ex. xv. 15): "King of Canaan" (Judg. iv. 2, 23, 24, v. 19): "Daughters of Canaan" (Gen. xxviii. 1, 6, 8, xxxvi. 2): "Kingdoms of Canaan" (Ps. cxxxv. 11). The word "Canaan" is also translated in the A. V. (Is. xxiii. 8) "traffickers;" (xxiii. 11) "the merchant city;" (Ez. xvii. 4) "traffic;" (Hos. xii. 7) "He is a merchant;" (Zeph. i. 11) "merchant-people."

Ca'naan, the Land of (literally Lowland; see CANAAN) = the country W. of the Jordan and Dead Sea, and between those waters and the Mediterranean (PALESTINE); specially opposed to the "land of Gilead," i. e. the high table-land E. of the Jordan. True, the district to which the name of "lowland" is thus applied contained many very elevated spots; but high as the level of much of the country W. of the Jordan undoubtedly is, several things prevent it from leaving an impression of elevation, viz. (1.) that wide maritime plain over which the eye ranges for miles from the central hills, (2.) the still deeper and more remarkable hollow of the Jordan valley, (3.) the almost constant presence of the long high line of the mountains E. of the Jordan. The word "Canaanite" was used in the O. T. in two senses, a broader and a narrower (CANAANITES); but this does not appear to be the case with "Canaan," at least in the older cases of its occurrence (Gen. xii. 5, xiii. 12, &c.). It is only in later notices (e. g. Zeph. ii. 5; Mat. xv. 22), that we find it applied to the low maritime plains of Philistia and Phenicia (compare Mk. vii. 26).

Ca'naan-ite [-nan-], The, the designation of the Apostle SIMON (Mat. x. 4; Mk. iii. 18), otherwise known as "Simon Zelotes." The word does not signify a descendant of Canaan, nor a native of Cana, but it comes from a Chaldee or Syriac word, Kan-nān or Knōnoyo, by which the Jewish sect or faction of "the Zealots" was designated. The Syriac word is the reading of the Peshito version. The Greek equivalent is Zēlōtēs (Lk. vi. 15; Acts i. 13).

Ca'naan-ites [-nan-], The (see CANAAN), a word used in two senses: 1. For the tribe of "the Canaanites" only = the dwellers in the lowland. The whole of the country W. of Jordan was a "low-land" as compared with the loftier and more extended tracts on the E.: but there was a part of this western country which was still more emphatically a "lowland." a. There were the plains lying between the shore of the Mediterranean and the foot of the hills of Benjamin, Judah, and Ephraim. (JEZREEL 1; PALESTINE; SEPIHELA; SHARON 1, &c.) b. But separated entirely from these was the still lower region of the JORDAN Valley or ARABAH. "The Canaanite dwells (A. V. 'Canaanites dwell') by the sea, and by the side (A. V. 'coast') of Jordan" (Num. xiii. 29). In Gen. x. 18-20 the seats of the Canaanite tribe are given as on the sea-shore and in the Jordan Valley. In Josh. xi. 3 "the Canaanite on the E. and on the W." is carefully distinguished from the Amorite, &c., who held "the mountain" (A. V. "mountains") in the centre of the country. (CHARIOT.) In Ex. iii. 8, 17, &c., the Canaanites are mentioned with the Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, as the nations to be expelled by the Israelites; in Deut. vii. 1, and Josh. iii. 10, xxiv. 11, the Girgashites are added, making seven nations in all; in Gen. xv. 19-21 the list of ten nations includes some E. of Jordan, and probably some S. of Palestine.—2. Applied as a general name to the non-Israelite inhabitants of the land (compare CANAAN). Instances of this are, Gen. xii. 6; Num. xxi. 8; Judg. i. See also Gen. xxiv. 3, 37, compare xxviii. 2, 6; Ex. xiii. 11, compare 5. Like the Phenicians, the Canaanites were probably given to commerce; and thus probably in later times Canaanite occasionally = "a merchant" (Job xli. 6; Prov. xxxi. 24; compare CANAAN).—On the language of the Canaanites, see SHERITIC LANGUAGES; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

Can'da-ce [-see; as an English name usually pron. kan'dase] (L.; Gr. kandakē; fr. Ethiopic = chief, or ruler, of servants [?], Sim.), a queen of ETHIOPIA (Meroë), mentioned Acts viii. 27. The name was not a proper name of an individual, but that of a dynasty of Ethiopian queens. Prof. Hackett (in B. S. xxiii. 515) appears disposed to regard these as queens of that part of Ethiopia of which the capital was Napata, eighty-six geographical miles N. of Meroë.

* Candle [-dl]. The Heb. nēr and Gr. luchnos, often translated "candle" in the A. V. (Job xviii. 6, xxi. 17; Mat. v. 15, &c.), = a light, i. e. a candle, lamp, lantern, &c. (Ges., Rbn. N. T. Lex.). CANDLESTICK; LAMP.

Candle-stick [-dl-], which Moses was commanded to make for the tabernacle, is described Ex. xxv. 31-37, xxxvii. 17-24. It is called in Lev. xxiv. 4, "the pure candlestick," and in Ecclus. xxvi. 17, "the holy candlestick." With its various appurtenances it required a talent of "pure gold," and it was not moulded, but "of beaten work." Josephus, however, says that it was of cast gold, and hollow. As the description given in Ex. is not very clear, we abbreviate Lightfoot's explanation of it. "The foot of it was gold, from which went up a shaft straight, which was the middle light. Near the foot was a golden dish wrought almondwise; and a little above that a golden knop, and above that a golden flower. Above the branches on the middle shaft was a golden boss, above which rose two shafts more; above the coming out of these was another boss, and two more shafts, and then on the shaft upward were three golden scollop-cups, a knop, and a flower: so that the heads of the branches stood an equal height" (Works, ii. 399, ed. Pitman). The whole weight of the candlestick was 100 minæ = about 229 lbs. troy or 188½ lbs. avoirdupois (WEIGHTS AND MEASURES); its height was, according to the Rabbis, five feet, and the breadth, or distance between the exterior branches, three and a half feet. It has been calculated to have been worth £5,076 = about $23,000, exclusive of workmanship. Generally it was "a type of preaching" or of "the light of the law" (Lightfoot, l. c.). Similarly candlesticks are made types of the Spirit, of the Church, of witnesses, &c. (compare Zech. iv.; Rev. ii. 5, xi. 4, &c.). The candlestick was placed on the S. side of the first apartment of the tabernacle, opposite the table of shewbread (Ex. xxv. 37), and was lighted every evening and dressed every morning (Ex. xxvii. 20, 21, xxx. 8; compare 1 Sam. iii. 8). Each lamp was supplied with cotton, and half a log of the purest olive-oil (about two wine-glasses), which was sufficient to keep them burning during a long night. When carried about, the candlestick was covered with a cloth of blue, and put with its appendages in badger-skin bags, which were supported on a bar (Num. iv. 9). In Solomon's Temple, instead of this candlestick, there were ten golden candlesticks similarly embossed, five on the right and five on the left (1 K. vii. 49; 2 Chr. iv. 7). They were taken to Babylon (Jer. lii. 19). In the Temple of Zerubabel there was again a single candlestick (1 Mc. i. 21, iv. 49). The description given of it by Josephus agrees only tolerably with the sculpture on the Arch of Titus; but he hints that it was not identical with the one used in the Temple. The candlestick represented on the arch of Titus as borne in his triumph, A. D. 70, was probably taken from Rome to Carthage, A. D. 455, by Genseric, thence carried to Constantinople, and then respectfully deposited at Jerusalem, A. D. 533. It has never been heard of since.

* Can'dy (Acts xxvii. 7, marg.), an English form of Candia, the modern name of CRETE.

Cane. REED 4.

Can'ker-worm. LOCUST 8.

Can'neh (Heb.) (Ez. xxvii. 23), probably a contraction of CALNEH, which is the reading of one MS.

Canon of Scrip'ture. The (L. canon, fr. Gr. kanōn) = "the collection of books which form the original and authoritative written rule of the faith and practice of the Christian church." Starting from this definition the present article will examine shortly—

I. The original meaning of the term: II. The Jewish Canon of the O. T. as to (a) its formation, and (b) extent: III. The Christian Canon of the O. T.; and IV. of the N. T.—I. The use of the word Canon.

—The word kanón, in classical Greek, is (1.) properly a straight rod, as the rod of a shield, or that used in weaving, or a carpenter's rule; hence (2.) metaphorically a testing rule (or model) in ethics, or in art, or in language. (3.) The word was also used passively for a measured space, and, in later times, for a fixed tax. The ecclesiastical usage of kanón offers a complete parallel to the classical. In Jd. xiii. 6 it occurs in its literal sense = "pillar," A. V.; in Gal. vi. 16 and 2 Cor. x. 15 it is translated "rule," A. V.; in 2 Cor. x. 13 the A. V. has "rule," margin "line," and in verse 16 "line," margin "rule." In patristic writings it commonly = "a rule" in the widest sense, and especially in the phrases "the rule (kanón) of the church," "the rule of faith," "the rule of truth." This rule was regarded either as the abstract, ideal standard, embodied only in the life and action of the church; or, again, as the concrete, definite creed, which set forth the facts from which that life sprang. As applied to Scripture the derivatives of kanón are used long before the simple word. The Latin translation of Origen speaks of Scripturæ Canonice (L. = canonical Scriptures) (De Princ. iv. 33), libri regulares (L. = books of [or according to] the rule) (Comm. in Mat. § 117), and libri canonizati (L. = books canonized, i. e. made or determined, according to rule) (id. § 28). This circumstance seems to show that the title "Canonical" was first given to writings in the sense of "admitted by the rule," and not as "forming part of and giving the rule." The first direct application of kanón to the Scriptures seems to be in the verses of Amphilochius (about A. D. 380), where the word indicates the rule by which the contents of the Bible must be determined, and thus secondarily an index of the constituent books. Among Latin writers it is commonly found from the time of Jerome and Augustine, and their usage of the word, which is wider than that of Greek writers, is the source of its modern acceptance. The uncanonical books were described simply as "those without," or "those uncanonicalized." The Apocryphal books (ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ), which were supposed to occupy an intermediate position, were called "books read," or "ecclesiastical," though the latter title was also applied to the canonical Scriptures. The canonical books were also called "books of the Testament," and Jerome styled the whole collection "the holy library," which happily expresses the unity and variety of the Bible.—II. (a) The formation of the Jewish Canon.—The history of the Jewish Canon in the earliest times is beset with the greatest difficulties. Before the period of the exile only faint traces occur of the solemn preservation and use of sacred books. According to the command of Moses the "book of the law" was "put in the side of the ark" (Deut. xxxi. 26), but not in it (1 K. viii. 9; compare Jos. iii. 1, § 7, v. 1, § 17), and this in the reign of Josiah, Hilkiah is said to have "found the book of the law in the house of the Lord" (2 K. xxii. 8; compare 2 Chr. xxxiv. 14). This "book of the law," which, in addition to the direct precepts (Ex. xxiv. 7), contained general exhortations (Deut. xxviii. 61) and historical narratives (Ex. xvii. 14), was further increased by the records of Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 26), and probably by other writings (1 Sam. x. 25). At a subsequent time collections of proverbs were made (Prov. xxv. 1), and the later prophets (especially Jeremiah) were familiar with the writings of their predecessors. It perhaps marks a further step in the formation of the Canon when "the book of the Lord" is mentioned as a general collection of sacred teaching (Is. xxxiv. 16; compare xxix. 18), at once familiar and authoritative; but it is unlikely that any definite collection either of "the psalms" or of "the prophets" existed before the Captivity. At that time Zechariah (vii. 12) speaks of "the law" and "the former prophets" as in some measure coördinate; and Daniel (ix. 2) refers to "the books" in a manner which seems to mark the prophetic writings as already collected into a whole. Even after the Captivity the history of the Canon, like all Jewish history up to the date of the Maccabees, is wrapped in great obscurity. Popular belief assigned to EZRA 2 and "the great synagogue" the task of collecting and promulgating the Scriptures as part of their work in organizing the Jewish church. Doubts have been thrown upon this belief, but it is in every way consistent with the history of Judaism and with the internal evidence of the books themselves. The account (2 Mc. ii. 13) which assigns a collection of books to Nehemiah is in itself a confirmation of the general truth of the gradual formation of the Canon during the Persian period. The persecution of Antiochus (B. C. 168) was for the O. T. what the persecution of Diocletian was for the N. T., the final crisis which stamped the sacred writings with their peculiar character. The king sought out "the books of the law" (1 Mc. i. 56) and burnt them; and the possession of a "book of the covenant" was a capital crime (Jos. xii. 5, § 4). After the Maccabean persecution the history of the formation of the Canon is merged in the history of its contents. The Bible appears from that time as a whole, and it is of the utmost importance to notice that the collection was peculiar in character and circumscribed in contents. All the evidence which can be obtained, though it is confessedly scanty, tends to show that it is false, both in theory and fact, to describe the O. T. as "all the relics of the Hebræo-Chaldaic literature up to a certain epoch," if the phrase is intended to refer to the time when the Canon was completed.—(b) The contents of the Jewish Canon.—The first notice of the O. T. as consisting of distinct and definite parts occurs in the prologue to the Greek translation of the Wisdom of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), in which "the law, the prophets, and the rest of the books," are mentioned as integral sections of a completed whole. A like threefold classification is used for describing the entire O. T. in Lk. xxiv. 44 (compare Acts xxviii. 23). The general contents of these three classes still, however, remain to be determined. Josephus (Ap. i. 8), the earliest direct witness on the subject, enumerates twenty-two books "which are justly believed to be divine:" five books of Moses, thirteen of the prophets, extending to the reign of Artaxerxes (= husband of Esther, according to Josephus), and four which contain hymns and directions for life. Still there is some ambiguity in this enumeration, for in order to make up the numbers it is necessary either to rank Job among the prophets, or to exclude one book, and in that case probably Ecclesiastes, from the Hagiographa. The former alternative is the more probable, for it is worthy of special notice that Josephus regards primarily the historic character of the prophets. The popular belief that the Sadducees received only the books of Moses rests on no sufficient authority. The casual quotations of Josephus agree with his express Canon.

The writings of the N. T. completely confirm the testimony of Josephus. Coincidences of language show that the apostles were familiar with several of the Apocryphal books; but they do not contain one authoritative or direct quotation from them, while, with the exception of Judges, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah, every other book in the Hebrew Canon is used either for illustration or proof. Several of the early Fathers describe the contents of the Hebrew Canon in terms which generally agree with the results already obtained. Melito of Sardis (cir. 179 A. D.) in a journey to the East made the question of the exact number and order of "the books of the O. T." a subject of special inquiry. He gives the result in the following form: the books are, 5 Moses . . . Joshua, Judges, Ruth, 4 Kings, 2 Chronicles, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Job, Isaiah, Jeremiah, 12 Prophets, Daniel, Ezekiel, Esdras. Origen, in enumerating the twenty-two books "which the Hebrews hand down as included in the Testament," omits the book of the twelve minor prophets, and adds "the letter" to the book of Jeremiah and Lamentations. The statement of Jerome is clear and complete. He gives the contents of the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagio-grapha, in exact accordance with the Hebrew authorities, placing Daniel in the last class; and adding that whatever is without the number of these must be placed among the Apocrypha. The statement of the Talmud is in many respects so remarkable that it must be transcribed entire. "But who wrote [the books of the Bible]? Moses wrote his own book, ? the Pentateuch, the section about Balaam, and Job. Joshua wrote his own book and the eight [last] verses of the Pentateuch. Samuel wrote his own book, the book of Judges, and Ruth. David wrote the book of Psalms [of which, however, some were composed] by the ten venerable elders, Adam, the first man, Melchizedek, Abraham, Moses, Heman, Jeduthun, Asaph, and the three sons of Korah. Jeremiah wrote his own book, the books of Kings and Lamentations. Hezekiah and his friends reduced to writing the books contained in the memorial word laMSHaK, i. e. Isaiah, Proverbs, Canticles, Ecclesiastes. The men of the Great Synagogue (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT) reduced to writing the books contained in the memorial word KaNDaG, i. e. Ezekiel, the twelve lesser prophets, Daniel, and Esther. Ezra wrote his own book, and brought down the genealogies of the books of Chronicles to his own times. . . . Who brought the remainder of the books [of Chronicles] to a close? Nehemiah the son of Hachalijah." In spite of the comparatively late date (about A. D. 500) from which this tradition is derived, it is evidently in essence the earliest description of the work of Ezra and the Great Synagogue which has been preserved. The details must be tested by other evidence, but the general description of the growth of the Jewish Canon bears every mark of probability. The later Jewish catalogues throw little light upon the Canon. They generally reckon twenty-two books, equal in number to the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, five of the Law, eight of the Prophets (Joshua, Judges and Ruth, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah and Lamentations, Ezekiel, 12 Prophets), and nine of the Hagio-grapha. The last number was more commonly increased to eleven by the distinct enumeration of the books of Ruth and Lamentations ("the twenty-four Books"). In Hebrew MSS., and in the early editions of the O. T., the arrangement of the later books offers great variations, but they generally agree in reckoning all separately except the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. So far then it has been shown that the Hebrew Canon was uniform and coincident with our own; but while the Palestinian Jews combined to preserve the strict limits of the old prophetic writings, the Alexandrine Jews (ALEXANDRIA; SEPTUAGINT) allowed themselves greater freedom. But so far as an authoritative Canon existed in Egypt, it is probable that it was the same as that of Palestine, and that at the beginning of the Christian era the Jews had only one Canon of the sacred writings, and that this Canon was recognized by our Lord and His apostles.—III. The history of the O. T. Canon among Christian writers exhibits the natural issue of the currency of the LXX., enlarged as it had been by apocryphal additions. In proportion as the Fathers were more or less absolutely dependent on that version for their knowledge of the O. T. Scriptures, they gradually lost in common practice the sense of the difference between the books of the Hebrew Canon and the Apocrypha. The custom of individuals grew into the custom of the church; but the custom of the church was not fixed in an absolute judgment. The history of the Christian Canon is to be sought in the first instance from definite catalogues, and not from isolated quotations. But even this evidence is incomplete and unsatisfactory, few of the catalogues being really independent, as will be seen by the subjoined table (No. I.). They evidently fall into two great classes, Hebrew and Latin; and the former, again, exhibits three distinct varieties, which are to be traced to the three original sources from which the catalogues were derived. The first may be called the pure Hebrew Canon, which is that of Protestant churches in general. The second differs from this by the omission of the book of ESTHER. The third differs by the addition of BARUCH, or "the Letter." During the four first centuries this Hebrew Canon is the only one which is distinctly recognized, and it is supported by the combined authority of those Fathers whose critical judgment is entitled to the greatest weight. The real divergence as to the contents of the O. T. Canon is to be traced to Augustine, whose wavering and uncertain language on the point furnishes abundant materials for controversy. In a famous passage (De Doctr. Christ. ii. 8 [13]) he enumerates the books which are contained in "the whole Canon of Scripture," and includes among them the Apocryphal books without any clear mark of distinction. This general statement is further confirmed by two other passages, in which it is argued that he draws a distinction between the Jewish and Christian Canons, and refers the authority of the Apocryphal books to the judgment of the Christian church. But in each case a distinction is drawn between the "Ecclesiastical" and properly "Canonical" books. The enlarged Canon of Augustine, which was, as it will be seen, wholly unsupported by any Greek authority, was adopted at the Council of Carthage (A. D. 397?), though with a reservation, and afterward published in the decretals which bear the name of Innocent, Damasus, and Gelasius; and it recurs in many later writers. But nevertheless a continuous succession of the more learned Fathers in the West maintained the distinctive authority of the Hebrew Canon up to the period of the Reformation.—Roman Catholics allow that up to the date of the Council of Trent the question of the Canon was open, but one of the first labors of that assembly was to circumscribe a freedom which the growth of literature seemed to render perilous. The decree of the Council "on the Canonical Scriptures" pronounced the enlarged Canon, including the Apocryphal books, except 1 and 2 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses, to be deserving in all its parts of "equal veneration," and added a list of books "to prevent the possibility of doubt." This hasty and peremptory decree, unlike in its form to any catalogue before published, was closed by a solemn anathema against all who should "not receive the entire books with all their parts as sacred and canonical." This decree was not, however, passed without opposition; and in spite of the absolute terms in which it is expressed, later Roman Catholics (e. g. Du Pin, Jahn) have sought a method of escaping from the definite equalization of the two classes of sacred writings by a forced interpretation of the subsidiary clauses.—The reformed churches unanimously agreed in confirming the Hebrew Canon of Jerome, and refused to allow any dogmatic authority to the Apocryphal books; but the form in which this judgment was expressed varied considerably in the different confessions. The English church (Art. 6) appeals directly to the opinion of St. Jerome, and concedes to the Apocryphal books (including [1571] 4 Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses) a use "for example of life and instruction of manners," but not for the establishment of doctrine.—The expressed opinion of the later Greek church on the Canon of Scripture has been modified in some cases by the circumstances under which the declaration was made. The authorized Russian catechism distinctly quotes and defends the Hebrew Canon on the authority of the Greek Fathers, and repeats the judgment of Athanasius on the usefulness of the Apocryphal books as a preparatory study in the Bible; and there can be no doubt but that the current of Greek opinion, in accordance with the unanimous agreement of the ancient Greek catalogues, coincides with this judgment.—The history of the Syrian Canon of the O. T. is involved in great obscurity from the scantiness of the evidence which can be brought to bear upon it. The Peshito Version was made, in the first instance, directly from the Hebrew, and consequently adhered to the Hebrew Canon; but as the LXX. was used afterward in revising the version, many of the Apocryphal books were translated from the Greek at an early period, and gradually added to the original collection.—The Armenian Canon, as far as it can be ascertained from editions, follows that of the LXX., but it is of no critical authority; and a similar remark applies to the Ethiopian Canon.—IV. The history of the Canon of the New Testament presents a remarkable analogy to that of the Canon of the O. T. The chief difference lies in the general consent with which all the churches of the West have joined in ratifying one Canon of the N. T., while they are divided as to the position of the O. T. Apocrypha. The history of the N. T. Canon may be conveniently divided into three periods. The first extends to the time of Hegesippus (about A. D. 170), and includes the era of the separate circulation and gradual collection of the Apostolic writings. The second is closed by the persecution of Diocletian (A. D. 303), and marks the separation of the sacred writings from the remaining ecclesiastical literature. The third may be defined by the third Council of Carthage (A. D. 397), in which a catalogue of the books of Scripture was formally ratified by conciliar authority.—1. The history of the Canon of the New Testament to 170 A. D.—The writings of the N. T. themselves contain little more than faint intimations of the position which they were to occupy. The mission of the apostles was essentially one of preaching, and of founding a church. The prevailing spiritual method of interpreting the O. T., and the peculiar position which the first Christians occupied, as standing upon the verge of "the coming age," seemed to preclude the necessity and even the use of a "N. T." Yet the apostles claim for their writings a public use (1 Th. v. 27; Col. iv. 16; Rev. xxii. 18), and an authoritative power (1 Tim. iv. 1, &c.; 2 Th. iii. 6; Rev. xxii. 19); and when 2 Peter was written, the Epistles of St. Paul were placed in significant connection with "the other Scriptures."—The transition from the Apostolic to the sub-Apostolic age is essentially abrupt and striking. An age of conservatism succeeds an age of creation; but in feeling and general character the period which followed the working of the apostles seems to have been a faithful reflection of that which they moulded. The writings of the Apostolic Fathers (about 70–120 A. D.) are all occasional. They sprang out of peculiar circumstances, and offered little scope for quotation. At the same time they show that the Canonical books supply an adequate explanation of the belief of the next age, and must therefore represent completely the earlier teaching on which that was based. In three places, however, in which it was natural to look for a more distinct reference, Clement (Ep. 47), Ignatius (ad Eph. 12), and Polycarp (Ep. 3) refer to Apostolic Epistles written to those whom they were themselves addressing. The casual coincidences of the writings of the Apostolic Fathers with the language of the Epistles are much more extensive. With the exception of the Epistles of Jude, 2 Peter, 2 John, and 3 John, with which no coincidences occur, and 1 Thessalonians, 2 Thessalonians, Colossians, Titus, and Philemon, with which the coincidences are very questionable, all the other Epistles were clearly known, and used by them; but still they are not quoted with the formulas which preface citations from the O. T., nor is the famous phrase of Ignatius (ad Philad. 5), "having fled for refuge to the Gospel as to the flesh of Christ and to the apostles as to the presbytery of the Church," sufficient to prove the existence of a collection of Apostolic records as distinct from the sum of Apostolic teaching. The coincidences with the GOSPELS, on the other hand, are numerous and interesting, but such as cannot be referred to the exclusive use of our present written Gospels. The details of the life of Christ were still too fresh to be sought for only in fixed records; and even where memory was less active, long habit interposed a barrier to the recognition of new Scriptures. The sense of the infinite depth and paramount authority of the O. T. was too powerful even among Gentile converts to require or to admit of the immediate addition of supplementary books (so Mr. Westcott, the original author of this article). But the sense of the peculiar position which the apostles occupied, as the original inspired teachers of the Christian church, was already making itself felt in the sub-Apostolic age.—The next period (120–170 A. D.), which may be fitly termed the age of the Apologists, carries the history of the formation of the Canon one step further. The facts of the life of Christ acquired a fresh importance in controversy with Jew and Gentile. The oral tradition, which still remained in the former age, was dying away, and a variety of written documents claimed to occupy its place. Then it was that the Canonical Gospels were definitely separated from the mass of similar narratives in virtue of their outward claims, which had remained, as it were, in abeyance during the period of tradition. Other narratives remained current for some time, but where the question of authority was raised, the four Gospels were ratified by universal consent. The testimony of Justin Martyr (about 146 A. D.) is in this respect most important. An impartial examination of his Evangelic references shows that they were derived certainly in the main, probably exclusively, from our Synoptic Gospels (i. e. Matthew, Mark, and Luke), and that each Gospel is distinctly recognized by him. The references of Justin to St. John are less decided; and of the other books of the N. T. he mentions the Apocalypse only by name (Dial. c. 81), and offers some coincidences of language with the Pauline Epistles.—The evidence of Papias (about 140–150 A. D.) is nearly contemporary with that of Justin, but goes back to a still earlier generation. It seems on every account most reasonable to conclude that he was acquainted with our present Gospels of Matthew and Mark, the former of which he connected with an earlier Hebrew original; and probably also with the Gospel of St. John, with 1 John and 1 Peter, and the Apocalypse. Meanwhile the Apostolic writings were taken by various mystical teachers as the foundation of strange schemes of speculation, which are popularly confounded together under the general title of Gnosticism, whether Gentile or Jewish in their origin. The need of a definite Canon must have made itself felt during the course of the Gnostic controversy. The Canon of Marcion (about 140 A. D.) contained both a Gospel ("The Gospel of Christ") which was a mutilated recension of St. Luke, and an "Apostle" or Apostolicon, which contained ten Epistles of St. Paul—the only true apostle in Marcion's judgment—excluding the pastoral Epistles and Hebrews. The narrow limits of this Canon were a necessary consequence of Marcion's belief and position, but it offers a clear witness to the fact that Apostolic writings were thus early regarded as a complete original rule of doctrine.—The close of this period of the history of the N. T. Canon is marked by the existence of two important testimonies to the N. T. as a whole. Hitherto the evidence has been in the main fragmentary and occasional; but the Muratorian Canon in the West (written about 170 A. D.), and the Peshito (VERSIONS, ANCIENT SYRIAC) in the East, deal with the collection of Christian Scriptures as such. Up to this point 2 Peter is the only book of the N. T. which is not recognized as an Apostolic and authoritative writing; and in this result the evidence from casual quotations coincides exactly with the enumeration in the two express catalogues.—2. The history of the Canon of the New Testament from 170 A. D. to 303 A. D.—From the close of the second century Christian writers take the foremost place intellectually as well as morally; and the powerful influence of the Alexandrine church widened the range of Catholic thought, and checked the spread of speculative heresies. From the first the common elements of the Roman and Syrian Canons form a Canon of acknowledged books, regarded as a whole, authoritative and inspired, and coordinate with the O. T. Each of these points is proved by the testimony of contemporary Fathers who represent the churches of Asia Minor, Alexandria, and N. Africa. Irenæus speaks of the Scriptures as a whole, without distinction of the Old and New Testaments, as "perfect, inasmuch as they were uttered by the Word of God and His Spirit." "There could not be," he elsewhere argues,

"more than four Gospels or fewer." Clement of Alexandria, again, marks "the Apostle" or "the Apostles" as a collection definite as "the Gospel," and combines them as "Scriptures of the Lord" with the Law and the Prophets. Tertullian notices particularly the introduction of the word Testament for the earlier word Instrument, as applied to the dispensation and the record, and appeals to the N. T., as made up of the "Gospels" and "Apostles." This comprehensive testimony extends to the four Gospels, the Acts, 1 Peter, 1 John, 13 Epistles of St. Paul, and the Apocalypse; and, with the exception of the Apocalypse, no one of these books was ever afterward rejected or questioned till modern times. But this important agreement as to the principal contents of the Canon left several points still undecided. The East and West, as was seen in the last section, severally received some books which were not universally accepted. So far the error lay in defect; but in other cases apocryphal or unapostolic books obtained a partial sanction or a popular use before they finally passed into oblivion. Generally it may be said that of the "disputed" books of the N. T. the Apocalypse was universally received with the single exception of Dionysius of Alexandria, by all the writers of the period; and the Epistle to the Hebrews, by the churches of Alexandria, Asia (?), and Syria, but not by those of Africa and Rome. The Epistles of James and Jude, on the other hand, were little used, and 2 Peter was barely known.

—3. The history of the New Testament Canon, A. D. 303–397.—The persecution of Diocletian was directed in a great measure against the Christian writings. The plan of the emperor was in part successful. Some were found who obtained protection by the surrender of the sacred books, and at a later time the question of the readmission of these "traitors" (traditores), as they were emphatically called, created a schism in the church. The Donatists, who maintained the sterner judgment on their crime, may be regarded as maintaining in its strictest integrity the popular judgment in Africa on the contents of the Canon of Scripture which was the occasion of the dissension; and Augustine allows that they held in common with the Catholics the same "Canonical Scriptures," and were alike "bound by the authority of both Testaments." The complete Canon of the N. T., as commonly received at present, was ratified at the third Council of Carthage (A. D. 397), and from that time was accepted throughout the Latin church, though occasional doubts as to the Epistle to the Hebrews still remained. Meanwhile the Syrian churches, faithful to the conservative spirit of the East, still retained the Canon of the Peshito. Chrysostom († 407 A. D.), Theodore of Mopsuestia († 429 A. D.), and Theodoret, who represent the church of Antioch, furnish no evidence in support of the Epistles of Jude, 2 Peter, 2 John, 3 John, or the Apocalypse. Junilius, in his account of the public teaching at Nisibis, places the Epistles of James, Jude, 2 John, 3 John, 2 Peter in a second class, and mentions the doubts which existed in the East as to the Apocalypse. And though Ephrem Syrus was acquainted with the Apocalypse, yet his genuine Syrian works exhibit no habitual use of the books not contained in the Syrian Canon.—The churches of Asia Minor seem to have occupied a middle position as to the Canon between the East and West. With the exception of the Apocalypse, they received generally all the books of the N. T. as contained in the African Canon. The well-known Festal Letter of Athanasius († 373 A. D.)

bears witness to the Alexandrine Canon. This contains a clear and positive list of the books of the N. T. as they are received at present; and the judgment of Athanasius is confirmed by the practice of his successor Cyril.—One important catalogue yet remains to be mentioned. After noticing in separate places the origin and use of the Gospels and Epistles, Eusebius sums up in a famous passage the results of his inquiry into the evidence on the Apostolic books furnished by the writings of the three first centuries (H. E. iii. 25). In the first class of acknowledged books (Gr. homologoumena) he places the four Gospels, the Epistles of St. Paul (i. e. fourteen), 1 John, 1 Peter, and, in case its authenticity is admitted (such seems to be his meaning), the Apocalypse. The second class of disputed books (Gr. antilegomena) he subdivides into two parts, (1.) such as were generally known and recognized, including the Epistles of James, Jude, 2 Peter, 2 John, 3 John; (2.) those which he pronounces spurious, i. e. which were either unauthentic or unapostolic, as the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd, the Apocalypse of Peter, the Apocalypse of John (if not a work of the apostle), and according to some the Gospel according to the Hebrews. These two great classes contain all the books which had received ecclesiastical sanction, and were in common distinguished from a third class of heretical forgeries (e. g. the Gospels of Thomas, Peter, Matthias, &c.).—At the era of the Reformation the question of the N. T. Canon became again a subject of great though partial interest. The hasty decree of the Council of Trent, which affirmed the authority of all the books commonly received, called out the opposition of controversialists, who quoted and enforced the early doubts. Erasmus denied the Apostolic origin of the Epistle to the Hebrews, 2 Peter, and the Apocalypse, but left their canonical authority unquestioned. Luther, on the other hand, created a purely subjective standard for the canonicity of the Scriptures, and placed the Gospel of John and 1 John, Romans, Galatians, Ephesians, and 1 Peter, in the first rank as containing the "kernel of Christianity," but set aside Hebrews, Jude, James, and the Apocalypse, at the end of his version, and spoke of them and the remaining Antilegomena (see above) with varying degrees of disrespect, though he did not separate 2 Peter, 2 John, 3 John, from the other Epistles. The doubts which Luther rested mainly on internal evidence were variously extended by some of his followers; but their views received no direct sanction in any of the Lutheran symbolic books. The doubts as to the Antilegomena of the N. T. were not confined to the Lutherans. Carlstadt placed the Antilegomena in a third class. Calvin, while he denied the Pauline authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and at least questioning the authenticity of 2 Peter, did not set aside their canonicity, and he notices the doubts as to James and Jude only to dismiss them.—The articles of the church of England and of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States of America define Holy Scripture as "the canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the church" (Art. vi.). This definition is followed by an enumeration of the books of the O. T. and of the Apocrypha; and then it is said summarily, without a detailed catalogue, "all the books of the N. T., as they are commonly received, we do receive and account them canonical."—The judgment of the Greek church in the case of the O. T. was seen to be little more than a reflection of the opinions of the West. The confession of Metrophanes gives a complete list of the books. At present, as was already the case at the close of the seventeenth century, the Antilegomena are reckoned by the Greek church as equal in canonical authority in all respects with the remaining books. See the articles on the separate books of the Scriptures; APOCRYPHA; BIBLE; GOSPELS; INSPIRATION; MIRACLES; NEW TESTAMENT; OLD TESTAMENT; PENTATEUCH; PROPHET; SCRIPTURE; SEPTUAGINT; VERSIONS; VULGATE.

Can'ô-py (Gr. kônôpeion) (Jd. x. 21, xiii. 9, 15, xvi. 19). The canopy of Holofernes (Ben) is the only one expressly mentioned. It probably retained the mosquito nets or curtains in which the Greek name originated, although its being "woven with purple, and gold, and emeralds, and precious stones" (Jd. x. 21) betrays luxury and display rather than such simple usefulness.

Cant'icles [-te-klz] (fr. L. = little songs), entitled in the A. V. "the Song of Solomon," (and in i. 1) "the Song of songs (i. e. the most beautiful of songs) which is Solomon's."—I. Author and date.—By the Hebrew title (in i. 1) it is ascribed to Solomon; and so in all the versions, and by the majority of Jewish and Christian writers, ancient and modern. In fact, if we except a few of the Talmudical writers, who assigned it to the age of Hezekiah, there is scarcely a dissentient voice down to the close of the last century. More recent criticism, however, has called in question this deep-rooted and well-accredited tradition. Among English scholars Kennicott, among German Eichhorn and Rosenmüller, regard the poem as belonging to the age of Ezra and Nehemiah. The charge of Chaldaism has been vigorously pressed by Rosenmüller, and especially by Eichhorn. But Gesenius assigns the book to the golden age of Hebrew literature, and traces "the few solitary Chaldaisms" which occur in the writings of that age to the hands of Chaldee copyists. He has moreover suggested an important distinction between Chaldaisms and dialectic varieties indigenous to N. Palestine, where he conjectures that Judges and Canticles were composed. Nor is this conjecture inconsistent with the opinion which places it among the "thousand and five" songs of Solomon (1 K. iv. 32; compare ix. 19 and 2 Chr. viii. 6). Probably Solomon had at least a hunting-seat somewhere on the slopes of Lebanon (compare Cant. iv. 8, Heb. 9), and in such a retreat, and under the influence of its scenery, and the language of the surrounding peasantry, he may have written Canticles. On the whole it seems unnecessary to depart from the plain meaning of the Hebrew title. Supposing the date fixed to the reign of Solomon, the question, at what period of that monarch's life the poem was written is closely connected with the interpretation of it, whether literally as an outburst of human love in his youth, or allegorically as the product of his matured wisdom after repentance of his sin. (See below III.).—II. Form.—This question is not determined by the Hebrew title. The non-continuity which many critics attribute to the poem is far from being a modern discovery. Ghislerius (sixteenth century) considered it a drama in five acts. Down to the eighteenth century, however, the Canticles were generally regarded as continuous. Gregory Nazianzen calls it "a bridal drama and song." According to Patrick, it is a "Pastoral Eclogue," or a "Dramatic Poem;" according to Lowth, "an epithalamium (or nuptial dialogue) of a pastoral kind." Michaelis and Rosenmüller, while differing as to its interpretation, agree in making it continuous. Bossuet, and after him Calmet, Percy, Williams, and Lowth, divided the Song into seven parts, or scenes of a pastoral drama, corresponding with the seven days of the Jewish nuptial ceremony. His division is impugned by Taylor (Fragments in Calmet), who proposes one of six days; and considers the drama to be post-nuptial, not ante-nuptial, as it is explained by Bossuet. The entire nuptial theory has been severely handled by J. D. Michaelis, and the literal school of interpreters in general. Lowth makes it a drama, but only of the minor kind, i. e. dramatic as a dialogue. He was unable to discover a plot. Moreover, if the only dramatic element in Canticles be the dialogue, the rich pastoral character of its scenery and allusions renders the term drama less applicable than that of idyl. The idyllic form seems to have recommended itself to the allegorical school of translators as getting rid of that dramatic unity and plot which their system of interpretation reduced to a succession of events without any culminating issue. But the majority of recent translators belonging to the literal school have adopted the theory of Jacobi (see below, III., 3). Based as this theory is upon the dramatic evolution of a simple love-story, it supplies that essential movement and interest, the want of which was felt by Lowth; and justifies the application of the term drama, to a composition of which it manifests the vital principle and organic structure.—III. Meaning.—The schools of interpretation may be divided into three:—the mystical, or typical; the allegorical; and the literal.—1. The mystical interpretation is properly an offshoot of the allegorical, and probably owes its origin to the necessity which was felt of supplying a literal basis for the speculations of the allegorists. This basis is either the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter (so most mystical interpreters, before 1800), or his marriage with an Israelitish woman, the Shulamite (so Good, &c.). The mystical interpretation makes its first appearance in Origen, who wrote a voluminous commentary upon the Canticles. It reappears in Abulpharagius (1226–1286), and was received by Grotius, approved of, and systematized by Bossuet, indorsed by Lowth, and used for the purpose of translation by Percy and Williams.—2. Allegorical.—Notwithstanding the attempts to discover this principle of interpretation in the LXX. (Cant. iv. 8); Jesus the son of Sirach (Ecclus. xlvii. 14–17; Wis. viii. 2); and Josephus (Ap. i. § 8); it is impossible to trace it with any certainty farther back than the Talmud. According to the Talmud the beloved = God; the loved one, or bride = the congregation of Israel. This general relation is expanded into more particular detail by the Targum, or Chaldee Paraphrase, which treats the Song of songs as an allegorical history of the Jewish people from the Exodus to the coming of the Messiah, and the building of the third Temple. Elaborate as it was, the interpretation of the Targum was still further developed by the mediæval Jews, who introduced it into their liturgical services. A new school of Jewish exegesis was originated by Mendelssohn (1729–1786); which, without actually denying the existence of an allegorical meaning, devoted itself to the literal interpretation. In the Christian church, the Talmudical interpretation, imported by Origen, was all but universally received. It was called in question by Erasmus and Grotius, and was gradually superseded by the typical theory of Grotius, Bossuet, Lowth, &c. In the eighteenth century the allegorical theory was reasserted, and reconstructed by Puffendorf (1776), and the reactionary allegorists (see below).

Some of the more remarkable variations of the allegorical school are:—(a.) The extension of the Chaldee allegory to the Christian church (so Aponius, Cocceius, &c.). (b.) Luther's theory limits the allegorical meaning to the contemporaneous history of the Jewish people under Solomon. (c.) According to Ghislerius and Cornelius a Lapide, the Bride = the Virgin Mary. (d.) Puffendorf refers the spiritual sense to the circumstances of our Saviour's death and burial.—3. The Literal interpretation seems to have been connected with the general movement of Theodore of Mopsuestia (360–429) and his followers, against the extravagances of the early Christian allegorists. Its scheme was nuptial, with Pharaoh's daughter as the bride. The nuptial theory was adopted by Grotius as the literal basis of a secondary and spiritual interpretation; and, after its dramatical development by Bossuet, long continued to be the standard scheme of the mystical school. In 1803 it was reconstructed by Good, with a Jewish instead of an Egyptian bride. The purely literal theory owes its origin to Germany. Michaelis (1770) regarded the Song as an exponent of wedded love, innocent, and happy. From this time German scholarship was mainly with the literalists. The most generally received interpretation of the modern literalists is that originally proposed by Jacobi (1771), adopted by Herder, Ammon, Umbreit, Ewald, &c.; and more recently by Prof. Meier of Tübingen (1854), and in England by Mr. Ginsburg, in his very excellent translation (1857). According to the detailed application of this view as given by Mr. Ginsburg, the Song is intended to display the victory of humble and constant love over the temptations of wealth and royalty. The tempter is Solomon: the object of his seductive endeavors is a Shulamite shepherdess, who, surrounded by the glories of the court and the fascinations of unwonted splendor, pines for the shepherd-lover from whom she has been involuntarily separated. The drama is divided into five sections, indicated by the thrice-repeated formula of adjuration (ii. 7, iii. 5, viii. 4), and the use of another closing sentence (v. 1). Prof. Weir (see below) also divides Canticles into five sections, but makes the third end with vi. 9 (not v. 1).—But even in Germany a strong band of reactionary allegorists have maintained their ground. On the whole, their tendency is to return to the Chaldee Paraphrase; a tendency especially marked in Rosenmüller. The allegorical interpretation has been defended in America by Professors Stuart and Burrowes, and by Prof. Stowe in American Bible Repository for July, 1847. It is also maintained by Prof. D. H. Weir in Fairbairn. The principal internal arguments adduced by them to show that the book delineates the mutual love of God and His people are:—(1.) the significations of "Solomon" (Heb. Shelômôsh = peace-giver) and "Shulamite" (Heb. Shûlammîth = peace-enjoying): (2.) the sudden changes from the singular to the plural indicating that Shûlammîth is to be taken collectively (i. 4, &c.): (3.) the occurrence of scenes and expressions (e. g. iii. 1–4, v. 7, viii. 1, 2), which, literally understood, are abhorrent to Eastern manners, yet not uncommon in Eastern allegorical poetry: (4.) the entire absence of jealousy in such scenes as are represented in i. 4, v. 1, vi. 8, 9: (5.) the dreamy and even impossible character of many scenes if literally understood (ii. 14–17, iv. 8, &c.). For external arguments the allegorists adduce Jewish tradition, the analogy of Oriental poetry, and especially the matrimonial metaphor so frequently employed in the Scriptures to describe the relation between Jehovah and Israel (Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16; Num. xv. 39; Ps. lxxiii. 27; Jer. iii. 1–11; Ez. xvi., xxiii., &c.). Compare also Ps. xlv.; Is. v. 1, liv. 4–6, lxii. 4, 5; Mat. ix. 15; Jn. iii. 29; 2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 23 ff.; Rev. xix. 7 ff.; xxi. 2, xxii. 17.—IV. Canonicity.—The book was rejected from the Canon by Castellio and Whiston; but in no case has its rejection been defended on external grounds. It is found in the LXX., and in the translations of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion. It is contained in the catalogue given in the Talmud, and in the catalogue of Melito; and in short we have the same evidence for its canonicity as that which is commonly adduced for the canonicity of any book of the O. T. BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION, &c.

Capernaum (Gr. Kapernaoum or Kapharnaoum, prob. fr. Heb. [see CAPHAR] = village of Nahum, Rbn. N. T. Lex.), a city of Galilee, the scene of many acts and incidents in the life of Christ. There is no mention of Capernaum in the O. T. or Apocrypha, but Is. ix. 1 (in Heb., viii. 23) is applied to it in Mat. iv. 15. The few notices of its situation in the N. T. are not sufficient to determine its exact position. It was on the W. shore of the sea of Galilee (Mat. iv. 13; compare Jn. vi. 24), and, if recent discoveries are to be trusted, was of sufficient importance to give to that sea, in whole or in part, the name of the "lake of Capernaum." (So also TIBERIAS.) It was in (so Mr. Grove), or not far from (so Thn. ii. 31), the "land of GENNESARET" (Mat. xiv. 34, compare Jn. vi. 17, 21, 24), i. e. the rich, busy plain on the W. shore of the lake, which we know from Josephus and from other sources to have been at that time one of the most prosperous and crowded districts in all Palestine. Being on the shore, Capernaum was lower than Nazareth and Cana of Galilee, from which the road to it was one of descent (Jn. ii. 12; Lk. iv. 31). It was of sufficient size to be always called a "city" (Mat. ix. 1; Mk. i. 33); had its own synagogue, in which our Lord frequently taught (Jn. vi. 59; Mk. i. 21; Lk. iv. 33, 38)—a synagogue built by the centurion of the detachment of Roman soldiers which appears to have been quartered in the place (Lk. vii. 1, compare 8; Mat. viii. 8 ff.). But besides the garrison there was also a customs station, where the dues were gathered both by stationary (Mat. ix. 9; Mk. ii. 14; Lk. v. 27) and by itinerant (Mat. xvii. 24) officers. The only interest attaching to Capernaum is as the residence of our Lord and His apostles, the scene of so many miracles and "gracious words." At Nazareth He was "brought up," but Capernaum was emphatically His "own city;" it was when He returned thither that He is said to have been "at home" ("in the house," A. V., Mk. ii. 1). Here He chose the Evangelist Matthew or Levi (Mat. ix. 9). The brothers Simon Peter and Andrew belonged to Capernaum (Mk. i. 29), and it is perhaps allowable to imagine that it was on the sea-beach that they heard the quiet call which was to make them forsake all and follow Him (Mk. i. 16, 17, compare 28). It was here that Christ worked the miracle on the centurion's servant (Mat. viii. 5; Lk. vii. 1), on Simon's wife's mother (Mat. viii. 14; Mk. i. 30; Lk. iv. 38), the paralytic (Mat. ix. 1; Mk. ii. 1; Lk. v. 18), and the man afflicted with an unclean devil (Mk. i. 32; Lk. iv. 33). At Capernaum occurred the incident of the child (Mk. ix. 33; Mat. xviii. 1; compare xvii. 24); and in the synagogue there was spoken the wonderful discourse of Jn. vi. (see verse 59). The doom which our Lord pronounced against Capernaum and the other unbelieving cities of the plain of Gennesaret has been remarkably fulfilled. The spots which lay claim to its site are 1. Khân Mînyeh (advocated by Robinson [ii. 403 ff., iii. 348 ff.], Porter in Kitto, &c.), a mound of ruins which takes its name from an old khan hard by on the N. This mound is situated close upon the sea-shore at the N. W. extremity of the plain (now El Ghuveir). 2. Three miles N. E. of Khân Mînyeh is the other claimant, Tell Hâm (favored by Thomson [i. 540 ff.], Wilson [ii. 142 ff.], Ritter, Van de Velde, &c.), ruins of walls and foundations covering a space of half a mile long by a quarter wide, on a point of the shore projecting into the lake and backed by a very gently rising ground. 3. 'Ain el-Mudawarah (the Round Fountain), in the W. boundary of the plain, a mile and a half back from the shore, and about three miles S. S. W. of Khân Mînyeh, was long believed to mark the site, and its claims have recently been advocated by Tristram (442 ff.) and De Saulcy. CHORAZIN; BETHSAIDA.

* Caph (Heb. = curved, hollow, the hollow of the hand, the palm, Ges.), the eleventh Hebrew letter, placed at the beginning of the eleventh section (ver. 81–88) of Ps. cxix. NUMBER; WRITING.

Cap'har (Heb. = village, hamlet [= Ar. kefr]; literally a covering, shelter, from the verb côphar, Ges.; see ATONEMENT), translated in the plural "villages" (1 Chr. xxvii. 25; Neh. vi. 2; Cant. vii. 11). The kindred Hebrew word côpher is translated "villages" in 1 Sam. vi. 18. In names of places it occurs in CHEPHAR-HA-AMMONAI, CHEPHIRAH, CAPHAR-SALAMA, CAPERNAUM, i. e. Capharnahum.

Cap'har-sal'a-ma (L. fr. Heb.; see CAPHAR), a place at which a battle was fought between Judas Maccabeus and Nicanor (1 Mc. vii. 31); apparently near Jerusalem; = the village of SILOAM?

Ca-phen'a-tha (fr. Talmudic caphniôth denoting unripe figs, Lightfoot), a place apparently close to and on the E. side of Jerusalem, which was repaired by Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Mc. xii. 37).

Ca-phi'ra (L.) = CHEPHIRAH (1 Esd. v. 19).

Cap'h-to-rim (1 Chr. i. 12) = CAPHTORIM.

Caphtor (Heb. a crown or chaplet, Ges.), a country thrice mentioned as the primitive seat of the PHILISTINES (Deut. ii. 23; Jer. xlvii. 4; Am. ix. 7), who are once called CAPHTORIMS (Deut. ii. 23), as of the same race with the Mizraite people of that name ("CAPHTORIM," Gen. x. 14; "Caphthorim," 1 Chr. i. 12). (CASLUHIM.) The position of the country, since it was peopled by Mizraites, must be supposed to be in EGYPT or near to it in Africa, for the idea of the S. W. of Palestine is excluded by the migration of the Philistines. Caphtor in most of the ancient versions is translated Cappadocia; some have made Caphtor = Cyprus; Rosenmüller, Mövers, Ewald, Fürst, &c., favor Crete. Mr. R. S. Poole has proposed to recognize Caphtor in the ancient Egyptian name Coptos. We must not suppose, however, that Caphtor was Coptos: it must rather be compared to the Coptite nome, probably in primitive ages of greater extent than under the Ptolemies, for the number of nomes was in the course of time greatly increased. The Caphtorim stand last in the list of the Mizraite peoples in Genesis and Chronicles, probably as dwellers in Upper Egypt, the names next before them being of Egyptian, and the earliest names of Libyan peoples. The migration of the Philistines is mentioned or alluded to in all the passages speaking of Caphtor or the Caphtorim. The period of the migration must have been very remote, since the Philistines were already established in Palestine in Abraham's time (Gen. xxi. 32, 34). The evidence of the Egyptian monuments, which is indirect, tends to the same conclusion, but takes us yet further back in time. We find from the sculptures of Rameses III. at Medeenet Haboo, that the Egyptians about 1200 B. C. were at war with the Philistines, the Tok-karu (= Carians? so Mr. Poole) and the Shayratana (see PELETHITES) of the Sea, and that other Shayratana served them as mercenaries. This evidence points therefore to the spread of a seafaring race cognate to the Egyptians at a very remote time. Probably the Philistines left Caphtor not long after the first arrival of the Mizraite tribes, while they had not yet attained that attachment to the soil that afterward so eminently characterized the descendants of those which formed the Egyptian nation.

Cap'h-to-rims (Deut. ii. 23), an English form of CAPHTORIM. CAPHTOR.

Cap-pa-do'ci-a [-she-a] (L. fr. Gr.; fr. Pers., Hdt.), a district of Asia Minor interesting in reference to N. T. history only from the mention of its Jewish residents among the hearers of St. Peter's first sermon (Acts ii. 9), and its Christian residents among the readers of his first Epistle (1 Pet. i. 1). The Jewish community in this region, doubtless, formed the nucleus of the Christian; and the former may probably be traced to the first introduction of Jewish colonists into Asia Minor by Seleucus. The range of Mount Taurus and the upper course of the Eu-PHRATES may safely be mentioned, in general terms, as natural boundaries of Cappadocia on the S. and E. Its geographical limits on the W. and N. were variable. In early times the name reached as far N. as the Euxine Sea. Cappadocia is an elevated tableland intersected by mountain-chains. It seems always to have been deficient in wood; but it was a good grain country, and particularly famous for grazing. Its Roman metropolis was Cesarea, now Kaisariyeh. The native Cappadocians seem originally to have belonged to the Syrian stock. ARIARATHES; LYCAONIA; PONTUS.

Cap'tain, the translation in the A. V. of nearly twenty different words, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek, denoting in general a chief or leader, either military or civil. (1.) As a purely military title, it is the translation of the Hebrew sar (lit. one that has dominion, a chief; see GOVERNOR 10) (Num. xxxi. 14; 1 K. i. 19, 25; 2 K. i. 9 ff., &c.). The Greek chiliarchos (lit. commander of 1,000; hence, a Roman military tribune) is translated "captain" in Jn. xviii. 12 and Rev. xix. 18, but usually "chief captain" (Acts xxi. 31 ff., &c.). (ARMY.) The "captain of the guard" in Acts xxviii. 16 was probably the praetorian prefect or commander of the emperor's body-guard. (2.) Hebrew kátsin, occasionally translated "captain" (Josh. x. 24; Judg. xi. 6, 11), sometimes also, like sar, denotes a civil officer, and is translated "prince" (Prov. xxv. 15, &c.), "ruler" (Is. iii. 6, 7, &c.), &c. So also Hebrew nási (lit. one elevated or exalted, Ges.) (Num. ii. 3, 5, &c.), rôsh (lit. the head) (Num. xiv. 4, &c.), nágid (lit. the foremost, Ges.), (1 Sam. ix. 16, &c.), &c. (3.) The "captain of the Temple" mentioned by St. Luke (xxii. 4, 52; Acts iv. 1, v. 24) superintended the guard of priests and Levites, who kept watch by night in the Temple. The office appears to have existed from an early date. (4.) The Greek archêgos, translated "captain" in Heb. ii. 10, = leader, author, founder (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).

* Cap'tive. CAPTIVITY; SLAVE; WAR.

Cap'tivity. The bondage of Israel in Egypt, and their subjugation at different times by the Philistines and other nations, are sometimes included under the above title; and the Jews themselves, perhaps with reference to Daniel's vision (ch. vii.), reckon their national captivities as four—the Babylonian, Median, Grecian, and Roman. But the present article is confined to the forcible deportation of the Hebrew people from their native land, and their forcible detention, under the Assyrian and Babylonian kings. The kingdom of Israel was invaded by three or four successive kings of Assyria. Pul or Sardanapalus, according to Rawlinson, imposed a tribute (B. C. 771; 762, Rln.) upon Menahem (1 Chr. v. 26, and 2 K. xv. 19). Tiglath-Pileser carried away (B. C. 740) the trans-Jordanic tribes (1 Chr. v. 26) and the inhabitants of Galilee (2 K. xv. 29, compare Is. ix. 1) to Assyria. Shalmaneser twice invaded (2 K. xvii. 3, 5) the kingdom which remained to Hoshea, took Samaria (B. C. 721) after a siege of three years, and carried Israel away into Assyria. Sennacherib (B. C. 713) is stated to have carried into Assyria 200,000 captives from the Jewish cities which he took (2 K. xviii. 13). Nebuchadnezzar, in the first half of his reign (B. C. 606-562), repeatedly invaded Judah, besieged Jerusalem, carried away the inhabitants to Babylon, and destroyed the city and Temple. Two distinct deportations are mentioned in 2 K. xxiv. 14 (including 10,000 persons) and xxv. 11; one in 2 Chr. xxxvi. 20; three in Jer. lii. 29-30, including 4,600 persons; one in Dan. i. 2. The two principal deportations were, (1.) that which took place B. C. 598, when Jehoiachin with all the nobles, soldiers, and artificers was carried away; and (2.) that which followed the destruction of the Temple and the capture of Zedekiah B. C. 588. The three which Jeremiah mentions may have been the contributions of a particular class or district to the general captivity; or they may have taken place under the orders of Nebuchadnezzar, before or after the two principal deportations. The captivity of certain selected children B. C. 607, mentioned by Daniel, who was one of them, may have occurred when Nebuchadnezzar was colleague or lieutenant of his father Nabopolassar, a year before he reigned alone. The seventy years of captivity predicted by Jeremiah (xxv. 12) are dated by Prideaux from B. C. 606. The captivity of Ezekiel dates from B. C. 598, when that prophet, like Mordecai the uncle of Esther (Esth. ii. 6), accompanied Jehoiachin. The captives were treated not as slaves but as colonists. There was nothing to hinder a Jew from rising to the highest eminence in the state (Dan. ii. 48), or holding the most confidential office near the person of the king (Neh. i. 11; Tob. i. 13, 22). The advice of Jeremiah (xxix. 5, &c.) was generally followed. The exiles increased in numbers and in wealth. They observed the Mosaic law (Esth. iii. 8; Tob. xiv. 9). They kept up distinctions of rank among themselves (Ez. xx. 1). Their genealogical tables were preserved, and they were at no loss to tell who was the rightful heir to David's throne. They had neither place nor time of national gathering, no Temple; and they offered no sacrifice. But the rite of circumcision and their laws respecting food, &c., were observed; their priests were with them (Jer. xxix. 1); and possibly the practice of erecting synagogues in every city (Acts xv. 21) was begun by the Jews in the Babylonian Captivity. The Captivity is not without contemporaneous literature. In Tobit we have a picture of the inner life of a family of the tribe of Naphtali, among the captives whom Shalmaneser brought to Nineveh. Baruch seems, in Mr. Layard's opinion, to have been written by one whose eyes, like those of Ezekiel, were familiar with the gigantic forms of Assyrian sculpture. Several of the Psalms appear to express the sentiments of Jews who were either partakers or witnesses of the Assyrian captivity. But it is from the three great prophets, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, that we learn most of the condition of the children of the Captivity. The Babylonian Captivity was brought to a close by the decree (Ezr. i. 2) of Cyrus (B. C. 536), and the return of a portion of the nation under Zerubbabel (B. C. 535), Ezra (B. C. 458), and Nehemiah (B. C. 445). The number who returned upon the decree of B. C. 536 was 42,360, besides servants. Among them about 30,000 are specified (compare Ezr. ii and Neh. vii.) as belonging to the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi. It has been inferred that the remaining 12,000 belonged to the tribes of Israel (compare Ezr. vi. 17). (GENUS.) Those who were left in Assyria (Esth. viii. 9, 11), and kept up their national distinctions, were known as The Dispersion (DISPERSION, JEWS OF THE); and, in course of time, they served a great purpose in diffusing a knowledge of the true God, and in affording a point for the commencement of the efforts of the Evangelists of the Christian faith. Many attempts have been made to discover the ten tribes existing as a distinct community. Josephus (xi. 5, § 2) believed that in his day they dwelt in large multitudes, somewhere beyond the Euphrates, in Arsareth, according to 2 Esd. xiii. 45. The imagination of Christian writers has sought them in the neighborhood of their last recorded habitation, in the Afghan tribes, at the foot of the Himalayas, in the Black Jews of Malabar, in the Nestorians, and in the N. American Indians. But though history bears no witness of their present distinct existence, it enables us to track the footsteps of the departing race in four directions after the time of the Captivity. (1.) Some returned and mixed with the Jews (Lk. ii. 36; Phil. iii. 5, &c.). (2.) Some were left in Samaria, mingled with the Samaritans (Ezr. vi. 21; Jn. iv. 12), and became bitter enemies of the Jews. (3.) Many remained in Assyria, and were recognized as an integral part of the Dispersion (see Acts ii. 9, xxvi. 7). (4.) Most, probably (so Prideaux), apostatized in Assyria, adopted the usages and idolatry of the nations among whom they were planted, and became wholly swallowed up in them.—The Captivity was a period of change in the vernacular language of the Jews (see Neh. viii. 8) (SHEMITIC LANGUAGES), and in the national character. COMMERCE; CYRUS; IDOLATRY; JERUSALEM; SYNAGOGUE.

Car-a-ba'si-on (fr. Gr.), a corrupt name to which it is difficult to find any thing corresponding in the Hebrew text (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Car-bun-cle [-bunk-l], a precious stone of a deep red color, now more commonly called garnet (Dana). Carbuncle is the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ekdāh or ekdāch, which occurs only in Is. liv. 12, in the description of the beauties of the new Jerusalem. Perhaps this may be a general term = any bright sparkling gem, but as it occurs only once, it is impossible to determine its real meaning.—2. Heb. bārekath, bāreketh, the third stone in the first row of the sacerdotal breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 17, xxxix. 10), also one of the mineral treasures of the king of Tyre (Ez. xxviii. 13); probably (so Braun, with the LXX., Vulg. and Jos.) = the emerald, a precious stone of a rich green color; see EMERALD 2.—3. Greek anthraz (see COAL 6) (Tob. xiii. 17; Ecclus. xxxii. 5) = the carbuncle (L. & S., &c.). The ancients probably included under this name every kind of red, transparent, fiery stone, including the garnet, ruby, &c. (C. W. King). (See above.)

Car'eas (Heb. fr. Sansc. = severe? Ges.), the seventh of the "chamberlains" of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Car'cha-mis (1 Esd. i. 25) = CARCHEMISH.

Car'che-mish [-ke-] (fr. Heb. = fortress of Chemosh, Ges.), a city (2 Chr. xxxv. 20; Is. x. 9; Jer. xlv. 2), generally supposed = the classical Circesium on the E. bank of the Euphrates, at the mouth of the Chaboras. (HABOR.) But Rawlinson maintains that Carchemish lay very much higher up the Euphrates, occupying nearly the site of the later Ma-bug, or Hierapolis, and apparently commanding the ordinary passage of the Euphrates at Bir, or Birch-jik, and thus in the contentions between Egypt and Assyria its possession was of primary consequence. Carchemish appears to have been taken by Pharaoh-Necho shortly after the battle of Megiddo (about B. C. 608), and retaken by Nebuchadnezzar after a battle three years later, B. C. 605.

Ca-re'ah (2 K. xxv. 23) = KAREAH.

Ca'ri-a (L. form of Gr.; fr. Car, an ancient king of Caria, Hdt.), the S. part of the region which in the N. T. is called ASIA, and the S. W. part of the peninsula of Asia Minor. In the Roman times the name of Caria was probably less used than previously. At an earlier period we find it mentioned as a separate district (1 Mc. xv. 23). At this time (B. C. 139) it was in the enjoyment of the privilege of freedom, granted by the Romans. A little before it had been assigned by them to Rhodes, and a little later it was incorporated in the province of Asia. CNIDUS, HALI-CARNASSUS, and MILETUS were in Caria. CAPHTOR.

Car-ma'ni-ans = the inhabitants of Carmania, a province of Asia N. of the Persian Gulf (2 Esd. xv. 30). The Carmanians were a warlike race (Strabo).

Car'me (1 Esd. v. 25) = HARIM.

Carmel (Heb.; nearly always with the article = the park, or the well-wooded place). 1. (In Kings, generally "Mount Carmel," in the Prophets, "Carmel.") A mountain which forms one of the most striking and characteristic features of Palestine. As if to accentuate more distinctly the bay (ACCHO) which forms the one indentation in the coast, this noble ridge, the only headland of lower and central Palestine, forms its S. boundary, running out with a bold bluff promontory all but into the very waves of the Mediterranean. From this point it stretches in a nearly straight line, bearing about S.S.E., for a little more than twelve miles, when it terminates suddenly in a bluff somewhat corresponding to its W. end, breaking down abruptly into the hills of Jenin and Samaria, which form at that part the central mass of the country. Carmel thus stands as a wall between the maritime plain of Sharon on the S., and the more inland expanse of Esdraelon on the N. Its structure is in the main the Jura formation (upper oolite), which is prevalent in the centre of W. Palestine—a soft, white limestone, with nodules and veins of flint. In form Carmel is a tolerably continuous ridge, at the W. end about 600, and at the E. about 1,600 feet above the sea. It is still clothed with the same "excellency" of "wood," which supplied the prophets of Israel and Judah alike with one of their most favorite illustrations (Is. xxxiii. 9; Mic. vii. 14). Modern travellers delight to describe its "rocky dells with deep jungles of copse"—its "shrubberies thicker than any others in central Palestine" (Stl., MS.)—its "impenetrable brushwood of oaks and other evergreens, tenanted in the wilder parts by a profusion of game and wild animals" (Ptr., Hand-book), but in other places bright with "hollyhocks, jasmine, and various flowering creepers" (V. de V.). Carmel fell within the tribe of ASHER (Josh. xix. 26). The king of "Jekneam of Carmel" was one of the Canaanite chiefs who fell before the arms of Joshua (xii. 22). These are the earliest notices of the name. There is not in them a hint of any sanctity as attaching to the mount. But probably from very early times it was considered as a sacred spot (1 K. xviii. 30). (HIGH PLACES.) In later times we know that its reputation was not confined to Palestine. But that which has made the name of Carmel most familiar to the modern world is its intimate connection with the history of the two great prophets of Israel—ELIJAH and ELISHA. Here Elijah brought back Israel to allegiance to Jehovah, and slew the prophets of BAAL (1 K. xviii. 19 ff.). His sacrifice to Jehovah, without doubt, took place at the E. end of the ridge near the highest point of the whole range, commanding the last view of the sea behind, and the first view of the great plain of Esdraelon in front, both the city of Jezreel and the winding bed of the Kishon being distinctly visible from this spot, now called el-Maharra-kah (Ar. = the burning or the sacrifice). "Close beneath, on a wide upland sweep, under the shade of ancient olives and round a well of water, said to be perennial (? Thn.) . . . must have been ranged on one side the king and people with the 850 prophets of Baal and Astarte, and on the other . . . the prophet of the Lord" (Stl. 345 ff.; see also V. de V. i. 320 ff.; Thn. ii. 220 ff.). Probably at Mount Carmel also (2 K. i. 9, "on the top of a hill," A. V.; literally, "on the top of the mount") Elijah "caused fire to come down from heaven" and consume the two "fitties" of the guard which Ahaziah had dispatched to take him prisoner, for having stopped his messengers to Baal-zebub the god of Ekron (2 K. i. 9-15). The tradition in the present convent is, that Elijah and Elisha both resided on the mountain, and a cave is actually shown under the high-altar of the church as that of Elijah. After the ascent of Elijah, Elisha went to Mount Carmel (2 K. ii. 25), though only for a time; but he was again there at the Shunammite's visit after the death of her son (iv. 25), and that at a time when no festival, no "new moon or sabbath" (v. 23), required his presence. This is the last mention of Carmel as the scene of any event in the sacred history. Carmel has derived its modern name from Elijah; Mar Elyas is the common designation, Kur-mel being occasionally, but only seldom, heard. From the Latin convent (on the W. end of Mount Carmel), has sprung the celebrated order of the Bare-footed Carmelite Friars, who claim to derive their origin from Elijah, but probably originated on Mount Carmel in the twelfth century.—2. A town in the mountainous country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55), familiar to us as the residence of Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 2, 5, 7, 40), and the native place or residence of David's favorite wife, "Abigail the Carmelites." This was doubtless the Carmel at which Saul set up a "place" (literally a "hand") after his victory over Amalek

(1 Sam. xv. 12). And this Carmel, and not the N. mount, must have been the spot at which King Uzziah had his vineyards (2 Chr. xxvi. 10). In the time of Eusebius and Jerome it was the seat of a Roman garrison. The ruins of the town, now Kur-mul, still remain at three hours (= six or seven miles) S. by E. from Hebron, close to those of Ma'in (Maon), Zif (Ziph), and other places named with Carmel in Josh. xv. 55.

Car-mel-ite = a native of CARMEL 2, as Nabal (1 Sam. xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 8) and Hezrai or Hezro (2 Sam. xxiii. 35; 1 Chr. xi. 37).

Car-mel-i-tes [i pronounced as in Carmelite] = a woman of CARMEL 2; used only of Abigail, David's wife (1 Sam. xxvii. 3; 1 Chr. iii. 1).

Car'mi (Heb. vine-dresser, Ges.). 1. Fourth son of Reuben, and progenitor of the CARMITES (Gen. xvi. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 6; 1 Chr. v. 8).—2. A man of the tribe of Judah, son of Zabdi, and father of Achan, the "troubler of Israel" (Josh. vii. 1, 18; 1 Chr. ii. 7, iv. 1).

Car'mites = a family of Reuben, descended from CARMi 1 (Num. xxvi. 6).

Car-na'im (L. fr. Gr.) a city E. of Jordan, besieged and taken by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. v. 26, 43, 44); = CARNION and ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

Car'ni-on (L. fr. Gr.) = CARNAIM (2 Mc. xii. 21, 26) (ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM).

Car'pen-ter. HANDICRAFT.

Car'pus (L. fr. Gr. = fruit), a Christian at Troas, with whom St. Paul left a cloak (2 Tim. iv. 13); according to Hippolytus, bishop of Berytus in Thrace.

Car'riage [-rij]. This word occurs six times in the text of the A. V. and = what is carried, baggage. It is the translation of:—1. Heb. pl. of eli or eli, literally any thing completed or made; see FURNITURE (1 Sam. xvii. 22; Is. x. 28); generally translated "stuff" or "vessels." 2. Heb. ebûdâh = heavy matters, precious things, wealth, Ges. (Judg. xviii. 21 only). 3. Heb. nisûdâh = what is borne, burden, Ges. (Is. xlvi. 1). 4. In Acts xxi. 15, the Greek participle apostekusasamenoi or episkeusasamenoi, "we took up our carriages," A. V., = having packed away or packed up our baggage. 5. But in the margin of 1 Sam. xvii. 20, and xxvi. 5-7—and there only—"carriage" (Heb. ma'gâl), translated "trench" in the text, = a wagon or cart. The allusion is to the circle of wagons round the encampment. CART; CHARIOT; WAGON.

Car'she-na (Heb.; from Pers. = slender man, Fû.; = spoiler, Bohlen; = black, Benfey), one of the seven princes of Persia and Media (Esth. i. 14).

Cart (Heb. 'agâlâh), translated "wagons" in Gen. xlv. 19, 21, 27, xlvii. 5; Num. vii. 3, 6, 7, 8, a vehicle drawn by cattle (2 Sam. vi. 6), to be distinguished from the CHARIOT drawn by horses. The Greek hamaza, translated in plural "carts" in Jd. xv. 11, has the same meaning. Carts and wagons were either open or covered (Num. vii. 3), and were used for conveyance of persons (Gen. xiv. 19), burdens (1 Sam. vi. 7, 8), or produce (Am. ii. 13). As there are few roads in Syria and Palestine and the neighboring countries (HIGHWAY; JERUSALEM), wheel-carriages for any purpose except conveyance of agricultural produce are all but unknown, except as they have been recently introduced into Egypt, &c., from Europe and America. The only cart used in W. Asia has two wheels of solid wood. But in the monuments of ancient Egypt representations are found of carts with two wheels, having four or six spokes, used for carrying produce, and of one used for religious purposes having four wheels with eight spokes. A bas-relief at Nineveh represents a cart having two wheels with eight spokes, drawn by oxen, conveying female captives (see cut from Layard). CARRIAGE; WAGON.

Carving. The arts of carving and engraving were much in request in the construction both of the Tabernacle and the Temple (Ex. xxxi. 5, xxxv. 33; 1 K. vi. 18, 35; Ps. lxxiv. 6), as well as in the ornamentation of the priestly dresses (Ex. xxviii. 9-36; Zech. iii. 9; 2 Chr. ii. 7-14). Cas'ph'i-a (Heb. in silver, LXX.; the white mountainous or snowy mountainous Caucasian region, Fū.), a place of uncertain site on the road between Babylon and Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 17). Fürst maintains that it was in the S. of Media, which lay between the Caspian Sea and Babylonia, and hence not far from the route of the Israelites as they returned.

Cas'len (L.) = CHISLEU (1 Mc. i. 54, iv. 52, 59; 2 Mc. i. 9, 18, x. 5). MONTH.

Cas'lu-him (Heb.), a Mizraite people or tribe (Gen. x. 14; 1 Chr. i. 12). The only clew we have as yet to the position of the Casluhim is their place in the list of the sons of MIZRAIM between the Pathrusim and the CAPHTORIM, whence it is probable that they were seated in Upper Egypt. Poole, &c., suppose the phrase, "of whom came the Philistines," should follow "Caphthorim" in 1 Chr., and "Caphtorim" in Gen. The LXX. seem to identify the Casluhim with the HASHMANNIM of Ps. lxxviii. 31 (A. V. "princes"). Bochart supposes (and so Gesenius) the Casluhim = the Colchians, who are said to have been an Egyptian colony. The supposition is improbable (so Mr. R. S. Poole). Forster conjectures the Casluhim = the inhabitants of Casiotis, a low littoral sandy region, about forty miles E. from Pelusium, and Bunsen assumes this to be proved; but the unproductiveness of the ground is a serious difficulty in the way.

Cas'phon (fr. Gr.) = CASPHOR (1 Mc. v. 36).

Cas'phor (L. fr. Gr.), one of the fortified cities in the "land of Galaad" (1 Mc. v. 26), in which the Jews took refuge from the Ammonites under Timotheus (compare ver. 6), and which with other cities was taken by Judas Maccabeus (v. 36 "Casphon"); probably = CASPIS; possibly = HESHBON (so Grotius, Calmet, Winer).

Cas'pis, a strong fortified city—whether E. or W. of Jordan is not plain—having near it a lake two stadia (=  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile) in breadth. It was taken by Judas Maccabeus with great slaughter (2 Mc. xii. 13, 16). CASPHOR.

Cas'sia [kash'ya] (L.), the representative in the A. V. of—1. Heb. kiddāh (fr. kādā, to divide or cleave, Ges.) one of the ingredients in the composition of the "oil of holy ointment" (Ex. xxx. 24), also an article of merchandise brought to Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 19). The A. V. is doubtless correct in the translation of the Hebrew word (so the Chaldee, Syriac, Gesenius, Fürst, &c.), though there is considerable variety of reading in the old versions, and the investigation of the subject is a difficult one. It is clear that the Latin writers by casia or cassia understood both the Oriental product now called cassia, and some low sweet herbaceous plant; but the Greek word is limited to the Eastern product (so Mr. Houghton, in Smith's Dictionary, Appendix A). Dioscorides mentions several kinds of cassia, and says they are produced in Spicy Arabia. One kind is known by the name of mosyletis, or, according to Galen, of mosyllos, from the ancient city and promontory Mosyllon, on the coast of Africa, near the modern Cape Guardafui. Will not this throw some light on Ez. xxvii. 19, "Dan and Javan and Meuzal (so margin) traded in thy markets with cassia, calamus," &c.? The cassia would be brought from India to Meuzal (UZAL), and thence exported to Tyre and other countries under the name of Meuzalitia, or Meuzal cassia. Cassia is not produced by any trees which are now found growing in Arabia. Probably therefore the Greek authors were mistaken on this subject, and have occasionally regarded products imported into Arabia, and thence exported N. to other countries, as the natural productions of that country. The cassiabark of commerce is inferior to the true CINNAMON, and is yielded by various kinds of Cinnamomum, which grow in different parts of India.—2. Heb. kāts'ôth (fr. kātsa', to cut or strip off, Ges.) (Ps. xlv. 8 only), generally supposed to be another term = cassia. The old versions, as well as the etymology of the Hebrew word, favor this interpretation.

Cas'tle [kas'l] (L.), ANTONIA; FENCED CITY; WAR.

Cas'tor and Pol'lux (both L. fr. Gr.), the Dioscuri (Gr. Dioskouroi = sons of Jupiter) of heathen mythology (Acts xxviii. 11). These two heroes, the twin-sons of Jupiter and Leda, were regarded as the tutelary divinities of sailors. They appeared in heaven as the constellation Gemini (L. = the Twins). As the ship mentioned by St. Luke was from Alexandria, it may be noticed that Castor and Pollux were specially honored in the neighboring district of Cyrenaica, of which CYRENE was the capital. In art these divinities were sometimes represented simply as stars hovering over a ship, but more frequently as young men on horseback, with conical caps and stars above them. Such figures were probably painted or sculptured at the bow of the ship, and Cyril of Alexandria says that such was always the Alexandrian method of ornamenting each side of the prow. SHIP.

Silver coin of Brutill. Obverse. Heads of Castor and Pollux to right. Reverse: Castor and Pollux mounted, advancing to right. In the exergue BPEITION (Gr. = of the Brutii, a people of lower Italy).

Cat occurs only in the plural in Bar. vi. 22. The Greek word ailouros, as used by Aristotle, has more particular reference to the wild cat. Herodotus (ii. 66) applies it to denote the domestic animal. The context of the passage in Baruch appears to point to the domesticated animal. Perhaps the people of Babylon originally procured the cat from Egypt. The domestic cat of the ancient Egyptians, and our own domestic cat (Felis domestica or Catus, of Ray), are supposed by some to be identical with the Felis maniculata (Rüppell), of Nubia, but there is considerable doubt on this point. The Egyptians, it is well known, paid an absurd reverence to the cat; it accompanied them in their fowling expeditions; it was deemed a capital offence to kill one; and when a cat died it was embalmed and buried at Bubastia, the city sacred to the moon, of which divinity the cat was reckoned a symbol.

Cat'er-pil-lar, the representative in the A. V. of—1. Heb. hîsil or châsil, literally = devourer, Ges. (1 K. viii. 37; 2 Chr. vi. 28; Ps. lxxviii. 46; Is. xxxiii. 4; Joel i. 4, ii. 25), inconsistently translated in LXX. and Vulgate by three different terms in each: probably = a LOCUST, perhaps in its larva state.—2. Heb. yelek, literally = feeder, Ges. LOCUST 8; PALMER-WORM.

Ca-thu'a apparently = GIDDEL (1 Esd. v. 30).

Cat'tle. BEAST; BULL; CALF; GOAT; HERD; LAMB; OX; SHEEP.

Caul, the translation in A. V. of—1. Heb. yôthereth, literally redundant; applied collectively to the lobes of the liver, as if redundant parts of it, the flaps, Ges. (Ex. xxix. 18, 22, &c.).—2. Heb. sigôr, literally a shutting up, enclosure; applied to the parts about the heart, the pericardium, Ges. (Hos. xiii. 8).—3. Heb. pl. shêbisim, in A. V. "cauls" (i. e. netted caps worn by women), margin "net-works" (Is. iii. 18) = head-dresses or ornaments of the head-dress of Hebrew ladies. Schröder understands medallions or sun-shaped ornaments worn on the necklace. HEAD-DRESS; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.

* Cause'way = a raised path or way (1 Chr. xxvi. 18, 18; Prov. xv. 19, margin; Is. vii. 3, margin). HIGHWAY.

* Caus'ey, an old spelling of CAUSEWAY.

Cave. The chalky limestone of which the rocks of Syria and Palestine chiefly consist, presents, as is the case in all limestone formations, a vast number of caverns and natural fissures, many of which have also been artificially enlarged and adapted to various purposes both of shelter and defence. This circumstance has also given occasion to the use of a large number of words in the Scriptures to denote caves, holes, and fissures, some of them giving names to the towns and places and their neighborhood. Out of them may be selected—I. Heb. mê'ârâh, usually translated "cave" (Gen. xix. 30, xxiii. 9, &c.).—II. Heb. hûr or hôr, also written chûr or chôr, usually translated "a hole," once in plural "caves" (Job xxx. 6). From this come (a.) the name of the HORITES of Mount Seir; (b.) HAURAN; (c.) the two towns of BETH-HORON; (d.) the town HORONAIM.—III. Heb. hagâvim or chagâvim = refuges, asylums, Ges., A. V. "clefs" (Cant. ii. 14; Jer. xlix. 16; Ob. 8).—IV. Heb. pl. of minhârâh, = a fissure, cleft, in mountains or rocks, hollowed out by the water, Ges.; A. V. "dens" (Judg. vi. 2).—V. Heb. pl. of mehillâh or mêchillâh, A. V. "caves" (Is. ii. 19).—VI. Gr. opê = an opening, hole, L. & S.; translated "place," margin "hole" (Jas. iii. 11); in plural "caves" (Heb. xi. 38); in LXX. = No. IV. (Ob. 3).—VII. Gr. spêlaion = a grotto, cave, cavern, pit, L. & S.; usually in A. V. "den" (Mat. xxi. 18, &c.), once "cave" (Jn. xi. 38); in LXX. = No. I. (Gen. xix. 30, &c.). The most remarkable caves noticed in Scripture are:—1. That in which Lot dwelt after the destruction of Sodom (Gen. xix. 30).—2. The cave of MACHPELAH.—3. Cave of MAKKEDAH.—4. Cave of ADULLAM.—5. Cave of EN-GEDI (1 Sam. xxiv. 3).—6. Obadiah's cave (1 K. xviii. 4).—7. Elijah's cave in Horeb (ix. 9).—8, 9. The rock sepulchres of Lazarus, and of our Lord (Jn. xi. 38; Mat. xxvii. 60). The existing caverns near the S. E. end of the Dead Sea serve fully to justify the mention of a cave as the place of Lot's retirement; as those on the W. side agree both in situation and in name with the caves of En-gedi. The cave in which Obadiah concealed the prophets was probably in the northern part of the country, in which abundant instances of caves fit for such a purpose might be pointed out. The site of the cave of Elijah, as well as of the "cleft" of Moses on Mount Horeb (Ex. xxxiii. 22), is also obviously indeterminate. Besides these special caves there is frequent mention in the O. T. of caves as places of refuge. Thus the Israelites took refuge from the Philistines in holes" (1 Sam. xiv. 11). So also in the time of Gideon they had taken refuge from the Midianites in dens and caves and strongholds, such as abound in the mountain region of Manasseh (Judg. vi. 2). (HOUSE; SELA.) Banditti often made the caves of Palestine their accustomed haunt. Josephus speaks of the robber inhabitants of the caves of ARBELA, also of those of Trachonitis, who lived in large caverns, and annoyed much the trade with Damascus, but were put down by Herod. It was the caves, which lie beneath and around so many of the Jewish cities that formed the last hiding-places of the Jewish leaders in the war with the Romans. (JERUSALEM.) No use, however, of rock caverns more strikingly connects the modern usages of Palestine and the adjacent regions with their ancient history than the employment of them as burial-places. The rocky soil of so large a portion of the Holy Land almost forbids interments, except in cavities either natural or hewn from the rock. Accordingly numerous sites are shown in Palestine and adjacent lands of (so-called) sepulchres of saints and heroes of the O. T. and N. T., venerated both by Christians and Mohammedans. BURIAL; CISTERN; TOMB.

Ce'dar. There is little doubt that the Hebrew erez (the firmly-rooted and strong tree), invariably rendered "cedar" by the A. V., does stand for that tree in most of the passages where the word occurs. It is described as tall (Is. ii. 13), spreading (Ez. xxxi. 3), abundant (1 K. v. 6, 10), fit for beams, pillars, and boards (vi. 10, 15, vii. 2), for masts (Ez. xxvii. 5), and for carved work as images (Is. xlv. 14). "Cedar" timber was used by David and Solomon in their buildings (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 K. v. 6, vi. 15, vii. 2), and by Zerubbabel in the second Temple (Ezr. iii. 7). "Cedar" in the Scriptures, especially = the cedar of Lebanon (Cedrus Libani); but that the word is used in a wider sense to denote other coniferous trees, is clear from some Scriptural passages where it occurs. For instance, the "cedar wood" in Lev. xiv. 6 can hardly be the wood of the Lebanon cedars, seeing that these could never have grown in the peninsula of Sinai. In another passage (Ez. xxvii. 5), perhaps erez = some fir; probably, as Dr. Hooker conjectures, the Pinus Halepensis = Aleppo Pine, which grows in Lebanon, and is better fitted for furnishing ship-masts than the wood of the Cedrus Libani. The Cedrus Libani, Pinus Halepensis, and Juniperus excelsa = tall Juniper, were probably all included under the term erez; though, no doubt, this name more especially = the cedar of Lebanon, as the firmest and grandest of the conifers. As to the "cedar wood" used in purifications, probably one of the smaller junipers is intended (J. Sabina ?), for it is doubtful whether the Juniperus excelsa exists at all in Arabia. As far as is at present known, the cedar of Lebanon is confined in Syria to one valley of the Lebanon range, viz., that of the Kedisha River, which flows from near the highest point of the range W. to the Mediterranean, and enters the sea at the port of Tripoli. The grove, of more than four hundred trees of all sizes, is at the very upper part of the valley, about fifteen miles from the sea, 6,500 feet above that level, and their position is moreover above that of all other arboreous vegetation. The valley here is very broad, open, and shallow, and the grove forms a mere speck on its flat floor. On nearer inspection, the cedars are found to be confined to a small portion of a range of low stony hills of rounded outlines, and perhaps 60 to 100 feet above the plain, which sweep across the valley. These hills are believed by Dr. Hooker to be old moraines, deposited by glaciers that once debouched on to the plain from the surrounding tops of Lebanon.

Ce'dron [see-] (L.; Gr. Kedron). 1. A place fortified by Cendebeus under the orders of the king Antiochus (Sidetes), as a station from which to command the roads of Judea (1 Mc. xv. 39, 41, xvi. 9).

It was not far from Jamnia (Jabneel), or from Azotus (Ashdod), and was probably the modern Katra or Kutrah, which lies on the maritime plain below the river Rubin, and three miles S.W. of 'Akir (Ekron).—2. The N. T. name of the brook KIDRON (Jn. xviii. 1 only).

Ce'lan [see-] (fr. Gr.) (1 Esd. v. 15). AZETAS.

Ce'ling [seel-]. The descriptions of Scripture (1 K. vi. 9, 15, vii. 3; 2 Chr. iii. 5, 9; Jer. xxii. 14; Hag. i. 4), and of Josephus, show that the ceilings of the Temple and the palaces of the Jewish kings were formed of cedar or fir planks applied to the beams or joints crossing from wall to wall, probably with sunk panels, edged and ornamented with gold, and carved with incised or other patterns, sometimes painted (Jer. xxii. 14). Probably both Egyptian and Assyrian models were followed, in this as in other branches of architectural construction, before the Roman period. Examples are extant of Egyptian ceilings in stucco painted with devices, of a date much earlier than that of Solomon's Temple. Of these devices the principal are the guilloche, the chevron, and the scroll. The panel work in ceilings, which has been described, is found in Oriental and N. African dwellings of late and modern times. Porter describes the ceilings of houses at Damascus as delicately painted. Many of the rooms in the Palace of the Moors at the Alhambra were ceiled and ornamented with the richest geometrical patterns. ARCHITECTURE; CARVING; HOUSE; PALACE; TEMPLE.

Cel'o-syr'i-a [sel-] (L. Cœlesyria, Cœlosyria, fr. Gr. = hollow Syria), an English form of the name given by the Greeks, after Alexander's time, to the remarkable valley or hollow between the two mountain-ranges of Libanus (or Lebanon) and Antilibanus, stretching from latitude 33° 20' to 34° 40', nearly one hundred miles, and containing the celebrated city of Heliopolis or Baalbek, the rivers Orontes and Litany, &c. The term was also used in a much wider sense to include the inhabited tract (in which was Damascus) E. of the Antilibanus range to the desert; and then further on that side of Jordan, through Trachonitis and Perea, to Idumea and the borders of Egypt. In the Apocrypha there is frequent mention of Celosyria in a somewhat vague sense, nearly = SYRIA (1 Esd. ii. 17, 24, 27, iv. 48, vi. 29, vii. 1, viii. 67; 1 Mc. x. 69; 2 Mc. iii. 5, 8, iv. 4, viii. 8, x. 11). AVEN 1; CŒLESYRIA; PLAIN 2; VALLEY 4.

Cen'chre-a [sen'kre-a] (L. Cenchrea, fr. Gr.; see below), the E. harbor of CORINTH (i. e. its harbor on the Saronic Gulf) and the emporium of its trade with the Asiatic shores of the Mediterranean, as Lechæum (Lutraki) on the Corinthian Gulf connected it with Italy and the West. St. Paul sailed from Cenchrea (Acts xviii. 18) on his return to Syria from his second missionary journey; and when he wrote his epistle to the Romans in the course of the third journey, an organized church seems to have been formed here (Rom. xvi. 1; see PHEBE). The distance of Cenchrea from Corinth was seventy stadia, or about nine miles. The modern village of Kikries retains the ancient name, which is conjectured by Dr. Sibthorpe to be derived from the millet (Gr. kengchros), which still grows there.

Cen-de-be'us [sen-] (L. Cendebeus, fr. Gr.), a general left by Antiochus VII. in command of the seaboard of Palestine (1 Mc. xv. 38, &c.) after the defeat of Tryphon B. C. 133. He fortified CEDRON 1, and harassed the Jews for some time, but was afterward defeated by the sons of Simon Maccabeus, with great loss (1 Mc. xvi. 1-10).

Cen'ser [sen-] (Heb. mahtâh or machtâh, and mik'tereth). The former of the Hebrew words seems = any instrument to seize or hold burning coals, or to receive ashes, &c., such as the appendages of the brazen altar and golden candlestick mentioned in Ex. xxv. 38, xxxvii. 23. It, however, generally bears the limited meaning which properly belongs to the second word, found only in the later books (e. g. 2 Chr. xxvi. 19; Ez. viii. 11), = a small portable vessel of metal fitted to receive burning coals from the altar, and on which the incense for burning was sprinkled (2 Chr. xxvi. 18; Lk. i. 9). The only distinct precepts regarding the use of the censer are found in Num. iv. 14, and Lev. xvi. 12. Solomon prepared "censers of pure gold" as part of the same furniture (1 K. vii. 50; 2 Chr. iv. 22). Possibly their general use may have been to take up coals from the brazen altar, and convey the incense while burning to the "golden altar," or "altar of incense," on which it was to be offered morning and evening (Ex. xxx. 7, 8; compare Rev. viii. 3, 5, where the Greek is libanôtos). So Uzziah, when he was intending "to burn incense upon the altar of incense," took "a censer in his hand" (2 Chr. xxvi. 16, 19). The Greek thumiatérion, translated "censer" in Heb. ix. 4, according to some = the altar of incense; but the A. V. translation is favored by the use of this Greek word for "censer" in the LXX. (2 Chr. xxvi. 19; Ez. viii. 11).

Cen'sus [sen-] (L.). 1. Moses laid down the law (Ex. xxx. 12, 13) that whenever the people were numbered, an offering of half a shekel should be made by every man above twenty years of age, by way of atonement or propitiation. The instances of numbering recorded in the O. T. are as follows:—1. Under the express direction of God (Ex. xxxviii. 26), in the third or fourth month after the Exodus during the encampment at Sinai, chiefly for the purpose of raising money for the Tabernacle. The numbers then taken amounted to 603,550 men (CHRONOLOGY II.). 2. Again, in the second month of the second year after the Exodus (Num. i. 1 ff.). This census may have been simply a formal verification of the result of the census previously made (so Palfrey). It was taken to ascertain—(a.) the number of fighting men from the age of twenty to fifty; (b.) the amount of the redemption offering due on account of all the FIRST-BORN both of persons and cattle. The Levites, who amounted to 22,000 (perhaps 300 others [compare Num. iii. 22, 28, 34, with 39] were themselves first-born, and therefore could not be substitutes for other Israelites), were taken in lieu of the first-born males of the rest of Israel, 22,273 in number, and for the surplus of 273 a money payment of 1,365 shekels, or 5 shekels each, was made to Aaron and his sons (Num. iii. 39-51). 3. Another numbering took place thirty-eight years afterward (Num. xxvi.), previous to the entrance into Canaan, when the total number, excepting the Levites, amounted to 601,730 males, showing a decrease of 1,820. 4. The next formal numbering of the whole people was in the reign of DAVID (2 Sam. xxiv.). The men of Israel above twenty years of age were 800,000, and of Judah 500,000, total 1,300,000. 1 Chr. (xxi. 5, 6, xxvii. 24) gives the number of Israel 1,100,000, and of Judah 470,000, total 1,570,000; but informs us that Levi and Benjamin were not numbered. 5. The census of David was completed by Solomon, by causing the foreigners and remnants of the conquered nations resident in Palestine to be numbered. Their number = 153,600, and they were employed in forced labor on his great architectural works (Josh. ix. 27; 1 K. v. 15, ix. 20, 21; 1 Chr. xxii. 2; 2 Chr. ii. 17, 18). (NETHINIM; SLAVE.) Between this time and the Captivity, from the numbers in the armies under successive kings of Israel and Judah, may be gathered with more or less probability, and with due consideration of the circumstances of the times as influencing the number of the levies, estimates of the population at the various times mentioned. (ARMY; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) 6. Rehoboam collected from Judah and Benjamin 180,000 men to fight against Jeroboam (1 K. xii. 21). 7. Abijah, with 400,000 men, made war on Jeroboam with 800,000, of whom 500,000 were slain (2 Chr. xiii. 3, 17). 8. Asa had an army of 300,000 men from Judah, and 280,000 (Josephus says 250,000) from Benjamin, with which he defeated Zerah the Ethiopian, with an army of 1,000,000 (xiv. 8, 9). 9. Jehoshaphat, besides men in garrisons, had under arms 1,160,000 men, including perhaps subject foreigners (xvii. 14-19). 10. Amaziah had from Judah and Benjamin 300,000, besides 100,000 mercenaries from Israel (xxv. 5, 6). 11. Uzziah could bring into the field 307,500 men (307,000, Jos.), well armed, under 2,600 officers (xxvi. 11-15). Other and partial notices of numbers indicating population are given in Judg. vi. 35, vii. 3, xii. 6 (compare Num. xxvi. 37), Judg. xx. 35, 36 (compare Num. xxvi. 41); 1 Chr. xii. 23-38; 1 K. xx. 15; 2 K. xxiv. 14, 16; Jer. lii. 30. See also 1 Chr. v. 18, vii. 5, 7, 9, 11, 40, &c. 12. The number of those who returned with Zerubbabel in the first caravan is reckoned at 42,360 (Ezr. ii. 64); but of these perhaps 12,542 belonged to other tribes than Judah and Benjamin. The purpose of this census was to settle with reference to the year of Jubilee the inheritances in the Holy Land, which had been disturbed by the CAPTIVITY, and also to ascertain the family genealogies, and insure, as far as possible, the purity of the Jewish race (Ezr. ii. 59, x. 2, 8, 18, 44; Lev. xxv. 10). In the second caravan, B. C. 458, the number was 1,496. Women and children are in neither case included (Ezr. viii. 1-14). Throughout all these accounts two points are clear: (1.) That great pains were taken to ascertain and register the numbers of the Jewish people at various times for the reasons mentioned above. (2.) That the numbers given in some cases can with difficulty be reconciled with other numbers of no very distant date, as well as with the presumed capacity of the country for supporting population. Thus David's census would represent a population of at least 5,814,000 in Israel, of whom not less than 2,000,000 belonged to Judah; Jehoshaphat's (one hundred years later) of 4,640,000 in Judah and Benjamin, including subject foreigners; while Amaziah's and Uzziah's were much less. If now we estimate the whole area of Palestine, including the trans-Jordanic tribes, at not exceeding 11,000 square miles, and of Judah and Benjamin at 3,135 square miles, the population of Palestine under David would be not less than 530 to one square mile, and that of Judah and Benjamin under Jehoshaphat, if we make no account of the subject foreigners and garrisons, at 1,480 to one square mile. The population of Lancashire (England) in 1852 was 1,064 to one square mile; of Middlesex (England, in which is London) was 6,683 to one square mile; of the island of Malta in 1849 was 1,182 to one sq. mile. Several provinces of China, with areas of from 39,000 to 70,000 square miles each, have 530 or more persons (in one case 832) to one square mile. While great doubt rests on the genuineness of numerical expressions in O. T. (ABIJAH 1; NUMBER), it must be considered that the readings on which our version is founded, give with trifling variations the same results as those presented by the LXX., and by Josephus. S. Palestine, at least, was very populous before the entrance of the Israelites; compare the population of Ai ("few" = 12,000 men and women, Josh. vii. 3, viii. 2t), of Gibeon ("greater than Ai," x. 2), the 123 cities "with their villages" in Judah and Simeon (xv., xix. 1-9), the 26 in Benjamin (xviii. 21-28), &c. There are abundant traces throughout the whole of PALESTINE of a much higher rate of fertility in former as compared with present times, a fertility remarked by profane writers, and of which the present neglected state of cultivation affords no test. (AGRICULTURE.) This combined with the positive divine promises of populousness, increases the probability of at least approximate correctness in the foregoing estimates of population.—II. The Roman census under the Republic consisted, so far as the present purpose is concerned, in an enrolment of persons and property by tribes and households. The census was taken, more or less regularly, in the provinces, under the republic, by provincial censors, and the tribute regulated at their discretion, but no complete census was made before the time of Augustus, who carried out three general inspections of this kind, viz., (1.) B. C. 28; (2.) B. C. 8; (3.) A. D. 14; and a partial one, A. D. 4. CYRENICUS; TAXING.

Ce'ras = KEROS (1 Esd. v. 29).

Ce'sar [see'zar] (L. Cæsar = cut out, sc. from his mother, Pliny), always in the N. T. = the Roman emperor, the sovereign of Judea (Jn. xix. 12, 15; Acts xvii. 7, &c.). The N. T. history falls entirely within the reigns of the five first emperors, viz., AUGUSTUS, TIBERIUS, CALIGULA, CLAUDIUS, and NERO, who were all related to Julius Cæsar the Dictator.

Ce-sa-re'a [ses-] (L. Cæsarea, named in honor of AUGUSTUS CÆSAR), a city, named in the N. T. as the residence, apparently for several years, of PHILIP THE EVANGELIST, the scene of the conversion of CORNELIUS the centurion, of the death of HEROD AGRIPPA I., and of several events in the history of ST. PAUL, including his imprisonment for two years, his pleading before FELIX, FESTUS, and HEROD AGRIPPA II., and his APPEAL to Cæsar (Acts viii. 40, ix. 30, x. 1, 24, xi. 11, xii. 19, xviii. 22, xxi. 8, 16, xxiii. 23, 33, xxv. 1, 4, 6, 13). Cæsarea was situated on the coast of Palestine, on the line of the great road from Tyre to Egypt, and about half way between Joppa and Accho or Ptolemais. St. Peter's journey from Joppa (x. 24) occupied rather more than a day. On the other hand St. Paul's journey from Ptolemais (xxi. 8) was accomplished within the day. The distance from Jerusalem was about seventy miles; Josephus states it in round numbers as six hundred stadia. (ANTIPATRIS.) In Strabo's time there was on this point of the coast merely a town called "Strato's tower" with a landing-place, whereas, in the time of Tacitus, Cæsarea is spoken of as the head of Judea. It was in this interval that the city was built by Herod the Great. The work was in fact accomplished in ten years. The utmost care and expense were lavished on the building of Cæsarea. A vast breakwater protected its harbor. It was the official residence of the Herodian kings, and of Festus, Felix, and the other Roman procurators of Judea. Here also were the headquarters of the military forces of the province. The Gentile population predominated; and at the Jewish synagogue-worship the O. T. was read in Greek. Constant feuds took place between the Jews and Greeks. At Cæsarea Vespasian was declared emperor. He made it a Roman colony. Eusebius the ecclesiastical historian was bishop of Cæsarea in the fourth century. Cæsarea continued to be a city of some importance even in the time of the Crusades. Now, though an Arabic corruption of the name still lingers on the site (Kaisariyeh), it is utterly desolate; and its ruins have for a long period been a quarry, from which other towns in this part of Syria have been built.

Ces-a-re'a Phil-lip'pi [ses-] (L. Cæsarea Philippi, named by HEROD PHILIP II. after CÆSAR and himself), is mentioned only in Mat. xvi. 13; Mk. viii. 27. Cæsarea Philippi was the N. point of our Lord's journeyings; and the passage in His life, which was connected with the place, was otherwise very marked. (TRANSFIGURATION.) The place itself too is remarkable in its physical and picturesque characteristics, and also in its historical associations. It was at the E. and most important of the two recognized sources of the Jordan, the other being at the Tell el-Kadi (DAN 2.) The spring rises, and the city was built on a limestone terrace in a valley at the base of Mount Hermon. Cæsarea Philippi has no O. T. history, though it has been not unreasonably identified with Baal-Gad. (BAAL, geography, 5; see also BETH-REHOB.) Its annals run back direct from Herod's time into heathenism. It was the Panium of Josephus (xv. 10, § 3), and the Panæas of the Greeks and Romans; and the inscriptions are not yet obliterated which show that the god Pan had once a sanctuary at this spot. Panium became part of the territory of Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, who enlarged and embellished the town, and called it Cesarea Philippi. Agrippa II. called the place Neronias in honor of Nero. Titus exhibited gladiatorial shows here after the end of the Jewish war. Coins of Cesarea Paneas continued through the reigns of many emperors. The bishop of Paneas appears in ecclesiastical history. The modern village is called Bāniās, the Arabic form of Paneas. The vast castle above the site of the city, built in Syro-Greek or even Phœnician times, is still the most remarkable fortress in the Holy Land.

Ce'tab (fr. Gr.) (1 Esd. v. 30), a name among the Nethinim, not in Ezra or Nehemiah.

Cha'bris [ka-] (fr. Gr.), son of Gothoniël; one of the three "rulers" or "ancients" of Bethulia, in the time of Judith (Jd. vi. 15, viii. 10, x. 6).

Cha'di-as [ka-] (fr. Gr.), (1 Esd. v. 20). AMMIDOL.

Chaff, the translation in A.V. of—1. Heb. hāshash or chāshash = dry grass, hay (Is. v. 24, xxxiii. 11).

—2. Heb. mōts = chaff separated by winnowing from the grain—the husk of the wheat (Job xxi. 18; Ps. i. 4, &c.).—3. Heb. teben, once (Jer. xxiii. 28) translated "chaff," once (Job xxi. 18) "stubble," elsewhere "straw" (Ex. v. 7, 10, 11, &c.); = straw, as broken up and cut in pieces by threshing, short straw, chaff, Ges. (STRAW).—4. Chaldaic ūr, once (Dan. ii. 35).—5. Gr. achuron (Mat. iii. 12; Lk. iii. 17) = chaff, short straw, (Rbn. N. T. Lex.); in LXX. = No. 2 & 3.

Chain. Chains were used, 1. as badges of office; 2. for ornament; 3. for confining prisoners. 1. The gold chain placed about Joseph's neck (Gen. xli. 42), and that promised to Daniel (Dan. v. 7), are instances of the first use. In Egypt it was one of the insignia of a judge, who wore an image of truth attached to it; it was also worn by the prime minister. In Persia it was considered not only as a mark of royal favor, but a token of investiture. 2. Chains for ornamental purposes were worn by men as well as women in many countries both of Europe and Asia, and probably among the Hebrews (Prov. i. 9). The necklace consisted of pearls, corals, &c., threaded on a string. Besides the necklace, other chains were worn (Jd. x. 4) hanging down as far as the waist, or even lower. Some were adorned with pieces of metal, shaped in the form of the moon ("round tires like the moon," A. V.; Is. iii. 18). The Midianites adorned the necks of their camels with it (Judg. viii. 21, 26). To other chains were suspended various trinkets—as scent-bottles ("tablets" A. V.; Is. iii. 20) and mirrors (iii. 23). Step-chains were attached to the ankle-rings, which shortened the step and produced a mincing gait (Is. iii. 16, 18). (ANKLET; EAR-RINGS; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.) 3. The means adopted for confining prisoners among the Jews were FETTERS similar to our handcuffs (CORD). Among the Romans, the prisoner was handcuffed to one, and occasionally to two guards (Acts xii. 6, 7, xxi. 33). TRIAL.

Chal'ce-do-ny [kal'se-] (Gr. chalkēdōn, named fr. Chalcedon) (Rev. xxi. 19 only). The name is applied in modern mineralogy to a variety of quartz (AGATE), of a pearly or wax-like lustre and of great translucency. There can, however, be little doubt that the stone to which Theophrastus (De Lapid. § 25) refers, as found in the island opposite Chalcedon and used as a soldier, must have been the green transparent carbonate of copper, or our copper emerald.

Chal-de'a [kal-] (L. Chaldæa; Kaldi or Kaldai on native monuments; Heb. Casdim, derived by some from CHESD, = "CHALDEANS;" see also CHILMAD) is properly only the most S. portion of Babylonia. It is used, however, in our version for the Hebrew Casdim ("Chaldeans"), under which term the inhabitants of the entire country are designated; and it will therefore here be taken in this extended sense. The origin of the term is very doubtful.—1. Extent and boundaries.—The tract of country viewed in Scripture as the land of the Chaldeans is that vast alluvial plain which has been formed by the deposits of the Euphrates and the Tigris—at least so far as it lies to the W. of the latter stream. This extraordinary flat, unbroken except by the works of man, extends from Hit on the Euphrates and Tekrit on the Tigris to the Persian Gulf, four hundred miles along the course of the rivers, and is on an average about one hundred miles in width.—2. General character of the country.—The general aspect of the country is thus described: "In former days the vast plains of Babylon were nourished by a complicated system of canals and watercourses, which spread over the surface of the country like a net-work. The wants of a teeming population were supplied by a rich soil, not less bountiful than that on the banks of the Egyptian Nile. Like islands rising from a golden sea of waving corn, stood frequent groves of palm-trees and pleasant gardens, affording to the idler or traveller their grateful and highly-valued shade. Crowds of passengers hurried along the dusty roads to and from the busy city. The land was rich in corn and wine. How changed is the aspect of that region at the present day! Long lines of mounds, it is true, mark the courses of those main arteries which formerly diffused life and vegetation along their banks, but their channels are now bereft of moisture and choked with drifted sand; the smaller offshoots are wholly effaced. 'A drought is upon the waters,' says the prophet, 'and they shall be dried up!' All that remains of that ancient civilization—'that glory of kingdoms,'—'the praise of the whole earth,'—is recognizable in the numerous mouldering heaps of brick and rubbish which overspread the surface of the plain. Instead of the luxurious fields, the groves, and gardens, nothing now meets the eye but an arid waste—the dense population of former times is vanished, and no man dwells there." (Loftus's Chaldæa, 14, 15). The prosperity and fertility of the country depend entirely on the regulation of the waters. Carefully applied and husbanded, they are sufficient to make the entire plain a garden.—3. Divisions.—The true Chaldea is always in the geographers the most S. portion of Babylonia, chiefly (if not solely) on the right bank of the Euphrates. Babylonia above this, is separated into two districts, called respectively Amordacia and Auranitis. The former is the name of the central territory round Babylon itself; the latter is applied to the regions toward the N., where Babylonia borders on Assyria.—4. Cities.—Babylonia was celebrated at all times for the number and antiquity of its cities. Some of the most important of those were ACCAD, Babylon (BABEL), Borsippa (Birs-Nimrud), Sippara or SEPHARVAIM, CALNEH, ERECH, UR, Is (Hit) (AHAVA; IVAH); and a multitude of others, the sites of many of which have not been determined.—5. Canals.—One of the most remarkable features of ancient Babylonia was its network of canals. Three principal canals carried off the waters of the Euphrates toward the Tigris, above Babylon:—(1.) The original "Royal River," or Ar-

Malcha of Berosus; (2.) the Nahr Malcha of the Arabs; (3.) the Nahr Kutba. On the other side of the stream, a large canal, leaving the Euphrates at Hiti, where the alluvial plain commences, skirted the deposit on the W. along its entire extent, and fell into the Persian Gulf at the head of the Bubian creek; while a second main artery branched from the Euphrates nearly at Mosab, and ran into a great lake, in the neighborhood of Borsippa, whence the lands S. W. of Babylon were irrigated. From these and other similar channels, with their numerous branches and crosscuts, every field was duly supplied with water "by the hand or by the help of engines" (Hdt.). Herodotus (so Rh.) probably refers by "engines" to the common hand-sweep or sweep, representations of which are found on the monuments.

—The "great inland fresh-water sea of Nedjef" (Loftus, 45) is a permanent lake of considerable depth, S. of Babylon, about forty miles in length, and thirty-five miles in its greatest width. Above and below the Sea of Nedjef, from the Birs-Nimrud to Kufa, and from the S. E. extremity of the Sea to Samava, extend the famous Chaldean marshes, where Alexander was nearly lost.—7. Productions.—The extraordinary fertility of the Chaldean soil has been noticed by various writers. It is said to be the only country in the world where wheat grows wild. Herodotus declared (i. 193) that grain commonly returned two-hundredfold to the sower, and occasionally three-hundredfold. The palm was undoubtedly one of the principal objects of cultivation. The soil is rich, but there is little cultivation, the inhabitants subsisting chiefly upon dates. More than half the country is left dry and waste from the want of a proper system of irrigation; while the remaining half is to a great extent covered with marshes owing to the same neglect. See Map, under EUPHRATES.

Chal-de'ans [kal-dee'anz] or Chal'dees [kal'deez] (see CHALDEA), appear in Scripture, until the time of the Captivity, as the people of the country which has Babylon for its capital, and which is itself termed SHINAR; but in Daniel, while this meaning is still found (v. 30, and ix. 1), a new sense shows itself. The Chaldeans are classed with the magicians and astronomers; and evidently form a sort of priest class, who have a peculiar "tongue" and "learning" (i. 4), and are consulted by the king on religious subjects. The same variety appears in profane writers. It appears that the Chaldeans were in the earliest times merely one out of the many Cushite tribes inhabiting the great alluvial plain known afterward as CHALDEA or BABYLONIA. Their special seat was probably that S. portion of the country which so late retained the name of Chaldea. Here was Ur "of the Chaldees." In process of time, as they grew in power, their name gradually prevailed over those of the other tribes inhabiting the country; and by the era of the Jewish Captivity it had begun to be used generally for all the inhabitants of Babylonia. It had come by this time to have two senses, both ethnic: (1.) as the special appellation of a particular race to whom it had belonged from the remotest times; (2.) as a designation of the nation at large in which this race was predominant. That the Chaldeans proper were a Cushite race is proved by the remains of their language, which closely resembles the Galla or ancient language of Ethiopia. Now it appears by the inscriptions that while both in Assyria and in later Babylonia, the Semitic type of speech prevailed for civil purposes, the ancient Cushite dialect was retained as a learned language for scientific and religious literature. This is no doubt the "learning" and the "tongue" to which reference is made in Dan. i. 4. (SEMITIC LANGUAGES; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF; VERSIONS, ANCIENT.) The Chaldeans were really the learned class; they were priests, magicians, or astronomers, and in the last of the three capacities they probably effected discoveries of great importance. According to Strabo, there were two chief seats of Chaldean learning, Borsippa, and Ur or Orchoë. To these we may add, from Pliny, Babylon and Sippara or Sepharvaim. The Chaldeans (it would appear) congregated into bodies, forming what we may perhaps call universities, and pursuing the studies, in which they engaged, together. They probably mixed up to some extent astrology with their astronomy, even in the earlier times, but they certainly made great advances in astronomical science. In later times they seem to have degenerated into mere fortune-tellers. ASTRONOMY; DIVINATION; IDOLATRY; MAGI; MAGIC.

Chal'dees. CHALDEANS.

Chalk [chawk] Stones = stones of LIME or limestone (Is. xxvii. 9).

* Cham'ber [chame-]. The "chambers of imagery" (Ez. viii. 12) refer to the imitation of Egyptian manners by painting on the wall of a chamber representations of the irrational creatures and various idols which were the immediate objects of worship (Fairbairn).—The "chambers of the South" (Job ix. 9) = the remotest recesses of the South (Gesenius); compare Ps. civ. 3. BED; HOUSE; PALACE; TEMPLE.

* Cham'ber-ing = lewdness, or licentious behavior (Rom. xiii. 13).

Cham'ber-lain. Erastus "the chamberlain" of the city of Corinth, was one whose salutations to the Roman Christians are given in Rom. xvi. 23. The office which he held was apparently that of public treasurer, an inferior magistrate, who had the charge of the public chest under the authority of the senate, and kept the accounts of the public revenues (GOVERNOR 14). The office held by Blastus, "the king's chamberlain" (margin "that was over the king's bed-chamber"), was entirely different from this (Acts xii. 20). It was a post of honor which involved great intimacy and influence with the king. For chamberlain as used in the O. T., see EUNUCH.

Cha-me-le-on [ka-], the translation in A. V., LXX., and Vulgate of the Heb. coah or coach (literally strength), one of the unclean animals in Lev. xi. 30. (MOLE 1.) Bochart accepts the Arabic reading of cleawlo, i. e. the lizard, known by the name of the "Monitor of the Nile" (Monitor Niloticus, Grey), a large strong reptile common in Egypt and other parts of Africa; but the evidence which supports this interpretation is far from conclusive.

Cham'ols [sham' me or sha-moi'], the translation in A. V. of the Heb. zemer, one of the animals allowed for food (Deut. xiv. 5); the LXX., Vulgate, and some other versions, give "camelopard" or "giraffe." But there is no evidence that the cham-ois or the camelopard has ever been seen in Palestine or Lebanon. Col. C. H. Smith (in Kitto) suggests the Kebsch (Ammotragus Tragelaphus), a wild sheep, in general form like a goat, not uncommon, he says, in the Mokattam rocks near Cairo, and found also in Sinai; not improbably this is the animal denoted.

* Cham-paign ['sham-pane'] (fr. Fr.) = a plain (Deut. xi. 30; Ez. xvii. 2, margin). ARABAH; PLAIN 2, 5; VALLEY 4.

Chan-na'an [ka'nan], the Greek and Latin form of CANAAN (Jd. v. 3, 9, 10; Bar. iii. 22; Sus. 56; 1 Mc. ix. 37; Acts vii. 11, xiii. 19).

Chan-na'an-ite [ka'nan-ite] (Jd. v. 16) = CANAANITE.

* Chan'cel-ler [ch as in much] (Ezr. iv. 8, 9, 17). REHUM 2.

* Chan'gers (Jn. ii. 15). MONEY-CHANGERS.

Chan-uu-ne-us (fr. Gr.); apparently = MERARI (1 Esd. viii. 48).

* Chan'noth [ka'nok] (Heb.) = ENOCH 1 (Gen. iv. 17, margin).

* Chap-el [ch as in much], the translation in A. V. (Am. vii. 13) of Heb. mikdash (= any thing sacred, a holy place, Ges.), elsewhere usually translated "sanctuary." In 1 Mc. i. 47 the plural of Gr. eidōleion (= "idol's temple" in 1 Mc. x. 83, &c.; 1 Cor. vii. 10) is translated "chapels of idols." In 2 Mc. x. 2, xi. 3, the plural of Gr. temenos is translated "chapels." See cut under TEMPLE.

Chap-i-ter = the upper member, or capital of a pillar; also possibly a roll moulding at the top of a building or work of art: as (1.) of the pillars of the Tabernacle and TEMPLE, and of the two pillars called especially Jachin and Boaz; and (2.) of the lavers (LAVER) belonging to the Temple (Ex. xxxviii. 17; 1 K. vii. 27, 31, 38, 41).

Char-a-ath-a-lar [kar.] (Gr.). "Cherub, Addan, and Immer" (Ezr. ii. 59) is changed in 1 Esd. v. 36 to "Charaathalar leading them, and Aalar."

Char-a-ra [kar.] (Gr. and L.), a place (2 Mc. xii. 17 only) inhabited by the Jews called TUBIENI, on the E. of Jordan, 750 stadia from the city Caspis. Ewald identifies it with RAPHON. The only name like Characa now known on the E. of Jordan is Kerak, the ancient Kir of MOAB.

Char'a-shim (Heb. hārāshim or chārāshim = craftsmen), the Valley of, a place founded or settled by JOAB 2 (1 Chr. iv. 14), and reinhabited by Benjamites after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 35). In Nehemiah it is "valley of craftsmen." ENGRAVER.

Char'cha-mis [ch as k] (L. fr. Heb.) = CARCHEMISH (1 Esd. i. 25).

Char'che-mish [ch as k] (fr. Heb.) = CARCHEMISH (2 Chr. xxxv. 20).

Char'cus [kar'kus] (1 Esd. v. 32). Corrupted from BARKOS.

Char'e-a [ka-] (Gr.) = HARSIA (1 Esd. v. 32).

Char'ger [ch as in much], the translation in A. V. of—1. Heb. agartāl (Ezr. i. 9, twice in plural, only), probably = slaughter-basin, i. e. a basin for receiving blood, Ges.—2. Heb. kē'ārāh (Num. vii. 13-85) = a deep dish, bowl, charger, Ges.; elsewhere (Ex. xxv. 29, xxxvii. 16; Num. iv. 7) translated "dishes." The "chargers" in Num. vii. were of silver, and weighed each one hundred and thirty shekels, or sixty-five ounces.—3. Gr. pinax, literally a board, plank; hence a wooden trencher, dish, or plate, and the Greek name continued when the material was changed, L. & S. (Mat. xiv. 8, 11; Mk. vi. 25, 28); in Lk. xi. 39 translated "platter." The daughter of Herodias brought the head of John Baptist in a charger. BASIN.

Char-i-ot, the translation in A. V. of—1. Heb. recheb = (so Ges.) a wagon, chariot, either for war or serving for luxury and pomp; often referring chiefly to the horses, and also to the warriors who sit upon the chariots (2 Sam. viii. 4, x. 18).—2. Heb. rēchūb, a chariot or horse (Ps. civ. 3).—3. Heb. mercāb, a chariot (1 K. iv. 26, v. 6 Heb.) or seat (Lev. xv. 9 [A. V. "saddle"]); Cant. iii. 10 [A. V. "covering"].—4. Heb. mercābāh (= No. 1 in signification, each occurring many times in O. T.).—5. Heb. richbah = a riding or driving, Ges. (Ez. xxvii. 20 only). No. 1-5 are all from the same root (rāchab = to ride).—6. Heb. 'agālāh (Ps. xli. 9, Heb. 10), elsewhere translated "CART" or "WAGON."—7. Heb. appiryōn (Cant. iii. 9, margin "BED") = a sedan, litter, a portable couch or palanquin, Ges.—8. Heb. hōtsen (Ez. xxiii. 24 only) = weapons, arms, Ges., Targums, &c.; chariots, A. V., Fbn. on Ez.—9. Gr. harma (Acts viii. 28, 29, 38, &c.); in LXX. = No. 1, 4, 5.—10. Gr. rhedē (Rev. xviii. 13, in plural only) = a four-wheeled carriage for travelling, a chariot, Rbn. N. T. Lex. Of the chariot as a vehicle used for peaceful purposes, the following are probable instances as regards the Jews, 1 Sam. viii. 11; 2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 K. xii. 18, xviii. 44; Is. xxii. 18; and as regards other nations, Gen. xli. 43, xli. 29; 2 K. v. 9, 21; Acts viii. 28 ff. The earliest mention of chariots in Scripture is in Egypt, where Joseph, as a mark of distinction, was placed in Pharaoh's second chariot (Gen. xli. 43), and later when he went in his own chariot to meet his father on his entrance into Egypt from Canaan (xli. 29). In the funeral procession of Jacob chariots also formed a part, possibly by way of escort or as a guard of honor (l. 9). The next mention of Egyptian chariots is for a warlike purpose (Ex. xiv. 7). In this point of view chariots among some ancient nations, as elephants among others, may be regarded as filling the place of heavy artillery in modern times, so that the military power of a nation might be estimated by the number of its chariots. Thus Pharaoh in pursuing Israel took with him 600 chariots. The Canaanites of the valleys of Palestine could resist the Israelites successfully in consequence of the number of their chariots of iron, i. e. perhaps armed with iron scythes (see below; Ges. s. v.; Josh. xvii. 18; Judg. i. 19). Jabin, king of Canaan, had 900 chariots (Judg. iv. 3). The Philistines in Saul's time had 30,000, a number which seems excessive (1 Sam. xiii. 5). David took from Hadadezer, king of Zobah, 1,000 chariots (2 Sam. viii. 4), and from the Syrians a little later 700 (x. 18), who in order to recover their ground collected 32,000 chariots (1 Chr. xix. 7). Up to this time the Israelites possessed few or no chariots, partly no doubt in consequence of the theocratic prohibition against multiplying horses, for fear of intercourse with Egypt, and the regal despotism implied in the possession of them (Deut. xvii. 16; 1 Sam. viii. 11, 12). But to some extent David (2 Sam. viii. 4), and in a much greater degree Solomon, broke through the prohibition. He raised, therefore, and maintained a force of 1,400 chariots (1 K. x. 26) by taxation on certain cities agreeably to Eastern custom in such matters (1 K. ix. 19, x. 25; Xen. Anabasis, i. 4, 9). The chariots themselves and also the horses were imported chiefly from Egypt, and the cost of each chariot was 600 shekels of silver, and of each horse 150 (1 K. x. 29). From this time chariots were regarded as among the most important arms of war, though the supplies of them and of horses appear to have been still mainly drawn from Egypt (1 K. xxii. 34; 2 K. ix. 16, 21, xiii. 7, 14, xviii. 24, xxiii. 30; Is. xxxi. 1). The Egyptian chariot and doubtless that of the Israelites had a nearly semicircular wooden frame with straightened sides, resting posteriorly on the axle of a pair of wheels, and supporting a rail of wood or ivory attached to the frame by leathern thongs and a wooden upright in front. The back of the car was open; the sides were strengthened and ornamented with leather and metal binding; the floor was of rope net-work, to give a springy footing to the occupants. On the right-hand side was the bow-case; sometimes also the quiver and spear-case were on this side, crossing diagonally. If two warriors were in the chariot, a second bow-case was added. The two wheels had each usually six spokes, and were fastened to the axle by a linch-pin secured by a thong. The horses wore a breast-band and girths attached to the saddle, and head furniture, but no traces. A bearing-rein was fastened to a ring or hook in front of the saddle, and the driving reins passed through other reins on each side of both horses. Most commonly two persons, and sometimes three rode in the chariot, of whom the third was employed to carry the state umbrella (2 K. ix. 20, 24; 1 K. xxii. 34; Acts viii. 38). A second chariot usually accompanied the king to battle to be used in case of necessity (2 Chr. xxv. 34). Chariots of other nations are mentioned, as of Assyria (2 K. xix. 23; Ez. xxiii. 24), Syria (2 Sam. viii. and 2 K. vi. 14, 15), Persia (Is. xxii. 6), Ethiopia (2 Chr. xiv. 9), the Philistines, &c. (see above). Antiochus Eupator is said to have had 300 chariots armed with scythes (2 Mc. xiii. 2). (ARMS; ARMY; HIGHWAY; HORSE.) The prophets allude frequently to chariots as typical of power (Ps. xx. 7, civ. 3; Jer. li. 21; Zech. vi. 1). In the N. T., the only mention of a chariot, except in Rev. ix. 9 and xviii. 13, is in the case of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii. 28, 29, 38).

* Char'i-ty (fr. L.) in A. V. of N. T. is a frequent translation of the Gr. agapē (1 Cor. viii. 1, xiii., &c.), usually and properly translated "love" (Lk. xi. 42; Rom. v. 5, 8, &c.). FEASTS OF CHARITY.

* Charm'er. DIVINATION; SERPENT-CHARMING.

Char'mis [kar'mis] (Gr.), son of Melchiel; one of the three "ancients" or "rulers" of Bethulia (Jd. vi. 15, viii. 10, x. 6).

Char'ran [kar'ran] (Gr. fr. Heb.) = HARAN (Acts vii. 2, 4).

Chase [ch as in much]. HUNTING.

Chas'e-ba [kas-] (Gr.), probably a corruption of GAZERA, the name succeeding Chaseba (1 Esd. v. 31).

* Cha'yah [ka-] (Gen. iii. 20, margin) = EVE.

Che'bar [ke-] (Heb. length, Ges.), a river in the "land of the Chaldeans" (Ez. i. 3), on the banks of which some of the Jews were located at the time of the Captivity, and where Ezekiel saw his earlier visions (Ez. i. 1, iii. 15, 23, &c.). It is commonly regarded as = the HABOR, or river of GOZAN, to which some portion of the Israelites were removed by the Assyrians (2 K. xvii. 6). But Rawlinson thinks the Chebar of Ezekiel must be looked for in Babylonia, and may be, as Bochart supposed, the Nahr Malcha or Royal Canal of Nebuchadnezzar, in the excavation of which the Jewish captives may have been employed. CHALDEA; EUPHRATES.

Cheb'el [keb-] (Heb. hebel or chebel). REGION.

Ched-or-la-omer [ked-] (Heb. handful of sheaves? but prob. fr. Pers., Ges.), a king of ELAM, in the time of Abraham, who with three other chiefs made war upon the kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar, and reduced them to servitude. Thirteen years afterward these rebelled; the next year Chedorlaomer and his allies marched upon their country, and after defeating many neighboring tribes, completely routed the five kings in the vale of Siddim; but as the victors carried off Lot and his possessions with the spoil, Abram pursued and smote Chedorlaomer and his forces, and rescued Lot, with all that had been taken (Gen. xiv.). Chedorlaomer (so Rln.) may have been the leader of certain immigrant Chaldean Elamites who founded the great Chaldean empire of Berosus in the early part of the twentieth century B. C.

Cheese is mentioned only three times in the Bible, viz. in Job. x. 10 (Heb. gebînâh = curdled milk, cheese, Ges.); 1 Sam. xvii. 18 (Heb. hârîtsây hehâlâb or chârîtsây hehâlâb = cuttings [i. e. slices] of curds, new or soft cheese, Ges.; A. V. "cheeses," marg. "cheeses of milk"); 2 Sam. xvii. 29 (Heb. shîphôth-bâkir = cheeses [properly, that which is rubbed, grated, ground fine, in order to be eaten] of kine, Ges.; "cheese of kine," A. V.). The cheese now common in the East is of very indifferent quality, usually in cakes about the size of a tea-saucer, white, very salt, without a rind, and soon becoming excessively hard and dry (Kit.). The Bedouin Arabs have coagulated buttermilk, which is dried until it becomes quite hard, and is then ground; the Arabs eat it mixed with butter (Burckhardt, Notes on the Bedouins, i. 60).

Che-lai [ke-] (Heb. perfection, Ges.), a son of Pahath-moab, and husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30).

Che-el-as [kel-si-as] (fr. Gr. form of HILKIAH). 1. Ancestor of Baruch (Bar. i. 1).—2. HILKIAH the high-priest in the time of Josiah (Bar. i. 7).—3. The father of Susanna (Sus. 2, 29, 63). Tradition represents him as the brother of Jeremiah, and = 2.

Che'il-ans [kel'e-anz] = inhabitants of CHELLUS (Jd. ii. 23).

Che-lu [kel'lu] (fr. Heb. = strong, robust, Fû.), a son of Bani, and husband of a foreign wife (Ez. x. 35).

Che-lus [kel-] (fr. Gr.), one of the places beyond (i. e. W. of) Jordan to which Nabuchodonosor sent his summons (Jd. i. 9). Except its mention with "Kades" there is no clue to its situation. Reland supposes it = Ehusa, south of Beer-sheba.

Che-lod [ke-] (fr. Gr.). "Many nations of the sons of Chelod" were among those who obeyed the summons of Nabuchodonosor to his war with Arphaxad (Jd. i. 6). The word is apparently corrupt.

Che-lub [ke-] (Heb. trap-cage, basket, Ges.). 1. A man among the descendants of Judah, described as brother of Shuah and father of Mehir (1 Chr. iv. 11).—2. Father of Ezri, David's officer (xxvii. 26).

Che-lu-bai [ke-lu'bay] (Heb. = CALEB, Ges.), son of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 9); = CALEB 1.

Che-ma-rim, Che-m'a-rims [ch as k] (Heb. cêmârim or cimârim = idol-priests; fr. a Syr. word denoting blackness, sadness, and concretely one who goes about in black or in mourning, hence an ascetic, priest in general, Ges.). This word only occurs in the text of the A. V. in Zeph. i. 4. In 2 K. xxiii. 5 it is rendered "idoltrous priests," and in Hos. x. 5 "priests," and in both cases "chemarim" is in the margin. In Hebrew usage the word is exclusively applied to the priests of the false worship.

Che-mosh [ke-] (Heb. perhaps subduer, vanquisher, Ges.), the national deity of the Moabites (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 7, 13, 46). In Judg. xi. 24, he also appears as the god of the Ammonites. Solomon introduced, and Josiah abolished, the worship of Chemosh at Jerusalem (1 K. xi. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 13). Jerome identifies him with Baal-peor; others with Baal-zebul; others, as Gesenius, with Mars, and others with Saturn.

* Che-na-an (Gen. ix. 18, marg.) = CANAAN.

Che-na'a-nah [ke-] (Heb. fem. of CANAAN, Ges.). 1. Son of Benjamin's grandson Bilhan, and head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. vii. 10).—2. Father, or ancestor, of Zedekiah the false prophet (1 K. xxii. 11, 24; 2 Chr. xviii. 10, 23); perhaps = 1.

Che-nai or Che-na'ni (Heb. prob. = CHENANIAH, Ges.), a Levite who assisted at the solemn purification of the people under Ezra (Neh. ix. 4).

Che-nai'ah [ken-] (Heb. = whom Jehovah hath set, Ges.), chief of the Levites, when David carried the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 22, 27, xxvi. 29).

Che-phar-ha-am'mo-nai [ke-far-] (Heb. village or hamlet of the Ammonites; see CAPHAR), a city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 24), probably named from some incursion of the Ammonites; site unknown.

Che-phirah [ke-fî-ra] (Heb. = village or hamlet; see CAPHAR), one of the four cities of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17), afterward in Benjamin (xviii. 26). The men of Chephirah returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29). Dr. Robinson seems to have discovered it in the ruined village of Kefir, about eleven miles W.N.W. from Jerusalem. CAPHIRA.

Che-rau [ke-] (Heb. lyre, Ges.), son of Dishon the Horite "duke" (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chr. i. 41).

Che-re-as [ke-] (fr. Gr.), governor of Gazara, and brother of Timotheus; both slain at Gazara by the forces of Judas Maccabeus (2 Mc. x. 32, 37).

Che-re-thim, Che-re-thims [ch as k] (Heb. pl. cêrêthim or crêthim) (Ez. xxv. 16). CHERETHITES.

Che-re-thites [ker-] (fr. Heb. cêrêthi or crêthi, pl. cêrêthim or crêthim; see below) and Pe-le-thites, the life-guards of King David (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, xx. 7, 23; 1 K. i. 38, 44; 1 Chr. viii. 17). These titles are commonly said to signify "executioners and couriers." It is plain that these royal guards were employed as executioners (1 K. ii. 25, 34, 46; 2 K. xi. 4), and as couriers (1 K. xiv. 27, marg. "runners"). But it has been conjectured that they may have been foreign mercenaries. They are connected with the Gittites, a foreign tribe (2 Sam. xv. 18); and the Cherethites are mentioned as a nation (1 Sam. xxx. 14; also in Ez. xxv. 16, A. V. "Cherethim" or "Cherethims") dwelling apparently on the coast, and therefore probably Philistines, of which name PELETHITES may be only another form. Prof. D. H. Weir (in Fairbairn) suggests that the Cherethites and Pelethites were mostly Israelite refugees with David among the Cherethites of Philistia, mingled perhaps with some native Cherethites. Fürst makes the Cherethites = Cretans or emigrants from CRETE, and so the LXX. in Ez. xxv. 16 (A. V. "Cherethim") and Zeph. ii. 6.

Che-rith [ke-] (Heb. a culling, separation, Ges.), the Brook, the torrent-bed or wady (BROOK 4) in which Elijah hid himself during the early part of the three years' drought (1 K. xvii. 3, 5). The position of the Cherith has been much disputed. Eusebius and Jerome place it E. of Jordan, where also Schwarz would identify it in a Wady Alias, opposite Bethshean. This is the Wady el-Yabis (Jabesh). The tradition mentioned by Marinus Sanutus in 1321, that it ran by Phasaelus, Herod's city in the Jordan valley, would make it the 'Ain el-Fuâil, a fountain concealed under high cliffs, from which a brook flows through a narrow valley, S. of Kurn Sirtabeh, and falls into the Jordan about fifteen miles above Jericho. This view is supported by Bachiene, A. D. 1758, and by Van de Velde (ii. 810). Robinson, on the other hand (i. 538), would find the name in the Wady Kelt, a deep, wild ravine, also W. of Jordan, and behind Jericho.

Cherub [ke-] (Heb.; see next article below), apparently a place in Babylonia from which some persons of doubtful extraction returned to Judea with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

Cher'ub, Cher'-n-bim, Cher'-n-bims [ch as in church and Rachel] (Heb. cērub or crūb = a keeper, warder, guard, sc. of the Deity, to guard against all approach? Ges.; Heb. pl. cērūbīm or crūbīm. Many other etymologies have been proposed.) In regard to cherubim, two principal opinions have been held: (1.) that they are an order of superhuman beings, having a separate and real existence (see below); (2.) that they were merely symbolical figures or imaginary beings, like the composite creature-forms in the religious insignia of Assyria, Egypt, Babylonia, and Persia, e. g. the sphinx, the gryphons or griffins, winged bulls and lions of NINEVEH, &c. (NISROCH.) In the sacred boats or arks of the Egyptians, (cut, p. 166), are sometimes found two figures with extended wings, which remind us of the description of the cherubim "covering the mercy-seat with their wings, and their faces (looking) one to another" (Ex. xxv. 20). The cherubim are first mentioned as "placed at the E. of the garden of Eden" (Gen. iii. 24). A pair (Ex. xxv. 18, &c.) were placed on the MERCY-SEAT of the ark: a pair of colossal size, probably in addition to the others, overshadowed it in Solomon's TEMPLE with the canopy of their contiguously extended wings (1 K. vi. 23 ff.). Jehovah is often spoken of as "manifesting himself, or dwelling between the cherubim" (Ex. xxv. 22; Num. vii. 89; 1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2, &c.). Cherubim were likewise represented on the curtains and veil of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 1, 31, xxxvi. 8, 35), on the walls and doors and veil of the Temple (1 K. vi. 29, 32, 35; 2 Chr. iii. 14, &c.), and on the bases of the lavers (1 K. vii. 29, 36). Ezekiel (i. 4-14) speaks of four "living creatures," and similarly the apocalyptic "beasts" (BEAST 14) (Rev. iv. 6) are four. The cherubim are sometimes placed beneath the actual presence of Jehovah, whose moving throne they appear to draw (Ez. i. 5, 25, 26, x. 1, 2, 6, 7). The glory symbolizing that presence which eye cannot see rests or rides on them, or one of them, thence dismounts to the Temple threshold, and then departs and mounts again (Ez. x. 4, 18; compare ix. 3; Ps. xviii. 10). Those on the ark were to be placed with wings stretched forth, one at each end of the mercy-seat, and to be made "of the mercy-seat." They are called the cherubim of glory (Heb. ix. 5), as on or between them the glory, when visible, rested. They were anointed with the holy oil, like the ark itself, and the other sacred furniture. Their wings were to be stretched upward, and their faces "toward each other and toward the mercy-seat." It is remarkable that with such precise directions as to their position, attitude, and material, nothing, save that they were winged, is said (in Exodus) concerning their shape. In Ez. i. (compare x.) they are minutely described as having a composite creature-form, of which the man, lion, ox, and eagle were the elements. In Ez. x. 14 their "first face" is said to be "the face of a cherub" (compare i. 10). Bähr is inclined to think that the precise form varied within certain limits; e. g. the cherubic figure might have one, two, or four faces, two or four feet, one or two pair of wings, and might have the bovine or leonine type as its basis, &c. Mr. F. W. Farrar (in Kit.) maintains, that, "although the complete symbol of the cherubim was composed of four separate or united forms of life, they might be sufficiently indicated by any one of these four elements, and that the shape in which they were commonly represented was either that of a winged ox (perhaps with a human head), or of a winged man (perhaps with calves' feet)." (See below.) Fairbairn also considers them symbolic and imaginary beings, "not presented to our view as always entirely alike;" but regards them as "composite animal forms" with "a predominantly human aspect"—"ideal representatives of humanity in its highest and holiest places—representatives not of what it actually is, but of what it was destined to become, when the purpose of God in its behalf was accomplished, and other elements than those now belonging to it had gathered into its condition." Probably most of those who have denied the personal reality of the cherubim have maintained that they are symbols directly or indirectly, either of the natural perfections of God, e. g. omnipotence, omniscience, &c. (personifications, in fact, of natural power employed in God's service), or of the divine moral attributes, e. g. justice, slowness to anger, &c. Thus Prof. Stuart (on Rev. iv. 6) regards the living creatures or cherubim as "symbolic of the all-pervading power, providence, and government of God who uses them as His instruments." As in Rev. v. 10 the best critical authorities read "them" and "they," instead of "us" and "we" with the A. V. and common Greek text, Prof. Stuart suggests that the first clause in verse 9, may be sung by the twenty-four elders and the four living creatures, the last clause by the elders alone, verse 10 by the living creatures alone, &c., and refers for such responsive praise to Ps. xxiv. and Is. vi. 1-3. Mr. Barnes (on Rev. iv. 6) regards the living creatures of Revelation and Ezekiel as "designed to furnish some representation of the government of God—to illustrate, as it were, that on which the divine government rests, or which constitutes its support—viz., power, intelligence, vigilance, energy." John Hutchinson,

Assyrian sphinx.—(Layard, ii. 348.)

Parkhurst, &c., considered the cherubim as emblems of the Trinity, with man incorporated into the divine essence, &c.—But many eminent theologians (Calvin, Dwight, &c.), with probably the great majority of ordinary readers of the Scriptures, have regarded the cherubim as real spiritual beings, or as symbolically (so Doddridge, Whitby, &c.) representing such beings. (SERAPHIM.) Gesenius defines the cherub as "a creature of a sacred and celestial nature." The ancient Arabic version translated the Hebrew by "angels." Some have held that the cherubim = angels in general, others that they constitute a distinct order of angels, or of spiritual beings superior to angels. As it is not certain that spiritual beings have any proper shape of their own (ANGELS), the apparent form might vary (see above) without involving any corresponding change in the essential nature of the beings represented or symbolized. Gesenius supposes the attributes of the lion, ox, and eagle added to the human figure, to mark the strength and swiftness of these ministers of Deity.—The king of Tyre is styled (Ez. xxviii. 14, 16) "the anointed cherub that covereth," "covering cherub," in allusion to the cherubim covering the mercy-seat with their wings and with reference to his peculiarly exalted and privileged position.

Ches'-lon [kes-] (Heb. confidence, hope, Ges.; literally loins, flank), one of the landmarks on the W. part of the N. boundary of Judah, apparently on the side of Mount Jearim (Josh. xv. 10); probably at the modern village named Kesla, about six miles N. E. of 'Ain-shems (Beth-shemesh) on the western mountains of Judah (Rbn. ii. 30 n.; iii. 164). Eusebius and Jerome mention a Chalon, but the former places it in Benjamin, the latter in Judah: both agree that it was a very large village in the neighborhood of Jerusalem.

Chesed [ke-] (Heb. increase, sc. of the family, Sim.), fourth son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 22), from whom (so Jerome, &c.) came the Casdin or Chal-deans. CHALDEA.

Chesil [ke-] (Heb. fool = CESIL), a town in the extreme S. of Palestine, named with Hormah and Ziklag (Josh. xv. 30); probably = BETHUL, BETHUEL, BETHEL 2. Rowlands and Wilton make Chesil = the modern el-Khulasah (Elusa). The former (in Fairbairn) suggests that Chesil may be Khuzai or Khuzali, a little N. of el-Khulasah, and then the latter = Chorashan.

Chest, the, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. arón, invariably used for the ARK OF THE COVENANT

(ARK); also once for the "coffin" (probably like that in the cut) in which Joseph's bones were carried from Egypt (Gen. i. 26; BURIAL; EMBALMING); and six times for the "chest" in which Jehoiada the priest collected the alms for the repairs of the Temple (2 K. xii. 9, 10; 2 Chr. xxiv. 8–11).—2. Heb. pl. gēnāzim, "chests" (Ez. xxvii. 24 only); = treasure chests, in which precious goods or wares are stored, Ges.; translated "treasuries" in Esth. iii. 9, iv. 7.

Chestnut-tree, the A. V. translation of the Heb. 'armōn in Gen. xxx. 37, and Ez. xxxi. 8. In Ezekiel it is spoken of as one of the glories of Assyria. The balance of authority (LXX., Vulgate, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, &c.) is certainly in favor of the oriental plane-tree (Platanus orientalis) as the tree denoted. The occidental plane-tree (Platanus occidentalis), a closely allied species, is well known in the United States as the button-wood or button-ball tree, and is often called sycamore. The A. V. follows the Rabbins, but the context of the passages where the word occurs, indicates some tree which thrives best in low and rather moist situations, whereas the chestnut-tree is a tree which prefers dry and hilly ground. The plane-trees of Palestine were probably more numerous in ancient days than now; though modern travellers occasionally refer to them. In Eccles. xxiv. 14, wisdom is compared to "a plane-tree (Gr. platanos) by the water."

Che-sul'oth [ke-] (Heb. hopes, Ges.; literally, the loins), a town of Issachar, named between Jezreel and Shunem (Josh. xix. 18); according to Robinson (ii. 332) and Porter (in Kitto) = CHISLOTH-TABOR. Keil (on Joshua) and others deny this identity.

* Cheth (Heb. hēyth or chēyth, probably = an enclosure, fence, Ges.), the eighth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Chet'-ti-lm [ket'-te-im] (fr. Gr.) = CHITTIM (1 Mc. i. 1).

Che'zib [ke-] (Heb. lying, false, Ges.), the birth-place of Shelah (Gen. xxxviii. 5); probably = ACH-ZIB 1. Wilton (in Fbn., art. Keilah) places Chezib at 'Ain Kussābeh, a fountain with ruins about four hours S. W. from Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis).

* Chiek'-ens (2 Esd. i. 30; Mat. xxiii. 37). HEN.

Chl'don (Heb. javelin; see ARMS, I. 2, b), the name in 1 Chr. xiii. 9 of the threshing-floor at which the accident to the ark, on its transport from Kirjath-jearim to Jerusalem, took place, and the death of Uzzah. In 2 Sam. vi. the name is given as NACHON.

* Chief of A'sia. ASIARCHS.

Child, Chl'dren. The blessing of offspring, but especially, and sometimes exclusively, of the male sex, is highly valued among all Eastern nations, while the absence is regarded as one of the severest punishments (Gen. xvi. 2, xxv. 21, xxix. 31, xxx. 1, 14; Deut. vii. 14; 1 Sam. i. 6 ff., ii. 5, iv. 20; 2 Sam. vi. 23, xviii. 18; 2 K. iv. 14; Esth. v. 11; Ps. cxxvii. 3, 5; Eccl. vi. 3; Is. xlvii. 9; Jer. xx. 15; Hos. ix. 14). Childbirth is in the East usually, but not always, easy (Gen. xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 28; Ex. i. 19; 1 Sam. iv. 19, 20). (MIDWIFE.) As soon as the child was born, and the umbilical cord cut, it was washed in a bath, rubbed with salt, and wrapped in swaddling-clothes. Arab mothers sometimes rub their children with earth or sand (Ez. xvi. 4; Job xxxviii. 9; Lk. ii. 7). On the eighth day the rite of CIRCUMCISION, in the case of a boy, was performed, and a name given, sometimes, but not usually, the same as that of the father, and generally conveying some special meaning. After the birth of a male child the mother was considered unclean for 7 + 33 days; if the child were a female, for double that period, 14 + 66 days. At the end of the time she was to make an offering of PURIFICATION of a lamb as a burnt-offering, and a pigeon or turtle-dove as a sin-offering, or in case of poverty, two doves or pigeons, one as a burnt-offering, the other as a sin-offering (Lev. xii.; Lk. ii. 22). The period of nursing appears to have been sometimes prolonged to three years (Is. xlix. 15; 2 Mc. vii. 27). Nurses were sometimes employed (Ex. ii. 9; Gen. xxiv. 59, xxxv. 8; 2 Sam. iv. 4; 2 K. xi. 2; 2 Chr. xxii. 11; comp. Gen. xxi. 7; 1 Sam. i. 23; Cant. viii. 1; Is. xlix. 15). (NURSE.) The time of weaning was an occasion of rejoicing (Gen. xxi. 8). (BANQUETS.) Arab children wear little or no clothing for four or five years: the young of both sexes are usually carried by the mothers on the hip or the shoulder, a custom to which allusion is made by Isaiah (Is. xlix. 22, lxvi. 12). Both boys and girls in their early years were under the care of the women (Prov. xxxi. 1). Afterward the boys were taken by the father under his charge. Those in wealthy families had tutors or governors, who were sometimes eunuchs (Num. xi. 12; 2 K. x. 1, 5; Is. xlix. 23; Gal. iii. 24). (EDUCATION.) Daughters usually remained in the women's apartments till MARRIAGE, or were employed in various domestic occupations, the seclusion being more strict in later times and among the higher classes (Gen. xxiv. 11, 16, xxix. 10; Ex. ii. 16; 1 Sam. ix. 11; 2 Sam. xiii. 7; Ecclus. vii. 25, xlii. 9; 2 Mc. iii. 19). (DRESS; MOTHER; SLAVE; WOMEN.) The FIRST-BORN male children were regarded as devoted to God, and were to be redeemed by an offering (Ex. xiii. 13; Num. xviii. 15; Lk. ii. 22). The authority of parents, especially of the FATHER, over children was very great, as was also the reverence enjoined by the law to be paid to parents. The disobedient child, the striker or reviler of a parent, was liable to capital punishment, though not, under the Mosaic law, at the independent will of the parent. (PATRIARCH; PUNISHMENTS.) Children were sometimes taken as bond-servants, in case of non-payment of debt (2 K. iv. 1; Neh. v. 5; Is. l. 1; Mat. xviii. 25). Parental authority and filial duty are inculcated in the fifth commandment and enforced in the N. T. (Ex. xx. 12; Eph. vi. 1 ff., &c.). "Child," "children" often figuratively denote origin, relationship, resemblance, &c. ADOPTION; BROTHER; DAUGHTER; HEIR; SON.

Chil'i-on [kil'e-on] (Heb. a pinning, Ges.), son of Elimelech and Naomi, and husband of ORPAH; "an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah" (Ru. i. 2-5, iv. 9). RUTH.

Chil'mad [kil] (Heb. enclosure [i. e. defence] of Media, Sim.), a place or country mentioned with Sheba and Asshur (Ez. xxvii. 23); supposed by Bochart, &c. (improbably) = ancient Charmande, a town near the Euphrates about 150 miles N. W. of Babylon. Rawlinson makes Chilmad = the city of Kalwadha (near Bagdad), with which he is disposed to connect the name CHALDEA.

Chim'ham [kim-] (Heb. pinning, longing, Ges.), a follower, and probably a son of Barzillai the Gileadite, who returned from beyond Jordan with David (2 Sam. xix. 37, 38, 40; compare 1 K. ii. 7). David appears to have bestowed on him a possession at Bethlehem, on which, in later times, an inn or Khan was standing (Jer. xli. 17). In 2 Sam. xix. 40, the name is in the Hebrew text and margin of A. V. CHIMHAN.

Chim'han [kim-] (Heb.). CHIMHAM.

Chim'ne-reth [kin-] (Heb. cinnereth = lyre, Ges.), a fortified city in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35 only), of which no trace is found in later writers, and no remains by travellers. By Jerome Chinnereth, perhaps from some tradition, was identified with the later Tiberias. (See the next article, and CINNEROTH.)

Chim'ne-reth [kin-] (Heb.; see above), Sea of, (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xiii. 27), the inland sea, most known as the "lake of GENNESARET," mentioned as at the end of Jordan opposite to the "Sea of the ARABAH," i. e. the Dead Sea; as having the Arabah below it, &c. (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xi. 2, xii. 3). In the two latter passages it is CINNEROTH. It seems likely that Chinnereth was an ancient Canaanite name existing long prior to the Israelite conquest.

Chim'ne-roth [kin-] (Heb. pl. cinnèrôth = lyres, Ges.). CHINNERETH, SEA OF; CINNEROTH.

Chios [ki-] (Gr.; derived by some fr. Gr. chiôn, snow), an island in the Grecian Archipelago. St. Paul passed near Chios on his return voyage from Troas to Cesarea (Acts xx., xxi.). Having come from Assos to Mitylene in Lesbos (xx. 14), he arrived the next day over against Chios (15), the next day at Samos and tarried at Trogyllium; and the following day at Miletus; thence he went by Cos and Rhodes to Patara (xxi. 1). At that time Chios enjoyed the privilege of freedom, and it is not certain that it ever was politically a part of the province of Asia, though it is separated from the mainland only by a strait of five miles. Its length is about thirty-two miles, and in breadth it varies from eight to eighteen. Its outline is mountainous and bold; and it has always been celebrated for its beauty and fruitfulness. It was desolated by the Persians B. C. 494, and in the Greek war of independence by the Turks, who (1822) massacred 25,000 of its inhabitants, and sold 45,000 into slavery.

Chis'len [kis'lu] MONTH.

Chis'lon [kis-] (Heb. confidence, hope, Ges.), father of Elidad, a prince of Benjamin at the division of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 21).

Chis'loth-ta'bor [kis-] (Heb. loins, or flank, of Tabor, Ges.), a place to the border of which reached the border of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12); perhaps at the modern village Ikadl, i. e. about two and a half miles W. of Mount Tabor. CHESULLOTH; TABOR (city).

Chit'tim [kit-] (Heb. pl., prob. = HITTITES, Ges.; see below), a family or race descended from Javan (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chr. i. 7; A. V. "KITTIM"), closely related to the DODANIM. Balaam predicts that a fleet should proceed "from the coast of Chittim" to "afflict" Assyria, &c. (Num. xxiv. 24); in Is. xxiii. 1, 12, "the land of Chittim appears as the resort of the fleets of Tyre: in Jer. ii. 10, the "isles of Chittim" are to the far W., as Kedar to the E. of Palestine: the Tyrians procured thence the cedar or boxwood (Box-TREE), which they inlaid with ivory for the decks of their vessels (Ez. xxvii. 6); in Dan. xi. 30, "ships of Chittim" advance to the S. to meet the king of the N. At a later period we find Alexander the Great described as coming from the land of CHETTUM (1 Mc. i. 1), and Perseus as king of the CITIMS (viii. 5). Josephus considered CYPRUS as the original seat of the Chittim, adducing as evidence the name of its principal town, Citium. Citium was without doubt a Phenician town. From the town the name extended to the whole island of Cyprus, which was occupied by Phenician colonies. The name Chittim, which in the first instance had applied to Phenicians only (= HITTITES), passed over to the islands which they had occupied, and thence to the people who succeeded the Phenicians in the occupation of them. Thus in 1 Maccabees, Chittim evidently = Macedonia. In the wider acceptance Chittim comprehended the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean, especially of the N. parts, viz., Greece and Italy (Gesenius). In an ethnological point of view, Chittim must be regarded as applying, not to the original Phenician settlers of Cyprus, but to the race which succeeded them; viz. the Carians. The Carians were connected with the Leleges, and must be considered as related to the Pelasgic family, though quite distinct from the Hellenic branch.

Chlo'e [klo'e] (Gr. the first light green shoot of plants in spring, especially young green corn or grass; hence, the verdant, an epithet of Ceres, L. & S.), a woman, some of whose household had informed St. Paul of the divisions in the Corinthian church (1 Cor. i. 11).

Choba (Gr.), a place (Jd. iv. 4), apparently in central Palestine; probably the same as Chobai or Chob'ai (Gr.) (Jd. xv. 4, 5). The name suggests HOBAB, if the distance from the probable site of Bethulia were not too great. Van de Velde (i. 308) identifies Chobai with the modern Kūbāieh, between Sinūr (Bethulia?) and Jenin (Engannim).

Cho-ra'shan [ko-] (Heb. smoking furnace, Ges.; chor in Syr. and Ar. = habitation, place, Wr., P. Holmes [in Kit.]; see ASHAN), one of the places in which "David and his men were wont to haunt" (1 Sam. xxx. 30); generally identified with ASHAN. Rowlands (in Fairbairn under "S. Country") suggests that Chorasshan may be El-Khulashah. BETHUL; CHESIL.

Cho-ra'zin [ko-] (Gr. district of Zin, Origen; fr. Heb. = woody places, forests, Lightfoot), one of the cities in which our Lord's mighty works were done, but named only in His denunciation (Mat. xi. 21; Lk. x. 13). Jerome describes it as on the shore of the lake, two miles from CAPERNAUM. Robinson makes Khān Mīnyeh = Capernaum, El-Tābighah = BETHSAIDA, and Tell Hām = Chorazin. Thomson identifies Chorazin with the ruined site Khorazy or Kherāzeh, two miles N. (Robinson makes it three miles N. W.) of Tell Hām (his Capernaum).

Cho-ze'ba (Heb. lying, false, Ges.). The "men of Chozebah" are named (1 Chr. iv. 22) among the descendants of Shelah the son of Judah. Chozeba probably = CHEZIB and ACHZIB.

Christ [ch pron. as k, i as in pine] (fr. Gr. christos = anointed = MESSIAH). JESUS CHRIST; MES-SIAH.

Chris'tian [ch as k, i as in pin] (fr. CHRIST). The disciples, we are told (Acts xi. 26), were first called Christians at ANTIOCH 1, somewhere about A. D. 43. They were known to each other as brethren of one family, as disciples of the same Master, as believers in the same faith, and as distinguished by the same endeavors after holiness and consecration of life; and so were called among themselves "brethren" (Acts xv. 1, 23; 1 Cor. vii. 12), "disciples" (Acts ix. 26, xi. 29), "believers" (Acts v. 14), "saints" (Rom. viii. 27, xv. 25). But the outer world could know nothing of the true force and significance of these terms. The Jews could add nothing to the scorn which the names NAZARENES and GALILEANS expressed, and had they endeavored to do so they would not have defiled the glory of their Messiah by applying his title to those whom they could not but regard as the followers of a pretender. The name "Christian," then, which, in the only other cases where it appears in the N. T. (Acts xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16: compare Tac. Ann. xv. 44), is used contemptuously, could not have been originally applied by the early disciples to themselves, though afterward adopted and gloried in by them (compare CROSS), nor could it have come to them from their own nation the Jews; it must, therefore, have been imposed upon them by the Gentile world, and no place could have so appropriately given rise to it as Antioch, where the first church was planted among the heathen. Its inhabitants were celebrated for their wit and a propensity for conferring nicknames. The Emperor Julian himself was not secure from their jests. Apollonius of Tyana was driven from the city by the insults of the inhabitants. Their wit, however, was often harmless enough; and there is no reason to suppose that the name "Christian" of itself was intended as a term of scurrility or abuse, though it would naturally be used with contempt. Suidas says the name was given in the reign of Claudius, when Peter appointed Evodius bishop of Antioch, and they who were formerly called Nazarenes and Galileans had their name changed to Christians.

Chron'i-cles [kron'e-kiz] (fr. Gr. pl. chronika = books of [or concerning] time, hence, annals or chronology, L. & S.; in Heb. dibréy hayyamim = words of the days, hence, daily affairs, chronicles, Ges.), the name originally given to the record made by the appointed historiographers in the kingdoms of Israel and Judah (1 K. xiv. 19), and then to the abridgment of sacred history which in the A. V. is called "The First Book of the Chronicles" and "The Second Book of the Chronicles." In the LXX. these books are called Paraleipomenon (Gr. = of things left remaining) prōton (= first), Paraleipomenon deuteron (= second), which is understood, after Jerome's explanation, as meaning that they are supplementary to the books of Kings. The Vulgate retains both the Hebrew and Greek name in Latin characters, Dibre ha'iamim, and Paraleipomenon. The constant tradition of the Jews, in which they have been followed by the great mass of Christian commentators, is that these books were for the most part compiled by Ezra. In fact, the internal evidence as to the time when the book of Chronicles was compiled, seems to tally remarkably with the tradition concerning its authorship. Notwithstanding this agreement, however, the authenticity of Chronicles has been vehemently impugned by De Wette and other German critics, whose arguments have been successfully refuted by Dahler, Keil, Movers, &c. As regards the plan of the book, of which Ezra is a continuation, forming one work, it becomes apparent when we consider it as the compilation of Ezra or some one nearly contemporary with him (so Lord A. C. Hervey, original author of this article). One of the greatest difficulties connected with the Captivity and the return must have been the maintenance of that genealogical distribution of the lands which yet was a vital point of the Jewish economy. Another difficulty intimately connected with the former was the maintenance of the Temple services at Jerusalem. This could only be effected by the residence of the priests and Levites in Jerusalem in the order of their courses: and this residence was only practicable in the case of the payment of the appointed tithes, first-fruits, and other offerings. But then again the registers of the Levitical genealogies were necessary, in order that it might be known who were entitled to such and such allowances, as porters, singers, priests, &c.; because all these offices went by families; and again the payment of the tithes, first-fruits, &c., was dependent upon the different families of Israel being established each in his inheritance. Obviously therefore one of the most pressing wants of the Jewish community after their return from Babylon would be trustworthy genealogical records. But further, not only had Zerubbabel (Ezr. iii., v., vi.), and after him Ezra and Nehemiah (ii., viii.; Neh. vii., viii.), labored most earnestly to restore the Temple and the public worship of God there to the condition it had been in under the kings of Judah; but it appears clearly from their policy, and from the language of the contemporary prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, that they had it much at heart to reinfuse something of national life and spirit into the heart of the people, and to make them feel that they were still the inheritors of God's covenanted mercies, and that the Captivity had only temporarily interrupted, not dried up, the stream of God's favor to their nation. Now nothing could more effectually aid these pious and patriotic designs than setting before the people a compendious history of the kingdom of David, which should embrace a full account of its prosperity, trace the sins which led to its overthrow, carry the thread through the period of the Captivity, and continue it as it were unbroken on the other side; and those passages in their former history would be especially important which exhibited their greatest and best kings as engaged in building or restoring the Temple, reforming all corruptions in religion, and zealously regulating the services of the house of God. As regards the kingdom of Israel or Samaria, seeing it had utterly and hopelessly passed away, and that the existing inhabitants were among the bitterest "adversaries of Judah and Benjamin," it would naturally engage very little of the compiler's attention. These considerations explain exactly the plan and scope of that historical work which is supposed to have consisted of the two books of Chronicles and Ezra. For after having given the genealogical divisions and settlements of the various tribes (1 Chr. i.-viii.), the compiler marks distinctly his own age and purpose by informing us of the disturbance of those settlements by the Babylonish Captivity (ix. 1), and of the partial restoration of them at the return from Babylon (2-24). He then gives a continuous history of the kingdom of Judah from David to his own times (ix. 35-Ezr. x.) introduced by the closing scene of Saul's life (1 Chr. x.), which introduction is itself prefaced by a genealogy of Saul's house (ix. 35-44), extracted from the genealogical tables drawn up in the reign of Hezekiah (so Lord A. C. Hervey). 1 Chr. xv.-

xvii., xxii.-xxix.; 2 Chr. xiii.-xv., xxiv., xxvi., xxix.-xxxi., xxxv., are among the passages wholly or in part peculiar to the books of Chronicles, which mark the compiler's purpose, and are especially suited to the age and work of Ezra. Many Chaldaisms in the language of these books, the resemblance of the style of Chronicles to that of Ezra, which is, in parts, avowedly Ezra's composition, the reckoning by Darics (1 Chr. xxix. 7; A. V. "drachms"), as well as the breaking off of the narrative in the lifetime of Ezra, are among other valid arguments by which the authorship, or rather compilation of 1 and 2 Chronicles and Ezra is vindicated to Ezra. As regards the materials used by him, and the sources of his information, they are not difficult to discover. The genealogies are obviously transcribed from some register, in which were preserved the genealogies of the tribes and families drawn up at different times, from the time of David to the time of Ezra (compare 1 Chr. vi. 33 ff. with iii. 19-24). The same wide divergence in the age of other materials embodied in the books of Chronicles is also apparent. Thus the information in 1 Chr. i., concerning the kings of Edom before the reign of Saul, was obviously compiled from very ancient sources. The same may be said of the incident of the slaughter of the sons of Ephraim by the Gittites (1 Chr. vii. 21, viii. 13), and of the account of the sons of Shelah and their dominion in Moab (iv. 21, 22). The curious details concerning the Reubenites and Gadites in 1 Chr. v. must have been drawn from contemporary documents, embodied probably in the genealogical records of Jotham and Jeroboam, while other records used by the compiler are as late as after the return from Babylon (e. g. 1 Chr. ix. 2 ff.; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 20 ff.); and others (e. g. Ezr. ii., iv. 6-23) are as late as the time of Artaxerxes and Nehemiah. Hence it is further manifest that the books of Chronicles and Ezra, though put into their present form by one hand, contain in fact extracts from the writings of many different writers, which were extant at the time the compilation was made. For the full account of the reign of David, he made copious extracts from the books of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer (1 Chr. xxix. 29). For the reign of Solomon he copied from "the book of Nathan," from "the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite," and from "the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chr. ix. 29). Another work of Iddo called "the story" (margin, "commentary") of the prophet Iddo, supplied an account of the acts, and the ways, and sayings, of King Abijah (xiii. 22): while yet another book of Iddo concerning genealogies, with the book of the prophet Shemaiah, contained the acts of King Rehoboam (xii. 15). For later times the "Book of the kings of Israel and Judah" is repeatedly cited (2 Chr. xxv. 26, xxvii. 7, xxxii. 32, &c.), also "the story" (margin, "commentary") of the book of the Kings" (xxiv. 27), and "the sayings of the seers" (margin, "Hosai," &c.) xxxiii. 19; for the reign of Jehoshaphat "the book of Jehu the son of Hanani" (xx. 34), and for the reigns of Uzziah and Hezekiah "the vision of the prophet Isaiah" (xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32). Besides the above-named works, there was also the public national record mentioned in Neh. xii. 23. The "Chronicles of David" (1 Chr. xxvii. 24), are probably the same as those written by Samuel, Nathan, and Gad (xxix. 29). From this time the affairs of each king's reign were regularly recorded in a book (1 K. xiv. 29, xv. 7, &c.); and it was doubtless from this common source that the passages in the Books of SAMUEL and KINGS identical with the Books of Chronicles were derived. Most, if not all, of the alleged discrepancies in regard to the facts and numbers may be satisfactorily explained. (ABIJAH 1; AHAZIAH 2; ARAUNAH; ASA; CENSUS; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF, &c.) As regards 2 Chr. xxxvi. 8 ff., and Ezr. i., a comparison of them with 2 K. xxiv., xxv., will lead to the conclusion that while the writer of the narrative in Kings lived in Judah, and died under the dynasty of Nebuchadnezzar, the writer of the chapter in Chronicles lived at Babylon, and survived till the commencement at least of the Persian dynasty. Moreover, he seems to speak as one who had long been a subject of Nebuchadnezzar, calling him simply "King Nebuchadnezzar." Lord A. C. Hervey supposes it highly probable that as Jeremiah wrote the closing portion of the Book of Kings, so did Daniel write the corresponding portion in Chronicles, and down to the end of Ezr. i. As regards the language of these books, as of Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, and the later prophets, it has a marked Chaldean coloring, and Gesenius says of them, that "as literary works, they are decidedly inferior to those of older date" (Introd. to Heb. Grammar). The books of Chronicles have always had their place in the O. T. (BIBLE, III. 3; CANON.) Though not expressly quoted in the N. T., they are supposed to be alluded to, e. g. in Heb. v. 4 (compare 1 Chr. xxiii. 13), Lk. i. 5 (compare 1 Chr. xxiv. 10), Mat. xxiii. 35 and Lk. xi. 51 (compare 2 Chr. xxiv. 20, 21).

Chro-nol-o-gy [kro-nol-o'je] (fr. Gr. = computation of time, L. & S.). The object of this article (originally by Mr. R. S. Poole) is to indicate the present state of biblical chronology, i. e. of the technical and historical chronology of the Jews and their ancestors from the earliest time to the close of the N. T. Canon. —I. Technical Chronology, comprehending the mode of reckoning time and the terms used to denote divisions of time.—The technical part of Hebrew Chronology presents great difficulties. The biblical information is almost wholly inferential. (INSPIRATION.) We must not expect among the patriarchs and Israelites either the accuracy of modern science or the inaccuracy of modern ignorance. The Arabs of the desert afford the best parallel. (ASTRONOMY.) Many of the genealogies given in the Bible are broken without being in consequence technically defective as Hebrew genealogies (Mat. i. 8; Ezr. vii. 1-5; 1 Chr. xxvi. 24; 1 K. xix. 16; 2 K. ix. 20, compare 2, 14, &c.; see GENEALOGY). There is no use of the GENERATION as a division of time in the Pentateuch, unless in Gen. xv. 16, where, however, the meaning most probably is that some of the fourth generation should come forth from Egypt. There is no evidence that the ancient Hebrews had any division smaller than an hour.—HOUR.—The "hour" is mentioned in Dan. iii. 6, 15, iv. 19, 33, v. 5, but in no one of these cases is a definite period of time clearly intended by the word employed. The Egyptians divided the day and night into hours like ourselves from at least B. C. about 1200. It is therefore not improbable that the Israelites were acquainted with the hour from an early period. The "DIAL of Ahaz" implies a division of the kind. In the N. T. we find the same system as the modern, the hours being reckoned from the beginning of the Jewish night and day.—DAY.—For the civil day of twenty-four hours we find in one place (Dan. viii. 14, margin) the term "evening-morning" (also in 2 Cor. xi. 25, A. V. "a night and a day;" compare Jon. i. 17; Mat. xii. 40). The civil day was divided into NIGHT and natural day, the periods of darkness and light (Gen. i. 5). The night, and therefore the civil day, is generally held to have begun at sunset (Lev. xxiii. 32). "Between the two evenings" (margin of Ex. xii. 6; Num. ix. 3, xxviii. 4) is a natural division between the late afternoon when the sun is low, and the evening when his light has not wholly disappeared, the two evenings into which the natural evening would be cut by the commencement of the civil day if it began at sunset. The natural day probably was held to commence at sunrise, morning-twilight being included in the last watch of the night, according to the old as well as the later division; some, however, made the morning-watch part of the day. Four natural periods, smaller than the civil day, are mentioned. These are "evening," and "morning," "noon" (or "mid-day"), and "midnight." All these seem to designate periods, evening and morning being, however, much longer than noon and midnight. The night was divided into watches, three in the O. T.; four in the N. T. (WATCHES OF NIGHT).—WEEK.—The Hebrew week was a period of seven days ending with the SABBATH; therefore it could not have been a division of the month, which was lunar, without intercalation. The week, whether a period of seven days, or a quarter of the month, was of common use in antiquity. The Egyptians, however, were without it, dividing their month of thirty days into decades as did the Athenians.—MONTH.—The months by which the time is measured in the account of the Flood seem to be of thirty days each, probably forming a year of three hundred and sixty days, for the first, second, seventh, and tenth months are mentioned (Gen. viii. 13, vii. 11, viii. 14, 4, 5). The months from the giving of the Law until the time of the Second Temple, were lunar. Their average length would of course be a lunation, or a little (44') above twenty-nine and a half days, and therefore they would in general be alternately of twenty-nine and thirty days, but it is possible that occasionally months might occur of twenty-eight and thirty-one days, if, as is highly probable, the commencement of each was strictly determined by observation. The first day of the month is called "NEW MOON."—YEAR.—It has been supposed, as already mentioned, that in Noah's time there was a year of three hundred and sixty days. The dates in the narrative of the Flood might indeed be explained in accordance with a year of three hundred and sixty-five days. The evidence of the prophetic Scriptures is however conclusive as to the knowledge of a year of the former length. There can be no doubt that the year instituted at the Exodus was essentially tropical (i. e. averaging nearly three hundred and sixty-five and a quarter days, the period of the sun's passing from one tropic or equinox to the same again), since certain observances connected with the produce of the land were fixed to particular days. It is equally clear that the months were lunar, each commencing with a new moon. Probably the nearest new moon about or after the equinox, but not much before, was chosen as the commencement of the year, and a thirteenth month was intercalated or added, whenever the twelfth ended too long before the equinox for the first-fruits of the harvest to be offered in the middle of the month following, and the similar offerings at the times appointed. The later Jews had two beginnings to the year. At the time of the Second Temple the seventh month of the civil reckoning was Abib, the first of the sacred. Hence it has been held that the institution at the time of the Exodus was merely a change of commencement, and not the introduction of a new year; and also that from this time there were the two beginnings. The former opinion is at present purely hypothetical, and has been too much mixed up with the latter, for which, on the contrary, there is some evidence. The strongest point in this evidence is the circumstance that the sabbatical and jubilee years commenced in the seventh month, and doubtless on its first day. It is perfectly clear that this would be the most convenient, if not the necessary, commencement of single years of total cessation from the labors of the field, since each year so commencing would comprise the whole round of these occupations in a regular order from seed-time to harvest, and from harvest to vintage and gathering of fruit. We can therefore come to no other conclusion but that for the purposes of AGRICULTURE the year was held to begin with the seventh month, while the months were still reckoned from the sacred commencement in Abib.—Seasons.—The ancient Hebrews do not appear to have divided their year into fixed seasons. We find mention of the natural seasons, "summer," and "winter," which = the whole year in Ps. lxxiv. 17; Zech. xiv. 8; and perhaps Gen. viii. 22. The Hebrew word for the former of these properly = the time of cutting fruits, and the Hebrew word for the latter = the time of gathering fruits; the one referring to the early fruit season, the other to the late one (= autumn, not unfrequently including winter, Ges.). There are two agricultural seasons of a more special character than the preceding in their ordinary use. These are "seed-time" and "harvest." (AGRICULTURE.)—Festivals and Holydays.—(See FASTS; FESTIVALS; JUBILEE, YEAR OF; SABBATICAL YEAR.)—Eras.—There are indications of several historical eras having been used by the ancient Hebrews, but our information is so scanty that we are generally unable to come to positive conclusions.—1. The Exodus (Ex. xii. 41, 51) is used as an era in 1 K. vi. 1, in giving the date of the foundation of Solomon's Temple.—2. The foundation of Solomon's Temple is conjectured by Ideler to have been an era (1 K. ix. 10; 2 Chr. viii. 1).—3. The era once used by Ezekiel (i. 1), and commencing in Josiah's eighteenth year, was most probably connected with the sabbatical system (2 K. xxiii. 22; 2 Chr. xxxv. 18, xxxiv. 30; comp. Deut. xxi. 10-13).—4. The era of Jehoiachin's captivity is constantly used by Ezekiel. The earliest date is the fifth year (i. 2), and the latest, the twenty-seventh (xxix. 17). The prophet generally gives the date without applying any distinctive term to the era. We have no proof that it was used except by those to whose captivity it referred. Its first year was current a. c. 596, commencing in the spring of that year.—5. The beginning of the seventy years' Captivity does not appear to have been used as an era.—6. The return from Babylon does not appear to be employed as an era; it is, however, reckoned from in Ezra iii. 1, 8, as is the Exodus in the Pentateuch.—7. The era of the Seleucidæ (b. c. 312) is used in 1 and 2 Maccabees. (MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.)—8. The liberation of the Jews from the Syrian yoke in the first year of Simon the Maccabee is stated to have been commemorated by an era used in contracts and agreements (1 Mc. xiii. 41; MACCABEES).—Regnal Years.—By the Hebrews regnal years appear to have been counted from the beginning of the year, not from the day of the king's accession. Thus, if a king came to the throne in the last month of a year, reigned for the whole of the next year, and died in the first month of the third year, we might have dates in his first, second, and third years, although he governed for no more than thirteen or fourteen months.—II. Historical Chronology.—The historical part of Hebrew Chronology is not less difficult than the technical. The information in the Bible is indeed direct rather than inferential, although there is very important evidence of the latter kind, but the present state of the numbers makes absolute certainty in many cases impossible. (ABIJAH 1; CENSUS.) The frequent occurrence of round numbers is a matter of minor importance, for, although when we have no other evidence, it manifestly precludes our arriving at positive accuracy, the variation of a few years is not to be balanced against great differences apparently not to be positively resolved, as those of the primeval numbers in the Hebrew, LXX., and Samaritan Pentateuch.—Biblical data.—It will be best to examine the biblical information under the main periods into which it may be separated, beginning with the earliest. (A.) First Period, from Adam to Abram's departure from Haran.—All the numerical data in the Bible for the chronology of this interval are comprised in two genealogical lists in Genesis, the first from Adam to Noah and his sons (Gen. v. 3-32), and the second from Shem to Abram (xi. 10-26), and in certain passages in the same book (vii. 6, 11, viii. 12, ix. 28, 29, xi. 32, xii. 4). The Masoretic Hebrew text, the LXX., and the Samaritan Pentateuch greatly differ, as may be seen by the following table.

	Age of each when the next was born.			Years of each after the next was born.			Total length of the life of each.

The parentheses indicate numbers not stated, but obtained by computation from others. The dots indicate numbers agreeing with the LXX. The two numbers for Methuselah and Nahor are given by different readings of the LXX. The number of generations in the LXX. is one in excess of the Hebrew and Samaritan on account of the "Second CAINAN," whom the best chronologists are agreed in rejecting as spurious. The variations are the result of design, not accident, as is evident from the years before the birth of a son and the residues agreeing in their sums in almost all cases in the antediluvian generations, the exceptions, save one, being apparently the result of necessity that lives should not overlap the date of the Flood. We have no clew to the date or dates of the alterations beyond that we can trace the LXX. form to the first century of the Christian era, if not higher, and the Hebrew to the fourth century: if the Samaritan numbers be as old as the text, we can assign them a higher antiquity than what is known as to the Hebrew. The cause of the alterations is most uncertain. It has indeed been conjectured that the Jews shortened the chronology in order that an ancient prophecy that the Messiah should come in the sixth millenary of the world's age might not be known to be fulfilled in the advent of our Lord. The reason may be sufficient in itself, but it does not rest upon sufficient evidence. The different proportions of the generation and lives in the LXX. and Hebrew have been asserted to afford an argument in favor of the former. But a stronger is found in the long period required from the Flood to the Dispersion and the establishment of kingdoms. With respect to probability of accuracy arising from the state of the text, the Hebrew certainly has the advantage. If, however, we consider the Samaritan form of the lists as sprung from the other two, the LXX. would seem (so Mr. Poole) to be earlier than the Hebrew, since it is more probable that the antediluvian generations would have been shortened to a general agreement with the Hebrew, than that the postdiluvian would have been lengthened to suit the LXX.; for it is obviously most likely that a sufficient number of years having been deducted from the earlier generations, the operation was not carried on with the later. Mr. Poole is inclined to prefer the LXX. numbers after the Deluge, and, as consistent with them, and probably of the same authority, those before the Deluge also. (But see below the Principal Systems of Biblical Chronology; also, ALEXANDRIA; SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH; SEPTUAGINT.) It remains for us to ascertain what appears to be the best form of each of the three versions, and to state the intervals thus obtained. In the LXX. antediluvian generations, that of Methuselah is 187 or 167 years: the former seems to be undoubtedly the true number, since the latter would make this patriarch, if the subsequent generations be correct, to survive the Flood fourteen years. In the postdiluvian numbers of the LXX. we must reject the second Cainan. Of the two forms of Nahor's generation in the LXX. we must prefer 79, as more consistent with the numbers near it, and as also found in the Samaritan. In the case of Terah (see ABRAHAM), Mr. Poole supposes the number might have been changed by a copyist, and takes the 145 years of the Samaritan.—It has been generally supposed that the Dispersion took place in the days of Peleg, on account of what is said in Gen. x. 25. The event, whatever it was, must have happened at Peleg's birth, rather than, as some have supposed, at a later time in his life. Mr. Poole therefore considers the following as the best forms of the numbers according to the three sources.

	LXX.	Heb.	Sam.

(B.) Second Period, from Abram's departure from Haran to the Exodus.—The length of this period is stated by St. Paul as 430 years from the promise to Abraham to the giving of the Law (Gal. iii. 17), the first event being held to be that recorded in Gen. xii. 1-5. The same number of years is given in Ex. xii.

40, 41. A third passage, occurring in the same essential form in both Testaments, and therefore especially satisfactory as to its textual accuracy, is the divine declaration to Abraham of the future history of his children:—"Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land [that is] not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance" (Gen. xv. 13, 14; compare Acts vii. 6, 7). The four hundred years cannot be held to be the period of oppression without a denial of the historical character of the narrative of that time, but can only be supposed to mean the time from this declaration to the Exodus. This reading, which in the A. V. requires no more than a slight change in the punctuation, if it suppose an unusual construction in Hebrew, is perfectly admissible according to the principles of Shemitic grammar, and might be used in Arabic. We find no difficulty in accepting the statements as to the longevity of Abraham and certain of his descendants (see PATRIARCH; also under Technical Chronology), and can go on to examine the details of the period under consideration as made out from evidence requiring this admission. The narrative affords the following data which we place under two periods—(1.) that from Abram's leaving Haran to Jacob's entering Egypt, and (2.) that from Jacob's entering Egypt to the Exodus.

(1.) Age of Abraham on leaving Haran.....	75 years
" " at Isaac's birth.....	100
Age of Isaac at Jacob's birth.....	60
Age of Jacob on entering Egypt.....	130
	216 or 215 years.
(2.) Age of Levi on entering Egypt.....	about 45

Age of Moses at Exodus.....	80

These data make up about 387 or 388 years, to which it is reasonable to make some addition, since it appears that all Joseph's generation died before the oppression commenced, and it is probable that it had begun some time before the birth of Moses. The sum we thus obtain cannot be far different from 430 years, a period for the whole sojourn that these data must thus be held to confirm. The genealogies relating to the time of the dwelling in Egypt, if continuous, which there is much reason to suppose some to be, are not repugnant to this scheme; but one alone of them, that of Joshua in 1 Chr. (vii. 23, 25-27), if a successio, can be reconciled with dating the 430 years from Jacob's entrance into Egypt. The historical evidence should be carefully weighed. Its chief point is the increase of the Israelites from the few who went with Jacob into Egypt, and Joseph and his sons, to the 600,000 men who came out at the Exodus. (CRXSUS.) At the former date are enumerated—"besides Jacob's sons' wives"—Jacob, his 12 sons and 1 daughter, 61 grandsons and 1 grand-daughter, and 4 great-grandsons, making 70 souls (Gen. xlii. 8-27). The generation to which children would be born about this time was thus of at least fifty-one pairs, since all are males except one, who most probably married a cousin. This computation takes no account of polygamy, which was certainly practised at the time by the Hebrews. This first generation must, unless there were at the time other grand-daughters of Jacob besides the one mentioned (compare verse 7), have taken foreign wives, and it is reasonable to suppose the same to have been constantly done afterward, though probably in a less degree (compare Lev. xxiv. 10). Bond-servants and children born from them in the house were adopted into the number of their own people (1 Chr. ii. 34, 35; compare Gen. xiv. 14, xv. 3, xvii. 27, xxx. 43, xlvii. 1); other foreigners may have been proselyted (see CALEB 1); early marriages probably prevailed (compare xxxviii. 14); and longevity aided to swell the population (xlvii. 28, l. 22; Ex. vi. 16, 18, 20, &c.; see AMRAM 1; GENEALOGY; GENERATION). It has been calculated that the Israelites in Egypt must have doubled on an average once in fifteen and a half years; but in view of the foregoing statements, of the ascertained rate of increase in several modern nations (the United States double every 20 or 23 years; and in some parts this rate is much exceeded), and of the especial blessing which attended the people, the interval of about 215 years does not seem too short for the increase. "Whatever may be the issue of the diversity between leading Egyptologists, certain it is that the chronology of Egypt is not yet adjusted to a scale so fixed that it is worth while to try to conform to it the elements of biblical chronology scattered through the O. T." (J. P. Thompson, D. D., in B. S. xiv. 652).—(C.) Third Period, from the Exodus to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple.—There is but one passage from which we obtain the length of this period as a whole. It is that in which the Foundation of the Temple is dated in the 480th (Heb.), or 440th (LXX.) year after the Exodus, in the 4th year and 2d month of Solomon's reign (1 K. vi. 1). Subtracting from 480 or 440 years the first three years of Solomon and the forty of David, we obtain  $(480 - 43 =) 437$  or  $(440 - 43 =) 397$  years. These results we have first to compare with the detached numbers. These are—(1.) From Exodus to death of Moses, 40 years. (2.) Leadership of Joshua,  $7 + z$  years. (3.) Interval between Joshua's death and the First Servitude,  $z$  years. (4.) Servitudes and rule of Judges until Eli's death, 430 years. (5.) Period from Eli's death to Saul's accession,  $20 + z$  years. (6.) Saul's reign, 40 years. (7.) David's reign, 40 years. (8.) Solomon's reign to Foundation of Temple, 3 years. Sum,  $3z + 580$  years. It is possible to obtain approximately the length of the three wanting numbers. Joshua's age at the Exodus was 20 or  $20 + z$  years (Num. xiv. 29, 30), and at his death, 110: therefore the utmost length of his rule must be  $(110 - 20 - 40 =) 50$  years. After Joshua there is the time of the Elders who overlived him, then a period of disobedience and idolatry, a servitude of 8 years, deliverance by Othniel the son of Kenaz, and rest for 40 years until Othniel's death. The duration of Joshua's government is limited by the circumstance that Caleb's lot was apportioned to him in the seventh year of the occupation, and therefore of Joshua's rule, when he was 85 years old, and that he conquered the lot after Joshua's death (Josh. xiv. 6-15; xv. 13-19; Judg. i. 9-15, 20). If we suppose that Caleb set out to conquer his lot about 7 years after its apportionment, then Joshua's rule would be about 13 years, and he would have been a little (about 18 years) older than Caleb. The interval between Joshua's death and the First Servitude is limited by the history of Othniel. He was already a warrior when Caleb conquered his lot; he lived to deliver Israel from the Mesopotamian oppressor, and died at the end of the subsequent 40 years of rest. Supposing Othniel to have been 30 years old when Caleb set out, and 110 years at his death, 32 years would remain for the interval in question (Judg. iii. 8-11). The rule of Joshua may be therefore reckoned to have been about 13 years, and the subsequent interval to the First Servitude about 32 years, altogether 47 (45) years. These numbers cannot be considered exact; but they can hardly be far wrong, more especially the sum. The residue of Samuel's judgeship after the 20 years from Eli's death until the solemn fast and victory at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii. 2), can scarcely have much exceeded 20 years. Samuel must have been still young at the time of Eli's death, and he died very near the close of Saul's reign (xxv. 1, xxviii. 3). If he were ten years old at the former date, and judged for 20 years after the victory at Mizpeh, he would have been near 90 years old ( $10 + 20 + 20 + 38 =$ ) at his death, which appears to have been a long period of life at that time. If we thus suppose the three uncertain intervals, the residue of Joshua's rule, the time after his death to the First Servitude, and Samuel's rule after the victory at Mizpeh to have been respectively 6, 32, and 20 years, the sum of the whole period, according to Mr. Poole, will be  $(580 + 58 =) 638$  years. (Compare Acts xiii. 19-21; Judg. xi. 26; also, Principal Systems of Biblical Chronology, below; JUDGES, BOOK OF, VII.; KINGS, 1ST AND 2D BOOKS OF, I.—(D.) Fourth Period, from the Foundation of Solomon's Temple to its Destruction.—The dates of this period can be more easily ascertained. With the exception of two supposed interregnums, one of 11 years between Jeroboam II. and Zachariah, and the other of 9 years between Pekah and Hoshea, for which in both cases he would suppose a longer reign of the earlier of the two kings between whom the interregnums are conjectured, Mr. Poole accepts the computation of the period given in the margin of the A. V. He also corrects (see below) the date of the conclusion of this period, there given B. C. 588 to 586, and estimates the whole period to be of about 425 years, that of the undivided kingdom 120 years, that of the kingdom of Judah about 388 years, and that of the kingdom of Israel about 255 years. (See ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF, and JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; also, Probable determination of Dates, below).—(E.) Fifth Period, from the Destruction of Solomon's Temple to the Return from the Babylonish Captivity.—The determination of the length of this period depends upon the date of the return to Palestine. The decree of CYRUS leading to that event was made in the first year of his reign, doubtless at Babylon (Ezr. i. 1), B. C. 538, but it does not seem certain that the Jews at once returned. (BABEL; EZRA, BOOK OF.) Two numbers, held by some to be identical, must here be considered. One is the period of 70 years, during which the tyranny of Babylon over Palestine and the East generally was to last, prophesied by Jeremiah (xxv.), and the other, the 70 years' Captivity (xxix. 10; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 21; Dan. ix. 2). The commencement of the former period is plainly the first year of Nebuchadnezzar and fourth of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxv. 1), when the successes of the king of Babylon began (xvi. 2), and the miseries of Jerusalem (xxv. 29), and the conclusion, the fall of Babylon (12). The famous seventy years of CAPTIVITY would seem to be the same period as this, since it was to terminate with the return of the captives (xxix. 10). This period we consider to be of  $48 + z$  years, the doubtful number being the time of the reign of Cyrus before the return to Jerusalem, probably about two or three years. (For the subsequent chronology, see Ahasuerus; Annas 2; Artaxerxes; Babel; Belshazzar; Caiaphas; Cyrenius; Daniel; Darius; Evil-Merodach; Herod; High-Priest; James; Jerusalem; Jesus Christ; John the Apostle; Maccabees; Nehemiah; Paul; Persians; Peter; Roman Empire; Star of the Wise Men, &c.)—Principal Systems of Biblical Chronology.

—Upon the data we have considered three principal systems of Biblical Chronology have been founded, which may be termed the Long System, the Short, and the Rabbinical. There is a fourth, which, although an offshoot in part of the last, can scarcely be termed biblical, inasmuch as it depends for the most part upon theories, not only independent of, but repugnant to the Bible: this last is at present peculiar to Baron Bunsen. The principal advocates of the Long Chronology are Jackson, Hales, and Des-Vignoles. They take the LXX. for the patriarchal generations, and adopt the long interval from the Exodus to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple. The Short Chronology, from Jerome's time the recognized system of the West, has had a multitude of illustrious supporters (Usher, Newton, Petavius, Michaelis, Gesenius, Stuart, Clinton, &c.), and is adopted in the margin of the A. V. Usher may be considered as its most able advocate. He follows the Hebrew in the patriarchal generations, and takes the 480 years from the Exodus to the Foundation of Solomon's Temple. The Rabbinical Chronology, partially received, chiefly by the German school, accepts the biblical numbers, but makes the most arbitrary corrections. For the date of the Exodus it has been virtually accepted by Bunsen, Lepsius, and Lord A. C. Hervey.

The principal disagreements of these chronologers, besides those already indicated, must be noticed. In the post-diluvian period Hales rejects the Second Cainan and reckons Terah's age at Abram's birth 180 instead of 70 years; Jackson accepts the Second Cainan and does not make any change in the second case; Usher and Petavius follow the Hebrew, but the former alters the generation of Terah, while the latter does not. The period of the kings, from the Foundation of Solomon's Temple, is very nearly the same in the computations of Jackson, Usher, and Petavius: Hales lengthens it by supposing an interregnum of 11 years after the death of Amaziah; Bunsen shortens it by reducing the reign of Manasseh from 55 to 45 years.—Probable determination of dates and intervals (by Mr. Poole).—Having thus gone over the biblical data, it only remains for us to state what we believe to be the most satisfactory scheme of chronology, derived from a comparison of these with foreign data, principally Egyptian and Assyrian.—(1.) Date of the Destruction of Solomon's Temple.—The Temple was destroyed in the 19th year of Nebuchadnezzar, in the 5th month of the Jewish year (Jer. lii. 12, 13; 2 K. xxv. 8, 9). In Ptolemy's Canon this year is current in the proleptic (i. e. reckoned by anticipation) Julian year, B. C. 586, and the 5th month may be considered as about = August of that year.—(2.) Synchronism of Josiah and Pharaoh Necho.—The death of Josiah can be clearly shown on biblical evidence (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF) to have taken place in the 22d year before that in which the Temple was destroyed, i. e. in the Jewish year from the spring of B. C. 608 to the spring of 607. P. Necho's 1st year is proved by the Apistabets to have been most probably the Egyptian vague year, Jan. B. C. 609–8, but possibly 610–9. (EGYPT.) The expedition in opposing which Josiah fell cannot be reasonably dated earlier than P. Necho's 2d year, B. C. 609–8 or 608–7. We have thus B. C. 608–7 for the last year of Josiah, and 638–7 for that of his accession, the former date falling within the time indicated by the chronology of P. Necho's reign.—(3.) Synchronism of Hezekiah and Tirhakah.—Tirhakah is mentioned as an opponent of SENNACHERIB shortly before the miraculous destruction of his army in the 14th year of Hezekiah. It has been lately proved from the Apistabets that the first year of Tirhakah's reign over Egypt was the vague year current in B. C. 689. The 14th year of Hezekiah, according to the received chronology, is B. C. 713, or, if we correct it two years on account of the lowering of the date of the destruction of the Temple, B. C. 711. If we hold that the expedition dated in Hezekiah's 14th year was different from that which ended in the destruction of the Assyrian army, we must still place the latter event before B. C. 695. There is, therefore, at first sight a discrepancy of at least six years. But most probably at the time of Sennacherib's disastrous expedition, Tirhakah was king of Ethiopia in alliance with the king or kings of Egypt, and afterward assumed the crown of Egypt. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.)—(4.) Synchronism of Rehoboam and Shishak.—Rehoboam appears to have come to the throne about 249 years before the accession of Hezekiah, and therefore about B. C. 973. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) The invasion of Shishak took place in his 5th year (1 K. xiv. 25), by this computation, B. C. 969. He appears to have come to the throne at least 21 or 22 years before his expedition against Rehoboam (1 K. iii. 1, ix. 24, xi. 26–40, &c.). An inscription at the quarries of Silsilis in Upper Egypt records the cutting of stone in the 22d year of Sheshonk I., or Shishak, for constructions in the chief temple of Thebes, where we now find a record of his conquest of Judah. On these grounds we may place the accession of Shishak B. C. about 990.—(5.) Exodus.—Arguments founded on independent evidence afford the best means of deciding which is the most probable computation from biblical evidence of the date of the Exodus. A comparison of the Hebrew calendar with the Egyptian (EGYPT) has led Mr. Poole to the following result:—The civil commencement of the Hebrew year was with the new-moon nearest to the autumnal equinox; and at the approximative date of the Exodus obtained by the long reckoning, we find that the Egyptian vague year commenced at or about that point of time. This approximative date, therefore, falls about the time at which the vague year and the Hebrew year, as dated from the autumnal equinox, nearly or exactly coincided in their commencements. It may be reasonably supposed that the Israelites in the time of the oppression had made use of the vague year as the common year of the country, which indeed is rendered highly probable by the circumstance that they had mostly adopted the Egyptian religion (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ez. xx. 7, 8), the celebrations of which were kept according to this year. When, therefore, the festivals of the Law rendered a year virtually tropical necessary, of the kind either restored or instituted at the Exodus, it seems most probable that the current vague year was fixed under Moses. If this supposition be correct, we should expect to find that the 14th day of Abib, on which fell the full-moon of the Passover of the Exodus, corresponded to the 14th day of a Phamenoth, in a vague year commencing about the autumnal equinox. It has been ascertained by computation that a full-moon fell on the 14th day of Phamenoth, on Thursday, April 21st, B. C. 1652. A full-moon would not fall on the same day of the vague year at a shorter interval than 25 years before or after this date, while the triple coincidence of the new-moon, vague year, and autumnal equinox could not recur in less than 1500 vague years. The date thus obtained is but four years earlier than Hales's, and the interval from it to that of the Foundation of Solomon's Temple, B. C. about 1010, would be about 642 years, or four years in excess of that previously obtained from the numerical statements in the Bible. We therefore take B. C. 1652 as the most satisfactory date of the Exodus.—(6.) Date of the Commencement of the 430 years of Sojourn.—Mr. Poole holds that the 430 years of Sojourn [see above, under Biblical data (B.)] commenced when Abraham entered Palestine, and that the interval was of 430 complete years, or a little more, commencing about the time of the vernal equinox, B. C. 2082, or nearer the beginning of that proleptic Julian year.—(7.) Date of the Dispersion.—Taking the LXX. numbers as most probable, Mr. Poole places the Dispersion, if coincident with Peleg's birth [see above, Biblical data (A.)], B. C. about 2698, or, if we accept Usher's correction of Terah's age at the birth of Abraham, about 2758.—(8.) Date of the Flood.—The Flood, as ending about 401 years before the birth of Peleg, would be placed B. C. about 3099 or 3159 (see above). The year preceding, or the 402d, was that mainly occupied by the catastrophe. It is most reasonable to suppose that the Noachian colonists began to spread about 800 years after the Flood. As far as we can learn, no independent historical evidence points to an earlier period than the middle of the 28th century B. C. as the time of the foundation of kingdoms, although the chronology of Egypt reaches to about this period, while that of Babylon (BABEL) and other states does not greatly fall short of the same antiquity.—(9.) Date of the Creation of Adam.—The numbers given by the LXX. for the antediluvian patriarchs (see above) would place the creation of Adam 2262 years before the end of the Flood, or B. C. about 5361 or 5421.

Chrys-o-lite [kris-] (fr. Gr. = golden stone), one of the precious stones in the foundation of the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). It also occurs in Ez. xxviii. 19, margin. It has been already stated (BERRY) that the chrysolite of the ancients = the modern Oriental topaz. The chrysolite in modern mineralogy is a mineral, massive or crystallized, of various shades of green, composed of silica, magnesia, and iron.

Chrys-o-prase [kris'o-praze] (fr. Gr. = golden lock) occurs twice in the margin of A. V. in Ezekiel; viz. in xxvii. 16, Heb. cadcdâ, text of A. V. "AGATE," and in xxviii. 18, Heb. nôphêc, text of A. V. "EMERALD." CHRYSOPRASUS.

* Chry-sop'ra-sus [kre-] (L. fr. Gr. = CHRYSOPRASE) occurs only in Rev. xxi. 20, as the tenth of the precious stones in the walls of the heavenly Jerusalem. Some suppose the ancient chrysoprasus = the modern chrysoprase, viz. the apple or leek-green variety of agate; but Mr. King (Nat. Hist., Anc. and Mod., of Precious Stones, &c., 130, 163) considers Pliny's chrysoprasus as a paler variety of our Indian CHRYSOLITE, and says that antique works do not occur in our chrysoprase, though intagli are known upon a mineral much resembling it, but more of a bluish cast, probably the cerulean jasper, which is also said to be sometimes found in antique Egyptian jewelry set alternately with bits of lapis-lazuli.

Chub [kub] (Heb.), the name of a people in alliance with Egypt in the time of Nebuchadnezzar (Ez. xxx. 5), and probably of northern Africa, or of the lands near Egypt to the S. Some have proposed to recognize Chub in the names of various African places, e. g. Kobe, a port on the Indian Ocean; Kolion, in the Mareotic nome in Egypt, &c. Others, however, think the present Hebrew text corrupt in this word. It has been therefore proposed to read Nûb for Nubia, as the Arabic version has "the people the Noobeh." Far better, on the score of probability, is the emendation which Hitzig proposes, Lûb = the LUBIM. In the absence of better evidence we prefer the reading of the present Hebrew text.

Chun [kun] (Heb. fr. a verb denoting to stand upright, to set up, Ges.), a city of Hadadezer (1 Chr. xviii. 8), called BEROthAI in 2 Sam. viii. 8.

Church (usually derived, with the Scottish kirk, Ger. kirche, and similar words in the Teutonic and Slavonian languages, from the Gr. kuriakon, which literally = pertaining to the Lord; but by Mr. Meyrick, after Lipsius, connected with the L. circus, circulus, the Gr. kuklos, each literally = a circle), the A. V. translation throughout the N. T. (except in Acts xix. 32, 39, 41; see ASSEMBLY 9) of the Gr. ekklēsia, Latin form ecclesia (originally and in classical use = an assembly called out by the magistrate, or by legitimate authority). Ekklēsia, of which the Latin form is ecclesia, in the LXX. = the Heb. kāhāl (see ASSEMBLY 7). The Gr. hierosoulos (= robber of temples, L. & S.) is translated in the plural (Acts xix. 37) "robbers of churches," and in the singular (2 Mc. iv. 42) "church-robber;" but elsewhere "church" occurs only as the translation of the Gr. ekklēsia. "Church" in Acts vii. 88; Heb. ii. 12, like "congregation" in Ps. xxii. 22; Deut. xxxi. 30 (Heb. kāhāl in both of these, also Gr. ekklēsia in the LXX.) = the whole assembly or congregation of the Israelitish people. The word occurs only twice in the Gospels (Mat. xvi. 18, "On this rock will I build my church" [PETER]; xviii. 17, "Tell it unto the church" [EXCOMMUNICATION]), but frequently in the Acts, Epistles, and Revelation, and denotes (1.) a particular church, i. e. a local Christian congregation or company of believers (Acts viii. 1, xi. 22, 26; Rom. xvi. 1, 4, 5; Gal. i. 2; Rev. i. 4, 11, 20, &c.); (2.) the church universal, i. e. the whole body of believers or Christians (Mat. xvi. 18; Eph. i. 22, iii. 10; Heb. xii. 23, &c.).—The following definitions are selected from different sources. The Greek Church teaches: "The church is a divinely instituted community of men, united by the orthodox faith, the law of God, the hierarchy, and the sacraments" (Catechism, Moscow, 1839). The Roman Catholic Bellarmine defines it: "The company of Christians knit together by the profession of the same faith and the communion of the same sacraments, under the government of lawful pastors, and especially of the Roman bishop as the only Vicar of Christ upon earth." The Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America declare: "The visible church of Christ is a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached, and the sacraments be duly ministered according to Christ's ordinance, in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same" (Art. xix.). The Lutheran Church defines: "A congregation of saints, in which the Gospel is rightly taught and the sacraments rightly administered" (Confessio Augustana, 1631, Art. vii.). The Presbyterian Church in the United States of America defines: "The universal church consists of all those persons, in every nation, together with their children, who make profession of the holy religion of Christ, and of submission to His laws. . . . A particular church consists of a number of professing Christians, with their offspring, voluntarily associating together, for divine worship, and godly living, agreeably to the holy Scriptures; and submitting to a certain form of government" (Form of Government, ii. §§ 2, 4). The Epitome of Church Government and Fellowship which received "a general approval" of the National Congregational Council, held at Boston, 1865, declares: "For government there is no one visible, universal church; nor are there national, provincial, diocesan, or classical churches, but only local churches or congregations of believers, and responsible directly to the Lord Jesus Christ, the one Head of the church universal and of every particular church. . . . A church is a society of professed believers, united by a covenant express or implied, whereby all its members agree with the Lord and with each other to observe all the ordinances of Christ, especially in united worship and in mutual watchfulness and helpfulness." Chushan-rish-a-tha'im [ku-] (Heb. CUSHAN of twofold wickedness, i. e. the horrible (so Targums, &c.); president of two governments, Fii.), the king of MESOPOTAMIA who oppressed Israel during eight years in the generation immediately following Joshua (Judg. iii. 8 ff.). The seat of his dominion was probably the region between the Euphrates and the Khabour. Chushan-Rishathaim's yoke was broken from the neck of the people of Israel by OTHNIEL, and nothing more is heard of Mesopotamia as an aggressive power. The rise of the Assyrian empire, about B. C. 1270, would naturally reduce the bordering nations to insignificance.

Chu'si [ku-] (fr. Gr.), a place named only in Jd. vii. 18, as near EKREBEL, and upon the brook MOCHMUR.

Chu'za [ku-] (Gr. Chouzas, from Aram. = seer?), properly CHUZAS, the house-steward of Herod Antipas, husband of the JOANNA healed by our Lord (Lk. viii. 3).

Cilic'ia [se-lish'e-a] (L. fr. Gr.; named from the Phœnician Ciliz, brother of Cadmus, Hdt.; from a Phœnician word for stone, Boch.), a maritime province in the S. E. of Asia Minor, bordering on Pamphylia in the W., Lycaonia and Cappadocia in the N., and Syria in the E. Lofty mountain chains, with only a few difficult passes or "gates," separate it from these provinces, Mount Amanus from Syria, and Taurus from Cappadocia. The western portion of the province is intersected with the ridges of Taurus and was denominated Trachæa (fr. Gr. = rough), in contradistinction to Pœdia (Gr. level) in the E. The connection between the Jews and Cilicia dates from the time when it became part of the Syrian kingdom. (ANTIOCHUS III.) In the apostolic age they were still there in considerable numbers (Acts vi. 9). Cilicia was from its geographical position the high-road between Syria and the West; it was also the native country of St. Paul (TARSUS); hence it was visited by him, soon after his conversion (Gal. i. 21; Acts ix. 30); and again in his second apostolical journey, when he entered it on the side of Syria, and crossed Taurus by the "Cilician Gates" into Lycaonia (Acts xv. 41). Cilicia became a Roman province after the defeat of the Cilician pirates by Pompey B. C. 67, and Cicero was once proconsul of Cilicia; but western or "rough" Cilicia appears to have been governed by its own kings till the time of Vespasian.

Cin'na-mon [sin-] (Heb. kinnamôn; Gr. kinnamon, kinnamônon; fr. Phœnician = cane or tube, from the form of its rolls, Hdt.), a well-known aromatic substance, the rind of the Laurus Cinnamomum, or Cinnamomum Zeylanicum, a small tree of the laurel family, found in Ceylon. It is mentioned in Ex. xxx. 23 as one of the component parts of the holy anointing oil, which Moses was commanded to prepare; in Prov. vii. 17 as a perfume for the bed; and in Cant. iv. 14 as one of the plants of the garden which is the image of the spouse. In Rev. xviii. 13 it is enumerated among the merchandise of the great Babylon. It was imported into Judea by the Phœnicians or by the Arabians, and is now found in Sumatra, Borneo, China, &c., but chiefly, and of the best quality, in the S. W. part of Ceylon. CASSIA.

Cin'ne-roth (Heb. pl. = lyres, Ges.), ALL, a district named with the "land of Naphtali" and other northern places as having been laid waste by Benhadad (1 K. xv. 20). It was possibly the small enclosed district N. of Tiberias, and by the side of the lake, afterward known as "the plain of GENNESARET." CHINNEOTH.

Ci-ra'ma (fr. Gr.) (1 Esd. v. 20) = RAMAH in Ezr. ii. 26.

Cir-cum-cis'lon [sur-kum-sizh'un] (fr. L. = a cutting around, especially of the prepuce or foreskin; Heb. mûlâh; Gr. peritomê), was peculiarly, though not exclusively, a Hebrew rite. It was enjoined upon Abraham, the father of the nation, by God, at the institution, and as the token, of the Covenant, which assured to him and his descendants the promise of the Messiah (Gen. xvii.). It was thus made a necessary condition of Hebrew nationality. Every male child was to be circumcised when eight days old (Lev. xii. 3) on pain of death (Gen. xvii. 12-14; Ex. iv. 24-26). If the eighth day were a Sabbath, the rite was not postponed (Jn. vii. 22, 23). Slaves, whether home-born or purchased, were circumcised (Gen. xvii. 12, 13); and foreigners must have their males circumcised before they could be allowed to partake of the passover (Ex. xii. 48), or become Jewish citizens. The operation, performed with a sharp instrument (iv. 25; Josh. v. 2; KNIFE), was painful, at least to grown persons (Gen. xxxiv. 25; Josh. v. 8). It seems to have been customary to name a child when it was circumcised (Lk. i. 59; CHILDREN.) The Israelites were not circumcised in the wilderness, probably as under a temporary rejection by God, and therefore prohibited from using the sign of the Covenant; but "the reproach of Egypt," i. e. the threatened taunt of their former masters that God had brought them into the wilderness to slay them (Ex. xxxii. 12; Num. xiv. 13-16; Deut. ix. 28), which, so long as they remained uncircumcised and wanderers in the desert for their sin, was in danger of falling upon them, was "rolled away" when they were circumcised in GILGAL (Josh. v. 2-9). Circumcision has prevailed extensively both in ancient and modern times; Herodotus, &c., state that the Egyptians (probably only the priests and those initiated into the mysteries) were circumcised; and among some nations, as e. g. the Abyssinians, Nubians, modern Egyptians, and Hottentots, a similar custom is said to be practised by both sexes. The biblical notice of the rite describes it as distinctively Hebrew or Jewish, so that in the N. T. "the circumcision" and "the uncircumcision" frequently = the Jews and the Gentiles. Circumcision certainly belonged to the Hebrews as it did to no other people, by virtue of its divine institution, of the religious privileges attached to it, and of the strict regulations which enforced its observance. Moreover, the O. T. history incidentally discloses the fact that many, if not all, of the nations with whom they came in contact were uncircumcised. The origin of the custom among one large section of those Gentiles who follow it, is to be found in the biblical record of Ishmael (Gen. xvii. 25). Josephus relates that the Arabians circumcise after the thirteenth year, because Ishmael, the founder of their nation, was circumcised at that age. Though Mohammed did not enjoin circumcision in the Koran, he was circumcised himself, according to the custom of his country: and circumcision is now as common among the Mohammedans as among the Jews. The process of restoring a circumcised person to his natural condition by a surgical operation was sometimes undergone. Some of the Jews in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, wishing to assimilate themselves to the heathen around them, built a gymnasium (A. V. "place of exercise") at Jerusalem, and that they might not be known to be Jews when they appeared naked in the games, "made themselves uncircumcised" (1 Mc. i. 15). Against having recourse to this practice, from an excessive anti-Judaistic tendency, St. Paul cautions the Corinthians (1 Cor. vii. 18). The attitude which Christianity, at its introduction, assumed toward circumcision was one of absolute hostility, so far as the necessity of the rite to salvation, or its possession of any religious or moral worth were concerned (Acts xv.; Gal. v. 2). (TIMOTHY; TITUS.) The Abyssinian Christians still practise circumcision as a national custom. An ethical idea is attached to circumcision even in the O. T. (Ex. vi. 12, 30; Jer. vi. 10; Lev. xxvi. 41) as the symbol of purity (see Is. lii. 1). MEDICINE.

Cisal [i-say] (fr. Heb.) = KISH 3 (Esth. xi. 2).

Cistern [sis-] (fr. L.; Heb. bôr), a receptacle for water, either conducted from an external spring, or proceeding from rainfall. The dryness of the summer months between May and September, in Syria, and the scarcity of springs in many parts of the country, make it necessary to collect in reservoirs and cisterns the rain-water, of which abundance falls in the intermediate period. (AGRICULTURE; PALESTINE.) The larger sort of public tanks or reservoirs (Ar. birkeh, Heb. bêrê- côh) are usually called in A. V. "pool," while for the smaller and more private it is convenient to reserve the name "cistern." Both pools and cisterns are frequent throughout the whole of Syria and Palestine. On the long-forgotten way from Jericho to Bethel, "broken cisterns" of high antiquity are found at regular intervals. JERUSALEM, described by Strabo as well supplied with water, in a dry neighborhood, depends mainly for this upon its cisterns, of which almost every private house possesses one or more, excavated in the rock on which the city is built. The cisterns have usually a round opening at the top, sometimes built up with stonework above and furnished with a curb and a wheel for the bucket (Eccl. xii. 6), so that they have externally much the appearance of an ordinary well. The water is conducted into them from the roofs of the houses during the rainy season, and with care remains sweet during the whole summer and autumn. In this manner most of the larger houses and public buildings are supplied. Empty cisterns were sometimes used as prisons and places of confinement. Joseph was cast into a "pit" (Heb. bôr) (Gen. xxxvii. 22), and his "dungeon" in Egypt is called by the same Hebrew name (xli. 14). Jeremiah was thrown into a miry though empty cistern, whose depth is indicated by the cords used to let him down (Jer. xxxviii. 6).

Cith'ern [sith-] (= L. cithara, Gr. kithara) (1 Mc. iv. 54), a musical instrument, resembling a guitar, most probably of Greek origin, employed by the Chaldeans, and introduced by the Hebrews into Palestine on their return thither after the Babylonian Captivity. With respect to the shape of the cithern mentioned in the Apocrypha, the opinion of the learned is divided: according to some it resembled in form the Greek delta Δ, others represent it as a half-moon, and others again like the modern guitar. In many Eastern countries it is still in use with strings, varying in number from three to twenty-four. Under the name of Koothir, the traveller Niebuhr describes it as a wooden plate or dish, with a hole beneath and a piece of skin stretched above like a drum. In Mendelssohn's edition of the Psalms, the Koothir or Kalhrus is described by the accompanying figure.

Cit'ims [sit'timz] (fr. Heb.) = CHITIM (1 Mc. viii. 5).

Cit'i-zen, the A. V. translation uniformly in the N. T. (Lk. xv. 15, xix. 14 in plural; Acts xxi. 39) of the Gr. politês (= a member of a city or state, citizen, freeman; fr. polis, city, L. & S.), translated in Apocrypha in plural "citizens" (2 Mc. iv. 50, &c.) or "countrymen" (5, &c.). The kindred Greek word politeia (= the relation in which a citizen stands to the state, citizenship, L. & S.) is translated "freedom" in Acts xxii. 28, and "commonwealth" in Eph. ii. 10. Another (politeuma) is translated "conversation" (Phil. iii. 20). In the Hebrew commonwealth, which was framed on a basis of religious, rather than of political privileges and distinctions, the idea of the commonwealth was merged in that of the CONGREGATION, to which every Hebrew, and even the STRANGER, under certain restrictions, was admitted. But in Greece and Rome, citizenship, comprehending not only complete protection by the laws, but also in the higher sense, a participation in the legislative and judicial power of the state or city, was highly valued. In 2 Mc. ix. 15 reference is made to the citizens of Athens, and in several passages in the N. T. to Roman citizens. The privilege of Roman citizenship was originally acquired in various ways, as by purchase (Acts xxii. 28), by military services, by favor, or by manumission. The right once obtained descended to a man's children. Among the privileges attached to citizenship, we note that a man could not be bound or imprisoned without a formal trial (ver. 29), still less be scourged (xvi. 37; Cic. in Verr. v. 63, 66). Another privilege attaching to citizenship was the appeal from a provincial tribunal to the emperor at Rome (Acts xxv. 11). Gentile Christians are figuratively "fellow-citizens (Gr. sumpolitai) of the saints" (Eph. ii. 19), i. e. members of the spiritual commonwealth of Israel, or of the kingdom of heaven. KINGDOM.

CIT'RON. APPLE-TREE.

CIT'Y [sit'te], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. 'dr and 'ir, plural of both drim, from 'dr, to keep watch.—2. Heb. kirydh, kirydh, dual kiryathaim, from kirah, to approach as an enemy, probably the most ancient name for city, but seldom used in prose as a general name.—3. Heb. kereth = No. 2 (Job xxix. 7; Prov. viii. 3, ix. 3, 14, xi. 11).—4. Chal. kirydh and kiryd = No. 2 (Ezr. iv. 10 ff.).—5. Gr. polis, uniformly in the N. T. translated "city;" in the LXX. = No. 1, 2, 3, 4; the plural of the derivative politarches being twice translated "rulers of the city" (Acts xvii. 6, 8). (FENCED CITY; VILLAGE.) The earliest notice in Scripture of city-building is of Enoch by Cain, in the land of his exile (Gen. iv. 17). After the confusion of tongues, Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar, and Asshur (or NIMROD), built Nineveh, Rehoboth, Calah, and Resen, the last being "a great city." A subsequent passage mentions Sidon, Gaza, Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Lasha, as cities of the Canaanites, but without implying for them antiquity equal to that of Nineveh and the rest (x. 10-12, 19, xi. 3, 9). The earliest description of a city, properly so called, is that of Sodom (xix. 1-22); but it is certain that from very early times cities existed on the sites of Jerusalem, Hebron, Shechem, Damascus, &c. Hebron is said to have been built seven years before Zoan (Tanis) in Egypt, and is thus the only Syrian town which presents the elements of a date for its foundation (Num. xiii. 22). Even before the time of Abraham there were cities in Egypt (Gen. xii. 14, 15; Num. xiii. 22), and the Israelites, during their sojourn there, were employed in building or fortifying the "treasure cities" of Pithom and Raamses (Ex. i. 11). Meanwhile the settled inhabitants of Syria on both sides of the Jordan had grown in power and in number of "fenced cities," which were occupied and perhaps partly rebuilt or fortified after the conquest. But from some of these the possessors were not expelled till a late period, and Jerusalem itself was not captured till the time of David (2 Sam. v. 6, 9). From this time the Hebrews became a city-dwelling and agricultural rather than a pastoral people. David enlarged Jerusalem, and Solomon, besides embellishing his capital, also built or rebuilt Tadmor (Palmyra), Gezer, Beth-horon, Hazor, and Megiddo, besides store-cities (ver. 7, 9, 10; 1 K. ix. 15-18; 2 Chr. viii. 6). Collections of houses in Syria for social habitation may be classed under three heads:—(1.) cities; (2.) towns with citadels or towers for resort and defence; (3.) unwall'd villages. The cities may be assumed to have been in almost all cases "fenced cities." But around the city, especially in peaceable times, lay undefended "SUBURBS" (1 Chr. vi. 57 ff.; Num. xxxv. 1-5; Josh. xxi.), to which the privileges of the city extended. The city thus became the citadel, while the population overflowed into the suburbs (1 Mc. xi. 61). The absence of walls as indicating security in peaceable times, is illustrated by Zechariah (ii. 4; compare 1 K. iv. 25). According to Eastern custom, special cities were appointed to furnish special supplies for the service of the state. Governors for these and their surrounding districts were appointed by David and by Solomon (1 K. iv. 7 ff., ix. 19; 1 Chr. xxvii. 25; 2 Chr. xvii. 12, xxi. 3; 1 Mc. x. 39). To this practice our Lord alludes in his parable of the pounds (Lk. xix. 17, 19). To the LEVITES forty-eight cities were assigned, thirteen of them for the family of Aaron (PRIEST), six as refuge (Josh. xxi.). (CITY OF REFUGE.) In many Eastern cities much space is occupied by gardens (GARDEN), and thus the size of the city is greatly increased. The vast extent of Nineveh and of Babylon may thus be in part accounted for. In most Oriental cities the streets are extremely narrow, seldom allowing more than two loaded camels, or one camel and two foot-passengers, to pass each other. (STREET.) The open spaces near the gates of towns were in ancient times, as they are still, used as places of assembly by the elders, of holding courts by kings and judges, and of general resort by citizens. They were also used as places of public exposure by way of punishment (Jer. xx. 2; Am. v. 10).—"City of David," in 2 Sam. v. 9 and elsewhere in the O. T., = Mount Zion in JERUSALEM; in Lk. ii. 4, 11 = BETHLEHEM 1. Jerusalem is also styled "the city of God" (Ps. xlii. 4, xlviii. 1, 8, &c.), "the holy city" (Neh. xi. 1, 18, &c.).—City of Destruction (Is. xix. 18); see IR-HA-HERES.—See also ARCHITECTURE; CITY OF REFUGE; COUNCIL; ELDER; GATE; GOVERNOR; HOUSE; JUDGE; SANHEDRIM; STREET; WALLS.

CITY of Refuge. Six Levitical cities were specially chosen for refuge to the involuntary homicide (BLOOD, AVENGER OF; MURDER) until released from banishment by the death of the high-priest (Num. xxxv. 6, 9 ff.; Josh. xx. 2 ff., xxi. 13, &c.). There were three on each side of Jordan. On the W. of Jordan were—1. KEDESH, in Naphtali; 2. SHECHEM, in Mount Ephraim; 3. HEBRON, in Judah. On the E. side of Jordan were—4. BEZER, in the tribe of Reuben, in the plains of Moab; 5. RAMOTH-GILEAD, in the tribe of Gad; 6. GOLAN, in Bashan, in the half-tribe of Manasseh. Maimonides says all the forty-eight Levitical cities had the privilege of asylum, but that the six refuge-cities were required to receive and lodge the homicide gratuitously. The directions respecting the refuge-cities present some difficulties in interpretation. The Levitical cities were to have a space of 1,000 cubits (about 583 yards) beyond the city wall for pasture and other purposes. Presently after, 2,000 cubits are ordered to be the suburb limit (Num. xxxv. 4, 5). The solution of the difficulty may be, either the 2,000 cubits are to be added to the 1,000 as "fields of the suburbs" (Lev. xxv. 34), or the additional 2,000 cubits were a special gift to the refuge-cities, whilst the other Levitical cities had only 1,000 cubits for suburbs. CITY; SUBURBS.

CLAN'da (fr. Gr.) (Acts xxvii. 16). A small island nearly due W. of Cape Matala on the S. coast of Crete, and nearly due S. of PHENICE. It is still called Claudanesa, or Gaudonesi, by the Greeks, which the Italians have corrupted into Gozzo. The ship which conveyed St. Paul was seized by the gale a little after passing Cape Matala, when on her way from Fair Havens to Phenice (Acts xxvii. 12-17). The storm came down from the island (EUCLEYPUS), and there was danger lest the ship should be driven into the African Syrtis (QUICKSANDS). She was driven to Clauda and ran under the lee of it, where the water would be smooth.

Clau'di-a (L. fem. of CLAUDIUS), a Christian woman mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 21, as saluting Timothy; supposed by Dean Alford and others to have been the wife of PUDENS, and originally a British maiden, daughter of King Cogidubnus, an ally of Rome, who took the name of his imperial patron, Tiberius Claudius.

Clau'di-us (L. lame, perhaps celebrated, A. F. Pott: a surname common to two celebrated Roman clans, one patrician, the other plebeian), in full, Tiberius Claudius Nero Drusus Germanicus, fourth Roman emperor, reigned from 41 to 54 A. D. He was the son of Nero Drusus, was born in Lyons, Aug. 1, A. C. 9 or 10, and lived private and unknown till the date of his being called to the throne, Jan. 24, A. D. 41. He was nominated to the supreme power mainly through the influence of Herod Agrippa I. In the reign of Claudius there were several famines, arising from unfavorable harvests (Acts xi. 28-30). (AGABUS.) Claudius was induced by a tumult of the Jews in Rome, to expel them from the city (xviii. 2). The date of this event is uncertain. After a weak and foolish reign he was poisoned by his fourth wife Agrippina, the mother of Nero, Oct. 13, A. D. 54. For a coin with his image, see CYPRUS.

Clau'di-us Lys-i-as. LYSIAS.

* Clave, from CLEAVE.

Clay, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. tû (Ps. xl 2, Heb. 3; Is. xli. 25; Nah. iii. 14), usually and properly translated "mire," but in Isaiah and Nahum above = potter's clay, Ges.—2. Heb. hômêr or chômêr = (so Ges.) clay, loam, sc. of a reddish color, e. g. potter's clay (Is. xiv. 9, &c.), as used for sealing (Job xxxviii. 14; see below), mire (xxx. 19), &c.; also translated "MORTAR" (Gen. xi. 3; Ex. i. 14, &c.), "mire" (Job xxx. 19; Is. x. 6, &c.).—3. Chal. hūsaph or chūsaph (Dan. ii. 33 ff.) = sherds, burnt clay, earthen-ware, Ges.—4. Heb. melet (Jer. xliii. 9) = mortar, cement, Ges.—5. Heb. ma'ûbeh hâddâmâh (1 K. vii. 46), translated "the clay ground," margin "the thickness of the ground," = the compact soil, probably clayey, Ges.; probably = 'ûbey hâddâmâh, A. V. "the clay ground," margin "thicknesses of the ground" (2 Chr. iv. 17).—6. Gr. pêlos (Jn. ix. 6, 11, 14, 15; Rom. ix. 21); in LXX. = No. 1 and 2. The great seat of the POTTERY of the present day in Palestine is Gaza, where are made the vessels in dark blue clay so frequently met with. (BRICK; HANDICRAFT.) Wine jars in Egypt were sometimes sealed with clay; mummy pits were sealed with the same substance, and remains of clay are still found adhering to the stone door-jambs. Our Lord's tomb may have been thus sealed (Mat. xxvii. 66), as also the earthen vessel containing the evidences of Jeremiah's purchase (Jer. xxxii. 14). The SEAL used for public documents was rolled on the moist clay, and the tablet was then placed in the fire and baked. The practice of sealing doors with clay to facilitate detection in case of malpractice is still common in the East.

* Clean (Heb. tâhôr; Gr. katharos), and Un-clean (Heb. lâmê; Gr. akathartos), terms used in the Scriptures—(1.) in a literal or physical sense (Lev. iv. 12, xiv. 40; Mat. xxvii. 69, &c.);—(2.) in a legal or ceremonial sense (Gen. vii. 2, 8, viii. 20; Lev. xi. 1; Deut. xii. 14, 28, &c.);—(3.) in a moral or spiritual sense (Ps. xix. 9, Heb. 10; Is. vi. 5; Ez. xlv. 23; Jn. xv. 8; Eph. v. 5, &c.).—The ceremonial distinction before the Flood was probably made with reference to sacrifice; the distinction of the Mosaic law referred to sacrifice, food, &c. The regulations made in this respect doubtless tended to promote health, to keep the Israelites separate from the surrounding heathen, and to set forth impressively great spiritual truths (Heb. ix. 9-14). LAW OF MOSES; PURIFICATION; SACRIFICE; UNCLEAN MEATS.

* Cleave, an English verb used in regular and irregular, transitive and intransitive forms in the Scriptures. To "cleave to" (Gen. ii. 24, &c.) = to adhere to, stick closely to, cling to, often in spite of efforts or influences tending to separation. So "cleave to" (Ru. i. 14, &c.), "cleaved to" (2 K. iii. 3, &c.) = adhered to, clung to. To "cleave," transitively (Lev. i. 17; Deut. xiv. 6; Eccl. x. 9, &c.), also intransitively (Zech. xiv. 4), = to divide, split, separate, sc. a thing into its parts. So "cleave" (Gen. xxii. 3, &c.), "cleft" (Mic. i. 4), "cloven" (Acts iii. 2, &c.) = divided or separated. The noun CLEFT or CLIFT is connected with the latter signification.

* Cleft (fr. CLEAVE) (Deut. xiv. 6; Cant. ii. 14, &c.) = a fissure or opening made by separation of parts; also written CLIFT.

Clem'ent (Gr. Klēmēs, fr. L. Clemens = mild, calm, clement), a fellow-laborer of St. Paul at Philippi (Phil. iv. 3). It was generally believed in the ancient church, that this Clement = the Bishop of Rome, afterward so celebrated.

Cle-o-pas (Gr. Kleopas, prob. contr. fr. Kleopatros = fame-father, i. e. of great fame, or inheriting fame from a father), one of the two disciples who were going to Emmaus on the day of the resurrection (Lk. xxiv. 18). It is a question whether this Cleopas = the Cleophas (accurately in marg. Clopas) or ALPHEUS in Jn. xix. 25. MARY OF CLEOPHAS.

Cle-o-pa'tra (L. fr. Gr. fem. of Kleopatros = CLEOPAS). 1. The wife of Ptolemy (Esth. xi. 1) was probably the grand-daughter of ANTIOCHUS III. and both sister and wife of PTOLEMY VI. PHILOMETOR.—2. A daughter of Ptolemy VI. Philometor and No. 1, who was married first to Alexander Balas B. C. 160 (1 Mc. x. 58), and afterward given by her father to Demetrius Nicator when he invaded Syria (xi. 12). During the captivity of Demetrius in Parthia, Cleopatra married his brother Antiochus VII. Sidetes. She afterward murdered Seleucus, her eldest son by Demetrius; and at length was herself poisoned, B. C. 120, by a draught which she had prepared for her second son Antiochus VIII.

* Cliff (anciently written CLIFT: see CLEAVE) = a high steep rock, appearing as if cleft or split off by violence. In 2 Chr. xx. 16 the Heb. ma'ûleh is translated "cliff" in A. V., margin "ascent" (see ZIZ); elsewhere "ascent," "going up," &c. (see AKRABBIM). In Job xxx. 6, the Heb. 'ârûs, translated "cliffs" in A. V., = horror, terror, Ges.; and so "cliffs of the valleys" in A. V. should be rather a horror of valleys, i. e. horrible valleys. VALLEY 3.

* Clift, an old spelling of CLEFT and of CLIFF, found in some copies of the A. V.

* Cloak. DRESS.

* Clo'pas (Gr. Klōpas = ALPHEUS) (Jn. xix. 25, margin) = CLEOPHAS.

* Clo'thing. DRESS; FULLER; HANDICRAFT.

Cloud (usually in A. V. = Heb. 'ānān and Gr. nephelē). The shelter given, and refreshment of rain promised, by clouds, give them their peculiar prominence in Oriental imagery, and the individual cloud in an ordinarily cloudless region becomes well defined and is dwelt upon like the individual tree in the bare landscape. When a cloud appears, rain is ordinarily apprehended, and thus the "cloud without rain" becomes a proverb for the man of promise without performance (Prov. xvi. 15; Is. xviii. 4, xxv. 5; Jude 12; compare Prov. xxv. 14). The cloud is a figure of transitoriness (Job xxx. 15; Hos. vi. 4), and of whatever intercepts divine favor or human supplication (Lam. ii. 1, iii. 44). Being the least substantial of visible forms, it most easily suggests spiritual being. Hence it is the recognized machinery by which supernatural appearances are introduced (Is. xix. 1; Ez. i. 4; Rev. i. 7). (DARKNESS.) A bright cloud, at any rate at times, visited and rested on the Mercy Seat (Ex. xxix. 42, 43; 1 K. viii. 10, 11; 2 Chr. v. 14; Ez. xliii. 4), and was by later writers named Shechinah. See the next art.; AIR; FIRMAMENT; HEAVEN; RAIN; SKY; VAPOR.

* Cloud, Pil'lar of. This was the active form of the symbolical glory-cloud, betokening God's presence to lead His chosen host, or to inquire and visit offences, as the luminous cloud of the sanctuary exhibited the same under an aspect of repose. The cloud, which became a pillar when the host moved, seems to have rested at other times on the Tabernacle, whence God is said to have "come down in the pillar" (Num. xii. 5; so Ex. xxxiii. 9, 10). It preceded the host, apparently resting on the ark which led the way (Ex. xiii. 21, xl. 36, &c.; Num. ix. 15-23, x. 34). SHECHINAH.

* Clo'ven, from CLEAVE.

* Cnid'as [ni-] (L. fr. Gr.) is mentioned in 1 Mc. xv. 23, as one of the Greek cities which contained Jewish residents in the second century B. C., and in Acts xxvii. 7, as a harbor which was passed by St. Paul after leaving Myra, and before running under the lee of Crete. It was a city of great consequence, at the extreme S. W. of the peninsula of Asia Minor, on a promontory now called Cape Crio, which projects between the islands of Cos and Rhodes (see Acts xxi. 1). All the remains of Cnidus show that it must have been a city of great magnificence.

* Coach'es (Is. lxvi. 20, margin). LITTERS.

Coal, the A. V. translation of several different words. 1. The most common in Hebrew is gacheleth or gacheleth, a live ember, translated in the plural "burning coals," as distinguished from No. 2 below (Prov. xxvi. 21). In 2 Sam. xxii. 9, 13, "coals" or "coals of fire" metaphorically = the lightnings proceeding from God (comp. Ps. xviii. 8, 12, 13, xli. 10). The proverbial expression, "Thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head" (Prov. xxv. 22; adopted by St. Paul in Rom. xii. 20), metaphorically expresses the burning shame and confusion which men must feel when their evil is requited by good.—2. Heb. pehām or pechām in Prov. xxvi. 21 (comp. No. 1 above) clearly = fuel not yet lighted; but in Is. xlv. 12, liv. 16 = fuel lighted. The fuel meant in the above passages is probably charcoal, and not mineral coal (see below).—3. Heb. retseph or ritspah. In the narrative of Elijah's miraculous meal (1 K. xix. 6) retseph (A. V. "baken on the coals") is used to describe the mode in which the cake was baked, viz., on a hot stone, as is still usual in the East. So ritspah in Is. vi. 6 (A. V. "a live coal") properly = a hot stone, Ges.—4. Heb. resheph in Hab. iii. 5, is rendered in A. V. "burning coals," and in the margin "burning diseases." The former meaning is supported by Cant. viii. 6 (A. V. "coals"), the latter by Deut. xxxii. 24 (A. V. "burning heat," marg. "coals").—5. In Lam. iv. 8, "their visage is blacker than a coal" (Heb. shēhōr or shēchōr) is in the margin (and so Ges.) "darker than blackness."—6. Gr. anthraz is translated in plural "coals of fire" (Rom. xii. 20; see No. 1, also CARBUNCLE 3), and "coals" (Ecclus. viii. 10). The kindred anthrakia is translated "a fire of coals" (Jn. xviii. 18, xxi. 9); "a heap of coals" (Ecclus. xi. 32). There is no evidence that the ancient Hebrews were acquainted with mineral coal, though it is found in Lebanon. It seems pretty clear that the ancients generally used charcoal for their fuel. AGRICULTURE; BREAD; COOKING; FIRE; FOREST; OVEN.

* Coast, in A. V. = border, limit, bound, as of a country, tribe, district, &c. (Ex. x. 4, 14, 19; Josh. xv. 1, 4; Mat. ii. 16, viii. 34, &c.).

* Cock. In the N. T. the "cock" is mentioned in reference to St. Peter's denial of our Lord, and indirectly in the word "cock-crowing" (Mat. xxvi. 34; Mk. xiv. 30, xiii. 35, &c.). The domestic cock and HEN were early known to the ancient Greeks and Romans. They were undoubtedly of Asiatic origin, and not improbably the Greeks obtained them from Persia. They are now common in Palestine. As no mention is made in the O. T. of these birds, and no figures of them occur in the Egyptian monuments, Mr. Houghton thinks that they came into Judea with the Romans, who prize these birds both as articles of food and for cock-fighting. The Mishna says "they do not rear cocks at Jerusalem on account of the holy things;" but if there was any such restraint, it must have been an arbitrary practice of the Jews, not binding on foreigners at Jerusalem. But the cock which Peter heard crow might have been not in the city, but on the Mount of Olives, or elsewhere within hearing. WATCHES OF NIGHT.

* Cock'le (Heb. boshāh) occurs only in Job xxxi. 40. Celsius has argued in favor of the aconite, the Aconitum Napellus, which however is quite a mountain—never a field—plant. But Mr. Houghton believes the boshāh = any bad weeds or fruit, perhaps bad or smutted barley, or some of the useless grasses which have somewhat the appearance of barley, such as Hordeum murinum, &c.

* Coffer (Heb. argāz), a movable box hanging from the side of a cart (1 Sam. vi. 8, 11, 15). On the phrase "in a coffer" (Ezr. vi. 2, marg.), see ECBATANA.

* Coffin. BURIAL; CHEST 1; EMBALMING.

* Cola (fr. Gr.), a place (Jd. xv. 4 only); perhaps (so Simonis) = ABEL-MEHOLOH, which is also written Abel-meholah.

Col-ho'zeh (Heb. all-seeing), a man of the tribe of Judah (Neh. iii. 15, xi. 5).

Col-lus (1 Esd. ix. 23) = KELAHIAH.

Col-lars (Judg. viii. 26). EAR-RINGS.

Col'lege, the. In 2 K. xxii. 14 it is said in the A. V. that Huldah the prophetess "dwelt in Jerusalem in the college" (Heb. mishneh), margin "in the second part." The same part of the city is undoubtedly alluded to in Zeph. i. 10 (A. V. "the second"), and probably in Neh. xi. 9 (A. V. "second over the city," literally "over the city second"), mishneh being translated "second" in each. Our translation derived "the college" from the Targum of Jonathan, which has "house of instruction," a school-house supposed to have been in the neighborhood of the Temple. Keil's explanation is probably the true one, that the mishneh was the "lower city," built on the hill Akra.

* Col'lops of fat (Job xv. 27) = pieces, flakes, or slices of fat.

Col'o-ny, a designation of PHILIPPI, in Acts xvi. 12. After the battle of Actium, Augustus assigned to his veterans those parts of Italy which had espoused the cause of Antony, and transported many of the expelled inhabitants to Philippi, Dyrrachium, and other cities. In this way Philippi was made a Roman colony, and it is thus described both in inscriptions and upon the coins of Augustus. The colonists went out as Roman citizens (CITIZEN) to represent and reproduce the city in the midst of an alien population. Their names were still enrolled in one of the Roman tribes. They were governed by Roman law, had their own magistrates, and were free from any intrusion by the governor of the province. Their land had the same freedom from taxation as land in Italy.

Col'ors [kul'lurz]. The terms relative to color, occurring in the Bible, may be arranged in two classes: I. Those applied to the description of natural objects; II. Those artificial mixtures employed in dyeing or painting.—I. The natural colors noticed in the Bible are white, black, red, yellow, and green. Of these yellow is very seldom noticed; it was apparently regarded as a shade of green, for the Heb. yérakrak is applied to gold (Ps. lxxiii. 13, "yellow," A. V.), and to the leprous spot (Lev. xiii. 49, xiv. 37; A. V. in both "greenish"), and very probably the hue of the leprous hair (30, 32, 36; Heb. tsáhób; A. V. "yellow") differed little from the "greenish" spot on the garments. Green is frequently noticed, but the reference is seldom to colors. Thus the Heb. ra'ánán, usually translated "green" in A. V., applies to what is vigorous and flourishing (Deut. xii. 2; Job xv. 32, &c.), and the Heb. yárak and yerek, translated "green," "green thing," &c., in A. V., have the radical signification of putting forth leaves, sprouting (Gen. i. 30; Is. xv. 6, xxxvii. 27, &c.). So also the Heb. lah or lach, usually translated "green" (Gen. xxx. 37; Judg. xvi. 7, 8; Ez. xvii. 24, xx. 47), is translated literally "moist" in Num. vi. 3; and Heb. rátób, translated "green" in Job viii. 16, = juicy, Ges. (COTTON; LINEN). The Gr. chlóros (= pale green, light green, greenish yellow, strictly of the color of young grass, corn, &c., L. & S.) is translated "green" (Mk. vi. 39; Rev. viii. 7, ix. 4), and "pale" (Rev. vi. 8); and in LXX. = Heb. yárak, yerek, and lah or lach. The Gr. hugros (= watery, wet, moist; hence sappy, green, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is applied to a tree and translated "green" in Lk. xxiii. 31; and in LXX. = Heb. lah or lach in Judg. xvi. 7, 8, and rátób in Job viii. 16. The only fundamental color of which the Hebrews appear to have had a clear conception was red; and even this is not very often noticed. They had therefore no scientific knowledge of colors. The highest development of color in the mind of the Hebrew evidently was light, and hence the predominance given to white as its representative (Mat. xvii. 2; Mk. ix. 3; Lk. ix. 29; compare "brightness," Heb. zôhar, Ez. viii. 2; Dan. xii. 3). The Hebrew, translated "color," in Ez. i. 4, 7, 16, &c., is 'ayin, literally eye, i. e. the look, the glance, such as the eye or any thing brilliant gives forth (Fbn. on Ez.). Next to white, black, or rather dark, holds the most prominent place, not only as its opposite, but also as representing the complexion of the Orientals. The three colors, white, black, and red, were sometimes intermixed in animals, and gave rise to the Hebrew terms tsáhór or tsáchór (A. V. "white") = dappled, probably white and red (so Mr. Bevan; Gesenius says "white, probably of a light reddish color"), see Ass (Judg. v. 10); 'akód = "ring-straked," either with white bands on the legs, or white-footed; nákód = "speckled," tálú (participle from tálá = to patch, Ges.; the Hebrew, translated "clothed" in Josh. ix. 5, is from the same verb) = "spotted," and báród = piebald (A. V. "grised"), the spots being larger in the last than in the two others, but the three being white and black (Gen. xxx. 32 ff.; báród also in Zech. vi. 3, 6). It remains for us now to notice the various terms applied to these three colors. 1. White. The most common Hebrew term is lábán, which (or its kindred lábén) is applied to such objects as milk (Gen. xlix. 12), manna (Ex. xvi. 31), snow (Is. i. 18), horses (Zech. i. 8), raiment (Eccl. ix. 8); and a cognate word = "the moon" (Is. xxiv. 23). The Heb. tsah or tsach, dazzling white, is applied to the complexion (Cant. v. 10); the Chal. hivár or chivár, for which the LXX. have leukos (see below), to snow (Dan. vii. 9 only); the Heb. sib (A. V. "gray-headed") to the hair alone (1 Sam. xii. 2; Job xv. 10). The Heb. céháh (Lev. xiii. 21 ff., A. V. "somewhat dark") = pale white, Ges. Another class of terms arises from the textures of a naturally white color (Heb. báts, shésh, Gr. bussos, &c.; see COTTON; LINEN). These were without doubt primarily applied to the material; but the idea of color is also prominent, particularly in the description of the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 1), and the priests' vestments (xxviii. 6). (See also BASKET 1; MARBLE.) In Esth. i. 6, the first Hebrew word translated "white," húr or chúr, which also occurs in viii. 15, = fine white linen, Ges.; the second Hebrew word, dar, translated "white," margin "alabaster," is commonly taken = a pearl, but perhaps = a species of marble or alabaster resembling pearl, or possibly mother of pearl (so Ges.). In N. T., the Gr. lampros (Rev. xv. 6, xix. 8) and leukos (Mat. v. 36, xvii. 2, &c.; also in LXX. = Heb. lábán above) and the verb leukainó (Mk. ix. 3, &c.) are translated "white;" and the participle kekoniamenos (= whiterashed) is translated "whited" (Mat. xxiii. 27; Acts xxiii. 3). White was symbolical of innocence, of joy, and of victory.—2. Black. The shades of this color are expressed in the Heb. sháhór or sháchór and sháhar or sháchar, applied to the hair (Lev. xiii. 31, 37; Cant. v. 11); the complexion (Cant. i. 5), particularly when affected with disease (Job xxx. 30); horses (Zech. vi. 2, 6); Heb. hám or chám, literally scorched (A. V. "brown," Gen. xxx. 32 ff.), applied to sheep; the word expresses the color produced by influence of the sun's rays:

Heb. verb kādar, literally to be dirty, translated in A. V. "to be black," "blackish," "dark," "darkened," &c., applied to mourner's robes (Jer. viii. 21, xiv. 2); a clouded sky (1 K. xviii. 45); night (Mic. iii. 6; Jer. iv. 28; Joel ii. 10, iii. 15); a turbid brook (ΚΙΝΚΡΟΣ), particularly when rendered so by melted snow (Job vi. 16). The Gr. melas is translated "black" in N. T. (Mat. v. 36, &c.), and in LXX. = Heb. shāhōr or shūchōr. Black, as the opposite to white, is symbolical of evil (Zech. vi. 2, 6; Rev. vi. 5).—3. Red. The Heb. ādōm (= "red," "ruddy," A. V. and Ges.) and kindred words ādām (= "to be red" or "ruddy"), admōni (= "red"), are applied to blood (2 K. iii. 22); a garment sprinkled with blood (Is. lxiii. 2); a heifer (Num. xix. 2); pottage made of lentiles (Gen. xxv. 30); a horse (Zech. i. 8, vi. 2); wine (Prov. xxiii. 31); the complexion (Gen. xxv. 25; Cant. v. 10; Lam. iv. 7). The Heb. ādāmdām (= "reddish" or "somewhat reddish") is applied to a leprous spot (Lev. xiii. 19, &c., xiv. 37). The Heb. sārōk, literally fox-colored, bay, is applied to a horse (A. V. "speckled," margin "bay," Zech. i. 8). The Gr. purros (= flame-colored, fiery red, red, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is translated "red" in Rev. vi. 4, xii. 3, and in LXX. = Heb. ādōm. The kindred Greek verb purrazō (= "to be red," A. V.) occurs in Mat. xvi. 2, 3. (See also RED SEA.) This color was symbolical of bloodshed (Zech. vi. 2; Rev. vi. 4, xii. 8).—II. Artificial colors. The art of extracting dyes, and of applying them to various textures, appears to have been known at a very early period. (DRESS; HANDICRAFT.) The Hebrews were probably indebted both to the Egyptians and the Phenicians; to the latter for the dyes, and to the former for the mode of applying them. The purple dyes which they chiefly used were extracted by the Phenicians (Ez. xxvii. 16), and in certain districts of Asia Minor, especially Thyatira (Acts xvi. 14). (ELISHAH.) The dyes consisted of purples, light and dark (the latter = "blue," A. V.), and crimson ("scarlet," A. V.); these three were contributed for holy purposes (Ex. xxv. 4); vermilion was introduced at a late period.—1. Purple (Heb. argāmdn, argēdn; Chal. argēnd, Dan. v. 7, 16, 29, A. V. "scarlet," Gr. porphura, porphureos, porphurous). This color was obtained from the secretion of a species of shell-fish, the Murex trunculus of Linnæus, which was found in various parts of the Mediterranean Sea. The coloring matter was contained in a small vessel in the throat, only a single drop in each animal, and the value was proportionally high. The Greek and probably the other terms were applied with great latitude, not only to all colors extracted from the shell-fish, but even to other brilliant colors (compare Jn. xix. 2 with Mat. xxvii. 28, and see No. 3, below). The same may be said of the L. purpureus. Generally speaking, however, the "purple" of the Scriptures must be considered as defined by the distinction between the purple proper, and the other purple dye (A. V. "blue"), which was produced from another species of shell-fish. The latter was undoubtedly a dark violet tint, while the former had a light reddish tinge. Robes of a purple color were worn by kings (Judg. viii. 26), and by the highest officers, civil and religious (Esth. viii. 15; 1 Mc. x. 20, 64, &c.). They were also worn by the wealthy and luxurious (Jer. x. 9; Ez. xxvii. 7; Lk. xvi. 19; Rev. xvii. 4, xviii. 16).—2. Blue (Heb. teqēleth; Gr. huakinthos, huakinthinus; JACINTH). This dye was procured from a species of shell-fish found on the coast of Phenicia, and called by modern naturalists Helix Ianthina. The tint is best explained by the statements of Josephus (iii. 7, § 7) and Philo that it was emblematic of the sky, in which case it represents not the light blue of our Northern climate, but the deep dark hue of the Eastern sky. The A. V. has rightly described the tint in Esth. i. 6 (margin) as violet. This color was used in the same way as purple (see above, No. 1).—3. Scarlet (A. V. "crimson," twice in O. T.; see below). The terms by which this color is expressed in Hebrew vary; sometimes shāni simply is used, as in Gen. xxxviii. 28, 30 (A. V. "scarlet thread"), Is. i. 18 (A. V. "scarlet"), Jer. iv. 30 (A. V. "crimson"), &c.; sometimes tōl'ath shāni, as in Ex. xxv. 4, &c.; sometimes tōl', as in Is. i. 18 (A. V. "crimson"), and Lam. iv. 5 (A. V. "scarlet"); and in Nah. ii. 3, Heb. 4, the plural participle methullā'in (A. V. "in scarlet," margin "dye") is used. The word car-mil (A. V. "crimson," 2 Chr. ii. 7, 14, iii. 14) was introduced into Hebrew at a late period, probably from Armenia, to express the same color. The first of these terms expresses the brilliancy of the color; the second the worm, or grub, whence the dye was procured. The Gr. kokkos is translated "scarlet" in Eccles. xlv. 11, and its adjective kokinōs is translated in the N. T. "scarlet," "scarlet color," "scarlet-colored" (Mat. xxvii. 28, compare No. 1, above; Heb. ix. 19; Rev. xvii. 3, 4, xviii. 12, 16); and in the LXX. is used generally for the preceding Hebrew words. The dye was produced from the females of an insect (Coccus Ilcis, Linn., Ar. kermes, whence crimson), somewhat resembling the cochineal, which is found in considerable quantities in Armenia and other Eastern countries. The tint produced was crimson rather than scarlet. The only natural object to which it is applied in Scripture is the lips, which are compared to a "scarlet" thread (Cant. iv. 3). "Scarlet" threads were selected as distinguishing marks from their brilliancy (Gen. xxxviii. 28; Josh. ii. 18, 21), and hence the color is expressive of what is excessive or glaring (Is. i. 18). "Scarlet" robes were worn by the luxurious (2 Sam. i. 24; Prov. xxxi. 21; Rev. xvii. 4, &c.); "scarlet" was the appropriate hue of a warrior's dress from its similarity to blood (Nah. ii. 3; compare Is. ix. 5), and was especially worn by officers in the Roman army (Mat. xxvii. 28). The three colors above described, purple, blue, and scarlet, together with white, were employed in the textures used for the curtains of the tabernacle and for the sacred vestments of the priests (Ex. xxvi. 1, &c.).—4. Vermilion (Heb. shāshar; Gr. mil-tos). This was a pigment used in fresco paintings, either for drawing figures of idols on the walls of temples (Ez. xxiii. 14), for coloring the idols themselves (Wis. xiii. 14), or for decorating the walls and beams of houses (Jer. xxii. 14). The Greek term = both red lead and red ochre; the L. sinopis (the translation in Vulgate) = the best kind of ochre, which came from Sinope on the Euxine or Black Sea. Vermilion was a favorite color among the Assyrians, as is still attested by the sculptures of Nimroud and Khorsabad.

Co-lo-s'æ [-see] (L.) = COLOSSE.

Co-lo-s'æ (L. Colosse; Gr. Kolossai or Kolassai), a city in the Roman province of ASIA (PHRYGIA), in the upper part of the basin of the river Meander, on one of its affluents named the Lycus. Hierapolis and Laodicea were in its immediate neighborhood (Col. ii. 1, iv. 13, 15, 16; see Rev. i. 11, iii. 14). Colosse was more ancient, and fell, as these other two cities rose in importance. The three were destroyed by an earthquake (so Eusebius) in the ninth year of Nero, but Colosse was a flourishing place three years afterward. It was situated close to the great road from Ephesus to the Euphrates. Hence our impulse would be to conclude that St. Paul passed this way, and founded or confirmed the Colossian church on his third missionary journey (Acts xviii. 23, xix. 1). (See the next article.) The most competent commentators, however, agree in thinking that Col. ii. 1, proves that St. Paul had never been there, when the epistle was written. That the apostle hoped to visit the place on being delivered from his Roman imprisonment is clear from Phn. 22 (comp. Phil. ii. 24). Philemon and Onesimus were dwellers in Colosse. So also were Archippus and Epaphras. Mr. Hamilton was the first to determine the actual site of the ancient city, which appears to be about three miles N. from the modern village of Chonass.

Co-los'sians [ko-losh'yanz] (= people of Colosse), the E-pis'tle to the, was written by the Apostle Paul during his first captivity at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16), and apparently in that portion of it (Col. iv. 3, 4) when the apostle's imprisonment had not assumed the more severe character which seems to be reflected in Phil. i. 20, 21, 30, ii. 27, and which not improbably succeeded the death of Burrus in A. D. 62, and the decline of the influence of Seneca. This important and profound epistle was addressed to the Christians of the once large and influential, but now smaller and declining, city of Colosse, and was delivered to them by Tychicus, whom the apostle had sent both to them (Col. iv. 7, 8) and to the church of Ephesus (Eph. vi. 21), to inquire into their state and to administer exhortation and comfort. The epistle seems to have been called forth by the information St. Paul had received from Epaphras (Col. iv. 12; Phn. 23) and from Onesimus, both of whom appear to have been natives of Colosse, and the former of whom was, if not the special founder, yet certainly one of the very earliest preachers of the gospel in that city. The main object of the epistle is not merely, as in Philippians, to exhort and to confirm, nor as in Ephesians, to set forth the great features of the church of the chosen in Christ, but especially to warn the Colossians against a spirit of semi-Judaistic and semi-Oriental philosophy which was corrupting the simplicity of their belief, and was noticeably tending to obscure the eternal glory and dignity of Christ. With regard to its genuineness and authenticity, there are no grounds for doubt. The external testimonies are explicit, and the internal arguments, founded on the peculiarity of style, the nerve and force of the arguments, and the originality that appears in every paragraph, are unusually strong and well defined. (CANON.) A few special points demand a brief notice.—1. The opinion that the epistles to the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, were written during the apostle's imprisonment at Cesarea (Acts xxi. 27–xxvi. 32), i. e. between Pentecost A. D. 58 and the autumn of A. D. 60, has been recently advocated by several writers of ability, and stated with such cogency and clearness by Meyer, as to deserve some consideration. But to go no further than the present epistle, the notices of the apostle's imprisonment in ch. iv. 3, 4, 11, certainly seem historically inconsistent with the nature of the imprisonment at Cesarea. The permission of Felix (Acts xxiv. 23) can scarcely be strained into any degree of liberty to teach or preach the Gospel.—2. The nature of the erroneous teaching condemned in this epistle has been very differently estimated. Three opinions only seem to deserve any serious consideration: (a) that these erroneous teachers were adherents of Neo-Platonism, or of some forms of Occidental philosophy; (b) that they leaned to Essene doctrines and practices; (c) that they advocated that admixture of Christianity, Judaism, and Oriental philosophy which afterward became consolidated into Gnosticism. Of these (a) has but little in its favor, except the somewhat vague term "philosophy" (ch. ii. 8), which, however, it seems arbitrary to restrict to Grecian philosophy; (b) is much more plausible as far as the usages alluded to, but seems inconsistent both with the exclusive nature and circumscribed localities of Essene teaching; (c) on the contrary is in accordance with the Gentile nature of the church of Colosse (i. 21), with its very locality—speculative and superstitious Phrygia—and with that tendency to associate Judaical observances (ii. 10) with more purely theosophic speculations (18), which became afterward so conspicuous in developed Gnosticism.—3. The striking similarity between many portions of this epistle and Ephesians has given rise to much speculation, both as to the reason of this studied similarity, and as to the priority of order in respect to composition. The similarity may reasonably be accounted for, (1.) by the proximity in time at which the two epistles were written; (2.) by the high probability that in two cities of Asia within a moderate distance from one another, there would be many doctrinal prejudices, and many social relations, that would call forth and need precisely the same language of warning and exhortation. The priority in composition must remain a matter for a reasonable difference of opinion. Bishop Ellicott believes the shorter and perhaps more vividly expressed Epistle to the Colossians to have been first written, and to have suggested the more comprehensive, more systematic, but less individualizing, Epistle to the Ephesians.

* Com'fort-er = one who gives comfort (2 Sam. x. 3; Eccl. iv. 1, &c.); especially applied to the Holy Spirit in N. T. (Jn. xiv. 16, &c.). SPIRIT, THE HOLY; also ADVOCATE.

* Com-mand-ment. LAW; LAW OF MOSES; TEN COMMANDMENTS.

Com-mere. From the time that men began to live in cities, trade, in some shape, must have been carried on to supply the town-dwellers with necessities, but it is also clear that international trade must have existed and affected to some extent even the pastoral nomad races, for we find that Abraham was rich, not only in cattle, but in silver, gold, and gold and silver plate and ornaments (Gen. xiii. 2, xxiv. 22, 53). (METALS; MONEY; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.) Among trading nations mentioned in Scripture, EGYPT holds in very early times a prominent position, though her external trade was carried on, not by her own citizens, but by foreigners, chiefly of the nomad races. (ARABIA.) It was an Ishmaelite caravan, laden with spices, which carried Joseph into Egypt. From Egypt it is likely that at all times, especially in times of general scarcity, corn would be exported, which was paid for by the non-exporting nations in silver, which was always weighed (Gen. xli. 57, xlii. 3, 25, 35, xliii. 11, 12, 21). Intercourse with TYRE does not appear to have taken place till a later period. At an early period trade was carried on between Babylon and the Syrian cities, and gold and silver ornaments were common among the Syrian and Arabian races (Num. xxxi. 50; Josh. vii. 21; Judg. v. 30, viii. 24; Job vi. 19). Until the time of SOLOMON the Hebrew nation may be said to have had no foreign trade. (AGRICULTURE; ALLIANCE; LOAN; SHIP.)

Solomon, however, organized an extensive trade with foreign countries. (ELATH; TARSHISH.) He imported linen yarn, horses, and chariots from Egypt (1 K. x. 22-29). Phenicians brought by sea to JOPPA the cedar and other timber for his great architectural works, whilst Solomon furnished them provisions (1 K. v. 6, 9; 2 Chr. ii. 15, 16). Solomon also built, or more probably fortified, PALMYRA (TADMOR), as a caravan station for the land-commerce with eastern and southeastern Asia (1 K. ix. 18). After his death the maritime trade declined, and an attempt made by Jehoshaphat to revive it proved unsuccessful (1 K. xxii. 48, 49). We know, however, that Phenicia was supplied from Judea with wheat, honey, oil, and balm (1 K. v. 11; Ez. xxvii. 17; Acts xii. 20), whilst Tyrian dealers brought fish and other merchandise to Jerusalem at the time of the return from Captivity (Neh. xiii. 16), as well as timber for the rebuilding of the Temple, which then, as in Solomon's time, was brought by sea to Joppa (Ezr. iii. 7). Oil was exported to Egypt (Hos. xii. 1), and fine linen and ornamental girdles of domestic manufacture were sold to the merchants (Prov. xxxi. 24). The successive invasions to which Palestine was subjected must have impoverished the country from time to time, but much wealth must somewhere have existed; so much so that, in the language of Ezekiel, Jerusalem appears as the rival of Tyre, and through its port, Joppa, to have carried on trade with foreign countries (Is. ii. 6, 16, iii. 11, 23; Hos. xii. 7; Ez. xxvi. 2; Jon. i. 3). The internal trade of the Jews, as well as the external, was much promoted, as was the case also in Egypt, by the festivals, which brought large numbers of persons to Jerusalem, and caused great outlay in victims for sacrifices and in incense (1 K. viii. 63). The places of public market were, then as now, chiefly the open spaces near the gates, to which goods were brought for sale by those who came from the outside (Neh. xiii. 15, 16; Zeph. i. 10). The traders in later times were allowed to intrude into the temple, in the outer courts of which victims were publicly sold for the sacrifices (Zech. xiv. 21; Mat. xxi. 12; Jn. ii. 14). The Jews in their dispersion became, and have continued to be, a nation of traders. CAMEL; CAPTIVITY; CESAREA; DISPERSION, JEWS OF THE; GATE; INN; MARKET; MONEY-CHANGERS; SLAVE; STONES, PRECIOUS; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

* Com'mon-wealth. CITIZEN; CONGREGATION.

* Com-pel' (fr. L., lit. to drive together), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ánas (= to urge, press, compel, Ges.) (Esth. i. 8 only).—2. Heb. nádah or nádach (= to thrust, impel, seduce, Ges.) (2 Chr. xxi. 11); elsewhere translated "drive" (Deut. xxx. 1; 2 K. xvii. 21; Jer. viii. 3, &c.), "thrust" (Deut. xiii. 5, 10), "force" (Deut. xx. 19; Prov. vii. 21), &c.—3. Heb. ábad (= to labor, work, serve, Ges.) (Lev. xxv. 39, margin "serve thyself with"); elsewhere translated "serve" (ver. 40, &c.), &c.—4. Heb. párats (literally, to break, break out or forth, Ges.) (1 Sam. xxviii. 23); elsewhere translated "break forth" (Ex. xix. 22, 24, &c.), "break down" (2 K. xiv. 13, &c.), &c.—5. Gr. anangkazô (= to force, compel, require, constrain, especially by argument; from anangkê, force, necessity, L. & S.) (1 K. xiv. 23; Acts xxvi. 11; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Gal. ii. 3, 14); also translated "constrain" (Mat. xiv. 22; Mk. vi. 45; Acts xxviii. 19; Gal. vi. 12).—6. Gr. angareuô (Mat. v. 41, xxvii. 32; Mk. xv. 21), a word of Persian, or rather of Tartar origin,

= to compel to serve as a mounted courier (Gr. ang-garos). According to the Persian system (Hdt. viii. 98), in order to make all haste in carrying royal messages, relays of men and horses were stationed at intervals, and the couriers, who had license from the government to press into the service men, horses, and vessels, handed the dispatch from one to another without interruption either from weather or darkness. Hence the word = press or impress into service. EPISTLE.

Con-a-ni'ah (Heb. whom Jehovah hath set, Ges.; = CONONIAH), one of the chiefs of the Levites in the time of Josiah (2 Chr. xxxv. 9).

* Con-cis'lon [kon-siz'hun] (fr. L. = a cutting off), a term of contempt for mere outward CIRCUMCISION (Phil. iii. 2).

Con-cu-bine [konk-yu-bine] (fr. L.; Heb. pilegesh; Gr. pallakē), among the ancient Hebrews, &c., = a wife of secondary rank. The concubine's condition was a definite one, and quite independent of the fact of there being another woman having the rights of wife toward the same man. The difference probably lay in the absence of the right to the "bill of divorcement" (see DIVORCE), without which the wife could not be repudiated. With regard to the children of wife and concubine, there was no such difference as our illegitimacy implies; the latter were a supplementary family to the former, their names occur in the patriarchal genealogies (Gen. xxii. 24; 1 Chr. i. 32), and their position and provision would depend on the father's will (Gen. xxv. 6). The state of concubinage is assumed and provided for by the law of Moses. A concubine would generally be either (1.) a Hebrew girl bought of her father; (2.) a Gentile captive taken in war; (3.) a foreign slave bought, or (4.) a Canaanitish woman, bond or free. The rights of (1.) and (2.) were protected by law (Ex. xxi. 7 ff.; Deut. xxi. 10-14), but (3.) was unrecognized, and (4.) prohibited. Free Hebrew women also might become concubines. So Gideon's concubine seems to have been of a family of rank and influence in Shechem, and such was probably the state of the Levite's concubine (Judg. xix., xx.). The ravages of war among the male sex, or the impoverishment of families might often induce this condition. The case (1.) was not a hard lot (Ex. xxi.). The provisions relating to (2.) are merciful and considerate to a rare degree, but overlaid by the Rabbis with distorting comments. In the books of Samuel and Kings the concubines mentioned belong to the king, and their condition and number cease to be a guide to the general practice. A new king stepped into the rights of his predecessor, and by Solomon's time the custom had approximated to that of a Persian harem (2 Sam. xii. 8, xvi. 21; 1 K. ii. 22). To seize on royal concubines for his use was thus a usurper's first act. ABNER; ABSALON; ADONIJAH; ADULTERY; HAGAR; HEIR; KETURAH; MARRIAGE; SLAVE; WOMEN.

* Con-dem-na'tion. DAMNATION; JUDGES; PUNISHMENTS; TRIAL.

Con-duit [-dit] (Heb. tē'd'lāh = a trench, water-course, canal, or aqueduct). 1. Although no notice is given in the Scriptures or Josephus of any connection between the pools of Solomon beyond Bethlehem and a supply of water for Jerusalem, it seems unlikely that so large a work as the pools should be constructed merely for irrigating his gardens (Eccl. ii. 6); and tradition, both oral and as represented by Talmudical writers, ascribes to Solomon the formation of the original aqueduct by which water was brought to Jerusalem. Pontius Pilate applied the sacred treasure of the Corban to the work of bringing water by an aqueduct. Whether his work was a new one or a reparation of Solomon's original aqueduct cannot be determined. The aqueduct, though much injured, and not serviceable for water beyond Bethlehem, still exists; the water is conveyed from the fountains which supply the pools about two miles S. of Bethlehem. (POOL.)—2. Among the works of Hezekiah he is said to have stopped the "upper water-course of Ginnon," and brought it down straight to the W. side of the city of David (2 Chr. xxxii. 30; compare 2 K. xviii. 17). JERUSALEM.

Co'ney or Co'ny, the A. V. translation of the Heb. shūphān, which is now universally allowed to be the Hyrax Syriacus, a gregarious animal of the class Pachydermata, found in Palestine, living in the caves and clefts of the rocks. In Lev. xi. 5 and in Deut. xiv. 7 it is declared to be unclean, because it chews the cud, but does not divide the hoof. In Ps. civ. 18 we are told "the rocks are a refuge for the conies," and in Prov. xxx. 26 that "the conies are but a feeble folk, yet make they their houses in the rocks." The Hyrax satisfies exactly the expressions in the two last passages. The action of its jaws resembles that of the ruminating animals, yet, like the hare, it is not classed among them by naturalists, as it has incisors or cutting teeth in the upper jaw and lacks the four stomachs of those animals, its true affinities being with the tapir, &c. It feeds on grass and the young shoots of shrubs, and is about the size of a cony or rabbit, which in some of its habits it much resembles. Its color is gray or brown on the back, white on the belly; it has long hair, a very short tail, and round ears. It is found on Lebanon and in the Jordan and Dead Sea valleys.

* Con-fec'tion = a preparation or compound of different ingredients (Ex. xxx. 35). OINTMENT.

* Con-fu'sion of Tongues. TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

Con-gre-ga'tion [kong-gre-] (fr. L.; for the Hebrew words see ASSEMBLY). This term describes the Hebrew people in its collective capacity under its peculiar aspect as a holy community, held together by religious rather than political bonds. Sometimes it is used in a broad sense as inclusive of foreign settlers (Ex. xii. 19); but more properly, as exclusively appropriate to the Hebrew element of the population (Num. xv. 15). Every circumcised Hebrew was a member of the congregation, and took part in its proceedings, probably from the time that he bore arms. It is important, however, to observe that he acquired no political rights in his individual capacity, but only as a member of a house; for the basis of the Hebrew polity was the house, whence was formed in an ascending scale the family or collection of houses, the tribe or collection of families, and the congregation or collection of tribes. The congregation occupied an important position under the Theocracy, as the national assembly or parliament, invested with legislative and judicial powers; each house, family, and tribe being represented by its head or father. The number of these representatives being inconveniently large for ordinary business, a further selection was made by Moses of seventy, who formed a species of standing committee (xi. 16). Occasionally indeed the whole body of the people was assembled at the door of the Tabernacle of the congregation (x. 3). The people were strictly bound by the acts of their representatives, even in cases where they disapproved of them (Josh. ix. 18). After the occupation of the land of Canaan, the congregation was assembled only on matters of the highest importance (Judg. x. 17, xi. 11, xx. 1; 1 Sam. vii. 5, x. 17; 2 Sam. v. 1; 1 K. xii. 20; 2 K. xi. 19, xxi. 24, xxiii. 30; 2 Chr. xxvi. 1, xxx. 5, xxxiv. 29; 1 Mc. iii. 46). In the later periods of Jewish history the congregation was represented by the SANHEDRIM. CHURCH; CITIZEN; CONVOCATION; ELDER; PRINCE; STRANGER; SYNAGOGUE.

Con-o-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = ΚΟΝΑΝΙΑ), a Levite, ruler of the offerings and tithes in the time of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 12, 13).

* Con'science [shens] (fr. L.), the uniform A. V. translation in the N. T. of the Gr. συνείδησις, literally = a knowing with one's self, consciousness; hence conscience, the moral faculty which distinguishes between right and wrong, and prompts to choose the right and avoid the wrong, Rbn. N. T. Lex. (Jn. viii. 9; Rom. ii. 15, &c.). In the O. T. it occurs in A. V. once (Eccl. x. 20, margin, "thought" in text) as the translation of Heb. malldā, for which the LXX. have here συνείδησις, and which elsewhere = "knowledge" (2 Chr. i. 10-12; Dan. i. 17), "science" (ver. 4).

Con-se-cra'tion. See ANOINTING; HIGH-PRIEST; PRIEST; TABERNACLE; TITHES.

* Con-ver-sa'tion (fr. L.) in the A. V. = manner of life, habitual course of action, conduct, an etymological meaning now disused. It is the translation of—1. Heb. derech (lit. a going, way, hence way of acting, course of living, conduct, Ges.) (Ps. xxxvii. 14, l. 23, margin, "way" in both), usually translated "way" in the O. T.—2. Gr. ἀναστροφή (literally, a turning about, hence mode of life, conduct, L. & S., Rbn. N. T. Lex.) uniformly (Gal. i. 13; Eph. iv. 22, &c.). The kindred Gr. verb ἀναστρέφωμαι (literally, to turn one's self about, hence to live or conduct one's self) is translated in 2 Cor. i. 12 and Eph. ii. 3 (aorist tense) "have had (had) conversation;" elsewhere translated "live" (Heb. xiii. 18; 2 Pet. ii. 18), &c.—3. Gr. πολιτεία, in Phil. iii. 20, = the state, community, commonwealth, Rbn. N. T. Lex.; citizenship, life as a citizen, L. & S. (see CITIZEN); life, tenor of life, Conybeare & Howson. The kindred Gr. verb πολιτεύωμαι (= to be a citizen, to live as a citizen, hence to live, L. & S., Rbn. N. T. Lex., Conybeare & Howson) is translated in Phil. i. 27 (second person plural, imperative present) "let your conversation be" and in Acts xxiii. 1 (first person singular, indicative perfect) "I have lived."—4. Gr. τρόπος (literally, a turning or turn, hence way, manner of life) (Heb. xiii. 5), elsewhere translated "manner" (Acts i. 11; Jude 7), "way" (Rom. iii. 2; Phil. i. 18), &c.

Con-vo-ca'tion, the A. V. translation of the Hebrew mikrá (ASSEMBLY 3), applied invariably to meetings of a religious character, in contradistinction to CONGREGATION. With one exception (Is. i. 13), the word is peculiar to the Pentateuch.

* Co'ny = CONEY.

Cook'ing. As meat did not form an article of ordinary diet among the Jews, the art of cooking was not carried to any perfection. Few animals were slaughtered except for purposes of hospitality or festivity. The proceedings on such occasions appear to have been as follow:—On the arrival of a guest the animal, either a kid, lamb, or calf, was killed (Gen. xviii. 7; Lk. xv. 23), its throat being cut so that the blood might be poured out (Lev. vii. 26); it was then flayed and was ready either for roasting or boiling: in the former case the animal was preserved entire, and roasted either over a FIRE (Ex. xii. 8, 46) of wood (Is. xlv. 16), or perhaps, as the mention of fire implies another method, in an oven, consisting simply of a hole dug in the earth, well heated and covered up; the Paschal lamb (PASS-OVER) was roasted by the first of these methods (Ex. xii. 8, 9; 2 Chr. xxxv. 13). Boiling, however, was the more usual method of cooking. Vegetables were usually boiled, and served up as pottage (Gen. xxv. 29; 2 K. iv. 38). Fish was also cooked (Lk. xxiv. 42), probably broiled. The cooking was in early times performed by the mistress of the household (Gen. xviii. 6); professional cooks were afterward employed (1 Sam. viii. 13, ix. 23). Food; MEALS.

Co'os (L. fr. Gr.) = COS (Acts xxi. 1).

Copper (fr. Gr.; see CYPRUS), the A. V. translation in Ezr. viii. 27 of the Heb. nechōsheth or nechōsheth, usually rendered "BRASS." (STEEL.) Copper is usually found as pyrites (sulphuret of copper and iron), malachite (carbonate of copper), or in the state of oxide, and occasionally in a native state, principally in America. It was almost exclusively used by the ancients for common purposes; for which its elastic and ductile nature rendered it practically available. It was possessed in countless abundance (2 Chr. iv. 18), and used for chains (Judg. xvi. 21, A. V. "fettlers"), pillars, lavers (1 K. vii. 15 ff.; 2 K. xxv. 13; 1 Chr. xviii. 8) (SEA, MOLTEN), and the other Temple vessels, mirrors (Ex. xxxviii. 8; Job xxxvii. 18), arms, as helmets, spears, &c. (1 Sam. xvii. 5, 6, 38; 2 Sam. xxi. 16). The "bow of STEEL" (Ps. xviii. 34, &c.) should be "bow of copper." The ancients could hardly have applied copper to these purposes without possessing some judicious system of alloys, or perhaps some forgotten secret for rendering the metal harder and more elastic than we can make it. The "vessels of fine copper" (Ezr. viii. 27, margin "yellow" or "shining brass;") compare 1 Esd. viii. 57, "fine brass") may have been of orichalcum, like the Persian or Indian vases found among the treasures of Darius. Copper vessels were brought (Ez. xxvii. 13) to the markets of Tyre by merchants of Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, i. e. probably the Moschi, &c., who worked the copper mines in the neighborhood of Mount Caucasus. COPPERSMITH; METALS; MINES.

Cop'per-smith, the A. V. translation of the Gr. chalkous, in 2 Tim. iv. 14. The Greek term often, as here, = any worker in metals (Rbn. N. T. Lex.). COPPER; HANDICRAFT; SMITH.

* Cor (Heb. a round vessel) = HOMER. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Cor'al occurs only, as the somewhat doubtful, yet most probable, rendering of the Hebrew ramith

(literally = high things), in Job xxviii. 18, and Ez. xxvii. 16. The old versions fail to afford us any clew. The natural upward form of growth of the common red coral of the Mediterranean, with which the Rabbins identify it, is well suited to the etymol-

1. Common red coral of the Mediterranean (Corallium rubrum).
2. Part of branch, enlarged to show the zoophyte with its eight tentacles.—From Milne Edwards, Hist. des Corallines.—(Fbu.)

ogy of the word. Pliny says that the Indians (i. e. people of the East Indies) valued coral as the Romans valued pearls. Coral often occurs in ancient Egyptian jewelry, as used for beads and amulets. Coral is the stony frame (mostly of carbonate of lime), which is formed by the animal secretions of zoophytes or polyps, and corresponds to the skeletons of more highly organized animals. There are numerous tribes of zoophytes, some of which produce coral of a tree-like or other form of apparent vegetation. See Appleton's New American Cyclopædia, and especially Professor Dana, on Zoophytes.

Cor'ban (L. fr. Heb. korban), an offering to God of any sort, bloody or bloodless, but particularly in fulfilment of a vow. The law laid down rules for vows (Lev. xxvii.; Num. xxx.). Upon these rules the traditionists enlarged, and laid down that a man might interdict himself by vow, not only from using for himself, but from giving to another, or receiving from him some particular object whether of food or any other kind whatsoever. The thing thus interdicted was considered as corban. A person might thus exempt himself from any inconvenient obligation under plea of corban. Our Lord denounced practices of this sort (Mat. xv. 5; Mk. vii. 11), as annulling the spirit of the law.

Cor'be (fr. Gr.), apparently = ZACCAI (1 Esd. v. 12).

Cord. Several Hebrew words (hebel or chebel, hûl or chûl, yether, méythâr, ûbôth) are translated in the A. V. "cord," "line," "band," "rope," "thread," "string," &c., with various distinctions of meaning and application. Of the various purposes to which cord, including under that term rope, and twisted thongs, was applied, the following are specially worthy of notice—(1.) For fastening a tent (Ex. xxxv. 18, xxxix. 40; Is. liv. 2).—(2.) For leading or binding animals, as a halter or rein (Ps. cxviii. 27; Hos. xi. 4).—(3.) For yoking them either to a cart (Is. v. 18) or a plough (Job xxxix. 10, A. V. "band").—(4.) For binding prisoners (Judg. xv. 13; Ps. ii. 3, cxix. 4; Ez. iii. 25).—(5.) For bowstrings (Ps. xi. 2), made of catgut.—(6.) For the ropes or "tacklings" of a vessel (Is. xxxiii. 23). (SHIP).—(7.) For measuring ground, A. V. "line" (2 Sam. viii. 2; Ps.

lxxviii. 55; Am. vii. 17; Zech. ii. 1), hence "cord" or "line" = an inheritance (Ps. xvi. 6). (REGION.)—(8.) For FISHING, HUNTING, &c. (NET).—(9.) For attaching articles of dress; as the "wreathen chains," which were rather twisted cords, worn by the high-priests (Ex. xxviii. 14, 22, 24, xxxix. 15, 17).—(10.) For fastening awnings (Esth. i. 6).—(11.) For attaching to a plummet. (HANDICRAFT).—(12.) For drawing water out of a well, sustaining or raising heavy weights (Josh. ii. 15; Jer. xxxviii. 6, 13). The materials of which cord was made varied according to the strength and the use required; the strongest rope was probably made of strips of camel hide as still used by the Bedouins. The finer sorts were made of flax (Is. xix. 9), silver threads (Eccl. xii. 6), &c.; others of the fibre of date palm, and probably of reeds and rushes. In the N. T. the Greek schoinion (properly, a rope twisted of rushes; generally, a rope or cord, L. & S.) is applied in the plural to the whip which our Saviour made (Jn. ii. 15), and to the ropes of a ship (Acts xxvii. 32).

Co-ri-an'der. The plant called Coriandrum sativum is found in Egypt, Persia, and India, and has a round tall stalk; it bears umbelliferous white or reddish flowers, from which arise globular, grayish, spicy seed-corns, marked with fine striæ. It is mentioned twice in the Bible (Ex. xvi. 31; Num. xi. 7).

Cor'inth (L. Corinthus; Gr. Korinthos; said to have been named from Corinthus, son of Jupiter). This city is alike remarkable for its distinctive geographical position, its eminence in Greek and Roman history, and its close connection with the early spread of Christianity. Geographically its situation was so marked, that the name of its Isthmus has been given to every narrow neck of land between two seas. But, besides this, the site of Corinth is distinguished by another conspicuous physical feature—viz. the Acrocorinthus, a vast citadel of rock which rises abruptly to the height of two thousand feet above the sea, and the summit of which is so extensive that it once contained a whole town. Below the Acrocorinthus, to the N., was the city of Corinth, on a table-land descending in terraces to the low plain which lies between CENCHRÆA the eastern harbor on the Saronic gulf and Lechæum the western harbor, one and a half mile distant, on the gulf of Corinth. The situation of Corinth, and and the possession of these eastern and western harbors, are the secrets of her history. The earliest passage in her progress to eminence was probably Phœnician. But at the most remote period of which we have any sure record, we find the Greeks established here in a position of wealth and military strength. Some of the earliest efforts of Greek ship-building are connected with Corinth; and her colonies to the W. were among the first and most flourishing sent out from Greece. Corinth was one of the largest and most magnificent cities of ancient Greece, a political rival of ATHENS, gave name to the most elaborate order of Greek architecture, and claimed to have invented the art of painting. In the latest passages of Greek history Corinth held a conspicuous place. Corinth was the head of the Achean league (ACHAIA). It is not the true Greek Corinth, destroyed by the Romans 146 B. C., with which we have to do in the life of St. PAUL, but the Corinth which was rebuilt and established as a Roman colony, about one hundred years afterward, by Julius Cæsar. The distinction between the two must be carefully remembered. The new city was hardly less distinguished than the old, and it acquired a fresh importance as the metropolis of the Roman province of ACHAIA. Corinth was a place of great mental activity, as well as of commercial and manufacturing enterprise. Its wealth was so celebrated as to be proverbial; so were the vice and profligacy of its inhabitants. The worship of Venus here was attended with shameful licentiousness. All these points are indirectly illustrated by passages in the two epistles to the CORINTHIANS. Corinth is still an episcopal see. The city has now shrunk to a wretched village, on the old site, and bearing the old name, which, however, is often corrupted into Gorlho. Pausanias, in describing the antiquities of Corinth.

Corinth as they existed in his day, distinguishes clearly between those which belonged to the old Greek city, and those which were of Roman origin. Two relics of Roman work are still to be seen, one a heap of brick-work which may have been part of the baths erected by Hadrian, the other the remains of an amphitheatre with subterranean arrangements for gladiators. Far more interesting are the ruins, on the W. side of the modern town, of the ancient Greek temple, probably the oldest of which any remains are left in Greece. The Posidonium, or sanctuary of Neptune, the scene of the Isthmian games, from which St. Paul borrows some of his most striking imagery in 1 Corinthians and other epistles, was a short distance N. E. of Corinth, at the narrowest part of the Isthmus, near the harbor of Schoenus (now Kalamaki) on the Saronic gulf. The exact site of the temple is doubtful; but to the S. are the remains of the stadium, where the foot-races were run (1 Cor. ix. 24); to the E. are those of the theatre, which was probably the scene of the pugilistic contests (26); and abundant on the shore are the small green pine-trees which gave the fading wreath (25) to the victors in the games.

Co-rin-thi-ans (=people of CORINTH). First E-pis-tle to the, was written by the Apostle PAUL toward the close of his three-year stay at Ephesus (Acts xix. 10, xx. 31), which (1 Cor. xvi. 8) probably terminated with the Pentecost of A. D. 57 or 58. The bearers were probably (according to the common subscription) Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, who had been recently sent to the apostle, and who (xvi. 17), are especially commended to the honorable regard of the church of Corinth. This varied and highly characteristic letter was addressed not to any party, but to the whole body of the large Judeo-Gentile (Acts xviii. 4, 8, 10) church of Corinth, and appears to have been called forth, 1st, by the information the apostle had received from members of the household of Chloe (1 Cor. i. 11), of the divisions among them, which were of so grave a nature as to have already induced the apostle to desire Timothy to visit Corinth (iv. 17) after his journey to Macedonia (Acts xix. 22); 2dly, by the information he had received of a grievous case of incest (1 Cor. v. 1), and of the defective state of the Corinthian converts, not only in regard of general habits (vi. 1 ff.) and church discipline (xi. 20 ff.), but, as it would also seem, of doctrine (xv.); 3dly, by the inquiries that had been specially addressed to St. Paul by the church of Corinth on several matters relating to Christian practice. The apostle opens with his usual salutation and an expression of thankfulness for their general state of Christian progress (i. 1-9); then passes to the divisions among them, incidentally justifying his own conduct and preaching (i. 10, iv. 16), and concluding with a notice of the mission of Timothy and his own intended visit (iv. 17-21); next deals with the case of incest (v. 1-8), noticing, as he passes, some previous remarks he had made on not keeping company with fornicators (9-13); comments on their litigation before heathen tribunals (vi. 1-8), and again reverts to fornication and uncleanness (9-20); answers their inquiries about marriage (vii. 1-24), and the celibacy of virgins and widows (25-40); then discusses the lawfulness of eating things sacrificed to idols, and Christian freedom generally (viii.), with a digression on his having waived his apostolic privileges in performing his apostolic duties (ix.); then reverts to and concludes the subject of the use of things offered to idols (x.-xi. 1); reproves their behavior in the assemblies of the church, both in respect to women prophesying and praying with uncovered heads (2-16), and their irregularities at the Lord's Supper (17-34); then gives instructions on the exercise of spiritual gifts (xii.-xiv.), with a panegyric of charity (xiii.), and a defence of the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead (xv.); and closes with directions concerning the contributions for the saints at Jerusalem (xvi. 1-4), notices of his own intended movements (5-9), commendation of Timothy, &c. (10-18), greetings (19, 20), and an autograph salutation and benediction (21-24).—With regard to the genuineness and authenticity of this epistle no doubt has ever been entertained. The external evidences are extremely distinct, and the character of the composition such, that if any critic should hereafter be bold enough to question the correctness of the ascription, he must be prepared to extend it to all the epistles that bear the name of the great apostle. (CANON.) Two special points deserve separate consideration:—1. The state of parties at Corinth at the time of the apostle's writing. The few facts supplied to us by the Acts of the Apostles, and the notices in the epistle, appear to be as follows:—The Corinthian church was planted by the apostle himself (1 Cor. iii. 6), in his second missionary journey (Acts xviii. 1 ff.). He abode in the city a year and a half (xviii. 11). A short time after the apostle left the city, APOLLOS went to Corinth (xix. 1). This visit of Apollos appears to have formed the commencement of a gradual division into two parties, the followers of St. Paul, and the followers of Apollos (compare 1 Cor. iv. 6). These divisions, however, were to be multiplied; for, as it would seem, shortly after the departure of Apollos, Judaizing teachers, supplied probably with letters of commendation (2 Cor. iii. 1) from the church of Jerusalem, appear to have come to Corinth and to have preached the Gospel in a spirit of direct antagonism to St. Paul personally. To this third party we may perhaps add a fourth that, under the name of "the followers of Christ" (1 Cor. i. 12), sought at first to separate themselves from the factious adherence to particular teachers, but eventually were driven by antagonism into positions equally sectarian and inimical to the unity of the church. At this momentous period, before parties had become consolidated, and had distinctly withdrawn from communion with one another, the apostle writes; and in the outset of the epistle (i.-iv. 21) we have his noble and impassioned protest against this fourfold rending of the robe of Christ.—2. The number of epistles written by St. Paul to the Corinthian church will probably remain a subject of controversy to the end of time. The well-known words (v. 9) certainly seem (so Bishop Ellicott, agreeing with Calvin, Doddridge, Scott, Rosenmüller, Barnes, Conybeare and Howson, &c.) to point to some former epistolary communication to the church of Corinth, which is now lost. The Greek and most Latin and Dutch commentators, with Macknight, Bloomfield, Dr. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto), &c., would translate the verse, "I have written to you in this epistle," &c. No notice has been taken of the supposed lost epistle by any writers of antiquity. The apocryphal letter of the church of Corinth to St. Paul, and St. Paul's answer, existing in Armenian, are worthless productions that deserve no consideration.

Co-rin'thi-ans, Sec'ond E-pis'tle to the, was written a few months subsequently to the first, in the same year (see above), and thus probably about the autumn of A. D. 57 or 58, a short time previous to the apostle's three months' stay in Achaia (Acts xx. 3). The place whence it was written was clearly not Ephesus (2 Cor. i. 8), but Macedonia (vii. 5, viii. 1, ix. 2), whither the apostle went by way of Troas, after waiting a short time in the latter place for the return of Titus (ii. 12, 13). The Vatican MS., the bulk of later MSS., and the old Syriac version, assign Philippi as the exact place whence it was written; but for this assertion we have no certain grounds to rely on: that the bearers, however, were Titus and his associates (Luke?) is apparently substantiated by ch. viii. 23, ix. 3, 5. The epistle was occasioned by the information which the apostle had received from Titus, and also probably from Timothy, of the reception of the first epistle. Perhaps the return of Timothy and the intelligence he conveyed might have made the apostle feel the necessity of at once dispatching to the contentious church one of his immediate followers (Titus), with instructions to support and strengthen the effect of the epistle, and to bring back the most recent tidings of the spirit prevailing at Corinth. These tidings, as it would seem from our present epistle, were mainly favorable; the better part of the church were returning back to their spiritual allegiance to their founder (i. 13, 14, vii. 9, 15, 16), but there was still a faction, possibly of the Judaizing members (comp. xi. 22), that were sharpened into even a more keen animosity against the apostle personally (x. 1, 10), and more strenuously denied his claim to apostleship. The contents of this epistle are thus very varied, but may perhaps be roughly divided into three parts:—1st, the apostle's account of the character of his spiritual labors, accompanied with notices of his affectionate feelings toward his converts (i.-vii.); 2dly, directions about the collections (viii., ix.); 3dly, defence of his own apostolical character (x.-xiii. 10). The genuineness and authenticity are supported by the most decided external testimony, and by internal evidence of such a kind that what has been said on this point in respect of the first epistle is here even still more applicable. (CANON; PAUL.) The principal historical difficulty connected with the epistle relates to the number of visits made by the apostle to the church of Corinth. The words of this epistle (xii. 14, xiii. 1, 2), seem distinctly to imply that St. Paul had visited Corinth twice before the time at which he now writes. St. Luke, however, only mentions one visit prior to that time (Acts xviii. 1 ff.); for the visit recorded in Acts xx. 2, 3, is confessedly subsequent. We must assume that the apostle made a visit to Corinth which St. Luke did not record, probably during the period of his three-year residence at Ephesus.

Cor'mo-rant, the representative in the A. V. of the Hebrew kāath (PELICAN) and shālāch. The latter, occurring only as the name of an unclean bird in Lev. xi. 17 and Deut. xiv. 17, has been variously rendered; but some sea bird is generally understood to be denoted by it. The etymology (from a root signifying to cast or throw) points to some plunging bird: the common cormorant (Phalacrocorax Carbo), which some writers have identified with the shālāch, is very widely distributed, but, according to Mr. Houghton, is unknown in the eastern Mediterranean; another species is found S. of the Red Sea, but (so Mr. Houghton) none on the W. coast of Palestine (?). Oedmann, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, Gesenius, &c., make the Gr. kataraktēs (= shālīch) = the gannet or solan goose (Sula alba), which, like the cormorant, belongs to the pelican family.

Corn, the A. V. translation of several Hebrew words, as bar or bār (Gen. xli. 35, &c.); also translated "wheat" (Jer. xliii. 28, &c.); dāḡān (Gen. xxvii. 28, 37, &c.), twice (Num. xviii. 12; Jer. xxxi. 12) translated "wheat;" shēber (Gen. xlii. 1, 2, &c.), translated "victuals" once (Neh. x. 31, Heb. 32), &c.; also of several Greek words, as kokkos (Jn. xii. 24), elsewhere translated "grain" (Mat. xiii. 31, &c.); si'os (Mk. iv. 28; Acts vii. 12), elsewhere translated "wheat" (Mat. iii. 12, &c.); plural sporima (Mat. xii. 1), elsewhere translated "cornfields" (Mk. ii. 23; Lk. vi. 1), &c.—"Corn," in the Scriptures as now in England = grain, or the various cereals. The most common kinds were WHEAT, BARLEY, spelt (A. V. "RYE," "FITCHES"), and MILLET; oats are mentioned only by rabbinical writers. Corn-crops are still reckoned at twentyfold what was sown, and were anciently much more. "Seven ears on one stalk" (Gen. xli. 22) is no unusual phenomenon in Egypt at this day. Wheat (2 Sam. iv. 6) was stored in the house for domestic purposes. (BARN.) It is at present often kept in a dry well, and perhaps the "ground corn" of 2 Sam. xvii. 19 was meant to imply that the well was so used. From Solomon's time (2 Chr. ii. 10, 15), as AGRICULTURE became developed under a settled government, Palestine was a corn-exporting country, and her grain was largely taken by Tyre (Ez. xxvii. 17; comp. Am. viii. 5). (COMMERCE.) "Plenty of corn" was part of Jacob's blessing (Gen. xxvii. 28; comp. Ps. lxxv. 13). Maize, or Indian corn, has been generally supposed exclusively a native of America, and hence unknown in Europe and the East before 1492. M. Rifaud, however, discovered in 1819 grains and leaves of it under the head of a mummy at Thebes, and hence Dr. J. Hamilton (in Fairbairn) supposes it may have been known to the Hebrews; but may not these grains and leaves have been deposited there, by accident or design, at some time within the last three or four centuries?

Cornell-us (L., according to Schl. fr. L. cornu, a horn; the name of a celebrated Roman clan), a Roman centurion of the Italian cohort (ARMY, II.) stationed in Cesarea (Acts x. 1, &c.), a devout man full of good works and alms-deeds (PROSELYTE). Cornelius and those assembled in his house were baptized by St. PETER, and thus Cornelius became the first-fruits of the Gentile world to Christ. Tradition has been busy with his life and acts. According to Jerome he built a Christian church at Cesarea; but later tradition makes him bishop of Scamandrios (Scamandria?), and ascribes to him the working of a great miracle.

Corner. The "corner" of the field was not allowed (Lev. xix. 9) to be wholly reaped. The poor had a right to carry off what was so left, and this was a part of the maintenance from the soil to which that class were entitled. On the principles of the Mosaic polity every Hebrew family had a hold on a certain fixed estate, and could by no ordinary and casual calamity be wholly beggared. Hence its indigent members had the claims of kindred on the "corners," &c., of the field which their landed brethren reaped. In the later period of the prophets their constant complaints concerning the defrauding the poor (Is. x. 2; Am. v. 11, viii. 6) seem to show that such laws had lost their practical force. Still later, under the Scribes, minute legislation fixed one-sixtieth as the portion of a field which was to be left for the legal "corner;" but provided also (which seems hardly consistent) that two fields should not be so joined as to leave one corner only where two should fairly be reckoned. The proportion being thus fixed, all the grain might be reaped, and enough to satisfy the regulation subsequently separated from the whole crop. This "corner" was, like the gleanings, tithe-free. AGRICULTURE; BEARD; GLEANING; HAIR; POOR; TITHE; WIDOW.

* Corner-gate (2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Chr. xxv. 23, xxvi. 9; Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10), a gate of JERUSALEM, 400 cubits from the gate of Ephraim (EPHRAIM, GATE OF); apparently (so Kit.) at the N. W. corner.

Corner-stone, a stone of great importance in binding together the sides of a building. Some of the corner-stones in the ancient work of the Temple foundations are 17 or 19 feet long, and 7½ feet thick. (See cut, under JERUSALEM, of the E. corner of the S. wall.) At Nineveh the corners are sometimes formed of one angular stone. "Corner-stone," or "head of the corner," sometimes = any principal person, as the princes of Egypt (Is. xix. 13, A. V. "the stay," margin "the corners," or "governors"), and is thus applied to our Lord (Ps. cxviii. 22; Is. xxviii. 16; Mat. xxi. 42; Eph. ii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7). In Ps. cxliv. 12, translated in A. V. "that our daughters may be as corner-stones, polished (margin "cut") after the similitude of a palace," Gesenius translates "that our daughters may be as corner-columns finely sculptured," supposing an allusion to the slender, tall, and elegant caryatides, or columns representing female figures, common in Egyptian architecture.

Cor-net (Heb. shôphâr), a loud-sounding instrument, made of the horn of a ram or of a chamois (sometimes of an ox), and used by the ancient Hebrews for signals, for announcing the "JUBILEE" (Lev. xxv. 9), for proclaiming the new year, for the purposes of war (Jer. iv. 5, 19; compare Job xxxix. 25), as well as for the sentinels placed at the watch-towers to give notice of the approach of an enemy (Ez. xxxiii. 4, 5). Shôphâr is generally rendered in the A. V. "trumpet," but "cornet" (the more correct translation) is used in 1 Chr. xv. 28; 2 Chr. xv. 14; Ps. xcvi. 6; Hos. v. 8; and in the margin of Ps. cl. 3; Joel ii. 1. "Cornet" is also employed in Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15, for the Chaldee keren (literary a horn). Oriental scholars for the most part consider shôphâr and keren to be one and the same musical instrument; but some biblical critics regard shôphâr and Heb. hâtsôtsêrah or chât-sôtsêrah (= "trumpet" in Num. x. 2 ff., &c.) as belonging to the species of keren, the general term for a horn. Gesenius makes hâtsôtsêrah or châtsôtsêrah = the straight trumpet, and shôphâr = one crooked like a horn. The silver trumpets which Moses was charged to furnish for the Israelites, were to be used for the following purposes: for the calling together of the assembly, for the journeying of the camps, for sounding the alarm of war, and for celebrating the sacrifices on festivals and new moons (Num. x. 1-10). In the age of Solomon the "silver trumpets" were increased in number to 120 (2 Cor. v. 12); and, independently of the objects for which they had been first introduced, they were now employed in the orchestra of the Temple as an accompaniment to songs of thanksgiving and praise. The Heb. yôbel, used sometimes = "year of JUBILEE" (comp. Lev. xxv. 13, 15, with xxv. 23, 30), generally = the institution of Jubilee, but in some instances (so Prof. Marks) = a musical instrument, resembling in its object, if not in its shape, the keren and the shôphâr (Ex. xix. 13, A. V. "trumpet," margin "cornet"). The Heb. plural mina'an'im, translated in A. V. "cornets," Vulgate "sistra" (2 Sam. vi. 5 only) = a musical instrument or rattle, which gave a tinkling sound on being shaken (Ges.). The Gr. salpingx is translated "trump" or "trumpet" in N. T. (Mat. xxiv. 31; 1 Cor. xiv. 8, xv. 52, &c.), and in LXX. = Heb. shôphâr, halsôtsêrâh or châtsôtsêrâh, and keren. The sounding of the cornet was the distinguishing ritual feature of the festival appointed by Moses to be held on the first day of the seventh month under the denomination of "a day of blowing trumpets" (Num. xxix. 1), or "a memorial of blowing of trumpets" (Lev. xxiii. 24). (ASSEMBLY 3; CONVOCATION; FESTIVALS; TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.) The cornet is also sounded in the synagogue at the close of the service for the Day of Atonement, and, amongst the Jews who adopt the ritual of the Sephardim, on the seventh day of the feast of Tabernacles, known by the post-biblical denomination of "the Great Hosannah."

* Cor-ruption, Mount of (2 K. xxiii. 13). OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

Cos or Co'es (both L. fr. Gr.), now Stanchio or Stanko, a small island N. W. from Rhodes, at the entrance of the Grecian Archipelago. It contained Jewish residents in the time of the Maccabees (1 Mc. xv. 23). Josephus mentions that the Jews had a great amount of treasure stored there during the Mithridatic war, and that Julius Cesar issued an edict in favor of the Jews of Cos. Herod the Great conferred many favors on the island. St. Paul, on the return from his third missionary journey, passed the night here, after sailing from MILETUS. It was celebrated for its light woven fabrics, and for its wines—also for a temple of Æsculapius, which was virtually a museum of anatomy and pathology. The Emperor Claudius bestowed upon Cos the privilege of a free state. The chief town (of the same name) was on the N. E., near a promontory called Scandarium: and perhaps it is to the town that reference is made in Acts xxi. 1 (A. V. "Coos").

Ce'sam (prob. fr. Heb. = a diviner, Rbn. N. T. Lxx.), son of Elmodam, in the line of Joseph the husband of Mary (Lk. iii. 28).

* Cotes, the A. V. translation in 2 Chr. xxxii. 28 of Heb. pl. avîrôth (as crib, manger, Ges.). (BARN; MANGER.) "Cote" properly = cot or cottage, as in "sheep-cote," &c.

Cot'ton, the proper translation (so Gesenius, &c.) of the Heb. carpas (compare L. carbasus; Gr. karpasos; Sansc. karpâsa = cotton), Esth. i. 6, where the Vulgate has carbasini colors, as if a color, not a material (so in A. V. "green"), were intended.

There is a doubt whether under the Hebrew shêakh and bûte, in A. V. "white linen," "fine linen," &c., cotton may have been included. (LIXEN.) Cotton garments for the worship of the temples are said to be mentioned in the Rosetta stone. There is, however, no word for the cotton plant in Hebrew, nor any reason to suppose that there was any early knowledge of the fabric. The Egyptian mummy swathings are decided to have been of linen, and not cotton. The very difficulty of deciding, however, shows how easily even scientific observers may mistake, and, much more, how impossible it would have been for ancient popular writers to avoid confusion. Varro knew of tree-wool on the authority of Ctesias, contemporary with Herodotus. The Greeks, through the commercial consequences of Alexander's conquests, must have known of cotton cloth, and more or less of the plant. Cotton was manufactured and worn extensively in Egypt, but extant monuments give no proof of its growth, as in the case of flax, in that country. But when Pliny (A. D. 115) asserts that cotton was then grown in Egypt, a statement confirmed by Julius Pollux (a century later), we can hardly resist the inference that, at least as a curiosity and as an experiment, some plantations existed there. This is the more likely since we find the cotton-tree (not cotton-plant) is mentioned still by Pliny as the only remarkable tree of the adjacent Ethiopia; and since Arabia, on its other side, appears to have known cotton from time immemorial, to grow it in abundance, and in parts to be highly favorable to that product. In India, however, we have the earliest records of the use of cotton for dress; of which, including the starching of it, some curious traces are found as early as 800 B. C., in the Institutes of Manu. Cotton is now both grown and manufactured in various parts of Syria and Palestine; but there is no proof that, till they came in contact with Persia, the Hebrews generally knew of it as a distinct fabric from linen.

Couch. BED.

* Com'ter [o as in no] (fr. L. cultor), (1 Sam. xiii. 20, 21) = "ploughshare," as the Hebrew word êth is elsewhere translated. AGRICULTURE.

Conn'ell (fr. L.; Gr. sunedrion). 1. The great council of the SANHEDRIM, which sat at Jerusalem (Mat. xxvi. 59, &c.).—2. A name applied to the lesser courts (x. 17; Mk. xiii. 9), of which there were two at Jerusalem, and one in each town of Palestine. The constitution of these courts is a doubtful point; but their existence is clearly implied in the passages quoted; and perhaps the "judgment" (Mat. v. 21) applies to them. (JUDGES; SANHEDRIM).—3. (Gr. sumboulion). A kind of jury or privy council (Acts xxv. 12), consisting of a certain number of assessors who assisted Roman governors in the administration of justice and other public matters.—4. (Gr. sumboulion, usually translated "counsel," as in margin). A consultation, or meeting for deliberation (Mat. xii. 14).

* Con'ri-er [koo're-er]. COMPEL; EPISTLE; FOOT-MAN.

* Course [o as in no]. ASTRONOMY; GAMES; PRIEST.

Court [o as in no] (Heb. hâtnêr or châtsêr), an open enclosure, applied in the A. V. most commonly (as the translation of Heb. hâtsêr or châtsêr) to the enclosures of the TABERNACLE and the TEMPLE (Ex. xxvii. 9, xl. 33; Lev. vi. 16; 1 K. vi. 36, vii. 8; 2 K. xxiii. 12; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 5, &c.). In 2 Chr. iv. 9 and vi. 13, the Heb. âzârâh is employed, apparently, for the same places. Hâtsér or châtsér also = the court of a PRISON (Neh. iii. 25; Jer. xxxii. 2, &c.), of a private HOUSE (2 Sam. xvii. 18), and of a PALACE (2 K. xx. 4; Esth. i. 5, &c.); and often = "VILLAGE," HAZER.

Cou'tha (fr. Gr.), a servant of the Temple who returned with Zerobabel (1 Esd. v. 32); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

Cov'e-nant [o as in love]. The Heb. bērith, of which the Gr. diathēkē (see below) is the usual translation in the LXX., is taken by Gesenius to mean primarily a cutting, with reference to the custom of cutting or dividing animals in two, and passing between the parts in ratifying a covenant (Gen. xv.; Jer. xxxiv. 18, 19). Professor Lee makes the proper signification of the word an eating together, or banquet, because among the Orientals to eat together amounts almost to a covenant of friendship. (BANQUETS; SALT.) In the N. T. the Gr. diathēkē (properly a disposition or arrangement; in classic Greek writers usually a disposition by will of property, Rbn. N. T. Lxx., L. & S.) is frequently, though not uniformly, translated "testament" in the A.V., whence the English names OLD TESTAMENT and NEW TESTAMENT. In its biblical meaning of a compact or agreement between two parties, the word is used—1. Of a covenant between God and man. Man not being in any way in the position of an independent covenanting party, the phrase is evidently used by way of accommodation. Strictly speaking, such a covenant is quite unconditional, and amounts to a promise (Gal. iii. 15 ff.) or act of mere favor (Ps. lxxxix. 28). Thus the assurance given by God after the Flood, that a like judgment should not be repeated, and that the recurrence of the seasons, and of day and night, should not cease, is called a "covenant" (Gen. ix.; Jer. xxxiii. 30). Generally, however, the form of a covenant is maintained, by the benefits which God engages to bestow being made by Him dependent upon the fulfilment of certain conditions which He imposes on man. Thus the covenant of Sinai was conditioned by the observance of the ten commandments (Ex. xxxiv. 27, 28; Lev. xxvi. 15), which are therefore called "Jehovah's covenant" (Deut. iv. 13), a name which was extended to all the books of Moses, if not to the whole body of Jewish canonical Scriptures (2 Cor. iii. 13, 14). This last-mentioned covenant, which was renewed at different periods (Deut. xxix.; Josh. xxiv.; 2 Chr. xv., xxiii. xxix., xxxiv.; Ezr. x.; Neh. ix., x.), is one of the two principal covenants between God and man. They are distinguished as old and new (Jer. xxxi. 31–34; Heb. viii. 8–13, x. 16), with reference to the order, not of their institution, but of their actual development (Gal. iii. 17), and also as being the instruments respectively of bondage and freedom (iv. 24). Consistently with this representation of God's dealings with man under the form of a covenant, such covenant is said to be confirmed, in conformity to human custom, by an OATH (Deut. iv. 31; Ps. lxxxix. 3), to be sanctioned by curses to fall upon the unfaithful (Deut. xxix. 21), and to be accompanied by a sign, such as the rainbow (Gen. ix.), circumcision (xvii.), or the Sabbath (Ex. xxxi. 16, 17).—2. Of a covenant between man and man, i. e. a solemn compact or agreement, either between tribes or nations (1 Sam. xi. 1; Josh. ix. 6, 15) (ALLIANCES), or between individuals (Gen. xxxi. 44), by which each party bound himself to fulfil certain conditions, and was assured of receiving certain advantages. In making such a covenant God was solemnly invoked as witness (xxxi. 50), and an oath was sworn (xxi. 31). A sign or witness of the covenant was sometimes framed, such as a gift (xxi. 30), or a pillar, or heap of stones erected (xxxi. 52). The marriage compact is called "the covenant of God" (Prov. ii. 17; see Mal. ii. 14). "Covenant" came to be applied to a sure ordinance, such as that of the shewbread (Lev. xxiv. 8); and is used figuratively in such expressions as a "covenant with death" (Is. xxviii. 18), or "with the beasts of the field" (Hos. ii. 18).

Cow. BULL; BUTTER; CHEESE; HEIFER; HERD; MILK; OX.

Coz (fr. Heb. = thorn, Ges.), a man among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Coz'bi (Heb. lying, false, Ges.) a Midianite woman, slain with Zimri by Phinehas; daughter of Zur, a chief of the Midianites (Num. xxv. 13, 18).

* Crack'nels, the A. V. translation of Heb. pl. nik-kudim = (so Gesenius) a kind of cake which probably crumbled easily (1 K. xiv. 3). BREAD; MOULDY.

* Crafts'man = a man of any particular craft or art, a mechanic (Deut. xxvii. 15; Acts xix. 24, 38, &c.). CHARASHIM.

Crane. Probably the A. V. is incorrect in rendering the Heb. sūs by "crane," which bird is probably intended by the Heb. 'agūr, translated "swallow" by the A. V. In Ezekiel's prayer (Is. xxxviii. 14), "Like a crane (Heb. sūs), or a swallow (Heb. 'agūr), so did I twitter;" and again in Jer. viii. 7 these two words occur in the same order, from which latter passage we learn that both birds were migratory. According to most of the ancient versions, Gesenius, Fürst, &c., sūs denotes a "swallow." "Crane" is a name of several species of large wading birds belonging to the genus Grus.

Cra'tes [-teez] (fr. Gr.), governor of the Cyprians, left by Sostratus in charge of the "castle" of Jerusalem (?), in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mc. iv. 29).

* Cre-a'tion (fr. L.). The book of Genesis opens with the declaration, "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth" (i. 1), and after alluding (2) to a chaotic state, goes on (3 ff.) to describe the works of God during six days, on the last of which man was created. The Scriptures differ from the sacred books of all heathens in ascribing the creation, preservation, and government of the universe to the supreme God in the active exercise of His infinite power, wisdom, and goodness (GENESIS, D. 1). It is now generally agreed that neither in Gen. i. 1, nor elsewhere in the Scriptures, is any definite time assigned as that of the first creative act, i. e. that the Scriptures do not determine how long ago "the beginning" of created existence was, though they teach that the heaven and earth have not existed from eternity, but were called into existence by the fiat of the Almighty. It is now also the prevalent opinion among the best geologists as well as biblical scholars, that the discoveries of modern science are not at all irreconcilable with the declarations of the Scriptures. The precise mode of reconciliation between them is indeed still a matter of controversy. Many (Chalmers, Buckland, &c.) have held that the work of the six days in Gen. i. 3 ff. and Ex. xx. 11 comprehended only the present arrangement of the material universe and the introduction of the existing orders of animals and plants with man at their head, a process occupying six natural days—that the chaotic state in Gen. i. 2 marked the total or partial wreck or wrecks of a previously existing creation with the plants and animals now known only as fossils—and that ages may have elapsed between the original creation in verse 1 and the six days' work in verse 8 ff. The present commonly received opinion among geologists is that the "six days" in Gen. i. 3 ff. (compare ii. 4) and Ex. xx. 11 = six successive periods of time, each of very long duration—that during these periods plants and animals were created, flourished, and became extinct, rocks were formed by the action of fire and by sedimentary deposits under water, and various other changes took place, all, so far as mentioned, in the order described in Gen. i., the earth gradually becoming fitted for the reception of man, and the existing forms of vegetable and animal life. This opinion may be illustrated by the following brief view of Professor Guyot's explanation of Gen. i. (from Bibliotheca Sacra, xii. 324 ff.). Verse 1 describes the creation of the matter of the universe. Verse 2 represents this matter in its chaotic (i. e. gaseous) state. Then come the six cosmogonic "days" (i. e. long periods), ending with a day of rest. These six days are divided into two periods of three days each. In the first three days the creation of inorganic matter takes place; in the second three the creation of organic beings, ending with man. The last day in each series is subdivided, containing two works, while the others contain but one each. The works of each day form great steps in the development, or rather in the successive creation, of the universe and of the globe. These "days" or periods are of unequal length, the first perhaps being the longest, and the others gradually becoming shorter. Science teaches that the original form of matter is the gaseous. The work of the first day was the production of light by the combination of the chemical parts, according to their affinities. That of the second day was the creation of the firmament, i. e. the separation of the mass of gaseous matter into an immense number of nebulous bodies or globes, "the waters above the firmament" afterward constituting the celestial bodies, and "the waters under the firmament" afterward becoming the earth. In the third day were two works:—(1.) the concentration of the matter of the globe into a mineral mass (at first entirely melted, but gradually cooling on the outside), with the separation of the waters of the ocean, which were previously in the form of vapor, from the land which constituted the first continents; (2.) the appearance of vegetation. The work of the fourth day was the organization of the solar system in its present condition, the succession of days and nights and of seasons, i. e. of the climates and physical conditions necessary to the existence of living beings. The work of the fifth day was the creation of the lower orders of animals, including the water animals, the amphibious and other reptiles, and the birds, and comprehending the paleozoic and reptilian ages of geology. The work of the sixth day, corresponding to the tertiary age of geology, was twofold: (1.) the creation of the higher animals specially living on the dry land, or the mammals; (2.) the creation of man. After this comes the seventh day of rest, or the still unfinished Sabbath of the earth, since the beginning of which no new creation has taken place. Only the outlines of the grand cosmogonic week are given by Moses, who received his narrative as a revelation from God, and probably did not himself fully comprehend the system of creation which he described.—The facts gathered from nature teach us, according to Professor Dana, that species have not been made out of species by any process of growth or development; —that the "original divine power" did not create a generic or universal germ from which all subordinate genera or species were developed;—that the evolution or plan of progress was by successive creations of species in their full perfection;—that the creation was not in a lineal series from the very lowest upward, for gigantic saurians appeared before turtles and serpents, trilobites were superior to many crustaceans afterward created, &c.; yet there was a gradual elevation of the successive races involved in the gradual refrigeration of the earth, as also in its other steps of physical progress; while the creations of the tribes were not simultaneous, but successive, and occurring at many different times, after more or less complete extirpations of previously existing life (Bibliotheca Sacra, xiii. 119 ff.). After all the objections raised against the credibility of the Mosaic account of the creation, it is still accepted and revered by the wisest and best among men of science. "The scientific writers in our language," says Professor Dana (Bibliotheca Sacra, xiii. 645), "that aim to exalt the Bible in their works, greatly outnumber those that publish works of detraction." The simple believer in the Scriptures has no need to fear the investigations of science in any of its departments; for the God that gave the Bible is the God of truth, and every truth will be found ultimately to be in harmony with every other truth. ADAM; ASTRONOMY; DAY; EARTH; FIRMAMENT; GENESIS; HEAVEN; INSPIRATION; JEHOVAH; MAN; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

Cred it-or. LOAN.

Crescens [-senz] (L. growing, increasing) (2 Tim. iv. 10), an assistant of St. Paul, said to have been one of the seventy disciples. According to early tradition, he preached the Gospel in Galatia. Later tradition makes him preach in Gaul, and found the church at Vienne.

Crete [kreet] (fr. Gr. Krētē, said to be named from a nymph Creta, or from Cres, its first king, or [so Strabo] from the Curetes, its ancient inhabitants), the modern Candia. This large island, which closes in the Greek Archipelago on the S., extends through a distance of 140 miles between its extreme points of Cape SALMONE (Acts xxvii. 7) on the E., and Cape Criumetopon beyond PHENICE (12) on the W. Though extremely bold and mountainous, this island has very fruitful valleys, and in early times it was celebrated for its hundred cities. From Crete comes the Latin name of "chalk," creta, i. e. Cretan earth. Crete was conspicuous in the mythology and early history of Greece, especially in connection with its king and legislator Minos, but comparatively unimportant in its later history. (PELETHITES.) It seems likely that a very early acquaintance existed between the Cretans and the Jews. There is no doubt that Jews were settled in the island in considerable numbers during the period between the death of Alexander the Great and the final destruction of Jerusalem. GORTYXA seems to have been their chief residence (1 Mc. xv. 23). Thus the special mention of Cretans (Acts ii. 11) among those who were at Jerusalem at Pentecost is just what we should expect. No notice is given in the Acts of any more direct evangelization of Crete; and no absolute proof can be adduced that St. Paul was ever there before his voyage from Caesarea to Puteoli. The circumstances of St. Paul's recorded visit were briefly as follows. The wind being contrary when he was off CNIDUS, the ship was forced to run down to Cape Salmone, and thence under the lee of Crete to FAIR HAVENS, near LASEA. Thence, after some delay, an unsuccessful attempt was made, on the wind becoming favorable, to reach Phenice for the purpose of wintering there (xvii. 7-12). It is evident from Tit. i. 5, that the apostle himself was in Crete, where he had left Titus, at no long interval of time before he wrote the letter. (TITUS, EPISTLE TO.) In Tit. i. 12, St. Paul adduces from Epimenides, a Cretan sage and poet, contemporary with Solon, sixth century B. C. (ALTAR, C. 2; ATHENS), a quotation in which the vices of his countrymen are described in dark colors — "liars," "evil beasts" (= brutes), "slow bellies" (= lazy gluttons).

Cretes [kreets] (Acts ii. 11), Cretians [-shanz] (Tit. i. 12) = Cretans, inhabitants of CRETE.

* Crib (Job xxxix. 9; Prov. xiv. 4; Is. i. 3). BARN; COTES; MANGER.

* Crime. BLASPHEMY; DIVINATION; IDOLATRY; MURDER; PUNISHMENTS; SLAVE; TRIAL.

Crim'son. COLORS.

* Crisp'ing-Pins (Is. iii. 22). BAG 1.

Cris'pus (L. curled?), ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth (Acts xviii. 8); baptized with his family by St. Paul (1 Cor. i. 14). According to tradition, he became afterward bishop of Aegina.

Cross. Except the Latin crux, from which the English "cross" is derived, there was no word definitively and invariably applied to this instrument of punishment. The Greek stauros, uniformly and correctly translated "cross" in the N. T., in Homer = an upright pole or stake (L. & S.). For the different forms, see below. As the emblem of a slave's death and a murderer's punishment, the cross was naturally looked upon with the profoundest horror, and closely connected with the ideas of pain, of guilt, and of ignominy (Gibbon, ii. 153). But after the celebrated vision of Constantine, in which, according to Eusebius, a luminous cross appeared in the heavens after mid-day with the inscription in Greek, "By this conquer," the representation being repeated at night in a dream, in which Christ also appeared to him, he ordered his friends to make a cross of gold and gems, such as he had seen, and "the towering eagles resigned the flags unto the cross" (Pearson), and "the tree of cursing and shame" "sat upon the sceptres and was engraved and signed on the foreheads of kings" (Jeremy Taylor, Life of Christ, iii. xv. 1). The new standards were called by the Latin name Labarum, and may be seen on the coins of Constantine the Great and his nearer successors. The Labarum is described in Eusebius, and, besides the pendent cross, supported the celebrated embroidered monogram of Christ, which was also inscribed on the shields and helmets of the legions. We may tabulate thus the various descriptions of cross, using the Latin designations, which are mostly explained in the subsequent description:—

1. The crux simplex, (L. = a cross simple), or mere stake of one single piece without transom, was probably the original of the rest. Sometimes it was merely driven through the man's chest (see cut under WAR), but at other times it was driven longitudinally through the whole body, coming out at the mouth. Another form of punishment consisted of tying the criminal to the stake, from which he hung by his arms.—2. The crux decussata (L. = a cross decussate, or X-shaped), is called St. Andrew's cross (ANDREW), although on no good grounds. It was in the shape of the letter X.—3. The crux commissa (L. = a cross joined together), or St. Anthony's cross (so called from being embroidered on that saint's cope), was in the shape of the letter T. A variety of this cross (the crux ansata [L. = a cross with a handle], "crosses with circles on their heads") is found "in the sculptures from Khorsabad and the ivories from Nimroud. In the Egyptian sculptures, a similar object, called a crux ansata, is constantly borne by divinities. The same symbol has been also found among the Copts, and (perhaps accidentally) among the Indians and Persians.—4. The crux immissa (L. = a cross let into, or let in), or Latin cross, differed from the former by the projection of the upright above the crossbar. That this was the kind of cross on which our Lord died is obvious from the mention of the "title," as placed above our Lord's head, and from the almost unanimous tradition; it is repeatedly found on the coins and columns of Constantine. There was a projection from the central stem, on which the body of the sufferer rested. This was to prevent the weight of the body from tearing away the hands. Whether there was also a support to the feet (as we see in pictures), is doubtful. An inscription was generally placed above the criminal's head, briefly expressing his guilt, and generally was carried before him. It was covered with white gypsum, and the letters were black. Nicquetus says it was white with red letters. It is a question whether tying or binding to the cross was the more common method. That our Lord was nailed, according to prophecy, is certain (John xx. 23, 27, &c.; Zech. xii. 10; Ps. xxii. 16). It is, however, extremely probable that both methods were used at once. The story of the so-called "invention" (i. e. discovery) of the cross," A.D. 326, is too famous to be altogether passed over. Socrates, Theodoret, &c., say, that the Empress Helena, Constantine's mother, was instructed in a dream to go to Jerusalem, that she found there three crosses with a superscription, that one of them miraculously cured a dying woman, and was therefore declared to be the genuine cross of Christ, and that she gave a part of it to the city of Jerusalem, and sent the rest to Constantine. Afterward, pieces of the so-called true cross were distributed through Christendom. To this day the supposed title, or rather fragments of it, are shown to the people once a year in the church of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme at Rome. In the epistles of St. Paul, "the cross of Christ," or "the cross" simply, figuratively = all that is connected with the cross,

i. e. the sufferings and death of the Lord Jesus Christ, the sacrifice for sin which He offered (see ATONEMENT), and in general, the great doctrines of the Gospel (1 Cor. i. 17, 18; Gal. v. 11, vi. 12, 14, &c.). Compare the "name" of the Lord (Ex. xxxiv. 5-7; 1 Sam. xii. 22, &c.). It was not till the 6th century that the emblem of the cross became the image of the crucifix. As a symbol the use of it was frequent in the early church. It was not till the second century that any particular efficacy was attached to it. CRUCIFIXION; JESUS CHRIST.

Crown. This ornament, which is both ancient and universal, probably originated from the fillets used to prevent the hair from being dishevelled by the wind. Such fillets are still common, and they may be seen on the sculptures of Persepolis, Nineveh, and Egypt; they gradually developed into turbans, which by the addition of ornamental or precious materials assumed the dignity of mitres or crowns. The use of them as ornaments probably was suggested by the natural custom of encircling the head with flowers in token of joy and triumph (Wis. ii. 8; Jd. xv. 13). Both the ordinary priests and the high priest wore them. The common "bonnet" of the priests (Heb. migbá'ah; Ex. xxviii. 40, xxxix. 28), formed a sort of linen turban or crown (Jos. iii. 7, § 3). The mitre of the high priest (Heb. mitenepheth, used also of a regal "diadem," Ez. xxi. 26) was much more splendid (Ex. xxviii. 36 ff., xxxix. 28, 30, 31; Lev. viii. 9). It had a fillet of blue lace, and over it a golden diadem (Heb. nézer, A. V. "crown," Ex. xxix. 6). The gold band was tied behind with blue lace (embroidered with flowers), and being two fingers broad, bore the inscription "Holiness to the Lord" (compare Rev. xvii. 5; Jos. iii. 7, § 7; B. J. v. 5, § 7). The use of the crown by priests, and in religious services was universal. "A striped head-dress and queue," or "a short wig, on which a band was fastened, ornamented with an asp, the symbol of royalty," was used by the kings of Egypt in religious ceremonies (Wilkinson's Ancient Egyptians, iii. 354, fig. 13). The crown worn by the kings of Assyria was "a high mitre . . . frequently adorned with flowers, &c., and arranged in bands of linen or silk. Originally there was only one band, but afterward there were two, and the ornaments were richer" (Layard, ii. 320). There are many words in Scripture denoting a crown besides those mentioned: as Heb. pér, the head-dress of bridegrooms (Is. lxi. 10, A. V. "ornaments," Ez. xxiv. 17, A. V. "the tire of thine head"), and of women (Is. iii. 20, A. V. "bonnets"); Heb. tephiróth, a head-dress (A. V. "diadem") of great splendor (Is. xxviii. 5); Heb. livyáth, a wreath (A. V. "ornament") of flowers (Prov. i. 9, iv. 9); and Heb. tsiniph (see DIADEM; HEAD-DRESS), a common tiara or turban (Job xxix. 14, A. V. "diadem," Is. iii. 23, A. V. "hoods"). The general Hebrew word for "crown" is 'atáráth, and we must attach to it the notion of a costly turban irradiated with pearls and gems of priceless value, which often form aigrettes, or plumes, for feathers, as in the crowns of modern Asiatic sovereigns. Such was probably the crown, which with its precious stones weighed (or rather was worth) a talent, taken by David from the king of Ammon at Rabbah, and used as the state crown of Judah (2 Sam. xii. 30). The Gr. stephanos, in the LXX., = Heb. 'atáráth, and is used in the N. T. for every kind of crown; the Gr. stemma is used once (Acts xiv. 13) for the "garlands" used with victims. In Rev. xii. 3, xiii. 1, xix. 12, allusion is made to many "crowns" worn in token of extended dominion. In these passages the Gr. diadema (= DIADEM) is used. The laurel, pine, or parsley crowns given to victors in the great GAMES of Greece are finely alluded to by St. Paul (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 5, &c.).

Crown of Thorns (Mat. xxvii. 29; Mk. xv. 17; Jn. xix. 2, 5). Our Lord was crowned with THORNS in mockery by the Roman soldiers. The object seems to have been insult, and not the infliction of pain as has generally been supposed. The Rhamnus or Spina Christi, although abundant in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, cannot be the plant intended, because its thorns are so strong and large that it could not have been woven into a wreath. Had the acacia been intended, as some suppose, the phrase would have been different. Obviously some small flexile thorny shrub is meant.

Cru-el-áx-ion was in use among the Egyptians (Gen. xl. 19), the Carthaginians, the Persians (Esth. vii. 10), the Assyrians, Scythians, Indians, Germans, and from the earliest times among the Greeks and Romans. Whether this mode of execution was known to the ancient Jews is a matter of dispute. Probably the Jews borrowed it from the Romans. It was unanimously considered the most horrible form of death. Among the Romans also the degradation was a part of the infiction, and the punishment if applied to freemen was only used in the case of the vilest criminals. Our Lord was condemned to it by the popular cry of the Jews (Mat. xxvii. 23) on the charge of sedition against Cesar (Lk. xxiii. 2), although the Sanhedrim had previously condemned him on the totally distinct charge of blasphemy. The scarlet robe, crown of thorns, and other insults to which our Lord was subjected were illegal, and arose from the spontaneous petulance of the brutal soldiery. But the punishment properly commenced with scourging, after the criminal had been stripped. It was inflicted not with the comparatively mild rods, but the more terrible scourge (2 Cor. xi. 24, 25), which was not used by the Jews (Deut. xxv. 3). Into these scourges the soldiers often stuck nails, pieces of bones, &c., to heighten the pain, which was often so intense that the sufferer died under it. In our Lord's case, however, this infliction seems neither to have been the legal scourging after sentence, nor yet the examination by torture (Acts xxii. 24), but rather a scourging before the sentence, to excite pity and procure immunity from further punishment (Lk. xxiii. 22; Jn. xix. 1). The criminal carried his own cross, or at any rate a part of it. Hence, figuratively, to take, take up, or bear one's cross = to endure suffering, affliction, or shame, like a criminal on his way to the place of crucifixion (Mat. x. 38, xvi. 24; Lk. xiv. 27, &c.). The place of execution was outside the city (1 K. xxi. 13; Acts vii. 58; Heb. xiii. 12), often in some public road or other conspicuous place. Arrived at the place of execution, the sufferer was stripped naked, the dress being the perquisite of the soldiers (Mat. xxvii. 35). The cross was then driven into the ground, so that the feet of the condemned were a foot or two above the earth, and he was lifted upon it, or else stretched upon it on the ground, and then lifted with it. Before the nailing or binding took place, a medicated cup was given out of kindness to stupefy the sufferer, usually of "wine mingled with myrrh." Our Lord refused it, probably that his senses might be clear (Mat. xxvii. 34; Mk. xv. 23). (GALL.) He was crucified between two "thieves" or "malefactors," according to prophecy (Is. liii. 12); and was watched according to custom by a party of four soldiers (Jn. xix. 23) with their centurion (Mat. xxvii. 54), whose express office was to prevent the stealing of the body. This was necessary from the lingering character of the death, which sometimes did not supervene even for three days, and was at last the result of gradual benumbing and starvation. But for this guard, the persons might have been taken down and recovered, as was actually done in the case of a friend of Josephus. Fracture of the legs was especially adopted by the Jews to hasten death (Jn. xix. 31). But the unusual rapidity of our Lord's death was due to the depth of His previous agonies, or may be sufficiently accounted for simply from peculiarities of constitution. Pilate expressly satisfied himself of the actual death by questioning the centurion (Mk. xv. 44). In most cases the body was suffered to rot on the cross by the action of sun and rain, or to be devoured by birds and beasts. Sepulture was generally therefore forbidden; but in consequence of Deut. xxi. 22, 23, an express national exception was made in favor of the Jews (Mat. xxvii. 58). This accursed and awful mode of punishment was happily abolished by Constantine. PUNISHMENTS.

Cruse, the translation in the A. V. of three distinct Hebrew words.—1. Tsappathath or tsappachath (= a cruse, flask, Ges.), carried by Saul on his expedition after David (1 Sam. xxvi. 11, 12, 16), and by Elijah (1 K. xix. 6), to hold water. In a similar case in the present day this would be a globular vessel of blue porous clay about nine inches in diameter, with a neck about three inches long, a small handle below the neck, and opposite the handle a straight spout, with an orifice about the size of a straw, through which the water is drunk or sucked. A similar globular vessel probably contained the oil of the widow of Zarepath (1 K. xvii. 12, 14, 16).—2. The noise which these vessels make when emptied through the neck is suggestive of the second term, bakkûk, which is used for a "cruse of honey" (1 K. xiv. 3), and an "earthen bottle" (Jer. xix. 1, 10).—3. Apparently very different from both these is the other term, tselôhith or tselôchith, which occurs only in 2 K. ii. 20, and was probably a flat metal saucer of the form still common in the East. Other words from the same root are translated in 2 Chr. xxxv. 13 "pans," and in 2 K. xxi. 13 "dish."

Crystal, the representative in the A. V. of—1. Heb. zêcûcith (Job xxviii. 17 only): "The gold and the crystal cannot equal it," i. e. wisdom. Notwithstanding the different interpretations ("rock crystal," "glass," "adamant," &c.), that have been assigned to this word, there can, Mr. Houghton thinks, be very little doubt that "GLASS" is intended. The old versions and paraphrases, Ges., Fû., &c., favor this interpretation.—2. Heb. kerah or kerach, which in other passages in the O. T. = "ice," "frost;" but once only (Ez. i. 22), as is generally understood = "crystal." The ancients supposed rock-crystal to be merely ice congealed by intense cold. The similarity of appearance between ice and crystal caused no doubt the identity of the terms to express these substances.—3. Gr. krustallos (in LXX. = No. 2) occurs in N. T. in Rev. iv. 6, xxii. 1. It may mean either "ice," or "crystal." A participle of the kindred Greek verb krustallizô occurs in Rev. xxi. 11, A. V. "clear as crystal."

Cuckoo. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Cuckoo [u as in bull], spelled "cuckow" in some copies, the A. V. translation of the Heb. shahaph or shachaph. Mr. Houghton thinks, there is no authority for this translation of the A. V., though the "cuckoo" (Cuculus canorus), a migratory insectivorous bird of the Eastern continent, is said to pass the winter in Palestine, and may be the bird in question (Gosse in Fairbairn, Col. C. H. Smith in Kitto); the Hebrew word occurs twice only (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15), as the name of some unclean bird. Bochart has attempted to show that the Hebrew denotes the cepphus (kepphos of Aristotle), which is probably the storm-petrel (Thalasidroma pelagica), a small web-footed sea-bird. Gesenius, following the LXX. and Vulgate, makes the Hebrew = the sea-mew or sea-gull, a sea-bird of the genus Larus, Linn. Tristram has suggested that some of the larger petrels, e. g. the Puffinus cinereus and P. Anglorum (shearwater), which abound in the E. of the Mediterranean and are similar in their habits to the storm-petrel, may be denoted by the Hebrew term.

Cucumbers, the translation of the Heb. kish-shuim, which occurs once only, in Num. xi. 5, as one of the good things of Egypt for which the Israelites longed. There is no doubt that this is a correct translation of the Hebrew, though the name may not have been confined to the common cucumber. Egypt produces excellent cucumbers, melons, &c. (MELON), the Cucumis chate being styled by Hasselquist "the Egyptian melon or queen of the cucumbers." This plant grows in the fertile earth around Cairo after the inundation of the Nile, and not elsewhere in Egypt. The C. chate is a variety only of the common musk-melon (C. Melo); it was once cultivated in England and called "the round-leaved Egyptian melon;" but it is rather an insipid sort. Besides the Cucumis chate, the common cucumber (C. sativus), of which the Arabs distinguish a number of varieties, is common in Egypt. "Both Cucumis chate and C. sativus," says Tristram, "are now grown in great quantities in Palestine: on visiting the Arab school in Jerusalem (1858) I observed that the dinner which the children brought with them to school consisted, without exception, of a piece of barley cake and a raw cucumber, which they eat rind and all." The "lodge (COTTAGE 2) in a garden of cucumbers" (Heb. mikaháh = a field of cucumbers, Ges., Fü.) (Is. i. 8) is a rude temporary shelter, erected in the open grounds where vines, cucumbers, gourds, &c., are grown, in which some lonely man or boy is set to watch, either to guard the plants from robbers, or to scare away the foxes and jackals from the vines. Compare Bar. vi. 70.

* Cum'brance = an encumbrance or burden (Deut. i. 12).

Cum'min (Heb. cammon; Gr. kuminon), one of the cultivated plants of Palestine (Is. xxviii. 25, 27; Mat. xxiii. 23). It is an umbelliferous plant (Cuminum sativum, Linn.), something like fennel. The seeds have a bitterish warm taste with an aromatic flavor. The Maltese are said to grow it at the present day, and to thresh it with a rod as described by Isaiah.

* Cum'ning, in A. V., as an adjective = skilful, expert, as a workman, &c. (Gen. xxv. 27; Ex. xxxviii. 23, &c.); or skilfully done, as work (Ex. xxviii. 15, &c.); as a noun = skill, expertness (Ps. cxxxvii. 5).

Cup. The chief Hebrew words rendered "cup" in the A. V. are, 1. cós (Gen. xi. 11, 13, 21, &c.); 2. kisáóh, only in plural (1 Chr. xxviii. 17), elsewhere translated "covers" (Ex. xxv. 29, &c.); 3. gebíá' (Gen. xiv. 2, 12, 16, 17), elsewhere translated in plural "bowls" (Ex. xxv. 31, &c.), once "pots" (Jer. xxxv. 5). For the Heb. aggán ("cups," Is. xxii. 24), see BASIN; for Heb. saph (2 Sam. xvii. 28, margin; Zech. xii. 2), see BASIN. The Gr. potérion (= drinking vessel or cup) is uniformly translated and from the Phenicians, who were celebrated in that branch of workmanship. Egyptian cups were of various shapes, either with handles or without them. In Solomon's time all his drinking vessels were of gold, none of silver (1 K. x. 21). Babylon is compared to a golden cup (Jer. li. 7). The great laver, or "sea," was made with a brim like the brim of a cup (Heb. cós), "with flowers of lilies" (1 K. vii. 26), a form which the Persepolitan cups resemble.—"Cup" often = what is contained in a cup, cupful (Mat. x. 42; Lk. xxiii. 20, &c.). Hence, figuratively, "cup = one's lot or portion, as if the contents of a cup presented by God to be drank, whether of good (Ps. xvi. 5, xxiii. 5, &c.), or of evil (Ps. xi. 6, lxxv. 8; Mat. xx. 22, 23, xvi. 39, 42, &c.). "The cup of salvation" (Ps. cxvi. 13) = the cup of thanksgiving to God for deliverance or salvation. "The cup of blessing" (1 Cor. x. 16) = the cup on or over which a blessing has been pronounced. (See LORD'S SUPPER; PASSOVER, I. d.) "The cup of devils" (Gr. pl. of daimonion; see DEMON) (verse 21) = the cup consecrated to devils, or heathen gods. See also DIVINATION 12.

Cup'-bear-er (Heb. maskkeh = one who gives to drink; Gr. oinochos = one who pours out wine); an officer of high rank with Egyptian, Persian, Assyrian, as well as Jewish monarchs (1 K. x. 5). It was his special business to fill and hand the cups of wine, &c., to the king and his guests. Not unfrequently it was his duty to taste the wine in the king's presence before delivering it to the king. His privilege of free access to the sovereign made his office one of high trust and often of great political and pecuniary value. The chief cup-bearer, or butler, to the king of Egypt was the means of raising Joseph to his high position (Gen. xl. 1 ft., xli. 9 ft.). RABSHAKK is supposed to have filled a like office in the Assyrian court (2 K. xviii. 17). NEHEMIAH was cup-bearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (Neh. i. 11, ii. 1). ACHIACHAR'S.

Cur'tain. The Hebrew terms translated in the A. "cup" in the N. T. (Mat. x. 42, xxiii. 25, &c.), and in the LXX. = Heb. cós. The cups of the Jews, whether of metal or earthenware, were possibly borrowed, in point of shape and design, from Egypt fabrics of the Tabernacle was laid on the Gershonites (Num. iv. 25). "Curtains" sometimes = the TABERNACLE (2 Sam. vii. 2; 1 Chr. xvii. 1), or a TEXT (Jer. iv. 20, &c.).—2. Māšēc, the "hanging" for the doorway of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 36, &c.), and also for the gate of the court round the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvii. 16, &c.). The rendering "curtain" occurs but once (Num. iii. 26). The idea in the root of māšēc seems to be that of shielding or protecting. If so, it may have been not a curtain or veil, but an awning to shade the entrances. (HANGING 1).—3. Dōk, found but once (Is. xl. 22), = fineness, hence, fine cloth, a garment, curtain, &c. (Ges.); a fine thin cloth, a fine carpet (Fü.).

Cush (Heb. black, Fū.), a Benjamite mentioned only in the title to Ps. vii. He was probably a follower of Saul, the head of his tribe.

Cush (Heb. black, Fū.), the name of a son of Ham, apparently the eldest, and of a territory or territories occupied by his descendants.—1. In the genealogy of Noah's children Cush seems to be an individual, for it is said "Cush begat Nimrod" (Gen. x. 8; 1 Chr. i. 10). If the name be older than his time he may have been called after a country allotted to him. Descendants of Cush enumerated are: his sons, SEBA, HAVILAH, SABTAH or SABTA, RAAMAH, and Sabtechah or SABTECHA; his grandsons, SHEBA and DEKAN; and NIMROD, mentioned after the rest, and apparently a remoter descendant than they.—2. Cush as a country, Mr. R. S. Poole, the original author of this article, regards as African in all passages except Gen. ii. 13, margin ("ETHIOPIA" in text, A. V.; see EDEN 1). We may thus distinguish a primeval and a post-diluvian Cush. The former was encompassed by Gihon, the second river of Paradise; it would seem therefore to have been somewhere to the N. of Assyria. It is possible that Cush is in this case a name of a period later than that to which the history relates, but it seems more probable that it was of the earliest age, and that the African Cush was named from this older country. In the ancient Egyptian inscriptions Ethiopia above Egypt is termed Kesh or Kesh, and this territory probably perfectly = the African Cush of the Bible. The Cushites, however, had clearly a wider extension, like the Ethiopians of the Greeks, but apparently with a more definite ethnic relation. The Cushites appear to have spread along tracts extending from the higher Nile to the Euphrates and Tigris. History affords many traces of this relation of Babylonia (BABEL), ARABIA, and ETHIOPIA. ZERAH the Cushite (A. V. "Ethiopian"), defeated by Asa, was most probably a king of Egypt. So also TIRHAKAH. Very soon after their arrival in Africa, the Cushites appear to have established settlements along the S. Arabian coast, on the Arabian shore of the Persian Gulf and in Babylonia, and thence onward to the Indus, and probably N. to Nineveh. ARABIA.

Cūsham (Heb. fr. CUSH) (Hab. iii. 7), possibly = CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, king of Mesopotamia. The order of events alluded to by the prophet seems to favor this supposition. There is far less reason for the supposition that Cushman here = an Asiatic CUSH (so Mr. R. S. Poole).

Cūshi (Heb. = CUSHITE; ETHIOPIAN). 1. A man apparently attached to Joab's person, but unknown and unaccustomed to the king, as may be inferred from his not being recognized by the watchman, and also from the abrupt manner in which he breaks his evil tidings to David. That Cushi was a foreigner—as we should infer from his name—is also slightly corroborated by his ignorance of the ground in the Jordan valley, by knowing which Ahimaaz outran him (2 Sam. xviii. 21 ff.).—2. An ancestor of Jehudi at Jehoiakim's court (Jer. xxxvi. 14).—3. Father of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

* Cūsh'ite (fr. Heb. = descendant from CUSH) (Num. xii. 1, margin; "Ethiopian" in text). ETHIOPIAN WOMAN.

Cuth or Cūthah (both Heb. in form; supposed by Boch., &c. to be Chal. = CUSH; treasure-house! Ayre), one of the countries whence Shalmaneser introduced colonists into Samaria (2 K. xvii. 24, 30). The position of Cuthah is undecided; Josephus speaks of a river of that name in Persia, and fixes the residence of the Cutheans in the interior of Persia and Media. Two localities have been proposed, each of which corresponds in part, but neither wholly, with Josephus:—1. Kutha, of the Arab geographers, between the Tigris and Euphrates, the site of which has been identified with the ruins of Towibah immediately adjacent to Babylon.—2. The Cutheans have been identified with the Cosmāi, a warlike tribe, who occupied the mountain ranges dividing Persia and Media.

Cū'ting off from the People. EXCOMMUNICATION; PUNISHMENTS.

* Cū'ting off the Hair. HAIR; NAZARITE; VOWS.

* Cū'ting off the Head. PUNISHMENTS.

Cū'tings (in the Flesh). The prohibition (Lev. xix. 28) against marks or cuttings in the flesh for the dead must be taken in connection with the parallel passages (Lev. xxi. 5; Deut. xiv. 1), in which shaving the head with the same view is equally forbidden. But it appears from Jer. xvi. 6, 7, xli. 5, that some outward manifestation of grief in this way was not wholly forbidden, or was at least tolerated. (MOURNING.) The ground, therefore, of the prohibition must be sought elsewhere, and will be found in the superstitious or inhuman practices prevailing among heathen nations. The priests of Baal cut themselves with knives to propitiate the god "after their manner" (1 K. xviii. 28). Herodotus says the Carians, who resided in Europe, cut their foreheads with knives at festivals of Isis; in this respect exceeding the Egyptians, who beat themselves on these occasions. Lucian, speaking of the Syrian priestly attendants of this mock deity, says, that using violent gestures they cut their arms and tongues with swords. The prohibition, therefore, is directed against practices prevailing not among the Egyptians whom the Israelites were leaving, but among the Syrians, to whom they were about to become neighbors. But there is another usage contemplated more remotely by the prohibition, viz., that of printing marks, tattooing, to indicate allegiance to a deity, in the same manner as soldiers and slaves bore tattooed marks to indicate allegiance or serfdom. This is evidently alluded to in Rev. xiii. 16, xvii. 5, xix. 20, and, though in a contrary direction, in Ez. ix. 4; Gal. vi. 17; Rev. vii. 3, and perhaps Is. xlv. 5 and Zech. xiii. 6.

Cū'a-mon [si-] (fr. Gr. = bean-field, L. & S.), a place named only in Jd. vii. 3, as lying in the plain (A. V. "valley") over against Esdraelom. If "Esdraelom" = Jezreel, this description answers to the situation of the ruins at Tell Kaimón, on the eastern slopes of Mount CARMEL, a conspicuous position overlooking the Kishon and the great plain. CAMON; JORNEAM.

Cūm bal, Cūm bāls [sim-] (Heb. plural tsilts'lim [2 Sam. vi. 5; Ps. cl. 5], and dual mitšiltayim [1 Chr. xv. 8, &c.], both translated in LXX. by plural of Gr. kumbalon, which in singular occurs in 1 Cor. xiii. 1, and from which comes the English "cymbal" through the L. cymbalum, a percussive musical instrument. Two kinds of cymbals are mentioned in Ps. cl. 5, "loud cymbals" or castanets, and "high-sounding cymbals." The former consisted of four small plates of brass or of some other hard metal; two plates were attached to each hand of the performer, and were struck together to produce a loud noise. The latter consisted of two larger plates, one held in each hand, and struck together as an accompaniment to other instruments. The use of cymbals was not necessarily restricted to the worship of the Temple or to sacred occasions: they were employed for military purposes, and also by the Hebrew women as a musical accompaniment to their national dances. Both kinds of cymbals are still common in the East in military music. The cymbals used in modern orchestras and military bands, are two metal plates of the size and shape of saucers, one fixed, the other held by the performer in his left hand. These resemble very closely the "high-sounding cymbals" of old, and are used in a similar manner to mark the rhythm, especially in music of a loud and grand character. BELLS.

Cypress [si-], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. hirzih (Is. xiv. 14 only). We are quite unable to assign any definite rendering to it (so Mr. Houghton). Besides the "cypress," the "beech," the "holm-oak," and the "fir" have been proposed. The Hebrew word points to some tree with a hard grain, and this is all that can be positively said of it.—2. Gr. kuparissos (= cypress, or evergreen cypress, Cypressus sempervirens, L. & S., Dr. Royle in Kit. &c.), described as growing "upon the mountains of Hermon" (Ecclus. xxiv. 13) and "up to the clouds" (l. 10). The cypress, at present, is found cultivated only in the lower levels of Syria (so Mr. Houghton). It is a native of the Taurus. It is "a flame-shaped, tapering, cone-like tree, with upright branches growing close to the trunk, and resembling in general appearance the Lombardy poplar" (Loudon). Its foliage is dark evergreen, and its wood is fine-grained, hard, fragrant, very durable, and of a beautiful reddish hue. GOPHER WOOD.

Cypri-ans [sip're-anz] = inhabitants of the island of CYPRUS (2 Mc. iv. 29). At the time alluded to (i. e. during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes), they were under the dominion of Egypt, and were governed by a viceroy. CRATES.

Cyprus [si-] (L. fr. Gr.), a large island of the Mediterranean, about one hundred and forty-eight miles long, and about forty miles broad for two-thirds of its length, the N. E. end being a long narrow peninsula. Cyprus is about 130 miles N. W. from Sidon. This island was in early times in close commercial connection with Phenicia; and there is little doubt that it is referred to in such passages of the O. T. as Ez. xxvii. 6. (CHITTIM.) Josephus (i. 6, § 1) makes this identification in the most express terms. Possibly Jews may have settled in Cyprus before the time of Alexander. Soon after his time they were numerous in the island, as is distinctly implied in 1 Mc. xv. 23. The first notice of it in the N. T. is in Acts iv. 36, as the native place of BARNABAS. In Acts xi. 19, 20, it appears prominently in connection with the earliest spreading of Christianity, and is again mentioned in connection with the missionary journeys of St. PAUL (xiii. 4-13, xv. 39, xxi. 3), and with his voyage to Rome (xxvii. 4). Situated in the extreme E.

corner of the Mediterranean, with the range of Lebanon on the E., and that of Taurus on the N., distinctly visible, it never became a thoroughly Greek island. Its religious rites were half Oriental (PAPHOS), and its political history has almost always been associated with Asia and Africa. It was rich and productive. Its fruits and flowers were famous. The mountains also produced metals, especially copper, which derives its name from Cyprus. Cyprus, after being subject to the Egyptian king Amasis, became a part of the Persian empire, and furnished ships against Greece in Xerxes' expedition. For a time it was subject to Greek influence, but again became tributary to Persia. After the battle of Issus, it joined Alexander, and after his death, fell to Ptolemy. The island became a Roman province (B. C. 58) under circumstances discreditable to Rome. At first its administration was joined with that of Cilicia, but after the battle of Actium it was separately governed. In the first division it was made an imperial province; but the emperor afterward gave it up to the senate. The proconsul ("DEPUTY" A. V.; the coin below names a proconsul of the Cyprians on its reverse: see SERGIUS PAULUS) appears to have resided at PAPHOS on the W. of the island. In the reign of Trajan a terrible insurrection of the Jews led to a massacre, first of the Greek inhabitants, then of the insurgents. In the ninth century, Cyprus fell into the power of the Saracens. The crusaders conquered it under Richard I. of England in 1191; the Venetians in 1473; the Turks in 1571. CAPHTOR; ELYMAS; SALAMIS.

Cy-re-ne (L. fr. Gr.; said to have been named from Cyrene, mother of its first chief), the principal city of that part of northern Africa, which was anciently called Cyrenaica, and also (from its five chief cities) Pentapolitana. This district was that wide projecting portion of the coast (corresponding to the modern Tripoli), which was separated from the territory of Carthage on the one hand, and that of Egypt on the other. Its surface is a table-land descending by terraces to the sea; and it was celebrated for its climate and fertility. (LIBYA.) The points to be noticed in reference to Cyrene as connected with the N. T. are these,—that, though on the African coast, it was a Greek city; that the Jews were settled there in large numbers, and that under the Romans it was politically connected with CRETE. The Greek colonization of this part of Africa under Battus began as early as B. C. 631; and it became celebrated for its commerce, physicians, philosophers (PHILOSOPHY), and poets. After the death of Alexander the Great, it became a dependency of Egypt. In this period we find the Jews established there with great privileges. Ptolemy the son of Lagus introduced them (see 1 Mc. xv. 23). Soon after the Jewish war (A. D. 70) they rose against the Roman power. In B. C. 75 the territory of Cyrene was reduced to the form of a province. On the conquest of Crete (B. C. 67) the two were united in one province, and together frequently called Creta-Cyrene. The numbers and position of the Jews in Cyrene prepare us for the frequent mention of the place in the N. T. in connection with Christianity. Simon, who bore our Saviour's cross (Mat. xxvii. 32; Mk. xv. 21; Lk. xxiii. 26) was a native of Cyrene. Jewish dwellers in Cyrenaica were in Jerusalem at Pentecost (Acts ii. 10). They even gave their name to one of the synagogues in Jerusalem (vi. 9). Christian converts from Cyrene were among those who contributed actively to the formation of the first Gentile church at Antioch (xi. 20). Lucius of Cyrene (xiii. 1) is traditionally said to have been the first bishop of his native district. The ruins of Cyrene occupy a vast space at the modern Ghrena, 550 miles E. of the city of Tripoli; Apollonia, the port of Cyrene, about twelve miles distant, is also in ruins.

* Cy-re'ni-an (Mk. xv. 21; Lk. xxiii. 26; Acts vi. 9) = a person from CYRENE.

Cy-re'ni-us, the English rendering in the A. V. of the Gr. Aurénios, which is itself the Greek form of the Roman name Quirinus (= spearman, warrior, Freund). The full name is Publius Sulpicius Quirinus. He was consul A. C. 742, B. C. 12, and made governor of Syria after the banishment of Archelaus in A. D. 6. He was sent to make an enrolment of property in Syria, and made accordingly, both there and in Judea, a CENSUS or registration. (TAXING.) But this census seems in Lk. ii. 2 to be identified with one which took place at the time of the birth of JESUS CHRIST, when Sentius Saturninus, as has been commonly supposed, was governor of Syria. Hence has arisen a considerable difficulty, which has been variously solved, either by supposing some corruption in the text of St. Luke, or by giving some unusual sense to his words. But A. W. Zumpt, of Berlin, has shown it to be probable that Quirinus was twice governor of Syria, and by arguments too long to be reproduced here, but very striking and satisfactory, fixes the time of his first governorship at from B. C. 4—when he succeeded Quintilius Varus, the successor of Sentius Saturninus (Jos. xvii. 5, § 2)—to B. C. 1, when he was succeeded by Marcus Lollius.

Cy'rus (L.; Heb. Côresh; probably fr. Pers. = the sun), the founder of the Persian empire (see Dan. vi. 28, x. 1, 13; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 22, 23), was, according to the common legends, the son of Mandane, the daughter of Astyages the last king of Media, and Cambyzes, a Persian of the royal family of the Achæmenidæ. In consequence of a dream, Astyages, it is said, designed the death of his infant grandson, but the child was spared by those whom he charged with the commission of the crime, and was reared in obscurity under the name of Agradates. When he grew up to manhood his courage and genius placed him at the head of the Persians. The tyranny of Astyages had at that time alienated a large faction of the Medes, and Cyrus headed a revolt which ended in the defeat and capture of the Median king B. C. 559, near Pasargadæ, supposed to have been about fifty miles N. E. of Persepolis, at the modern Murg-Aub. After consolidating the empire which he thus gained, Cyrus entered on that career of conquest which has made him the hero of the East. In B. C. 546 (?) he defeated Cræsus, and the kingdom of Lydia was the prize of his success. Babylon fell before his army, and the ancient dominions of Assyria were added to his empire (B. C. 538). (BELSHAZZAR; DARIUS THE MEDIC.) Probably Cyrus planned an invasion of Egypt; and there are traces of campaigns in Central Asia, in which he appears to have attempted to extend his power to the Indus. Afterward he attacked the Massagetae, and according to Herodotus fell in a battle against them B. C. 539. His tomb is still shown at Pasargadae, the scene of his first decisive victory. In the absence of authentic details of his actions, the empire which he left is the best record of his power and plans. Like an Oriental ALEXANDER, he aimed at universal dominion; and the influence of Persia, like that of Greece, survived the dynasty from which it sprang. In every aspect the reign of Cyrus marks an epoch in universal history. The fall of Sardis and Babylon was the starting-point of European life. But the personal relations to God's people, with which he is invested in the Scriptures, are full of a more peculiar interest. Hitherto the great kings, with whom the Jews had been brought into contact, had been open oppressors or seductive allies; but Cyrus was a generous liberator and a just guardian of their rights. An inspired prophet (Is. xlv. 28) recognized him "a shepherd" of the Lord, an "anointed" king (xlv. 1). The permanent effects which Persia has wrought upon the world can be better traced through the Jewish people than through any other channel. In this respect also, Cyrus stands out clearly as the representative of the East, as Alexander afterward of the West. The one led to the development of the idea of order, and the other to that of independence. Ecclesiastically the first crisis was signalized by the consolidation of a church; the second by the distinction of sects. The one found its outward embodiment in "the great Synagogue" (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT); the other in the dynasty of the Asmoneans. (MACCABEES.) The edict of Cyrus for the rebuilding of the Temple (2 Chr. xxxvi. 22, 23; Ezr. i. 1-4, iii. 7, iv. 3, v. 13, 17, vi. 3) was in fact the beginning of Judaism; and the great changes by which the nation was transformed into a church are clearly marked. 1. The lesson of the kingdom was completed by the CAPTIVITY. The sway of a temporal prince was at length felt to be only a faint image of that Messianic kingdom to which the prophets pointed. 2. The Captivity, which was the punishment of idolatry, was also the limit of that sin. Thenceforth the Jews apprehended the spiritual nature of their faith, and held it fast through persecution. 3. The organization of the outward church was connected with the purifying of doctrine, and served as the form in which the truth might be realized by the mass. Prayer assumed a new importance. The Scriptures were collected. Synagogues were erected, and schools formed. SCRIBES shared the respect of priests. 4. Above all, the bond by which "the people of God" was held together, was at length felt to be religious, and not local, nor even primarily national. The Jews, incorporated in different nations, still looked to Jerusalem as the centre of their faith. DISPERSION, THE JEWS OF THE.

tines. The most famous temples of Dagon were at Gaza (Judg. xvi. 21–30) and Ashdod (1 Sam. v. 5, 6; 1 Chr. x. 10). The latter temple was destroyed by Jonathan in the Maccabean wars (1 Mc. x. 83, 84, xi. 4). Traces of the worship of Dagon likewise appear in the names Caphar-Dagon and BETH-DAGON. Dagon was represented with the face and hands of a man and the tail of a fish (1 Sam. v. 4). In the Babylonian mythology the name Dagon (Odakon) is applied to a fish-like being who rose from the waters of the Red Sea as one of the great benefactors of men. Niebuhr appears to identify this being with the Phenician god, but Rawlinson regards them as wholly distinct. The fish-like form was a natural emblem of fruitfulness, and as such was likely to be adopted by seafaring tribes in the representation of their gods.

Dal'san (Gr.) (1 Esd. v. 31) = REZIN 2.

Dal-lal'ah [-la'yah] or Dal-a-l'ah (fr. Heb. = DELAIAH), sixth son of Elieoenai, a descendant of the royal family of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 24).

Dal-ma-nu'tha (L.), a town on the W. side of the sea of Galilee near MAGDALA. About one mile from Magdala is a narrow glen to the S., at the mouth of which are the ruins of a village. The place is called 'An el-Bāridah, "the cold Fountain." Here probably (so Porter) is the site of Dalmanutha.

Dal-ma'ti-a [-she-a] (Gr. and L.; named [so Polybius] from Delminium, or Dalminium, the ancient capital), a mountainous district on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea, extending from the river Naro in the S. to the Savus in the N. It formed a portion of the Roman province of ILLYRICUM after A. D. 9. St. Paul sent Titus there (2 Tim. iv. 10), and he himself had preached the Gospel in its immediate neighborhood (Rom. xv. 19).

Dal'phon [-fon] (Heb. fr. Pers.), the second of the ten sons of Haman slain by the Jews (Esth. ix. 7).

Dam'a-ris (Gr. and L.; perhaps = Gr. damalis, a heifer, Grotius, &c.), an Athenian woman converted to Christianity by St. Paul's preaching (Acts xvii. 34). Chrysostom and others held her = the wife of Dionysius the Areopagite.

* Dam-as-cenes' [-seenz] (fr. Gr.) = inhabitants of DAMASCUS (2 Cor. xi. 32).

Da-mas'cus (L.; Heb. Dammasek or Darneseek, activity, alertness, perhaps in reference to traffic, Ges.), one of the most ancient, and at all times one of the most important, of the cities of SYRIA. It is situated in a plain of extreme fertility, which lies E. of the great chain of Antilibanus, on the edge of the desert. This plain, which is nearly circular, and about thirty miles in diameter, owes its fertility to the river Barada. (ABANA.) Two other streams, the Wady Helbon upon the N., and the Awaj upon the S., increase the fertility of the Damascene plain. (PHARPAR.) According to Josephus, Damascus was founded by Uz, the son of Aram, and grandson of Shem. It is first mentioned in Scripture in connection with ABRAHAM (Gen. xiv. 15), whose steward was a native of the place (xv. 2). We may gather from his name (ELIEZER), as well as from the statement of Josephus, which connects the city with the Arameans, that it was a Shemitic settlement. Nothing more is known of Damascus until the time of David, when "the Syrians of Damascus came to succor Hadadezer, king of Zobah," with whom David was at war (2 Sam. viii. 5; 1 Chr. xviii. 5). On this occasion "David slew of the Syrians 22,000 men;" and in consequence of this victory became completely master of the whole territory, which he garrisoned with Israelites (2 Sam. viii. 6). It appears that in the reign of Solomon, Rezon, who had been a subject of Hadadezer, and had escaped when David conquered Zobah, made himself master of Damascus, and established his own rule there (1 K. xi. 23–25). Afterward the family of Hadad, whom Nicolaüs of Damascus makes king of Damascus in David's time, appears to have recovered the throne, and BEN-HADAD I., grandson of the antagonist of David, is found in league with Baasha, king of Israel, against Asa (xv. 19; 2 Chr. xvi. 3), and afterward in league with Asa against Baasha (1 K. xv. 20). He was succeeded by his son Hadad IV. (BEN-HADAD II. of Scripture), who was defeated by AHAB (1 K. xx.). Three years afterward war broke out afresh, through Ahab's claim to Ramoth-Gilead (xxii. 1–4). The defeat and death of Ahab at that place (15–37) seem to have enabled the Syrians of Damascus to resume the offensive. Their bands ravaged the lands of Israel during the reign of Jehoram; and they even undertook at this time a second siege of Samaria, which was frustrated miraculously (2 K. vi. 24, vii. 6, 7). After this, we do not hear of any more attempts against the Israelite capital. The cuneiform inscriptions show that toward the close of his reign Ben-hadad was exposed to the assaults of a great conqueror, who was bent on extending the dominion of Assyria over Syria and Palestine. Perhaps these circumstances encouraged HAZAEL to murder Ben-hadad and seize the throne, which Elisha had declared would certainly one day be his (viii. 15). Shortly after the accession of Hazael (about B. C. 884), he was in his turn attacked by the Assyrians, who defeated him with great loss amid the fastnesses of Antilibanus. However, in his wars with Israel and Judah he was more fortunate, and his son BEN-HADAD III. followed up his successes (viii. 28, 29, ix. 14, 15, x. 32, 33, xii. 17, 18, xiii. 3-7, 22, 24). At last a deliverer appeared (verse 5), and Joash, the son of Jehoahaz, "beat Hazael thrice, and recovered the cities of Israel" (verse 25). In the next reign still further advantages were gained by the Israelites. Jeroboam II. (about B. C. 836) is said to have "recovered Damascus" (xiv. 28), and though this may not mean that he captured the city, it at least implies that he obtained a certain influence over it. A century later (about B. C. 742) the Syrians appear as allies of Israel against Judah (xv. 37). It seems to have been during a pause in the struggle against Assyria that REZIN, king of Damascus, and Pekah, king of Israel, resolved conjointly to attack Jerusalem, intending to depose Ahaz and set up as king a creature of their own (Is. vii. 1-6; 2 K. xvi. 5). The attempt signally failed. AHAZ asked and obtained aid from TIGLATH-PILESER; Rezin was slain, the kingdom of Damascus brought to an end, and the city itself destroyed, the inhabitants being carried captive into Assyria (verses 7-9; compare Is. vii. 8 and Am. i. 5). It was long before Damascus recovered from this serious blow (Is. xvii. 1; Jer. xlix. 23 ff.; Am. i. 4). We do not know at what time Damascus was rebuilt; but Strabo says that it was the most famous place in Syria during the Persian period (6th century, &c., B. C.). Shortly after the battle of Issus (ALEXANDER THE GREAT), it was taken by Parmenio; and from this time it continued to be a place of some importance under the Greeks, becoming however decidedly second to ANTIOCH I. The Romans became masters of it B. C. 64. At the time of the Apostle PAUL, it formed a part of the kingdom of ARETAS (2 Cor. xi. 32). A little later it was reckoned to DECAPOLIS. It grew in magnificence under the Greek emperors, and when taken by the Mohammedans (ARABIA) A. D. 634, was one of the first cities of the Eastern world. It is still a city of 150,000 inhabitants. July 9, 1860, the Mohammedans of Damascus massacred about 6,000 of the Christian population, and burned their quarter of the city. Damascus has always been a great centre for trade. It would appear from Ez. xxvii. 18 that Damascus took manufactured goods from the Phenicians, and supplied them in exchange with wool and wine. But the passage trade of Damascus (CAMEL) has probably been at all times more important than its direct COMMERCE. Some translate Am. iii. 12 (A. V. "in Damascus on a couch") "on the damask couch;" but it is questionable whether this fabric, or the peculiar method of working in steel, which has impressed itself in a similar way upon the speech of the world, was invented by the Damascenes before the Mohammedan era.—Certain localities in Damascus are shown as the site of those Scriptural events which especially interest us in its history. A "long wide thoroughfare," leading direct from one of the gates to the castle or palace of the Pasha, is "called by the guides 'Straight'" (Acts ix. 11); but the natives know it among themselves, as "the Street of Bazaars." The house of Judas is shown, but it is not in the street "Straight." That of Ananias is also pointed out. The scene of the conversion is confidently said to be an open green spot, surrounded by trees, and used as the Christian burial-ground; but four distinct spots have been pointed out at different times, so that little confidence can be placed in any of them. The point of the walls at which St. Paul was let down by a basket (verse 25; 2 Cor. xi. 33) is also shown.

Gr. krima (= judgment, Rbn. *N. T. Gr. krisis (properly = separation; in N. T. judgment, Rbn. *N. T. Gr. katakrinó (= condemnation, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) (Wis. xii. 47).—So also the Greek verb krinó (properly = to separate, hence, to decide, to judge, Rbn. N. T. Lex.), from which are derived No. 2 and 3 above, is usually translated "to judge" (Mat. vii. 1, 2; Jn. v. 22, 30, &c.), sometimes "to condemn" (Jn. iii. 17, 18; Acts xii. 27, &c.), "to determine" (Acts iii. 13; 1 Cor. ii. 2; 2 Cor. ii. 1, &c.), &c., is translated in the passive "might be damned" (2 Th. ii. 12). The Greek compound verb katakrinó (= to give judgment against, to condemn, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is uniformly translated "to condemn" (Mat. xii. 41, 42, xx. 18, &c.), except twice in the passive, viz. Mk. xvi. 16 ("shall be damned"), Rom. xiv. 23 ("is damned"). DEATH; ETERNAL; HELL; JUDGMENT; PUNISHMENTS.

Dan (Heb. judge). 1. The fifth son of Jacob, and the first of Bilhah, Rachel's maid (Gen. xxx. 6). The origin of the name is given in the exclamation of Rachel—"God hath judged me (dánanni) . . . and given me a son," therefore she called his name Dan (judge). In the blessing of Jacob (xlix. 16) this play on the name is repeated—"Dan shall judge (yáddin) his people." (ADDER 4.) Dan was own brother to Naphtali; but no personal history of him is preserved. Only one son (Hushim 1) is attributed to him (xlv. 23); but when the people were numbered in the wilderness of Sinai, his tribe was, with the exception of Judah, the most numerous of all, containing 62,700 men able to serve. The position of Dan during the march through the desert was on the N. side of the Tabernacle, among the hindmost of the long procession (Num. ii. 25, 26, 31, x. 25). It arrived at the threshold of the Promised Land, and passed the ordeal of the rites of Baal-peor with an increase of 1,700 on the earlier census (xxv., xxvi. 42, 43). The remaining notices of the tribe before the passage of the Jordan are unimportant. It furnished a "prince" to the apportionment of the land; and it was appointed to stand on Mount Ebal at the ceremony of blessing and cursing (Deut. xxvii. 13). Moses said of Dan: "Dan is a lion's whelp; he shall leap from Bashan" (xxxiii. 22). Dan was the last of the tribes to receive his portion, and that portion was apparently the smallest of the twelve (Josh. xix. 40-48). But notwithstanding its smallness it had eminent natural advantages. On the N. and E. it was completely embraced by Ephraim and Benjamin, while on the S. E. and S. it joined Judah, and was thus surrounded by the three most powerful states of the whole confederacy. From Japho—afterward Joppa, and now Yāfa—on the N., to Ekron and Gath-rimmon on the S., a length of at least fourteen miles, that noble tract, one of the most fertile in the whole of Palestine, was allotted to this tribe. (SEPELA.) By Josephus (v. 1, § 22, and 3, § 1) this is extended to Ashdod on the S. and Dor on the N. But this rich district, the corn-field and the garden of the whole S. of Palestine, was too valuable to be given up without a struggle by its original possessors. The Amorites accordingly “forced the children of Dan into the mountain, for they would not suffer them to come down into the valley” (Judg. i. 34)—forced them up from the corn-fields of the plain, with their deep black soil, to the villages whose ruins still crown the hills that skirt the lowland. With the help of Ephraim, Dan prevailed against the Amorites for a time, but in a few years the Philistines took the place of the Amorites and with the same result. These considerations enable us to understand how it happened that long after the partition of the land “all the inheritance of the Danites had not fallen to them among the tribes of Israel” (xviii. 1). They also explain the warlike and independent character of the tribe betokened in the name of their headquarters “MAHANEH-DAN,” “the camp, or host, of Dan,” in the fact specially insisted on and reiterated (11, 16, 17) of the complete equipment of their 600 warriors “appointed with weapons of war,”—and the lawless freebooting style of their behavior to Micah. In the “security” and “quiet” (7, 10) of their rich northern possession (No. 2, below) the Danites enjoyed the leisure and repose which had been denied them in their original seat. Gesenius translates Judg. v. 17 (A. V. “and why did Dan remain in ships?”)—and Dan, why abides he at the ships? i. e. why dwells he listless on the coast of the sea? In the time of David Dan still kept its place among the tribes (1 Chr. xii. 35). Asher is omitted, but the ruler or prince “of Dan” is mentioned in the list of 1 Chr. xxvii. 22. But from this time forward the name as applied to the tribe vanishes; it is kept alive only by the northern city. In the genealogies of 1 Chr. ii.—xii. the descendants of Dan are omitted entirely, which is remarkable when the great fame of SAMSON (AHOIAB; HURAM 3), and the warlike character of the tribe are considered, and can only be accounted for by supposing that its genealogies had perished. Lastly, Dan is omitted from the list of those who were sealed by the angel in the vision of St. John (Rev. vii. 5–8).—2. The well-known city, so familiar as the most northern landmark of Palestine, in the common expression “from Dan even to BEER-SHEBA” (Judg. xx. 1, &c.). The name of the place was originally LAISH or LESHEM. Its inhabitants lived “after the manner of the Zidonians,” i. e. engaged in commerce, and without defence. Living thus “quiet and secure,” they fell an easy prey to the active and practised freebooters of the Danites. These conferred upon their new acquisition the name of their own tribe, “after the name of their father who was born unto Israel” (Judg. xviii. 7, 27–29; Josh. xix. 47). The locality of the town is specified with some minuteness. It was “far from Zidon,” and “in the valley that is by BETH-REHOB.” To the form of the graven image set up by the Danites in their new home, and the nature of the idolatry we have no clew, nor to the relation, if any, between it and the calf-worship (CALF; IDOLATRY) afterward instituted there by Jeroboam (1 K. xii. 29, 30; Am. viii. 14).—After the establishment of the Danites at Dan it became the acknowledged extremity of the country. Dan was, with other northern cities, laid waste by Ben-hadad (1 K. xv. 20; 2 Chr. xvi. 4), but is afterward mentioned in Jer. iv. 15, viii. 16. Various considerations (its mention in Gen. xiv. 14; Deut. xxxiv. 1, &c.) incline to the suspicion that Dan was a holy place of note from a far earlier date than its conquest by the Danites. With regard to Gen. xiv. 14 three explanations suggest themselves.—(1.) That another place of the same name is intended.—(2.) That it is a prophetic anticipation by the sacred historian of a name which was not to exist till centuries later.—(3.) That the passage originally contained an older name, as Laish; and that when that was superseded by Dan, the new name was inserted in the MSS. (Ewald).—The Tell el-Kādi, a mound from the foot of which gushes out one of the largest fountains in the world, the main source of the Jordan, is very probably the site of the town and citadel of Dan. The spring is called el-Leddān (possibly a corruption of Dan), and the stream from the spring Nahr ed-Dhan, while the name, Tell el-Kādi, “the Judge’s mound,” agrees in signification with the ancient name. It is four miles west of Bānids. (CESAREA PHILIPPI).—3. In Ez. xxvii. 19 (Heb. vedān, A. V. “Dan also”) Gesenius has Vedan, as the proper name of an Arabian city, probably Aden, whence cloths, wrought iron, caesia and other spices were brought to Tyre. First regards “Dan” here as a contraction of DEDAN. Others refer it to the tribe of Dan.

Dance. 1. The dance is spoken of in Holy Scripture universally as symbolical of some rejoicing, and is often coupled for the sake of contrast with mourning, as in Eccl. iii. 4 (compare Ps. xxx. 11; Mat. xi. 17). In the earlier period it is found combined with some song or refrain (Ex. xv. 20, xxxii. 18, 19; 1 Sam. xxi. 11); and with the tambourine (A. V. “timbrel”), more especially in those impulsive outbursts of popular feeling which cannot find sufficient vent in voice or in gesture singly. Dancing formed a part of the religious ceremonies of the Egyptians, and was also common in private entertainments. Many representations of dances, both of men and women, are found in the Egyptian paintings. The “feast unto the Lord,” which Moses proposed to Pharaoh to hold, was really a dance. The Hebrew verb hāgag or chāgag, translated in Ex. v. 1 “hold a feast,” literally (so Gesenius) = to move in a circle, hence to dance, properly, in a circle (1 Sam. xxx. 16, A. V. “dancing”); to keep a festival, celebrate a holiday, sc. by leaping and dancing, by sacred dances (Ex. v. 1; Lev. xxiii. 41, A. V. “shall keep,” “shall celebrate,” Ps. xlii. 4, Heb. 5, A. V. “that kept holyday”); to reel, to be giddy, spoken of drunkards (Ps. cvii. 27, A. V. “reel to and fro”). Women, however, among the Hebrews, made the dance their especial means of expressing their feelings; and so welcomed their husbands or friends on their return from battle (1 Sam. xviii. 6). The “eating and drinking and dancing” of the Amalekites is recorded, as is the people’s “rising up to play,” with a tacit censure (xxx. 16; Ex. xxxii. 6; 1 Cor. x. 7). So among the Bedouins, native dances of men are mentioned, and are probably an ancient custom. The Hebrews, however, save in such moments of temptation, seem to have left dancing to the women. But more especially, on such occasions of triumph, any woman whose nearness of kin to the champion of the moment gave her a public character among her own sex, seems to have felt that it was her part to lead such a demonstration of triumph, or of welcome (Ex. xv. 20; Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7; Jd. xv. 12, 13). This marks the peculiarity of David's conduct, when, on the return of the Ark of God from its long sojourn among strangers and borderers, he (2 Sam. vi. 5-22) was himself chorus-leader; and here too the women, with their timbrels (see especially verses 5, 19, 20, 23), took an important share. This fact brings out more markedly the feelings of Saul's daughter Michal, keeping aloof from the occasion, and "looking through a window" at the scene. She should, in accordance with the examples of Miriam, &c., have herself led the female choir, and so come out to meet the Ark and her lord. She stays with the "household" (20) and "comes out to meet" him with reproaches, perhaps feeling that his zeal was a rebuke to her apathy. From the mention of "damsels," "timbrels," and "dances" (see No. 2, below) (Ps. lxxviii. 25, cxlix. 3, cl. 4), as elements of religious worship, it may perhaps be inferred that David's feeling led him to incorporate in its rites that popular mode of festive celebration. This does not seem to have survived him (compare 2 Chr. xxix. 30, xxxv. 4, 15). In later Judaism the dance of men was practised at the feast of Tabernacles. Loose morality commonly attended festive dances at heathen shrines. Said Cicero, "No one dances unless he is either drunk or mad" (Kitto). In the earlier period of the Judges the dances of the virgins in Shiloh, apart from men (Judg. xxi. 19-23), were certainly part of a religious festivity. What the fashion or figure of the dance was, is a doubtful question. Most of the Hebrew verbs translated "to dance" in A. V., viz. hāgag or chāgag above, hūl or chūl (Judg. xxi. 21, 23), cārār (2 Sam. vi. 14, 16), literally = to turn or move in a circle. The Hebrew verb rākad, also translated "to dance" (1 Chr. xv. 29; Job xxi. 11; Eccl. iii. 4; Is. xiii. 21), = to leap, skip, e. g. for joy, or for fear (Ps. cxiv. 4, 6, A. V. "skipped"). The Greek verb orchomai (= to leap, sc. by rule, to dance, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is translated in N. T. "to dance" (Mat. xi. 17, &c.), and in LXX. = Heb. cārār and rākad. Dancing also had its place among merely festive amusements apart from any religious character (Jer. xxxi. 4, 13; Lam. v. 15; Mk. vi. 22; Lk. xv. 25). Children dance (Job xxi. 11; Mat. xi. 17; Lk. vii. 32).—2. By this word is also rendered in the A. V. and by Gesenius, Fürst, LXX., &c., the Hebrew māhōl or māhōl, which Professor Marks, Dr. A. Clarke, Mendelssohn, the Arabic version, &c., regard as denoting a musical instrument of percussion, supposed to have been used by the Hebrews at an early period of their history. In Ps. cl. the sacred poet exhorts mankind to praise Jehovah in His sanctuary with all kinds of music; and among the instruments mentioned is found māhōl or māhōl (verse 4; A. V. "dance," margin "pipe"). Professor Marks, &c., believe it to have been made of metal, open like a ring, with small bells attached to its border, and played at weddings and merry-makings by women, who accompanied it with the voice. One author describes it as having tinkling metal plates fastened on wires, at intervals within the circle that formed the instrument, like the modern tambourine; according to others it was of metal or wood, with a handle which the performer might so manage as to set in motion several rings strung on a metal bar, passing from one side of the instrument to the other, the waving of which produced a loud, merry sound.

Dan-i-el (L. fr. Heb. Dāniyēl or Dāniēl = judge of God, Ges.; God is judge, Fū.). 1. The second son of David, by Abigail the Carmelitess (1 Chr. iii. 1); in 2 Sam. iii. 3 called CHILEAB.—2. A descendant of Ithamar, who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 2).—3. A priest who sealed the covenant drawn up by Nehemiah B. c. 445 (Neh. x. 6); perhaps = No. 2.—4. The fourth of "the greater prophets." (See the next article.) Nothing is known of his parentage or family. He appears, however, to have been of royal or noble descent, and to have possessed considerable personal endowments (Dan. i. 3, 4). He was taken to Babylon in "the third year of Jehoiakim" (B. c. 604)<sup>1</sup> and trained for the king's service

<sup>1</sup> This date has given rise to many objections, because Jehoiakim's fourth year is identified with Nebuchadnezzar's first (Jer. xxv. 1). Various explanations have been proposed, but the text of Daniel suggests the true explanation. The second year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign (Dan. ii. 1) falls after the completion of Daniel's three years' training which commenced with his captivity (i. 1, 5); and this is a clear indication that the expedition mentioned in i. 1 was undertaken in the last year of Nabopolassar, while as yet Nebuchadnezzar was not properly king. Some further difficulties appear to have been satisfactorily removed by Niebuhr. The date in Jer. xli. 2 is not that of the battle of Carchemish, but of the prophet's warning; and the threats and promises in Jer. xxv. are consistent with the notion of a previous subjec-

(BELTESHAZZAR; CHALDEANS) with his three companions. Like Joseph, in earlier times, he gained the favor of his guardian, and was divinely supported in his resolve to abstain from the "king's meat" for fear of defilement (8-16). At the close of his three years' discipline, Daniel had an opportunity of exercising his peculiar gift of interpreting dreams, on the occasion of Nebuchadnezzar's decree against the Magi (5, 17, 18, ii. 14 ff.). In consequence of his success he was made "ruler of the whole province of Babylon," and "chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon" (ii. 48). He afterward interpreted the second dream of Nebuchadnezzar (iv. 8-27), and the handwriting on the wall which disturbed the feast of BELSHAZZAR (v. 10-38), though he no longer held his official position among the magi (7, 8, 12), and probably lived at Susa (viii. 2). At the accession of Darius he was made first of the "three presidents" of the empire (vi. 2), and was delivered from the lions' den, into which he had been cast for his faithfulness to the rites of his faith (10-23; compare B. & D. 29-42). At the accession of Cyrus he still retained his prosperity (Dan. vi. 28; compare i. 21; B. & D. 2); though he does not appear to have remained at Babylon (compare Dan. i. 21), and in "the third year of Cyrus" (B. C. 534) he saw his last recorded vision on the banks of the Tigris (x. 1, 4). According to Mohammedan tradition, Daniel returned to Judea, held the government of Syria, and finally died at Susa, where his tomb is still shown, and is visited by crowds of pilgrims. In Ezekiel mention is made of Daniel as a pattern of righteousness (xiv. 14, 20) and wisdom (xxviii. 3); and since Daniel was still young at that time (about B. C. 588-584), some have thought that another prophet of the name must have lived at some earlier time, perhaps during the Captivity of Nineveh, whose fame was transferred to his later namesake. On the other hand the narrative in Dan. i. 11, implies that Daniel was conspicuously distinguished for purity and knowledge at a very early age (compare Sus. 45), and he may have been nearly forty years old at the time of Ezekiel's prophecy.

Dan i-el, the Book of (DANIEL 4), is the earliest example of apocalyptic literature, and in a great degree the model according to which all later apocalypses were constructed (so Mr. Westcott, the original author of this article). In this aspect it stands at the head of a series of writings in which the deepest thoughts of the Jewish people found expression after the close of the prophetic era. (ENOCH, BOOK OF; ESDRAS, SECOND BOOK OF; REVELATION OF ST. JOHN.) There can be no doubt that it exercised a greater influence upon the earlier Christian church than any other writing of the O. T., while in the Gospels it is especially distinguished by the emphatic quotation of our Lord (Mat. xxiv. 15).—1. In studying Daniel, it is of the utmost importance to recognize its apocalyptic character. To the old prophets Daniel stands, in some sense, as a commentator (Dan. ix. 2-19): to succeeding generations, as the herald of immediate deliverance. The form, the style, and the point of sight of prophecy, are relinquished upon the verge of a new period in the existence of God's people, and fresh instruction is given to them suited to their new fortunes. The change is not abrupt and absolute, but yet it is distinctly felt. The eye and not the ear is the organ of the Seer: visions and not words are revealed to him. The Babylonian exile supplied the outward training and the inward necessity for this last form of divine teaching; and the prophetic visions of Ezekiel form the connecting link between the characteristic types of revelation and prophecy.—2. The language of the book, no less than its general form, belongs to an era of transition. Like Ezra, Daniel is composed partly in the vernacular Aramaic (Chaldee), and partly in the sacred Hebrew. The introduction (i.-ii. 4 a) is written in Hebrew. On the occasion of the "Syriac" (i. e. Aramaic) answer of the Chaldeans, the language changes to Aramaic, and this is retained till the close of the seventh chapter (ii. 4 b-vii.). The personal introduction of Daniel as the writer of the text (viii. 1) is marked by the resumption of the Hebrew, which continues to the close of the book (viii.-xii.). The character of the Hebrew bears the closest affinity to that of Ezekiel and Habakkuk. The Aramaic, like that of Ezra, is also of an earlier form than exists in any other Chaldaic document. The use of Greek technical terms marks a period when commerce had already united Persia and Greece; and the occurrence of peculiar words which admit of an explanation by reference to Aryan and not to Shemitic roots (MEDES; PERSIANS; SEMITIC LANGUAGES) is almost inexplicable on the supposition that the prophecies are a Palestinian forgery of the Maccabean age.—3. The book is generally divided in two nearly equal parts. The first of these (i.-vi.) contains chiefly historical incidents; the second (vii.-xii.) is entirely apocalyptic. But this division takes no account of the difference of language, nor of the change of person at the beginning of chapter viii. It seems better to divide the book into three parts. The first chapter forms an introduction. Chapters ii.-vii. give a general view of the progressive history of the powers of the world, and of the principles of the divine government as seen in events of the life of Daniel. Chapters viii.-xii. trace in minuter detail the fortunes of the people of God, as typical of the fortunes of the church in all ages (see § 11, below).—4. The position which Daniel occupies in the Hebrew Canon seems at first sight remarkable. It is placed among the Holy writings (or Hagiographa; see BIBLE) between Esther and Ezra, or immediately before Esther, and not among the prophets. This collocation, however, is a natural consequence (so Mr. Westcott) of its being as distinct in its character from the prophetic writings as the Apocalypse of St. John from the apostolic epistles (see above, § 1).—5. The unity of the book in its present form, notwithstanding the difference of language, is generally acknowledged. Still there is a remarkable difference in its internal character. In the first six chapters and the beginning of the seventh Daniel is spoken of historically (i. 6-21, ii. 14-49, iv. 8-27, v. 13-29, vi. 2-28, vii. 1, 2); in the rest of the book he appears personally as the writer (vii. 15-28, viii. 1-ix. 22, x. 1-9, xii. 5). The cause of the difference in person is commonly supposed to lie in the nature of the case. Mr. Westcott, however, thinks it more probable that the peculiarity arose from the manner in which the book assumed its final shape (see § 10, below).—6. Allusion has been made already to the influence which the book exercised upon the Christian church. Apart from the general type of Apocalyptic composition which the apostolic writers derived from Daniel (2 Th. ii.; Rev. throughout; compare Mat. xxvi. 64, xxi. 44?), the New Testament incidentally acknowl-tion of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar which may have been accomplished without resistance (so Mr. Westcott, original author of this article).

edges each of the characteristic elements of the book, its miracles (Heb. xi. 33, 34), its predictions (Mat. xxiv. 15), and its doctrine of angels (Lk. i. 19, 26). At a still earlier time the same influence may be traced in the Apocrypha. Baruch exhibits so many coincidences with Daniel, that by some the two books have been assigned to the same author (Fritzsche); and the first book of Maccabees represents Mattathias quoting the marvellous deliverances recorded in Daniel, together with those of earlier times (1 Mc. ii. 59, 60), and elsewhere exhibits an acquaintance with the Greek version of the book (1 Mc. i. 54 = Dan. ix. 27). The allusion to the guardian angels of nations, which is introduced into the Alexandrine translation of the Pentateuch (Deut. xxxii. 8, LXX.), and recurs in Eccclus. xvii. 17, may have been derived from Dan. x. 21, xii. 1, though this is uncertain, as the doctrine probably formed part of the common belief. According to Josephus (xi. 8, §§ 4, 5), the prophecies of Daniel gained for the Jews the favor of ALEXANDER THE GREAT; and whatever credit may be given to the details of his narrative, it at least shows the unquestioning belief in the prophetic worth of the book which existed among the Jews in his time.—7. The testimony of the Synagogue and the Church gave a clear expression to the judgment implied by the early and authoritative use of the book, and pronounced it to contain authentic prophecies of Daniel, without contradiction, with one exception, till modern times. Porphyry alone († about 305 A.D.) assailed the book. Externally it is as well attested as any book of Scripture.—8. The history of the assaults upon the prophetic worth of Daniel in modern times is full of interest. First, doubts were raised as to the authorship of chapters i.—vii. (Spinoza, Newton), which are compatible with the recognition of their canonicity. Then, the variations in the LXX. suggested the belief that chapters iii.—vi. were a later interpolation (J. D. Michaelis). Next, the last six chapters only were retained as a genuine book of Scripture (Eichhorn, first and second edition); and at last the whole book was rejected as the work of an impostor in the time of ANTIUCHUS EPIPHANES (Corrodi, 783: Hitzig fixes the date more exactly from 170 B.C. to the spring of 164 B.C.). This last opinion has found, especially in Germany, a very wide acceptance. Among those who have doubted or denied the authenticity of Daniel are Gesenius, De Wette, Rosenmüller, Bertholdt, Bleek, Ewald, Knobel, Lengerke, &c. It has been defended by Staßlin, Jahn, Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Keil, Außerlen, &c., in Germany; by Stuart, Barnes, &c., in America, and by English writers generally. The leading grounds on which modern critics reject the book, are the alleged “fabulosity of its narratives,” and “the minuteness of its prophetic history.” “The contents of the book,” it is said, “are irrational and impossible” (Hitzig). Such critics, of course, deny INSPIRATION, reject MIRACLES, and set aside as repugnant to reason every thing that is divine or supernatural in the Scriptures or elsewhere. (PROPHET, &c.)—9. The general objections against the “legendary” miracles and specific predictions of Daniel are strengthened by other objections in detail, which cannot, however, be regarded in themselves as of any considerable weight. Not only, it is said, is the book placed among the Hagiographa, but Daniel is omitted in the list of prophets given in the Wisdom of Sirach; the language is corrupted by an intermixture of Greek words; the details are essentially unhistorical; the doctrinal and moral teaching betrays a late date. In reply to these remarks, it may be urged, that if the book of Daniel was already placed among the Hagiographa at the time when the Wisdom of Sirach was written, the omission of the name of Daniel (Eccclus. xlix.) is most natural. Nor is the mention of Greek musical instruments (iii. 5, 7, 10) surprising at a time when the intercourse of the East and West was already considerable. Yet further the scene and characters of the book are Oriental, e. g. the colossal image (iii. 1), the fiery furnace, the martyr-like boldness of the three confessors (ver. 16), the decree of Darius (vi. 7), the lions' den (7, 19), the demand of Nebuchadnezzar (ii. 5), his obeisance before Daniel (46) (ADORATION), his sudden fall (iv. 33). In doctrine, again, the book is closely connected with the writings of the Exile, and forms a last step in the development of the ideas of MESSIAH (vii. 13, &c.), of the RESURRECTION (xii. 2, 3), of the ministry of ANGELS (viii. 16, xii. 1, &c.), of personal devotion (vi. 10, 11, i. 8), which formed the basis of later speculations, but received no essential addition in the interval before the coming of our Lord. Generally it may be said that while the book presents in many respects a startling and exceptional character, yet it is far more difficult to explain its composition in the Maccabean period than to connect the peculiarities which it exhibits with the exigencies of the Return. (ALEXANDRIA; APOCRYPHA; BEL-SHAZZAR; CAPTIVITY; CHALDEANS; CYRUS; DANIEL; DARIUS I; MACCABEES; MAGI; MEDES; NEBUCHADNEZZAR; PERSIANS; SEPTUAGINT.)—10. But while all historical evidence supports the canonicity of the book of Daniel, it does not follow that the recognition of the unity and authority of the book is necessarily connected with the belief that the whole is to be assigned to the authorship of Daniel. According to the Jewish tradition the books of Ezekiel, the twelve minor prophets, Daniel and Esther, were written (i. e. drawn up in their present form) by the men of the great synagogue (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT), and in the case of Daniel the tradition is supported by strong internal evidence, as the manner in which Daniel is spoken of (i. 17, 19, 20, v. 11, 12; the title in ix. 23, xii. is different).—11. The interpretation of Daniel has proved an inexhaustible field for the ingenuity of commentators, and the certain results are comparatively few. According to the traditional view, which appears as early as 2 Esdras and the epistle of Barnabas, the four empires described in chapters ii., vii., are the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Greek, and the Roman. With nearly equal consent it has been supposed that there is a change of subject in xi. 31 ff, by which the seer passes from the persecutions of Antiochus to the times of Antichrist. According to Mr. Westcott this interpretation destroys the great idea of a cyclic development of history which lies at the basis of all prophecy; and the revelations of Daniel gain their full significance when they are seen to contain an outline of all history in the history of the nations which ruled the world before Christ's coming. He regards the empires of Daniel as those of the Babylonians, Medes, Persians, and Greeks, who all placed the centre of their power at Babylon, and appear to have exhibited on one stage the great types of national life; but this first fulfilment of the vision was only inchoative, and the correlatives of the four empires must be sought in post-Christian history (compare Babylon and Rome, &c.). (ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION;

ALEXANDER III.; ANTICHRIST; ANTIOCHUS II.-IV.; BABEL; BABYLON, &c.—12. There is no Chaldean translation of Daniel. The Greek version has undergone singular changes. At an early time the LXX. version, which was certainly very unfaithful, was supplanted in the Greek Bibles by that of Theodotion, and in the time of Jerome the version of Theodotion was generally "read by the churches." In the course of time, however, the version of Theodotion was interpolated from the LXX., so that it is now impossible to recover the original text (see the next article). Meanwhile the original LXX. translation passed entirely out of use, and it was supposed to have been lost till the last century, when it was published at Rome.

Dan'-el (see above), A-po-er'-ry-phal Ad-di'tions to. The Greek translations of Daniel, like that of Esther, contain several pieces not in the original text. The most important of these additions are contained in the Apocrypha of the A. V. under the titles of The Song of the three Holy Children, The History of Susanna, and The History of the Destruction of Bel and the Dragon.—1. a. The first of these pieces is incorporated into the narrative of Daniel. After the three confessors were thrown into the furnace (Dan. iii. 23), Azarias is represented praying to God for deliverance (Sg. 3 H. Ch. 3-22) and in answer the angel of the Lord shields them from the fire which consumes their enemies (23-27), whereupon "the three, as out of one mouth," raise a triumphant song (29-68), of which a chief part (35-66) has been used as a hymn in the Christian church since the fourth century (see the Book of Common Prayer of the Protestant Episcopal Church, under Morning Prayer, "O all ye works of the Lord," &c.).—b. The two other pieces appear more distinctly as appendices, and offer no semblance of forming part of the original text. The History of Susanna (or The Judgment of Daniel) is generally found at the beginning of the book (Vat. & Alex. MSS. Old L. version); though it also occurs after the twelfth chapter (Vulg. cd. Complutensian). The History of Bel and the Dragon is placed at the end of the book; and in the LXX. version it bears a special heading as "part of the prophecy of Habakkuk."—2. The additions are found in both the Greek texts, the LXX. and Theodotion, in the Old Latin and Vulgate, and in the existing Syriac and Arabic versions. On the other hand there is no evidence that they ever formed part of the Hebrew text, and they were originally wanting in the Syriac.—3. Various conjectures have been made as to the origin of the additions. It has been supposed that they were derived from Aramaic originals, but the character of the additions themselves indicates rather the hand of an Alexandrine writer (ALEXANDRIA); and it is not unlikely that the translator of Daniel wrought up traditions which were already current, and appended them to his work. CANON.

Dan'ites (from DAN), the == the descendants of DAN, and members of his tribe (Judg. xiii. 2, xviii. 1, 11; 1 Chr. xii. 35).

Dan'-ja'an (Heb. Dan in the wood, Vulg., Ges.; Dan [i. e. Baal or Pan; see below] playing the pipe, Fü.), a place named only in 2 Sam. xxiv. 6 as one of the points visited by Joab in taking the census of the people. It occurs between Gilead and Zion, and probably = DAN 2. Fürst makes Dan-jaan = Baniya, where Baal or Pan was worshipped in a grotto. CESAREA PHILIPPI.

Dan'nah (Heb. low ground, Fü.), a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 49), probably S. or S. W. of Hebron; site unknown.

Daph'ne [daf-] (Gr. laurel; also the daughter of the river-god Peneus, who, pursued by Apollo, is said to have been changed into a laurel), a celebrated grove and sanctuary of Apollo, near ASTIOCH 1 (2 Mc. iv. 33). The distance between the two places was about five miles, and in history they are associated most intimately together. The situation was of extreme natural beauty, with perennial fountains and abundant wood. Here Seleucus Nicator erected a magnificent temple and colossal statue of Apollo. The succeeding Seleucid monarchs, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, embellished the place still further. When Syria became Roman, Daphne continued to be famous as a place of pilgrimage and vice. The site has been well identified by Pococke and other travellers at Bit-el-Maa (= the House of the Water), on the left bank of the Orontes, to the S. W. of Antioch.

Da'ta (Heb.) = DARDA (1 Chr. ii. 6).

Dar'da (Heb. pearl of wisdom, Ges.; bearer, holder, Fü.), a son of MAHOL, and one of four men of great fame for their wisdom, but surpassed by Solomon (1 K. iv. 31). In 1 Chr. ii. 6, however, the same four names occur again as "sons of Zerah," of the tribe of Judah, with the slight difference that Darda appears as Dara. The identity of these persons with those in 1 K. iv. 31 has been greatly debated; but there cannot be much reasonable doubt that they are the same (so Mr. Grove). HE-MAN 1, 2.

Dar'le. DRAM; MONEY, II. 2.

Da-r'us (L.; Heb. Daryavesh; from old Pers. = coercer, conservator, Ildt., Ges.), the name of several kings of Media and Persia. Three kings bearing this name are mentioned in the O. T. 1. "Darius the Mede" (Dan. xi. 1, vi. 1), "the son of ASHTAFERUS of the seed of the MEDES" (ix. 1), who succeeded to the Babylonian kingdom (BABEL) on the death of Belshazzar, being then sixty-two years old (v. 31, ix. 1). Only one year of his reign is mentioned (ix. 1, xi. 1); but that was of great importance for the Jews. DANIEL was advanced by the king to the highest dignity (vi. 1 ff.), probably in consequence of his former services (compare v. 17); and after his miraculous deliverance, Darius issued a decree enjoining throughout his dominions "reverence for the God of Daniel" (vi. 25 ff.). The extreme obscurity of the Babylonian annals has given occasion to three different hypotheses as to the name under which Darius the Mede is known in history. The first of these which identifies him with Darius Hystaspis, rests on no plausible evidence, and may be dismissed at once. The second, adopted by Josephus, and supported by many recent critics (Bertholdt, Lengerke, Hävernick, Hengstenberg, Auberlen), is more deserving of notice. According to this he was CYAXARES II., "the son and successor of Astyages," who is commonly regarded as the last king of Media. But the only direct evidence for the existence of CYAXARES II. is that of Xenophon's romance. A third identification (Winer, Niebuhr) remains, by which Darius is represented as the personal name of "ASTYAGES," the last king of the Medes, and this appears to satisfy all the conditions of the problem (so Mr. Westcott, original author of this article).—2. Da-r'us, the son of Hys-tas'pes (L. from old Pers. = possessor of horses, Bonfey), or D. Hys-tas'pis, the fifth in descent from Achæmenes, the founder of the Perso-Aryan dynasty (PERSIANS). Upon the usurpation of the Magian Smerdis (ARTAXERXES 1), he conspired with six other Persian chiefs to overthrow the impostor, and on the success of the plot was placed upon the throne B. C. 521. His designs of foreign conquest were interrupted by a revolt of the Babylonians, which was at length put down and severely punished (about B. C. 516). After the subjugation of Babylon, Darius turned his arms against Scythia, Libya, and India. The defeat of Marathon (B. C. 490) only roused him to prepare vigorously for that decisive struggle with the West which was now inevitable. His plans were again thwarted by rebellion, and he died B. C. 485. With regard to the Jews, Darius Hystaspis pursued the same policy as Cyrus, and restored to them the privileges which they had lost (Ezr. iv. 24, v., vi.; HAGGAI; JERUSALEM; ZECHARIAH 1).—3. Da-r'ius the Persian (Neh. xii. 22) may be identified with Darius II. Nothus (Ochus), king of Persia B. C. 424–3–405–4, if the whole passage in question was written by NEHEMIAH. If, however, the register was continued to a later time, as is not improbable, the occurrence of the name JADDUA (ver. 11, 22) points to Darius III. Codomannus, the antagonist of ALEXANDER THE GREAT, and last king of Persia B. C. 336–330 (1 Mc. i. 1).—4. AREUS, king of the Lacedæmonians (1 Mc. xii. 7).

Dark'ness is spoken of as encompassing the actual presence of God, as that out of which He speaks, the envelope, as it were, of Divine glory (Ex. xx. 21; 1 K. viii. 12; Ps. xcvi. 2; compare Joel ii. 31, iii. 15; Mat. xxiv. 29, &c.). (CLOU.) The plague of darkness in Egypt (Ex. x. 21–23; Ps. cv. 28) has been ascribed by various commentators to non-miraculous agency, but no sufficient account of its intense degree, long duration, and limited area, as proceeding from any physical cause, has been given. The darkness "over all the land" (Mat. xxvii. 45; Mk. xv. 33; Lk. xxiii. 44) attending the crucifixion has been similarly attributed to an eclipse. Phlegon of Tralles indeed mentions an eclipse of intense darkness, which began at noon, and was combined, he says, in Bithynia, with an earthquake, which in the uncertain state of our chronology more or less nearly synchronizes with the event. Wieseler, however, and De Wette, consider the year of Phlegon's eclipse an impossible one for the crucifixion, and reject that explanation of the darkness. Origen also denies the possibility of such a cause; for by the fixed Paschal reckoning the moon must have been about full. The argument from the duration (3 hours) is also of great force; for an eclipse seldom lasts in great intensity more than 6 minutes. On the other hand, Seyffarth maintains that the Jewish calendar, owing to their following the sun, had become so far out that the moon might possibly have been at new. He however views this rather as a natural basis than as a full account of the darkness, which in its degree at Jerusalem was still preternatural. Darkness is also, as in "land of darkness," used for the state of the dead (Job x. 21, 22); and frequently figuratively = gloom, adversity, misery (Ps. cvii. 10, cxliii. 3; Is. v. 30, &c.), also = ignorance, unbelief, and sin, as the privation of spiritual LIGHT (Jn. i. 5; iii. 19). MIST; NIGHT.

Dar'kon (Heb. scatterer, Ges.; bearer, Fñ.), ancestor of some among the "children of Solomon's servants," who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58). LOZON.

* Dart. ARMS, II. 2.

Dates (2 Chr. xxxi. 5, margin). HONEY; PALM-TREE.

Da'than (Heb. of, or from, a fountain, Ges., Fñ.), a Reubenite chieftain, son of Eliab, and brother of Abiram, who joined the conspiracy of KORAH the Levite (Num. xvi. 1 ff., xxvi. 9; Deut. xi. 6; Ps. cvi. 17).

Dath'e-ma (Gr.), a fortress in which the Jews of Gilead took refuge from the heathen (1 Mc. v. 9). The reading of the Peshito-Syriac, Ramtha, points to RAMOTH-GILEAD, which can hardly fail to be the correct identification.

Daugh'ter (Heb. bath, Gr. thugatér). 1. The word in Scripture not only = daughter in the strict sense, but grand-daughter or other female descendant, much in the same way and like extent with "son" (Gen. xxiv. 48, xxxi. 43). (CHILD; EDUCATION).—2. The female inhabitants of a place, a country, or the females of a particular race are called "daughters" (Gen. vi. 2, xxvii. 46, xxviii. 6, xxxvi. 2; Num. xxv. 1; Deut. xxiii. 17; Is. iii. 16; Jer. xli. 11, xlix. 2–4; Lk. xxiii. 28).—3. The same notion of descent explains the phrase "daughters of music," i. e. singing-birds (Eccl. xii. 4), and the use of the word for branches of a tree (Gen. xlix. 22), the pupil of the eye (literally "daughter of the eye") (Lam. ii. 18; Ps. xvii. 8), and the expression "daughter of 90 years" (A. V. "90 years old"), to denote the age of Sarah (Gen. xvii. 17).—4. It is also used of cities in general, poetically for the inhabitants of a city, often for the whole body of inhabitants personified as a female, Ges. (Is. x. 32, xxiii. 12; Jer. vi. 2, 23; Zech. ix. 9).—5. But more specifically of dependent towns, villages, or hamlets, while to the principal city the correlative "mother" is applied (Num. xxi. 25, marg.; 2 Chr. xxviii. 18, A. V. "villages" in both; Josh. xvii. 11, 16; Judg. i. 27; 1 Chr. vii. 28, 29; A. V. "towns" in these passages). Hazerim; VILLAGE.

Da'vid (Heb. beloved), the son of Jesse, is the best known to us of any of the characters in the O. T. In him, as in the case of St. Paul in the N. T., we have the advantage of comparing a detailed narrative of his life with undoubted works of his own composition, and the combined result is a knowledge of his personal character, such as we probably possess of no historical personage before the Christian era, with the exception of Cicero, and perhaps of Cesar. His life may be divided into three portions, more or less corresponding to the three old lost biographies by Samuel, Gad, and Nathan:—I. His youth before his introduction to the court of Saul. II. His relations with Saul. III. His reign.—I. The early life of David contains in many important respects the antecedents of his future career. 1. His family may best be seen in the form of a genealogy. It thus appears that David was the youngest son, probably the youngest child, of a family of ten. His mother's name is unknown. His father, Jesse, was of a great age when David was still young (1 Sam. xvii. 12). His parents both lived till after his final rupture with Saul (xxii. 3). Through them David inherited several points which he never lost. (a) His connection with Moab through his great-grandmother Ruth. This he kept up when he escaped to Moab and entrusted his aged parents to the care of the king (xxii. 3), and it may not have been without its use in keeping open a wider view in his mind and history than if he had been of purely Jewish descent. (b) His birthplace, BETHLEHEM. His recollection of the well of Bethlehem is one of the most touching incidents of his later life (1 Chr. xi. 17), and it is his connection with it that brought the place again in after-times into universal fame (Lk.

ii. 4). (c) His general connection with the tribe of Judah. In none of the tribes does the tribal feeling appear to have been stronger. (d) His relations to Zeruah and Abigail. Though called, in 1 Chr. ii. 16, sisters of David, they are not expressly called the daughters of Jesse; and Abigail, in 2 Sam. xvii. 25, is called the daughter of NAHSH. Stanley asks, Is it too much to suppose that David's mother had been the wife or concubine of Nahash, and then married by Jesse?—2.

As the youngest of the family he may possibly have received from his parents the name, which first appears in him, of David, the beloved, the darling. Perhaps for this same reason he was never intimate with his brethren. The familiarity which he lost with his brothers he gained with his nephews. The three sons of his sister Zeruah, and the one son of his sister Abigail, were probably of the same age as David himself, and they accordingly were to him throughout life in the relation usually occupied by brothers and cousins. The two sons of his brother Shimeah are both connected with his after-history. One was Jonadab, the friend and adviser of his eldest son Amnon (2 Sam. xiii. 3). The other was Jonathan (2 Sam. xxi. 21), who afterward perhaps (see JONATHAN 2) became the counsellor of David himself (1 Chr. xxvii. 32). The first time that David appears in history at once admits us to the whole family circle. There was a practice once a year at Bethlehem, probably at the first new moon of the year, of holding a sacrificial feast, at which Jesse, as the chief proprietor of the place, would preside (1 Sam. xx. 6), with the elders of the town. At this or such like feast (xvi. 1) suddenly appeared the great prophet Samuel, driving a heifer before him, and having in his hand a horn of the consecrated oil of the Tabernacle. The heifer was killed. The party were waiting to begin the feast. Samuel stood with his horn to pour forth the oil (ANOINTING), as if for an invitation to begin (compare ix. 22). He was restrained by divine intimation as son after son passed by. Eliab, the eldest, by "his height" and "his countenance," seemed the natural counterpart of Saul, whose rival, unknown to them, the prophet came to select. But the day was gone when kings were chosen because they were head and shoulders taller than the rest. "Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest, and behold he keepeth the sheep." This is our first and most characteristic introduction to the future king. The boy was brought in, and "anointed" by the prophet "in the midst of his brethren; and the spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward" (xvi. 13). It is useless to speculate on the extent to which his mission was then known to himself or to others. Josephus (vi. 8, § 1) says that Samuel whispered it into his ear. We are enabled to fix his appearance at once in our minds. He was of short stature, with red or auburn hair, such as is not unfrequently seen in his countrymen of the East at the present day. In later life he wore a beard. His bright eyes are especially mentioned (xvi. 12), and generally he was remarkable for the grace of his figure and countenance ("fair of eyes," "comely," "goodly," xvi. 12, margin, 18, xvii. 42), well made, and of immense strength and agility. His swiftness and activity made him (like his nephew Asahel) like a wild gazelle, his feet like harts' feet, and his arms strong enough to break a bow of steel (Ps. xviii. 33, 34). He was pursuing the occupation allotted in Eastern countries usually to the slaves, the females, or the despised of the family. He usually carried a switch or wand (A.V. "staff") in his hand (1 Sam. xvii. 40), such as would be used for his dogs (xvii. 43), and a scrip or wallet (BAG 3) round his neck, to carry any thing that was needed for his shepherd's life (xvii. 40).—3. But there was another preparation still more needed for his office, which is his next introduction to the history. When the body-guard of Saul were discussing with their master where the best minstrel could be found to chase away his madness by music, one of the young men in the guard suggested David. Saul, with the absolute control inherent in the idea of an Oriental king, instantly sent for him, and in the successful effort of David's harp we have the first glimpse into that genius for music and poetry which was afterward consecrated in the Psalms.—4. One incident alone of his solitary shepherd life has come down to us—his conflict with the lion and the bear in defence of his father's flocks (xvii. 34, 35). But it did not stand alone. He was already known to Saul's guards for his martial exploits, probably (so Stanley) against the Philistines (xvi. 18), and, when he suddenly appeared in the camp, his elder brother immediately guessed that he had left the sheep in his ardor to see the battle (xvii. 28). The reconciliation of the apparently contradictory accounts in 1 Sam. xvi. 14–23, and xvii. 12–31, 55–58, has much perplexed commentators. "The old solution of the difficulty, that as David, after his first introduction to Saul, did not abide constantly with him, but went and came between Saul and his father's house (xvii. 15), he may have been at home when the war with the Philistines broke out; and as Saul's distemper was of the nature of mania, he very probably retained no recollection of David's visits to him while under it, but at each new interview regarded and spoke of him as a stranger, i.e., after all, the best that has been suggested" (Dr. W. L. Alexander in Kitto). The statement that David became Saul's armor-bearer, &c. (xvi. 21) may be anticipatory (compare xvi. 22 and xviii. 2), or Saul may have had as many armor-bearers as Joab (2 Sam. xviii. 15), and in either case both Saul and Abner might easily fail to recognize David, especially in the excitement of the moment and under the greatly changed appearance which David probably presented at his encounter with Goliath. Nor would his having been Saul's armor-bearer without actual service in the field have made him a proficient in the use of arms or armor at this time. His encounter with GOLIATH took place at EPHES-DAMMIM, in the frontier-hills of Judah. Saul's army is encamped on one side of the ravine, the Philistines on the other; the watercourse of Elah runs between them. A Philistine of gigantic stature, and clothed in complete armor, insults the comparatively defenceless Israelites, amongst whom the king alone appears to be well armed (xvii. 38; compare xiii. 22). No one can be found to take up the challenge. At this juncture David appears in the camp. Just as he comes to the circle of wagons (CARRIAGE 3) which formed, as in Arab settlements, a rude fortification round the Israelite camp (xvii. 20), he hears the well-known shout of the Israelite war-cry (compare Num. xxiii. 21). The martial spirit of the boy is stirred at the sound; he leaves his provisions with the baggage-master, and darts to join his brothers, like one of the royal messengers, into the midst of the lines. Then he hears the challenge, now made for the fortieth time—sees the dismay of his countrymen—hears the reward proposed by the king—goes with the impetuosity of youth from soldier to soldier, talking of the event, in spite of his brother's rebuke—he is introduced to Saul—undertakes the combat. His victory over the gigantic Philistine is rendered more conspicuous by his own diminutive stature, and by the simple weapons with which it was accomplished—not the armor of Saul, which he naturally found too large, but the shepherd's sling, which he always carried with him, and the five polished pebbles which he picked up as he went from the watercourse of the valley, and put in his shepherd's wallet. Two trophies long remained of the battle—one, the sword of the Philistine (ARMS, I. 1), which was hung up behind the ephod in the Tabernacle at Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 9); the other, the head, which he bore away himself, and which was either laid up at Nob, or subsequently at Jerusalem. Ps. cxliv., though by its contents of a much later date, is by the title in the LXX. "against Goliath." But there is also a psalm, preserved in the LXX. at the end of the Psalter, and which, though probably a mere adaptation from the history, well sums up this early period of his life.—II. Relations with Saul.—We now enter on a new aspect of David's life. The victory over Goliath had been the turning-point of his career. Saul inquired his parentage, and took him finally to his court. Jonathan was inspired by the romantic friendship which bound the two youths together to the end of their lives. The triumphant songs of the Israelitish women announced that they felt that in him Israel had now found a deliverer mightier even than Saul. And in those songs, and in the fame which David thus acquired, was laid the foundation of that unhappy jealousy of Saul toward him which, mingling with the king's constitutional malady, poisoned his whole future relations to David. Three new qualities now began to develop themselves in David's character. The first was his prudence, already glanced at (1 Sam. xvi. 18), which was the marked feature of the beginning of his public career (xviii. 5, 14, 15, 18, 23, 30). It was that peculiar Jewish caution which has been compared to the sagacity of a hunted animal, such as is remarked in Jacob, and afterward in the persecuted Israelites of the middle ages. Secondly, we now see his magnanimous forbearance called forth first toward Saul, but displaying itself (with a few painful exceptions) in the rest of his life. He is the first example of the virtue of chivalry. Thirdly, his hairbreadth escapes, continued through so many years, impressed upon him a sense of dependence on the Divine help, clearly derived from this epoch (2 Sam. iv. 9; 1 K. i. 29; Ps. xviii. 2, 36, xxxi. 20). This course of life subdivides itself into four portions:—1. His life at the court of Saul till his final escape (1 Sam. xviii. 2–xix. 18). His office is not exactly defined. But it would seem that, having been first armor-bearer (xvi. 21, xviii. 2), then captain over a thousand—the subdivision of a tribe—(xviii. 13), he finally, on his marriage with Michal, the king's second daughter, was raised to the high office of captain of the king's body-guard, second only, if not equal, to Abner, the captain of the host, and Jonathan, the heir apparent. These three formed the usual companions of the king at his meals (xx. 25, compare xxii. 14). David was now chiefly known for his successful exploits against the Philistines, by one of which (xviii. 25 ff.) he won his wife, and drove back the Philistine power with a blow from which it only rallied at the disastrous close of Saul's reign. He also still performed from time to time the office of minstrel. But the successive snares laid by Saul to entrap him, and the open violence into which the king's madness twice broke out, at last convinced him that his life was no longer safe. He had two faithful allies, however, in the court—the son of Saul, his friend JONATHAN 1—the daughter of Saul, his wife MICHAL. Warned by the one, and assisted by the other, he escaped by night, and was thenceforward a fugitive (Ps. lix. title). Jonathan he never saw again except by stealth. Michal was given in marriage to another (Phaltiel), and he saw her no more till long after her father's death. 2. His escape (1 Sam. xix. 18 to xxi. 15). He first fled to NAIOTH of Ramah, to Samuel. This is the first recorded occasion of his meeting with Samuel since the original interview during his boyhood at Bethlehem. Up to this time both the king and himself had thought that a reunion was possible (see xx. 5, 26). But the madness of Saul now became more settled and ferocious in character, and David's danger proportionably greater. The secret interview with Jonathan confirmed the alarm already excited by Saul's endeavor to seize him at Ramah, and he now determined to leave his country, and take refuge, like Coriolanus or Themistocles in like circumstances, in the court of his enemy. Before this last resolve, he visited Nob, the seat of the Tabernacle, partly to obtain a final interview with the high-priest (xxii. 9, 15), partly to obtain food and weapons. On the pretext of a secret mission from

Saul, he gained an answer from the oracle, some of the consecrated loaves, and the consecrated sword of Goliath (Ps. lii. title). (ABIATHAR; AHIMELECH 1; DOGA.) His stay at the court of ACHISH was short. Discovered possibly by "the sword of Goliath," his presence revived the national enmity of the Philistines against their former conqueror, and he only escaped by feigning madness (1 Sam. xxi. 13). 3. His life as an independent outlaw (xxii. 1 to xxvi. 25). (a) His first retreat was the cave of ADULLAM, where he was joined by his whole family, now feeling themselves insecure from Saul's fury (xxii. 1). This was probably the foundation of his intimate connection with his nephews, the sons of Zeruiah. (ABISHAI; ASAHEL 1; JOAB.) Besides these, were outlaws and debtors from every part. (b) His next move was to a stronghold, either (so Stanley) the mountain, afterward called Herodium, probably the modern Frank Mountain, called in Arabic el-Fureidis, and lying close to the traditional cave of Adullam, or the fastness called by Josephus (B. J. viii. 9, § 3) Marada, the Greek form of the Heb. metsad or metsuddah, A. V. "hold" (1 Sam. xxii. 4, 5; 1 Chr. xii. 16), and identified by Robinson (i. 525) with the ruin on the modern Sebbeh, a pyramidal cliff about ten miles S. of Engedi (see cut, under SEA, THE SALT); but some suppose this "hold" was in the land of Moab. Whilst there he had deposited his aged parents, for the sake of greater security, beyond the Jordan, with their ancestral kinsman of Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 3). The neighboring king, Nabash of Ammon, also treated him kindly (2 Sam. x. 2). Here occurred the chivalrous exploit of the three heroes to procure water from the well of Bethlehem, and David's chivalrous answer, like that of Alexander in the desert of Gedrosia (1 Chr. xi. 16-19; 2 Sam. xxiii. 14-17). He was joined here by two separate bands. One a little body of eleven fierce Gadite mountaineers, who swam the Jordan in flood-time to reach him (1 Chr. xii. 8). Another was a detachment of men from Judah and Benjamin under Amasai (= Amasa, David's nephew?), who henceforth attached himself to David's fortunes (16-18). (c) At the warning of the prophet Gad, he fled next to the forest of HARETH, and then again fell in with the Philistines, and again, apparently advised by Gad (1 Sam. xxiii. 4), made a descent on their foraging parties, and relieved KEILAH, in which he took up his abode. Whilst there, now for the first time in a fortified town of his own (xxiii. 7), he was joined by a new and most important ally—ABIATHAR, the last survivor of the house of Ithamar. By this time the 400 who had joined him at Adullam (xxii. 2) had swelled to 600 (xxiii. 13). (d) The situation of David was now changed by the appearance of Saul himself on the scene. Apparently the danger was too great for the little army to keep together. They escaped from Keilah, and dispersed, "whithersoever they could go," amongst the fastnesses of Judah. Henceforth it becomes difficult to follow his movements with exactness. But thus much we discern. He is in the wilderness of ZIPH 2. Once (or twice) the Ziphites betray his movements to Saul. From thence Saul literally hunts him like a partridge, the treacherous Ziphites beating the bushes before him, and 3,000 men, stationed to catch even the print of his footsteps on the hills (xxiii. 14, 22 [Heb.], 24 [LXX.], xxiv. 11, xxvi. 2, 20). David finds himself driven to the extreme S. of Judah, in the wilderness of MAON. On two, if not three occasions, the pursuer and pursued catch sight of each other; twice David generously spares Saul's life, and Saul confesses his fault and predicts the future prosperity of David (xxiii. 25-29, xxiv. 1-22, xxvi.). To this period are annexed by their titles Ps. liv., lviii., lxiii., cxlii. Whilst he was in the wilderness of Maon occurred David's adventure with NABAL, instructive as showing his mode of carrying on the freebooter's life, and his marriage with ABIGAIL. His marriage with ABINOAM from JEZREEL 2, also in the same neighborhood (Josh. xv. 56), seems to have taken place a short time before (1 Sam. xxv. 43, xxvii. 3; 2 Sam. iii. 2). 4. His service under Achish (1 Sam. xxvii. 1-2 Sam. i. 27). Wearied with his wandering life he at last crosses the Philistine frontier, not, as before, in the capacity of a fugitive, but the chief of a powerful band—his 600 men now grown into an organized force, with their wives and families around them (1 Sam. xxvii. 3, 4). After the manner of Eastern potentates, Achish gave him, for his support, a city—ZIKLAG on the frontier of Philistia (xxvii. 6). There we meet with the first note of time in David's life. He was settled there for a year and four months (xxvii. 7), and a body of Benjaminite archers and slingers, twenty-three of whom are specially named, joined him from the very tribe of his rival (1 Chr. xii. 1-7). He deceived Achish into confidence by attacking the old Nomadic inhabitants of the desert frontier, and representing the plunder to be of portions of the S. tribes or the Nomadic allied tribes of Israel. But this confidence was not shared by the Philistine nobles, and accordingly David was sent back by Achish from the last victorious campaign against Saul. During his absence the roving Amalekites, whom he had plundered during the previous year, had made a descent upon Ziklag, burnt it to the ground, and carried off the wives and children of the new settlement. A wild scene of frantic grief and recrimination ensued between David and his followers. It was calmed by an oracle of assurance from Abiathar. Assisted by the Manassites who had joined him on the march to Gilboa (1 Chr. xii. 19-21), he overtook the invaders in the desert, and recovered the spoil (1 Sam. xxx.). Two days after this victory an Amalekite arrived from the N. with the fatal news of the defeat of Gilboa. The reception of the tidings of the death of his rival and of his friend, the solemn mourning, the vent of his indignation against the bearer of the message, the pathetic lamentation that followed, well close the second period of David's life (2 Sam. i. 1-27).—III. David's reign.—(I.) As king of Judah at HEBRON, seven and a half years (2 Sam. ii. 1-v. 5). Hebron was selected, doubtless, as the ancient sacred city of the tribe of Judah, the burial-place of the patriarchs and the inheritance of Caleb. Here David was first formally anointed king (ii. 4). To Judah his dominion was nominally confined. Gradually his power increased, and during the two years which followed the elevation of Ishbosheth a series of skirmishes took place between the two kingdoms. Then rapidly followed, though without David's consent, the successive murders of ABNER and of ISHBOSHETH (iii. 30, iv. 5). The throne, so long waiting for him, was now vacant, and the united voice of the whole people at once called him to occupy it. A solemn league was made between him and his people (v. 3). For the third time David was anointed king, and a festival of three days celebrated the joyful event (1 Chr. xii. 39). His little band had now swelled into "a great host, like the host of God" (xii. 22). The command of it, which had formerly rested on David alone, he now devolved on his nephew Joab (2 Sam. ii. 28). Underneath this show of outward prosperity, two cankers, incident to the royal state which David now assumed, had first made themselves apparent at Hebron, which darkened all the rest of his career: (1.) the formation of a harem, according to the usage of Oriental kings (ii. 2, iii. 3-5, 14 ff.); (2.) the increasing power of his kinsmen and chief officers, which the king strove to restrain within the limits of right (iii. 31-36). (II.) Reign over all Israel thirty-three years (2 Sam. v. 5 to 1 K. ii. 11). 1. The foundation of JERUSALEM. One fastness alone in the centre of the land had hitherto defied the arms of Israel. On this, with a singular prescience, David fixed as his future capital. By one sudden assault Jebus was taken. The reward bestowed on the successful scaler of the precipice was the highest place in the army. Joab henceforward became captain of the host (1 Chr. xi. 6). The royal residence was instantly fixed there—fortifications were added by the king and by Joab—and it was known by the special name of the "city of David" (xi. 7; 2 Sam. v. 9). The Philistines made two ineffectual attacks on the new king (2 Sam. v. 17-25), and a retribution on their former victories took place by the capture and conflagration of their own idols (1 Chr. xiv. 12). Tyre, now for the first time appearing in the sacred history, allied herself with Israel; and Hiram sent cedarwood for the buildings of the new capital (2 Sam. v. 11), especially for the palace of David himself (vii. 2). Unhallowed and profane as the city had been before, it was at once elevated to a sanctity which it has never lost, above any of the ancient sanctuaries of the land. The ark was now removed from its obscurity at Kirjath-jearim with marked solemnity. A temporary halt, owing to the death of UZZAH, detained it at Obed-edom's house, after which it again moved forward with great state to Jerusalem. It was the greatest day of David's life. One incident only tarnished its splendor—the reproach of Michal, his wife (DANCE), as he was finally entering his own palace, to carry to his own household the benediction which he had already pronounced on his people. His act of severity toward her was an additional mark of the stress which he himself laid on the solemnity (vi. 20-23; 1 Chr. xv. 29; Ps. vi. xv.,

(I.) WIVES OF THE WANDERINGS.

(1 Sam. xxvii. 3; 1 Chr. iii. 1.)

Ahinoam of Jezreel — Abigail of Carmel.
 Amnon or Jehiel †† (Jerome Qu. Heb. on 1 Chr. xxvii. 32). Chibseab or Daniel (1 Chr. iii. 1; Joa. vii. 1, § 4).

N. B.—There were, besides, 10 concubines (2 Sam. v. 13, xv. 16), whose children (1 Chr. iii. 9) are not named.

(II.) WIVES AT HEBRON.

(2 Sam. iii. 2-5; 1 Chr. iii. 1-4.)

Maacah of Geshur — Hagith — Abital — Eglah — Michal (2 Sam. iii. 13).
 Absalom, Tamar. Adonijah. Shiphathiah. Ithream.
 3 sons who died (2 Sam. xiv. 27, xviii. 16). Tamar — URIEL † (2 Sam. xiv. 27, xiii. 7).
 MAACHAN — REHOBOAM (2 Chr. xiii. 21; 1 K. xv. 2).

xxiv., xxix., xxx., xlv., lxviii., xcvi., ci., cv., cvi., cxxxii., and compare 1 Chr. xvi. 8-36). 2. Foundation of the court and empire of Israel (2 Sam. viii.-xii.). The erection of the new capital at Jerusalem introduces us to a new era in David's life and in the history of the monarchy. He became a king on the scale of the great Oriental sovereigns of Egypt and Persia, with a regular administration and organization of court and camp, and he also founded an imperial dominion which for the first time realized the prophetic description of the bounds of the chosen people (Gen. xv. 18-21). The internal organization now established lasted till the final overthrow of the monarchy. The empire was of much shorter duration, continuing only through the reigns of David and his successor Solomon. But, for the period of its existence, it lent a peculiar character to the sacred history (2 Sam. vii. 9). (a) In the internal organization of the kingdom, the first new element to be considered is the royal family, the dynasty, of which David was the founder, a position which entitled him to the name of "Patriarch" (Acts ii. 29), and (ultimately) of the ancestor of the Messiah. Of these, ABSALOM and ADONIJAH both inherited their father's beauty (2 Sam. xiv. 25; 1 K. i. 6); but SOLOMON alone possessed any of his higher qualities. It was from a union of the children of Solomon and Absalom that the royal line was carried on (1 K. xv. 2). David's strong parental affection for all of them is very remarkable (2 Sam. xiii. 31, 33, 36, xiv. 33, xviii. 5, 33, xix. 4; 1 K. i. 6). (b) The military organization (ARMS; ARMY), which was in fact inherited from Saul, but greatly developed by David, was as follows: (1.) "The Host," i. e. the whole available military force of Israel, in 12 divisions of 24,000 each, who were held to be in duty month by month (1 Chr. xxvii. 1-15). The army was still distinguished from those of surrounding nations as a force of infantry without cavalry. The only innovations as yet allowed were the introduction of a very limited number of chariots (2 Sam. viii. 4) and of mules for the princes and officers instead of the asses (xiii. 29, xviii. 9). (2.) The Body-guard now assumed a peculiar organization. They are usually called "CHERETHITES and PELETHITES." The captain of the force was BENAIAH 1, son of Jehoiada (2 Sam. viii. 18, xv. 18, xx. 23; 1 K. i. 38, 44). (3.) The most peculiar military institution in David's army was that which arose out of the peculiar circumstances of his early life. The nucleus of what afterward became the only standing army in David's forces was the band of six hundred men who had gathered round him in his wanderings. The number of six hundred was still preserved. It became yet further subdivided into three large bands of two hundred each, and small bands of twenty each. The small bands were commanded by thirty officers, one for each band, who together formed "the thirty," and the three large bands by three officers, who together formed "the three," and the whole by one chief, "the captain of the mighty men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 8-39; 1 Chr. xi. 9-47). This commander of the whole force was Abishai, David's nephew (1 Chr. xi. 20; and compare 2 Sam. xvi. 9). The preceding is the view adopted by Stanley. (ARMY.) (c) Side by side with this military organization were established social and moral institutions. Some were entirely for pastoral, agricultural, and financial purposes (1 Chr. xxvii. 25-31), others for judicial (xxvi. 29-32). Some few are named as constituting what would now be called the court or council of the king; the councillors, Ahithophel of Gilo, and Jonathan the king's "uncle" or nephew (1 Chr. xxvii. 32, 33); the "companion" or "friend," Hushai (33; 2 Sam. xv. 37, xvi. 19); the scribe, Sheva, or Seraiah, and at one time Jonathan (xx. 25; 1 Chr. xxvii. 32); Jehoshaphat, the recorder or historian, and Adoram the tax-collector, both of whom survived him (2 Sam. xx. 24; 1 K. xii. 18, iv. 3, 6). But the more peculiar of David's institutions were those directly bearing on religion. Two prophets appear as the king's constant advisers. Of these, Gad, who seems to have been the elder, had been David's companion in exile; and from his being called "the seer," belongs probably to the earliest form of the prophetic schools. Nathan, who appears for the first time after the establishment of the kingdom at Jerusalem (2 Sam. vii. 2), is distinguished both by his title of "prophet," and by the nature of the prophecies which he utters (5-17, xii. 1-14), as of the purest type of prophetic dispensation, and as the hope of the new generation, which he supports in the person of Solomon (1 K. i.). Two high-priests also appear—representatives of the two rival houses of Aaron (1 Chr. xxiv. 3); here again, as in the case of the two prophets, one, Abiathar, who attended him at Jerusalem, companion of his exile, and connected with the old time of the judges (xxvii. 34), joining him after the death of Saul, and becoming afterward the support of his son; the other Zadok, who ministered at Gibeon (xvi. 39), and was made the head of the Aaronic family (xxvii. 17). Besides these four great religious func-tionaries there were two classes of subordinates—prophets, specially instructed in singing and music, under Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (xxv. 1-21)—Levites, or attendants on the sanctuary, who again were subdivided into the guardians of the gates and guardians of the treasures (xxvi. 1-28) which had been accumulated, since the reestablishment of the nation, by Samuel, Saul, Abner, Joab, and David himself (26-28). (d) From the internal state of David's kingdom we pass to its external relations. Within ten years from the capture of Jerusalem, he had reduced to a state of permanent subjection the PHILISTINES on the W. (2 Sam. viii. 1); the MOABITES on the E. (viii. 2); the SYRIANS on the N. E. as far as the Euphrates (viii. 3); the EDOMITES (viii. 14) on the S.; and finally the AMMONITES, who had broken their ancient alliance, and made one grand resistance to the advance of his empire (x. 1-19, xii. 26-31). These three last wars were entangled with each other. The last and crowning point was the siege of RABBAH 1 (2 Sam. xxii. 1; Ps. xviii., xx., xxi., lx., lxxviii., cviii. 7-13). 3. Three great calamities may be selected as marking the beginning, middle, and close of David's otherwise prosperous reign; which appears to be intimated in the question of Gad (2 Sam. xxiv. 13), "a three years' famine (1 Chr. xxi. 12; probably the "7" in 2 Sam. is a copyist's error), a three months' flight, or a three days' pestilence." (a) Of these, the first (the three years' famine) (2 Sam. xxi. 1 ff.) introduces us to the last notices of David's relations with the house of Saul. There has often arisen a painful suspicion in later times, as there seems to have been at the time (xvi. 7), that the oracle, which gave as the cause of the famine Saul's massacre of the Gibeonites, may have been connected with the desire to extinguish the last remains of the fallen dynasty. But such an explanation is not needed. The massacre was probably the most recent national crime that had left any deep impression; and the whole tenor of David's conduct toward Saul's family is of an opposite kind (compare ix. 1-13, xxi. 7, 14). (b) The second group of incidents contains the tragedy of David's life, which grew in all its parts out of the polygamy, with its evil consequences, into which he had plunged on becoming king. Underneath the splendor of his last glorious campaign against the Ammonites, was a dark story, known probably at that time only to a very few; the double crime of adultery with Bath-sheba, and of the virtual murder of UURIAH 1 (xi. ff.). The crimes are undoubtedly those of a common Oriental despot. But the rebuke of Nathan; the sudden revival of the king's conscience; his grief for the sickness of the child; the gathering of his uncles and elder brothers around him; his return of hope and peace; are characteristic of David, and of David only (Ps. xxxii., li.). But the clouds from this time gathered over David's fortunes, and henceforward "the sword never departed from his house" (2 Sam. xii. 10). The outrage on his daughter TAMAR 2; the murder of his eldest son AMNON 1; and then the revolt of his best-beloved ABSALOM, brought on the crisis which once more sent him forth a wanderer, as in the days when he fled from Saul; and this, the heaviest trial of his life, was aggravated by the impetuosity of Joab, now perhaps, from his complicity in David's crime, more unmanageable than ever. The rebellion was fostered apparently by the growing jealousy of the tribe of Judah at seeing their king absorbed into the whole nation; and if AUTHIPHIEL was the grandfather of Bath-sheba, its main supporter was one whom David had provoked by his own crimes (Ps. iii., iv. [?], xlii., lv., lxix., cix., cxliii.). (AHIMAAZ 2; BARZILLAI 1; SHIMEI 2.) MAHANAIM was the capital of David's exile, as it had been of the exiled house of Saul (2 Sam. xvii. 24; comp. ii. 8, 12). His forces were arranged under the three great military officers who remained faithful to his fortunes—Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, who seems to have taken the place of Benaiah as captain of the guard (xviii. 2). On Absalom's side was David's nephew Amasa (xvii. 25). The final battle was fought in the forest of Ephraim (EPHRAIM, THE WOOD OF), which terminated in the accident leading to the death of Absalom. The return was marked at every stage by rejoicing and amnesty (xix. 16-40). Judah was first reconciled. The embers of the insurrection still smouldering (xix. 41-43) in David's hereditary enemies of the tribe of Benjamin were trampled out by the mixture of boldness and sagacity in Joab, now, after the murder of Amasa, once more in his old position; and David again reigned in undisturbed peace at Jerusalem (xx. 1-22). (c) The closing period of David's life, with the exception of one great calamity, may be considered as a gradual preparation for the reign of his successor. This calamity was the three days' pestilence which visited Jerusalem at the warning of the prophet Gad. The occasion which led to this warning was the CENSUS of the people taken by Joab at the king's orders (xxiv. 1-9; 1 Chr. xxi. 1-7, xxvii. 23, 24). Joab refused altogether to number Levi and Benjamin (xxi. 6). The plague and its cessation were commemorated down to the latest times of the Jewish nation. At the threshing-floor of ARAUNAH, or Ornan, the Jebusite (2 Sam. xxiv. 16 ff.; 1 Chr. xxi. 15 ff.), an awful vision appeared, such as is described in the later days of Jerusalem, of the angel of the Lord stretching out a drawn sword between earth and sky over the devoted city. The scene of such an apparition at such a moment was at once marked out for a sanctuary. David demanded, and Araunah willingly granted the site; the altar was erected on the rock of the threshing-floor; the place was called "MORIAH" 2 (2 Chr. iii. 1); and for the first time a holy place, sanctified by a vision of the divine presence, was recognized in JERUSALEM. This spot afterward became the altar of the TEMPLE, and therefore the centre of the national worship, with but slight interruption, for more than one thousand years, and it is even contended that the same spot is the rock still regarded with almost idolatrous veneration, in the centre of the Mussulman "Dome of the Rock." A formidable conspiracy to interrupt the succession (ADONIJAH) broke out in the last days of David's reign, which detached from his person two of his court, Joab and Abiathar. But Zadok, Nathan, Benaiah, Shimei, and Rei, remaining firm, the plot was stifled, and Solomon's inauguration took place under his father's auspices (1 K. i. 1-53; Ps. ii., xcii.).—By this time David's infirmities had grown upon him. The warmth of his exhausted frame was attempted to be restored by the introduction of ABISHAG (1 K. i. 1 ff., ii. 17 ff.). His last song is preserved—a striking union of the ideal of a just ruler which he had placed before him, and of the difficulties which he had felt in realizing it (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7). His last words, as recorded, to his successor, are general exhortations to his duty, combined with warnings against Joab and Shimei, and charges to remember the children of Barzillai (1 K. ii. 1-9). He died, according to Josephus, at the age of seventy, and "was buried in the city of David." After the return from the Captivity, "the sepulchres of David" were still pointed out "between Siloah and the house of the mighty men," or "the guardhouse" (Neh. iii. 16). His tomb, which became the general sepulchre of the kings of Judah, was pointed out in the latest times of the Jewish people. The edifice shown as such from the Crusades to the present day is on the S. hill of modern Jerusalem, commonly called Mount Zion, under the so-called "Cenaculum;" but it cannot be identified with the tomb of David, which was emphatically within the walls. David's character is fully brought out in the historical record of his life and in his PSALMS. His faults, which were certainly great, have often been exaggerated. They were the common faults in his day of a man of ardent passions, and were especially to be expected in one placed in his varying circumstances. His life will compare favorably in this respect with the lives of Eastern warriors and monarchs in general. On the other hand, his virtues shine with peculiar brightness, and render it not inappropriate for God to call him "a man after his own heart" (1 Sam. xiii. 14; Acts xiii. 22). If his sins were great, his humiliation was as deep, and his penitence evidently as sincere as any ever recorded (Ps. li., &c.). He had the high honor of being both an ancestor and a representative (Ez. xxxiv. 23, 24, &c.) of the Lord JESUS CHRIST. ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.

David, City of. BETHLEHEM; JERUSALEM.

Day (Heb. yôm; Gr. héméra). The variable length of the natural day at different seasons led in the very earliest times to the adoption of the civil day (or one revolution of the sun) as a standard of time. The commencement of the civil day varies in different nations: the Babylonians reckoned it from sunrise to sunrise; the Umbrians from noon to noon; the Romans from midnight to midnight; the Athenians and others from sunset to sunset. The Hebrews naturally adopted the latter reckoning (Lev. xxiii. 32, "from even unto even shall ye celebrate your sabbath") from Gen. i. 5, "the evening and the morning were the first day" (see below). The Jews are supposed, like the modern Arabs, to have adopted from an early period minute specifications of the parts of the natural day. Roughly indeed they were content to divide it into "morning, evening, and noon" (Ps. lv. 17); but when they wished for greater accuracy they pointed to six unequal parts, each of which was again subdivided. These are held to have been called in Hebrew: I. Nesheph (A. V. "twilight," 1 Sam. xxx. 17, &c.; "dawning of the morning," Ps. cxix. 14, &c.) and shahar or shachar (usually translated in A. V. "the morning," Gen. xix. 15, &c.) = the dawn. After their acquaintance with Persia they divided this into (a) the time when the eastern, and (b) when the western horizon was illuminated. The writers of the Jerusalem Talmud divide the dawn into four parts.—II. Bôker (usually translated "morning," Gen. i. 5, 8, 13, 19, 23, 31, xix. 27, &c.), sunrise. Some suppose the Jews, like other Oriental nations, commenced their civil day at this time until the Exodus.—III. Hôm or chôm hayyôm, "heat of the day" (Gen. xviii. 1, &c.), about nine o'clock.—IV. Tsôharatim, the two noons (Gen. xliii. 16, A. V. "noon;" Deut. xxviii. 29, A. V. "noon-day").—V. Rûah or rûach hayyôm, "the cool (literally wind) of the day," before sunset (Gen. iii. 8); so called by the Persians to this day.—VI. 'Ereb, "evening." The phrase between the two evenings (Ex. xvi. 12, A. V. "at even;" xxx. 8, A. V. "at even," margin "between the two evens"), marking the time for slaying the paschal lamb and offering the evening sacrifice

(Ex. xii. 6, A. V. "in the evening," margin "between the two evenings," xxix. 39, A. V. "at even"), led to a dispute between the Karaites and Samaritans on the one hand, and the Pharisees on the other. The former took it to mean between sunset and full darkness (Deut. xvi. 6); the Rabbinites explained it as the time between the beginning and end of sunset. —The word "day" is used of a festal day (Hos. vii. 5), a birthday (Job iii. 1), a day of ruin (Hos. i. 11; Job xviii. 20), the judgment-day (Joel i. 15; 1 Th. v. 2), the kingdom of Christ (in Jn. viii. 56 = time, time of manifestation, Rbn. N. T. Lex.; in Rom. xiii. 12 = the light of true and higher knowledge, moral light, Rbn. N. T. Lex.), and in other senses which are mostly self-explaining. "Day" is often used indefinitely = time or period of time (Gen. ii. 4; Judg. xviii. 30; Is. xlvi. 7; Jn. xiv. 20, &c.). On the length of the "six days" of Gen. i., see CREATION. Many interpreters regard the "days" in Dan. xii. 11, 12; Rev. xi. 3, 9, &c., as symbolizing or denoting years, and compare Lev. xxv. 3, 4; Num. xiv. 34; Ez. iv. 2-6. Of those who believe the work of CREATION to have occupied six long successive periods of time, some adopt a figurative and some a symbolic principle of interpretation: 1. The figurative, that "day" in Gen. i. and Ex. xx. 11 (as in Gen. ii. 4, &c.), and its equivalent phrase, "evening and morning," directly = an indefinite period of time. This view claims that neither "evening and morning" nor "day" could be literally understood of the first three "days" of Gen. i., before the sun and moon appeared (and the second three must be similar to the first three); but that "evening and morning" must here simply = the natural boundaries of one of those successive periods called "days." 2. The symbolic, that "day" (and so "evening and morning") is used literally in Gen. i. &c.; but it is then made a typical representative of a higher period (compare the "seventy weeks" of Daniel, and see above). The Mosaic record may thus have been originally communicated to man in a series of visions, each vision giving a view of one "day's" work, the "morning" then = the period of the presence of creative energy or activity, and the "evening" = that of the absence or cessation of this energy or activity; or without visions the same symbolization would be used. Both these views regard the word "day," &c., as the best to express, in a revelation made to Hebrews and uneducated minds generally, the abstract idea of a regular succession of periods of indefinite duration (Prof. E. P. Barrows in B. S., xiv. 79 ff.; Rev. E. A. Walker in New Englander, xix. 553 ff.). CHRONOLOGY; HOUR; JUDGMENT, DAY OF; NIGHT; SABBATH; WEEK.

Days'man, an old English term, meaning umpire or arbitrator (Job ix. 33). It is derived from day, in the specific sense of a day fixed for a trial. The word is found in Spenser's Faerie Queene, ii. c. 8, in the Bible published in 1551 (1 Sam. ii. 25), and in other works of the same age.

Deacon, the A. V. translation in Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. 8, 12 of the Gr. diakonos, elsewhere translated "MINISTER" (Mat. xx. 26; Rom. xiii. 4, xv. 8, &c.) and "servant" (Mk. ix. 35; Jn. xii. 26; Rom. xvi. 1, &c.). In 1 Tim. iii. 10, 13, the corresponding Greek verb diakoneō = to "use the office of a deacon;" elsewhere = to "minister" (Mat. iv. 11, viii. 15, &c.) and "serve" (Lk. x. 40, xxii. 26, 27; Jn. xii. 2, 26; Acts vi. 2, &c.). The office described by this title appears in the N. T. as the correlative of BISHOP. The two are mentioned together in Phil. i. 1; 1 Tim. iii. Like most words of similar import, it appears to have been first used in its generic sense, implying subordinate activity (1 Cor. iii. 5; 2 Cor. vi. 4; A. V. "ministers" in both), and afterward to have gained a more defined connotation, as applied to a distinct body of men in the Christian society. The narrative of Acts vi. is commonly referred to as giving an account of the institution of this office. The apostles, in order to meet the complaints of the Hellenistic Jews, that their widows were neglected in the daily ministration (Gr. diakonia), call on the body of believers to choose seven men "full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom," whom they "may appoint over this business." It is questioned by many, whether the seven = the deacons of the N. T. (SEVEN, THE.) There are indications, however, of the existence of another body in the church of Jerusalem whom we may compare with the deacons of Phil. i. 1, and 1 Tim. iii. 8. As the "elders" of Acts xiv. 23, xv. 6; 1 Pet. v. 1, were not merely men advanced in years, so the "young men" of Acts v. 6, 10, were probably not merely young men, but persons occupying a distinct position and exercising distinct functions. The identity of "bishops" and "elders" has been shown under BISHOP; and it is natural to infer that there was a similar relation between the "deacons" and "young men." Lk. xxii. 26 tends to the same conclusion. Assuming on these data the identity of the two names we have to ask—(I.) To what previous organization, if any, the order is traceable? (II.) What were the qualifications and functions of the men so designated? I. As the constitution of the Jewish SYNAGOGUE had its elders and pastors, so also it had its subordinate officers (Lk. iv. 20, A. V. "minister"), whose work it was to give the reader the rolls containing the lessons for the day, to clean the synagogue, to open and close it at the right times. II. The moral qualifications described in 1 Tim. iii., as necessary for the office of a deacon, are substantially the same as those of the bishop. The deacons, however, were not required to be "given to hospitality," nor to be "apt to teach." It was enough for them to "hold the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience." They were not to gain their living by disreputable occupations. On offering themselves for their work they were to be subject to a strict scrutiny (iii. 10), and if this ended satisfactorily were to enter on it. From the later practice of the church, the analogy of the synagogue, and the scanty notices of the N. T., we may think of the "deacons" in the church of Jerusalem as preparing the rooms in which the disciples met, taking part in the distribution of alms out of the common fund, maintaining order at the daily meetings of the disciples to break bread, distributing the bread and the wine of the Lord's Supper, which the apostle or his representative had blessed. According to Tertullian (second century) and Jerome (fourth century), deacons were permitted in some churches to baptize. It does not appear to have belonged to the office of a deacon to teach publicly in the church. The possession of any special "gift" or talent would lead naturally to a higher work and office, but the idea that the diaconate was but a probation through which a man had to pass before he could be an elder or bishop was foreign to the constitution of the church of the first century. The best expositors (compare Wiesinger and Ellicott) regard the "good degree" gained by those who "have used the office of a deacon well," as referring to the honor which belongs essentially to the lower work, not to that which they were to find in promotion to a higher.

Deacon-ess. The Gr. diakonos is found in Rom. xvi. 1 (A. V. "servant"), associated with a female name, and this has led to the conclusion that there existed in the apostolic age, as there undoubtedly did a little later, an order of women bearing that title, and exercising in relation to their own sex functions analogous to those of the deacons. On this hypothesis it has been inferred that the women mentioned in Rom. xvi. 6, 12, belonged to such an order. The rules given as to the conduct of women in 1 Tim. iii. 11 and Tit. ii. 3, have in like manner been referred to them, and they have been identified even with the "widows" of 1 Tim. v. 3-10. (WIDOW.) In some of these instances, however, it seems hardly doubtful that writers have transferred to the earliest age of the church the organization of a later.

* Dead [ded]. DEATH.

Dead Sea. This name nowhere occurs in the Bible, and appears not to have existed until the second century A. C. SEA, THE SALT.

* Deaf [def or deaf] = unable to hear (Ex. iv. 11, &c.). It was forbidden in the Law to curse them (Lev. xix. 14). Jesus Christ often restored hearing to the deaf, and adduced this as a proof of His Messiahship (Mat. xi. 5; Mk. vii. 32-37, &c.). (MIRACLES.) Those are figuratively "deaf" who refuse to obey the divine requirements (Is. xxix. 18, xlii. 18, &c.).

Dearth. FAMINE.

* Death (Heb. māneth; Gr. thanatos, &c.) = the termination or extinction of LIFE. 1. "To die," "death," "dead," are used with reference to the termination of human or animal life, whether naturally (Gen. v. 5, xiii. 2, 3 ff., xxv. 8, 11; Mat. x. 8; Mk. v. 23, xii. 20 ff., &c.) or by violence (Gen. xxvi. 9; Ex. xxi. 34 ff.; Judg. xvi. 30; Mat. xv. 4; Jn. xix. 33, &c.).—2. They also refer to the departure or destitution of spiritual life, or a state of insensibility to holiness, &c., as connected with sin or alienation from God (Mat. viii. 22, first; Eph. ii. 1, &c.).—3. They also refer to the perdition, or utter destitution of happiness and final exclusion from God's favor, which is also, under the law of God, consequent on unforgiven sin, and which in Rev. ii. 11, &c., is called the "second death" (Jn. vi. 50, viii. 51; Rom. vi. 21, 23, &c.). In Mat. viii. 22 the spiritually "dead" (No. 2) are to bury the naturally "dead" (No. 1); and elsewhere the different senses are often closely connected, and may be illustrated in the same sentence or even in the same word (Lk. xv. 24, 32, &c.). "Death" is often personified (Rev. vi. 8, &c.). Physical death (No. 1) is represented as a return to the dust (Gen. iii. 19, &c.), a removal or an absence, sc. from the body (Job x. 21; Mat. xxvi. 24; Phil. i. 23, &c.), a sleep (Jer. li. 39; Dan. xii. 2; Jn. xi. 11, 12, &c.), &c. BLOOD; DAMNATION; DARKNESS; ETERNAL; GATE; HELL; MURDER; PUNISHMENTS.

Debir (Heb. inner sanctuary, Ges.). 1. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 49), one of a group of eleven cities to the W. of Hebron. The earlier name of Debir was KIRJATH-SEPHER and KIRJATH-SANNAH. Joshua took it after Hebron, and destroyed its king, its Anakim, and all its inhabitants (Josh. x. 38 ff., xi. 21, xii. 13). It was apparently reoccupied by the Canaanites after this conquest, and afterward taken by Othniel (Josh. xv. 15 ff.). It was one of the cities given with their "suburbs" to the priests (Josh. xxi. 15; 1 Chr. vi.

58). Debir does not appear to have been known to Jerome, nor has it been discovered with certainty in modern times. About three miles W. of Hebron is a deep and secluded valley called the Wady Nun-kur, enclosed on the N. by hills, of which one bears a name certainly suggestive of Debir—Devir-bau (Rosen; Rbn. Phys. Geog., 249). Schwarz speaks of a Wady Dibir in this direction. Van de Velde finds Debir at Dilbeh, six miles S. W. of Hebron.—2. A place on the N. boundary of Judah, near the "Valley of Achor" (Josh. xv. 7), and therefore somewhere in the complications of hill and ravine behind Jericho. A Wady Dabor is marked in Van de Velde's map as close to the S. of Noby Musa, at the N. W. corner of the Dead Sea.—3. The "border of Debir" is named as forming part of the boundary of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26), and as apparently not far from Mahanaim; site unknown.

Deb' o-ra (= DEBORAH), a woman of Naphtali, mother of Tobiel, the father of Tobit (Tob. i. 8).

Deb' o-rah (Heb. bee, Ges., Fñ.). 1. The nurse of Rebekah (Gen. xxv. 8). Deborah accompanied Rebekah from the house of Bethuel (xxiv. 59), and is only mentioned by name on the occasion of her burial, under the oak-tree of Bethel, which was called in her honor ALLON-BACHUTH.—2. A prophetess who judged Israel (Judg. iv., v.). She lived under the palm-tree of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel in Mount Ephraim (iv. 5), which, as palm-trees were rare in Palestine, "is mentioned as a well-known and solitary landmark, and was probably the same spot as that called (xx. 33) Baal-Tamar, or the sanctuary of the palm" (Stl. 146). She was probably a woman of Ephraim, although, from the expression in Judg. v. 13, some suppose her to have belonged to Issachar. Lapidoth was probably her husband, and not Barak, as some say. She was not so much a judge as one gifted with prophetic command (iv. 6, 14, v. 7), and by virtue of her inspiration "a mother in Israel." Jabin's tyranny was peculiarly felt in the northern tribes, who were near his capital and under her jurisdiction, viz. Zebulun, Naphtali, and Issachar: hence, when she summoned BARAK to the deliverance, it was on them that the brunt of the battle fell. Under her direction Barak encamped on the broad summit of Tabor. Deborah's prophecy was fulfilled, the army of JABIN was defeated, and SISERA was slain by Jael (iv. 7, 9, compare 15 ff.). Deborah's title of "prophetess" includes the notion of inspired poetry, as in Ex. xv. 20; and in this sense the glorious triumph ode (Judg. v.) well vindicates her claim to the office. PROPHET.

Debt [det], Deb'tor. LOAN.

* Dec'a-logue (fr. Gr.) = TEN COMMANDMENTS.

De-cap'o-lis (Gr. the ten cities). This name occurs only three times in the Scriptures (Mat. iv. 25; Mk. v. 20, vii. 31). Immediately after the conquest of Syria by the Romans (B. C. 65) ten cities appear to have been rebuilt, partially colonized, and endowed with peculiar privileges; the country around them was hence called Decapolis. The limits of the territory were not very clearly defined; and probably (so Porter) in the course of time other neighboring cities received similar privileges. Pliny enumerates them as follows: SCYTHOPOLIS or BETH-SHEAN, HIPPOS, GADARA, PELLA, Philadelphia (RABBAH 1), GERASA, DION, CANATHA (KENATH), DAMASCUS, and Raphana. Ptolemy (v. 17) makes Capitolas one of the ten; and an old Palmyrene inscription includes Abila. (ABILENE.) Josephus (B. J. iii. 9, § 7) calls Scythopolis the largest city of Decapolis, thus manifestly excluding Damascus from the number. All the cities of Decapolis, except Scythopolis, lay E. of the Jordan. It would appear, however, from Mat. iv. 25, and Mk. vii. 31, that Decapolis was a general appellation for a large district extending along both sides of the Jordan. Pliny says it reached from Damascus on the N. to Philadelphia on the S., and from Scythopolis on the W. to Canatha on the E. This region, once so populous and prosperous, from which multitudes flocked to hear the Saviour, and through which multitudes followed His footsteps, is now almost without an inhabitant.

* De-clis'ion (Heb. hārûts or chārûts = decision, judgment, LXX., Ges., Fül., &c.), Valley of (Joel iii. 14). JEHOSEPHAT, VALLEY OF.

* De-cree'. JUDGE; KING; LAW.

De'dan (Heb. low country, Fül.; advance [i. e. increase] of the family, Sim.). 1. The name of a son of RAAMAH, son of CUSH (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chr. i. 9).—2. A son of JOKSHAN, son of KETURAH (Gen. xxv. 3; 1 Chr. i. 32). The usual opinion respecting these founders of tribes is that the first settled among the sons of Cush, wherever these latter may be placed; the second, on the Syrian borders, about the territory of Edom. But Gesenius and Winer have suggested that the name may apply to one tribe; and this may be adopted as probable on the supposition that the descendants of the Keturahite Dedan intermarried with those of the Cushite Dedan, whom Mr. E. S. Poole places, presumptively, on the borders of the Persian Gulf. (ARABIA.) The theory of this mixed descent gains weight from the fact that in each case the brother of Dedan is named SHEBA. It may be supposed that the Dedanites were among the chief traders traversing the caravan-route from the head of the Persian Gulf to the S. of Palestine, bearing merchandise of India, and possibly of southern Arabia; and hence the mixture of such a tribe with another of different (and Keturahite) descent presents no impossibility. The passages in the Bible in which Dedan is mentioned (besides the genealogies above referred to) are Is. xxi. 13 ("Dedanium"), Jer. xxv. 23, xlix. 8, and Ez. xxv. 13, xxvii. 15, 20, xxxviii. 13, and are in every case obscure. The probable inferences from these mentions of Dedan are—1. That Dedan, son of Raamah, settled on the shores of the Persian Gulf, and his descendants became caravan-merchants between that coast and Palestine. 2. That Jokshan, or a son of Jokshan, by intermarriage with the Cushite Dedan formed a tribe of the same name, which appears to have had its chief settlement in the borders of Idumea, and perhaps to have led a pastoral life. A native indication of the name is presumed to exist in the island Didan, on the borders of the gulf.

De'da-nim or De-da'nim (Heb. pl. of DEDAN) (Is. xxi. 13). DEDAN.

De-d-i-ca'tion, Feast of the, the festival instituted to commemorate the purging of the Temple and the rebuilding of the altar after Judas Maccabeus had driven out the Syrians, b. c. 164. It is named only once in the Canonical Scriptures (Jn. x. 22). Its institution is recorded 1 Mc. iv. 52–59. It commenced on the 25th of Chisleu (in December; see MONTH), the anniversary of the pollution of the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes, b. c. 167. Like the great Mosaic feasts, it lasted eight days, but it did not require attendance at Jerusalem. It was an occasion of much festivity. The writer of 2 Mc.

tells us that it was celebrated in nearly the same manner as the Feast of Tabernacles, with the carrying of branches of trees, and with much singing (x. 6, 7). Josephus states that the festival was called "Lights." In the Temple at Jerusalem the "Hallel" (= Hallelujah, or service of praise; see PASSOVER) was sung every day of the feast.

Deer. FALLOW-DEER.

De-grees', Song of, a title given to fifteen PSALMS, from cxx. to cxxiv. inclusive. Four of them (cxxii., cxxiv., cxxxi., cxxxiii.) are attributed to David, one (the central one, cxxvii.) to Solomon, and the other ten give no indication of their author. Eichhorn supposes them all to be the work of one and the same bard, and he also shares the opinion of Herder, who interprets the title, "Hymns for a journey." With respect to the Heb. ma'âlôth, literally ascents, translated in the A. V. "degrees," a great diversity of opinion prevails amongst biblical critics. According to some it refers to the melody to which the Psalm was to be chanted. Others, including Gesenius, derive the word from the poetical composition of the song, and from the circumstance that the concluding words of the preceding sentence are often repeated at the commencement of the next verse (compare cxxi. 4, 6, and cxxiv. 1–2 and 3–4). Aben Ezra quotes an ancient authority, which maintains that the degrees allude to the fifteen steps which, in the temple of Jerusalem, led from the court of the women to that of the men, and on each of which steps, one of the fifteen songs of degrees was chanted. The most generally accredited opinion, however, is that they were pilgrim songs, sung by the people as they went up to Jerusalem (compare Ex. xxxiv. 24; 1 K. xii. 27, 28; Acts xv. 2, xviii. 22, xxi. 12, &c.). Hengstenberg supposes that the five ancient Psalms by David and Solomon, sung by the people, as they went up to Jerusalem, before the Captivity, were made the basis of a whole series or system, designed for the same use by an inspired writer after the return, who not only added ten Psalms of his own, as appears from the identity of tone and diction, but joined them to the old ones in a studied and artificial manner (Alexander on Ps. cxx.).

De'ha-vites (from Heb. = villagers? Ges.), are mentioned but once in Scripture (Ezr. iv. 9). They were among the colonists planted in Samaria after the completion of the Captivity of Israel. From their name and their being coupled with the SUSANCHITES and the ELAMITES, it is fairly concluded that they are the Dai or Dahi, mentioned by Herodotus (i. 125) among the nomadic tribes of Persia, and regarded by some as the ancestors of the modern Danes. Compare APOLLONIUS 5.

De kar (from Heb. = a thrusting through, Ges.). The son of Dekar (BEN-DEKAR) was Solomon's commissary in the western part of the hill-country of Judah and Benjamin, Shaalbim and Beth-shemesh (1 K. iv. 9).

De-lai'ah (la'yah) or Del-a-l'ah (Heb. Jehovah's freedman = DALAI'AH). 1. A priest in the time of David, leader of the twenty-third course of priests (1 Chr. xxiv. 18).—2. "Children of Delaiah" were among the people of uncertain pedigree who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 60; Neh. vii. 62).—3. Son of Mehetabeel and father of Shemaiah (Neh. vi. 10).—4. Son of Shemaiah, one of the "princes" about the court of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxvi. 12, 25).

De-l'i'lah, or Del'i-lah (Heb. feeble, pining with desire, Ges.), a woman who dwelt in the valley of SOREX, beloved by SAMSON (Judg. xvi. 4-20). Her connection with Samson forms the third and last of those amatory adventures which in his history are so inextricably blended with the craft and prowess of a judge in Israel. She was bribed by the "lords of the Philistines" to win from Samson the secret of his strength, and the means of overcoming it. There seems to be little doubt that she was a Philistine courtesan; and her employment as a political emissary, together with the large sum offered for her services (1,100 pieces of silver from each lord = 5,500 shekels; compare Judg. iii. 3), and the tinct attributed to her in Judges, but more especially in Josephus, indicates a position not likely to be occupied by any Israelitish woman at that period of national depression.

De'age. NOAH.

De'us (from Gr. deîos = visible, probably from the story of its becoming suddenly visible by order of Neptune, L. & S.), mentioned in 1 Mc. xv. 23, is the smallest of the islands called Cyclades in the Ægean Sea, or Grecian Archipelago. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Apollo, and was celebrated as the birthplace of this god and of his sister Artemis. DIANA.

De'mas (Gr., most probably a contraction from DEMETRIUS, or perhaps from Demarchus = governor of the people), a companion of St. Paul (Phn. 24; Col. iv. 14) during his first imprisonment at Rome. At a later period (2 Tim. iv. 10) we find him mentioned as having deserted the apostle through love of this present world, and gone to Thessalonica.

De-me'tri-us (L. from Gr. = of, or belonging to, the goddess Ceres, in Gr. Demeter, L. & S.). A maker of silver shrines of Artemis (DIANA) at EPHESUS (Acts xix. 24). These were small models of the great temple of the Ephesian Artemis, with her statue, which it was customary to carry on journeys, and place on houses, as charms.—2. A Christian highly commended in 3 Jn. 12; improbably supposed by some = No. 1. JOHN, 3d EPISTLE OF.

De-me'tri-us (L. from Gr., see above) I., surnamed So'ter (Gr. Saviour), king of Syria, was the son of SELEUCUS PHILOPATOR, and grandson of ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT. While still a boy he was sent by his father as a hostage to Rome (B. C. 175) in exchange for his uncle ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES. From his position he was unable to offer any opposition to the usurpation of the Syrian throne by Antiochus IV.; but on the death of that monarch (B. C. 164) he claimed his liberty and the recognition of his claim by the Roman senate in preference to that of his cousin ANTIOCHUS V. His petition was refused; he left Italy secretly, and landed with a small force in Tripolis in Phœnicia (1 Mc. vii. 1; 2 Mc. xiv. 1). The Syrians soon declared in his favor (B. C. 162), and Antiochus and his protector Lysias were put to death (1 Mc. vii. 2-4; 2 Mc. xiv. 2). His campaigns against the Jews were unsuccessful (1 Mc. vii.-x.). (ALCIMUS; ARIARATHES; BACCHIDES; MACCABEES; NICANOR.) In B. C. 152, ALEXANDER BALAS was brought forward, with the consent of the Roman senate, as a claimant to the throne. The rivals met in a decisive engagement (B. C. 150), and Demetrius, after displaying the greatest personal bravery, was defeated and slain (1 Mc. x. 48-50).

De-me'tri-us (see above) II., surnamed Ni-ca'ter (the victorious), was the eldest son of DEMETRIUS SO'REX. He was sent by his father, together with his brother ANTIOCHUS SIDETES, with a large treasure, to Chidus, when Alexander Balas laid claim to the throne of Syria. When he was grown up he made a descent on Syria (B. C. 148), and was received with general favor (1 Mc. x. 67 ff.). His campaigns against Jonathan and the Jews, and the favorable terms obtained from Demetrius by Simon, are described in 1 Mc. x.-xiii. (ANTIOCHUS VI.; APOLLONIUS 5; MACCABEES; PTOLEMY VI.; TRYPHON.) In B. C. 138, Demetrius was taken prisoner by ARSACES VI. (Mithridates), whose dominions he had invaded (1 Mc. xiv. 1-3). Mithridates treated his captive honorably, and gave him his daughter in marriage. When Antiochus Sidetes, who had gained possession of the Syrian throne, invaded Parthia, Phraates employed Demetrius to effect a diversion. In this Demetrius succeeded, and when Antiochus fell in battle, he again took possession of the Syrian crown (B. C. 128). Not long afterward a pretender, supported by Ptolemy Physcon, appeared in the field against him, and after suffering a defeat he was assassinated, according to some by his wife (CLEOPATRA 2), while attempting to escape by sea.

De'mon (from Gr. daimôn. LXX. use Gr. daimonion; N. T. daimonion, rarely daimôn, both translated "devil" in A. V.).—I. The usage of daimôn in classical Greek is various. In Homer, where the gods are but supernatural men, it is used interchangeably with "god;" afterward in Hesiod, when the idea of the gods had become more exalted and less familiar, the "demons" are spoken of as intermediate beings, the messengers of the gods to men.—II. In the LXX. the words daimôn and daimonion are not found very frequently, but yet employed to render different Hebrew words; generally in reference to the idols of heathen worship. In Josephus we find the word "demons" used always of evil spirits. By Philo it appears to be used in a more general sense, as equivalent to "angels," and referring to both good and evil.—III. We now come to the use of the term in the N. T. In the gospels generally, in Jas. ii. 19, and in Rev. xvi. 14, the demons (A. V. "devils") are spoken of as spiritual beings, at enmity with God, and having power to afflict man, not only with disease, but, as is marked by the frequent epithet "unclean," with spiritual pollution also. They "believe" the power of God "and tremble" (Jas. ii. 19); they recognize the Lord as the Son of God (Mat. viii. 29; Lk. iv. 41), and acknowledge the power of His name, used in exorcism, in the place of the name of Jehovah, by his appointed messengers (Acts xix. 15); and look forward in terror to the judgment to come (Mat. viii. 29). The description is precisely that of a nature akin to the angelic (ANGELS) in knowledge and powers, but with the emphatic addition of the idea of positive and active wickedness. There can be no doubt of its being a doctrine of Scripture, mysterious (though not necessarily impossible) as it may be, that in idolatry the influence of the demons was at work and permitted by God to be effective within certain bounds. Of the nature and origin of the demons, Scripture is all but silent. From Mat. xii. 24-30; Mk. iii. 22-30; Lk. xi. 14-26; Rev. xvi. 14, we gather that the demons are agents of Satan in his work of evil, subject to the kingdom of darkness, and doubtless doomed to share in its condemnation; and we conclude probably that they = the "angels" of the devil (Mat. xxv. 41; Rev. xii. 7, 9), the "principalities and powers against whom we wrestle" (Eph. vi. 12, &c.). BEELZEBUB; DEMONIACS; DEVIL; SATAN.

De-mo'ni-acs (the more literal translation of the Gr. pl. daimonizomenoi, A. V. "possessed with devils," &c.), a term frequently used in the N. T., and applied to persons suffering under the possession of a DEMON or evil spirit, such possession generally showing itself visibly in bodily disease or mental derangement. (So the Gr. daimon: n echei, A. V. "he hath a devil," might be translated he has a demon, or he is a demoniac.) In our Lord's time (as is seen, e. g. constantly in Josephus) the belief in the possession of men by demons, who were either the souls of wicked men after death, or evil angels, was thoroughly established among all the Jews except the Sadducees alone. With regard to the frequent mention of demoniacs in Scripture three main opinions have been started.—I. That of Strauss and the mythical school, which makes the whole account merely symbolic, without basis of fact. The notion stands or falls with the mythical theory as a whole, which would take away not only the INSPIRATION, but all the truth of the Scriptural narration. (MIRACLES.)—II. The second theory is, that our Lord and the Evangelists, in referring to demoniacal possession, spoke only in accommodation to the general belief of the Jews, without any assertion as to its truth or its falsity. It is concluded that, since the symptoms of the affliction were frequently those of bodily disease (as dumbness, Mat. ix. 32; blindness, Mat. xii. 22; epilepsy, Mk. ix. 17-27), or those seen in cases of ordinary insanity (as in Mat. viii. 28; Mk. v. 1-5), since also the phrase "to have a devil" is constantly used in connection with, and apparently = "to be mad" (Jn. vii. 20, viii. 48, x. 20, and perhaps Mat. xi. 18; Lk. vii. 33); and since, lastly, cases of demoniacal possession are not known to occur in our own days, therefore we must suppose that our Lord spoke, and the Evangelists wrote, in accordance with the belief of the time, and with a view to be clearly understood, especially by the sufferers themselves, but that the demoniacs were merely persons suffering under unusual diseases of body and mind. With regard to this theory also, it must be remarked that it does not accord either with the general principles or with the particular language of Scripture. Accommodation is possible, when, in things indifferent, language is used which, although scientifically or etymologically inaccurate, yet conveys a true impression, or when, in things not indifferent, a declaration of truth (1 Cor. iii. 1, 2), or a moral law (Mat. xix. 8), is given, true or right as far as it goes, but imperfect because of the imperfect progress of its recipients. But certainly here the matter was not indifferent, and superstition in things of far less moment was denounced by our Lord. Nor was the language used such as can be paralleled with mere conventional expression. There is no harm in our "speaking of certain forms of madness as lunacy, not thereby implying that we believe the moon to have or to have had any influence upon them; . . . but if we began to describe the cure of such as the moon's ceasing to afflict them, or if a physician were solemnly to address the moon, bidding it abstain from injuring his patient, there would be here a passing over to quite a different region, . . . there would be that gulf between our thoughts and words in which the essence of a lie consists. Now Christ does everywhere use such language as this." (Trench, On Miracles, p. 153.) Nor is there in the whole of the N. T. the least indication that any "economy" of teaching was employed on account of the "hardness" of the Jews' "hearts." Possession and its cure are recorded plainly and simply; demoniacs are frequently distinguished from those afflicted with bodily sickness (Mk. i. 32, xvi. 17, 18; Lk. vi. 17, 18), even, it would seem, from the epileptic (A. V. "lunatic," Mat. iv. 24); the same outward signs are sometimes referred to possession, sometimes merely to disease (compare Mat. iv. 24, with xvii. 15; xii. 22, with Mk. vii. 32, &c.); the demons are represented as speaking in their own persons with superhuman knowledge, and acknowledging our Lord to be, not as the Jews generally called him, son of David, but Son of God (Mat. viii. 29; Mk. i. 24, v. 7; Lk. iv. 41, &c.). All these things speak of a personal power of evil, and, if in any case they refer to what we might call mere disease, they at any rate tell us of something in it more than a morbid state of bodily organs or self-caused derangement of mind. Nor does our Lord speak of demons as personal spirits of evil to the multitude alone, but in His secret conversations with His disciples, declaring the means and conditions by which power over them could be exercised (Mat. xvii. 21). Twice also He distinctly connects demoniacal possession with the power of the Evil One; once in Lk. x. 18, to the seventy disciples, where He speaks of His powers and theirs over demoniacs as a "fall of SATAN," and again in Mat. xii. 25-30, when He was accused of casting out demons through Beelzebub, and, instead of giving any hint that the possessed were not really under any direct and personal power of evil, He uses an argument, as to the division of Satan against himself, which, if possession be unreal, becomes inconclusive and almost insincere. Lastly, the single fact recorded of the entrance of the demons at Gadara (Mk. v. 10-14) into the herd of swine, and the effect which that entrance caused, is sufficient to overthrow the notion that our Lord and the Evangelists do not assert or imply any objective reality of possession. In the face of this mass of evidence it seems difficult to conceive how the theory can be reconciled with any thing like truth of Scripture. (DIVINATION; INSPIRATION; LUNATICS; MEDICINE; MIRACLES.)—III. We are led, therefore (so Mr. Barry), to the ordinary and literal interpretation of these passages, that there are evil spirits, subjects of the Evil One, who, in the days of the Lord Himself and His apostles especially, were permitted by God to exercise a direct influence over the souls and bodies of certain men. This influence is clearly distinguished from the ordinary power of corruption and temptation wielded by Satan through the permission of God. The distinguishing feature of possession is the complete or incomplete loss of the sufferer's reason or power of will; his actions, his words, and almost his thoughts are mastered by the evil spirit (Mk. i. 24, v. 7; Acts xix. 15), till his personality seems to be destroyed, or, if not destroyed, so overborne as to produce the consciousness of a twofold will within him, like that sometimes felt in a dream. In the ordinary temptations and assaults of Satan the will itself yields consciously, and by yielding gradually assumes, without losing its apparent freedom of action, the characteristics of the Satanic nature. It is solicited, urged, and persuaded against the strivings of grace, but not overborne. Still, however, possession is only the special, and, as it were, miraculous form of the "law of sin in the members," the power of Satan over the heart itself, recognized by St. Paul as an indwelling and agonizing power (Rom. vii. 21-24). Nor can it be doubted that it was rendered possible in the first instance by the consent of the sufferer to temptation and to sin. That it would be most probable in those who yielded to sensual temptations may easily be conjectured from general observation of the tyranny of a habit of sensual indulgence.

Almost all the cases of demoniac possession are recorded as occurring among the rude and half-Gentile population of Galilee. It was but natural that the power of evil should show itself in more open and direct hostility than ever, in the age of our Lord and His apostles, when its time was short, that it should take the special form of possession in an age of such unprecedented and brutal sensuality as that which preceded His coming, and continued till the leaven of Christianity was felt;—that it should have died away gradually before the great direct, and still greater indirect, influence of Christ's kingdom. Accordingly we find early fathers, e. g. Justin Martyr, Tertullian, alluding to its existence as a common thing, mentioning the attempts of Jewish exorcism in the name of Jehovah as occasionally successful (Mat. xii. 27; Acts xix. 13), but especially dwelling on the power of Christian exorcism to cast it out from the country as a test of the truth of the Gospel, and as one well-known benefit which it already conferred on the empire. By degrees the mention is less and less frequent, till the very idea is lost or perverted.

Dem'o-phon [-fon] (Gr.), a Syrian general in Palestine under Antiochus V. Eupator (2 Mc. xii. 2).

De-na'ri-us (L.). MONEY, II. 2; PENNY.

De-pos'it [-poz-] (fr. L.). The arrangement by which one man kept at another's request the property of the latter until demanded back, was one common to all the nations of antiquity. Our Saviour seems to allude to conduct in such cases as a test of honesty (Lk. xvi. 12). In the later times, when no banking system (LOAN) was as yet devised, shrines were often used for the custody of treasure (2 Mc. iii. 10, 12, 15); but, especially among an agricultural people, the exigencies of war and other causes of absence, must often have rendered it necessary for an owner to intrust property, especially animals, to the custody of another. The articles specified by the Mosaic law on this subject are: (1.) "money or stuff;" and (2.) "an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast." The first case was viewed as only liable to loss by theft (probably for loss by accidental fire, &c., no compensation could be claimed), and the thief, if found, was to pay double, i. e. probably to compensate the owner's loss, and the unjust suspicion thrown on the depositary. If no theft could be proved, the depositary was to swear before the judges that he had not appropriated the article, and then was quit. In the second, if the beast were to "die or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it,"—accidents to which beasts at pasture were easily liable,—the depositary was to purge himself by a similar oath. In case, however, the animal were stolen, the depositary was liable to restitution, which probably was necessary to prevent collusive theft. If it were torn by a wild beast, some proof was easily producible, and, in that case, no restitution was due (Ex. xxii. 7-13). In case of a false oath so taken, the perjured person, besides making restitution, was to "add the fifth part more thereto," to compensate the one injured, and to "bring a ram for a trespass-offering unto the Lord" (Lev. vi. 5, 6). In Tob. v. 3 a written acknowledgment of a deposit is mentioned (compare i. 14, iv. 20).

Dep'u-ty, the uniform rendering in the A.V. of the Greek antlupatos = proconsul (Acts xiii. 7, 8, 12, xix. 38). The derived Greek verb antlupateuô (Acts xviii. 12) = "to be deputy." At the division of the Roman provinces by Augustus (B. C. 27) into senatorial and imperial, the emperor assigned to the senate such portions of territory as were peaceable, and could be held without force of arms, an arrangement which remained with frequent alterations till the third century. Over these senatorial provinces the senate appointed by lot yearly an officer, called proconsul, who exercised purely civil functions. The provinces were in consequence called proconsular. (ACHAIA; ASIA; CYPRUS; GALLIO; SERGIUS PAULUS.) The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was formerly called deputy (Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 2).

Der'be (Gr.). The exact position of this town has not yet been ascertained, but its general situation is undoubted. It was in the eastern part of the great upland plain of LYCAONIA, which stretches from ICONIUM E. along the N. side of the chain of Taurus. It must have been somewhere near the place where the pass called the Cilician Gates opened a way from the low plain of Cilicia to the table-land of the interior; and probably it was a stage upon the great road which passed this way. Derbe was visited by ST. PAUL on his first (Acts xiv. 6, 20) and second missionary journeys (xvi. 1), and probably also on the third (xviii. 23, xix. 1). "Gaius" was "of Derbe" (xx. 4). Three sites have been assigned to Derbe. (1.) By Col. Leake it was supposed to be Bu-bir-Kiliseh, at the foot of the Karadagh, a remarkable volcanic mountain which rises from the Lycaonian plain; but this is almost certainly the site of Lystra. (2.) In Kiepert's Map, Derbe is marked farther to the E., at a spot where there are ruins, and which is in the line of a Roman road. (3.) Hamilton and Texier are disposed to place it at Dirle, a little to the S. W. of the last position, and nearer to the roots of Taurus.

Des'ert, in the sense ordinarily attached to the word, is a vast, burning, sandy plain, alike destitute of trees and of water; but no such region as this is ever mentioned in the Bible as having any connection with the history of the Israelites. The words rendered in the A. V. by "desert," when used in the historical books, denoted definite localities, and those localities do not answer to the common conception of a "desert."—1. Heb. 'arabâh (literally arid tract, sterile region, Ges.), as already shown (ARABAH), with the article = the sunken valley N. and S. of the Dead Sea, but particularly the former. In the sense of the Jordan Valley it is translated "desert" only in Ex. xlvii. 8; in a more general sense of waste, deserted country it is translated "desert" in Is. xxxv. 1, 6, xl. 3, xli. 19, li. 8; Jer. ii. 6, v. 6, xvii. 6, l. 12.—2. Heb. midbâr = pasture ground, usually translated "wilderness," is translated "desert" in speaking of the WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING IN Ex. iii. 1, v. 3, xix. 2; Num. xx. 1, xxvii. 14, xxxiii. 16; and in more than one of these it is evidently employed for the sake of euphony merely. In Ex. xxiii. 31 it = the desert of ARABIA (Bush), and in 2 Chr. xxvi. 10 it = the district S. E. of Jerusalem and W. of the Dead Sea (Bertheau). Midbâr (almost uniformly translated "wilderness") is most frequently used for those tracts of waste land which lie beyond the cultivated ground in the immediate neighborhood of the towns and villages of Palestine (BETH-AVEN; GIBEON; JERUEL; MAON; PARAN; ZIPH, &c.), covered in spring with a rich, green verdure of turf and small shrubs and herbs of various kinds, but at the end of summer having a most dreary aspect, as the herbage withers, the turf dries up and is powdered thick with the dust of the chalky soil. In the poetical books "desert" is found as the translation of midbâr in Deut. xxxii. 10; Job xxiv. 5; Ps. lxxv. 6, margin, Heb. 7; Prov. xxi. 19, margin; Is. xli. 1; Jer. xxv. 24.—3. Heb.

hîrbâh or chûrbâh appears to have the force of dryness, and thence of desolation. It does not occur in any historical passages. It is rendered "desert" in Ps. cii. 6; Is. xlviii. 21; Ez. xiii. 4. The term commonly employed for it in the A. V. is "waste places" or "desolation."—4. Heb. yêshimôn with the article, apparently denotes the waste tracts on both sides of the Dead Sea. In all these cases it is treated as a proper name in the A. V. (JESHIMON.) Without the article it occurs in a few passages of poetry, and is translated "wilderness" in Deut. xxxii. 10, and "desert" in Ps. lxxviii. 40; cvi. 14; Is. xliii. 19, 20.—5. Gr. crêmos = solitary, lonely, desolate; as a noun, a solitude, desert, wilderness (L. & S., Rbn. N. T. Lex.), translated "desert" (Mat. xiv. 13, 15, xxiv. 28, &c.), "wilderness" (Mat. iii. 1, 8, &c.), "desolate" (Mat. xxiii. 38; Lk. xiii. 35; Acts i. 20; Gal. iv. 27), "solitary" (Mk. i. 35), and in LXX. = Nos. 2 and 3. The kindred Gr. noun crémia, usually translated "wilderness" (Mat. xv. 33, &c.), is in the plural translated "deserts" once (Heb. xi. 38).

DES-SAN (L.), a village (not "town"), at which Nicanor's army was once encamped during his campaign with Judas (2 Mc. xiv. 16). Ewald conjectures that it may have been ADASA.

* De-struction, Cit'y of. (Is. xix. 18). IR-HA-HERES.

Deu'el (Heb. invocation of God, Ges.), father of Eliasaph, the "prince" of Gad at the numbering of the people at Sinai (Num. i. 14, vii. 42, 47, x. 20). The same man is mentioned again in ii. 14 as REUEL, owing to an interchange of the two very similar Hebrew letters.

Deu-ter-on-o-my (fr. Gr. = second law). A. Contents. The book consists chiefly of three discourses delivered by Moses shortly before his death. They were spoken to all Israel in the plains of Moab on the E. side of the Jordan (i. 1), in the eleventh month of the last year of their wanderings, the fortieth year after their Exodus from Egypt (i. 3). Subjoined to these discourses are the Song of Moses, the Blessing of Moses, and the story of his death.—(I.) The first discourse (i. 1-iv. 40). After a brief historical introduction, the speaker recapitulates the chief events of the last forty years in the wilderness, and especially those events which had the most immediate bearing on the entry of the people into the promised land, and bases on this an earnest and powerful exhortation to obedience. To this discourse is appended a brief notice of the severing of the three cities of refuge on the E. side of the Jordan (iv. 41-43).—(II.) The second discourse is introduced like the first by an explanation of the circumstances under which it was delivered (iv. 44-49). It embraces v. 1-xxvi. 19, and contains a recapitulation, with some modifications and additions, of the Law already given on Mount Sinai. It will be observed that no pains are taken here, or indeed generally in the Mosaic legislation, to keep the several portions of the law, considered as moral, ritual, and ceremonial, apart from each other by any clearly marked line. But there is in this discourse a very manifest gradual descent from the higher ground to the lower. The speaker begins by setting forth Jehovah Himself as the great object of love and worship, thence he passes (1.) to the religious, (2.) to the political, and (3.) to the social economy of his people.—(III.) In the third discourse (xxvii. 1-xxx. 20), the Elders of Israel are associated with Moses. The people are commanded to set up stones upon Mount Ebal, and on them to write "all the words of this law." Then follow the several curses to be pronounced by the Levites on Ebal (xxvii. 14-26), and the blessings on Gerizim (xxviii. 1-14). How terrible will be the punishment is further portrayed in the vivid words of a prophecy too fearfully verified in the subsequent history of the people.—(IV.) The delivery of the law as written by Moses (for its still further preservation) to the custody of the Levites, and a charge to the people to hear it read once every seven years (xxxi.): the Song of Moses spoken in the ears of the people (xxx. 30-xxxii. 44): and the blessing of the twelve tribes (xxxiii.).—(V.) The Book closes (xxxiv.) with an account of the death of Moses, which is first announced to him in xxxii. 48-52.—B. Relation of Deuteronomy to the preceding books. It has been an opinion very generally entertained by the more modern critics, as well as by the earlier, that the book of Deuteronomy forms a complete whole in itself, and that it was appended to the other books as a later addition. The more conservative critics contend that Deuteronomy forms an integral part of the PENTATEUCH, which is throughout to be ascribed to Moses. Others have given reasons for believing that it was written by the Jehovist, or supposed later writer, according to the documentary hypothesis; whilst others again are in favor of a different author. The chief grounds on which the last opinion rests are the many variations and additions to be found in Deuteronomy, both in the historical and legal portions, as well as the observable difference of style and phraseology. It is necessary, therefore, before we come to consider more directly the question of authorship, to take into account these alleged peculiarities; and it may be well to enumerate the principal alleged discrepancies, additions, &c., and to subjoin the replies and explanations which they call forth.—(1.) Alleged Discrepancies. The most important discrepancies alleged to exist between the historical portions of Deuteronomy and the earlier books are the following:—(1.) The appointment of JUDGES (i. 6-18) is at variance with the account in Ex. xviii.—To this it has been answered, that although Deut. i. 6 mentions the departure from Sinai, yet Deut. i. 9-17 refers evidently to what took place during the abode there, as is shown by comparing the expression "at that time," ver. 9, with the same expression ver. 18. Again, there is no force in the objection that Jethro's counsel is here passed over in silence. When making allusion to a well-known historical fact, it is unnecessary for the speaker to enter into details. This at most is an omission, not a contradiction. Lastly, the story in Exodus is perfectly distinct from that in Num. xi., and there is no confusion of the two here. Nothing is said of the institution of the seventy in Deuteronomy, probably because the office was only temporary, and if it did not cease before the death of Moses, was not intended to be perpetuated in the promised land.—(2.) Chapter i. 22 is at variance with Num. xiii. 2, because here Moses is said to have sent the spies into Canaan at the suggestion of the people, whereas there God is said to have commanded the measure.—The explanation is obvious. The people make the request; Moses refers it to God, who then gives to it His sanction.—(3.) Chapter i. 44, "And the Amorites which dwelt in that mountain," &c., whereas in the story of the same event, Num. xiv. 43-45, Amalekites are mentioned.—The Amorites stand here not for "Amalekites" but for "Canaanites," as being the most powerful of all the Canaanitish tribes. (AMORITE.)—(4.) Chapter ii. 2-8, confused and at variance with Num. xx. 14-21, and xxi. 4. In the former we read (ver. 4), "Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren, the children of Esau." In the latter (ver. 20), "And he said, Thou shalt not go through. And Edom came out against him," &c.—But, according to Deuteronomy, that part of the Edomite territory only was traversed which lay about Elath and Ezion-geber, whereas the opposition, according to Numbers, was offered at Kadesh. In Deut. ii. 8 the failure of an attempt to pass elsewhere is implied. Again, the unfriendliness of the Edomites and Moabites in not coming out to meet the Israelites with bread and water (Num. xx. 19, 20; Deut. xxiii. 4), was the very reason why the latter were obliged to buy provisions of them (ii. 28, 29), for which in both accounts they offered to pay (Num. xx. 19; Deut. ii. 6).—(5.) More perplexing is the difference in the account of the encampments of the Israelites, as given Deut. x. 6, 7, compared with Num. xx. 23, xxxiii. 30 and 37. The explanation given by Kurtz is on the whole the most satisfactory. He says: "In the first month of the fortieth year the whole congregation comes a second time to the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh (Num. xxxiii. 36). On the down-route to Ezion-geber they had encamped at the several stations, Moseroth (or Mosera), Bene-Jaakan, Hor-hadgad, and Jotbath. But now again departing from Kadesh, they go to Mount Hor, 'in the edge of the land of Edom' (ver. 37, 38), or to Moserah (Deut. x. 6, 7), this last being in the desert at the foot of the mountain. Bene-Jaakan, Gudgodah, and Jotbath were also visited about this time, i. e. a second time, after the second halt at Kadesh." (WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING).—(6.) In Deuteronomy the usual name for the mountain on which the law was given is Horeb, only once (xxxiii. 2) SINAI; whereas in the other books Sinai is far more common than Horeb. The answer given is, that Horeb was the general name of the whole mountain-range; Sinai, the particular mountain on which the law was delivered.—(II.) The Additions both to the historical and legal sections are of far more importance, and the principal of them we shall here enumerate.—(1.) In the History. (a.) The command of God to leave Horeb (Deut. i. 6, 7, not mentioned Num. x. 11). The repentance of the Israelites (Deut. i. 45, omitted Num. xiv. 45). The intercession of Moses in behalf of Aaron (Deut. ix. 20, omitted Ex. xxxii, xxxiii.). These are so slight, however, that they might have been passed over very naturally in the earlier books. But of more note are: (b.) The command not to fight with the Moabites and Ammonites (Deut. ii. 9, 19), or with the Edomites, but to buy of them food and water (ii. 4–8). The notices respecting the earlier inhabitants of the countries of Moab and Ammon and of Mount Seir (ii. 10–12, 20–23); the sixty fortified cities of Bashan (iii. 4); the king of the country who was "of the remnant of giants" (iii. 11); the different names of Hermon (iii. 9); the wilderness of Kedemoth (ii. 26); and the more detailed account of the attack of the Amalekites (xxv. 17, 18; compare Ex. xvii. 8).—(2.) In the Law. The appointment of the cities of refuge (Deut. xix. 7–9; compare Num. xxxv. 14 and Deut. iv. 41); of one particular place for the solemn worship of God, where all offerings, tithes, &c., are to be brought (Deut. xii. 5 ff.), whilst the restriction with regard to the slaying of animals only at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation (Lev. xvii. 3, 4) is done away (Deut. xii. 15, 20, 21); the regulations respecting tithes to be brought with the sacrifices and burnt-offerings to the appointed place (6, 11, 17, xiv. 22 ff., xxvi. 12 ff.); concerning false prophets and seducers to idolatry and those that hearken unto them (xiii.); concerning the king and the manner of the kingdom (xvii. 14 ff.); the prophets (xviii. 15 ff.); war and military service (xx.); the expiation of secret murder; the law of female captives; of first-born sons by a double marriage; of disobedient sons; of those who suffer death by hanging (xxi.); the laws in xxii. 5–8, 13–21; of divorce (xxiv. 1 ff.); and various lesser enactments (xxiii., xxv.); the form of thanksgiving in offering the first-fruits (xxvi.); the command to write the law upon stones (xxvii.), and to read it before all Israel at the Feast of Tabernacles (xxxi. 10–13). Many others are rather extensions or modifications of, than additions to, existing laws.—C. Author. 1. It is generally agreed that by far the greater portion of the book is the work of one author. The only parts which have been questioned as possible interpolations, are, according to De Wette, iv. 41–3 x. 6–9, xxxii. and xxxiii. 2. It cannot be denied that the style of Deuteronomy is very different from that of the other four books of the PENTATEUCH. 3. Who then was the author? On this point the following principal hypotheses have been maintained:—(1.) The old traditional view that this book, like the other books of the Pentateuch, is the work of Moses himself. Of the later critics, Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Ranke, Stuart, &c., have maintained this view. In support of this opinion it is said: (a.) That supposing the whole Pentateuch to have been written by Moses, the change in style is easily accounted for when we remember that the last book is hortatory in its character, that it consists chiefly of orations, and that these were delivered under very peculiar circumstances. (b.) That the use of language is not only generally in accordance with that of the earlier books, and that as well in their Elohistic as in their Jehovistic portions (i. e. in those from the alleged older document, in which the name of God is ELOHIM, as well as in those from the alleged later one, in which the name JEHOVAH is used; see PENTATEUCH), but that there are certain peculiar forms of expression common only to these five books. (c.) That the alleged discrepancies in matters of fact between this and the earlier books may all be reconciled. (d.) That the book bears witness to its own authorship (xxxi. 19), and is expressly cited in the N. T. as the work of Moses (Mat. xix. 7, 8; Mk. x. 3 ff.; Acts iii. 22, vii. 37). The advocates of this theory of course suppose that the last chapter, containing an account of the death of Moses, was added by a later hand, and perhaps formed originally the beginning of the book of Joshua.—(2.) The opinion of Stäehelin (and as it would seem, of Bleek) that the author is the same as the writer of the Jehovistic or later portions of the other books.—(3.) The opinion of De Wette, Gesenius, &c., that the author of Deuteronomy is distinct from the Jehovist (i. e. the writer of the alleged later document of the other books).—(4.) From the fact that certain phrases occurring in Deuteronomy are found also in Jeremiah, it has been too hastily concluded by Von Bohlen, Gesenius, &c., that both books were the work of the prophet.—(5.) Ewald is of opinion that it was written by a Jew living in Egypt during the latter half of the reign of Manasseh. The song of Moses (xxxii.) is, according to him, not by the author of the rest of Deuteronomy, but is nevertheless later than the time of Solomon.—D. Date of Composi- tion. Was the book really written, as its language certainly implies, before the entry of Israel into the Promised Land? To suppose it was written long after the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan, in the reign of Solomon, or in that of Manasseh, is not only to make the book an historical romance, but to attribute very considerable inventive skill to the author. De Wette argues, indeed, that the character of the laws is such as of itself to presuppose a long residence in the land of Canaan. He instances the allusion to the Temple (xii. and xvi. 1-7), the provision for the right discharge of the kingly and prophetic offices, the rules for civil and military organization, and the state of the Levites, who are represented as living without cities (though such are granted to them in Num. xxxv.) and without tithes (allotted to them in Num. xviii. 20 ff.). Other reasons for a later date, such as the mention of the worship of the sun and moon (Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3; compare Am. v. 26); the punishment of stoning (Deut. xvii. 5, xxii. 21 ff.; compare Ex. xix. 13, xxi. 28 ff.; Lev. xx. 2, 27, &c.); the name Feast of Tabernacles (Deut. xvi. 18; compare Lev. xxiii. 34); and the motive for keeping the Sabbath (Deut. v. 15; compare Ex. xx. 11; one motive does not exclude other motives), are of little force. For a further discussion of the question of authorship, as well as of the date of the legislation in Deuteronomy, see PENTATEUCH.

Devil [dev'1], the A. V. translation of—1. Gr. diabolos (= a trader, accuser, slanderer, Rbn. N. T. Lxx.). This Greek word is found in the plural in 1 Tim. iii. 11 (A. V. "slanderers"); 2 Tim. iii. 3 and Tit. ii. 3 (A. V. in both "false accusers," margin "make-bates"). In all other cases it is used with the article in the singular as a descriptive name of SATAN (A. V. "the devil," Wis. ii. 24; Mat. iv. 1, 5, 8, 11, xiii. 39, xxv. 41, &c.), excepting that in Jn. vi. 70 (A. V. "a devil") it is applied (without the article) to Judas (compare Mat. xvi. 23), as doing Satan's work, also (without the article) to Satan (Acts xiii. 10, A. V. "thou child of the devil," literally Devil's son); in LXX. = "Satan." The name describes Satan as slandering God to man, and man to God.—2. Gr. daimōn (Mat. viii. 31, &c.), daimonion (Tob. vi. 7, 17, Gr. 8, 18; Bar. iv. 7, 35; Mat. vii. 22, ix. 33 f., &c.), &c. (DEMON; DEMONIACS).—3. Heb. śā'ir (Lev. xvii. 7; 2 Chr. xi. 15), an object of idolatrous worship = a he-goat, Ges. (GOAT; SATYRS).—4. Heb. pl. šēdīm (Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. cvi. 37) = idols, properly lords, Ges.; demons, LXX.; compare 1 Cor. x. 20.

Dew. This in the summer is so copious in Palestine that it supplies to some extent the absence of rain (Ecclus. xviii. 16, xliii. 22), and becomes important to the agriculturist. As a proof of this copiousness the well-known sign of Gideon (Judg. vi. 37, 39, 40) may be adduced (compare Cant. v. 2; Dan. iv. 23, 25). Thus it is coupled in the divine blessing with rain, or mentioned as a prime source of fertility (Gen. xxvii. 28; Deut. xxxiii. 13; Zech. viii. 12), and its withdrawal is attributed to a curse (2 Sam. i. 21; 1 K. xvii. 1; Hag. i. 10). It becomes a leading object in prophetic imagery by reason of its penetrating moisture without the apparent effort of rain (Deut. xxxii. 2; Job xxix. 19; Ps. cxxxiii. 3; Prov. xix. 12; Is. xvi. 19; Hos. xiv. 5; Mic. v. 7); while its speedy evanescence typifies the transient goodness of the hypocrite (Hos. vi. 4, xiii. 3). With the proverbial expressions (Prov. iii. 20), "the clouds drop down the dew," compare the common modern phrase, "the dew falls." AGRICULTURE; EARTH.

Di'a-dem (fr. Gr., literally = something bound around, sc. the head). What the "diadem" of the Jews was we know not. (Crown.) That of other nations of antiquity was a fillet of silk, two inches broad, bound round the head and tied behind, the invention of which is attributed to Bacchus. Its color was generally white; sometimes, however, it was of blue, like that of Darius; and it was sown with pearls or other gems (Zech. ix. 16), and enriched with gold (Rev. ix. 7). It was peculiarly the mark of Oriental sovereigns (1 Mc. xiii. 32). A crown (Heb. nézer = diadem, Ges.) was used by the kings of Israel, even in battle (2 Sam. i. 10); but probably this was not the state crown (Heb. ʾăḏ-râh, 2 Sam. xii. 30), although used in the coronation of Joash (2 K. xi. 12). In Esth. i. 11, ii. 17, we have the Heb. cether for the turban (A. V. "crown") worn by the Persian king, queen, or other eminent persons to whom it was conceded as a special favor (viii. 15). The diadem of the king differed from that of others in having an erect triangular peak. The words in Ez. xxiii. 15 (translated in A. V. "exceeding in dyed attire") mean long and flowing turbans of gorgeous colors.

Di'al. The Heb. pl. ma'âlôth (translated "dial," margin "degrees," in 2 K. xx. 11; Is. xxxviii. 8) is rendered "steps" in A. V. (Ex. xx. 26; 1 K. x. 19, 20, &c.), and "degrees" in A. V. (2 K. xx. 9, 10, 11; Is. xxxviii. 8, &c.; see DEGREES, SONS OF). In the absence of any materials for determining the shape and structure of the solar instrument, which certainly appears intended (AHAZ), the best course is to follow the most strictly natural meaning of the words, and to consider with Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome, that the ma'âlôth were really stairs, and that the shadow (perhaps of some column or obelisk on the top) fell on a greater or smaller number of them according as the sun was low or high. The terrace of a palace might easily be thus ornamented. ASTRONOMY; CHRONOLOGY; HOUR.

Di'a-mond [di'a-mund or di'mund], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. yahalom, a precious stone, the third in the second row on the breastplate of the high-priest (Ex. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11), and mentioned (Ez. xxviii. 13) among the precious stones of the king of Tyre. Our translation, "diamond," is derived from Aben Ezra, defended by Braun, and apparently embraced by Fürst, Henderson, Bush, &c. The diamond is a well-known transparent gem, the hardest and most costly of all minerals. Several of the ancient versions translate the Hebrew word "the ONYX, which," says Gesenius, "is not improbable." Kalisch says "perhaps EMERALD."—2. Heb. shāmīr (Jer. xvii. 1). ADAMANT.

Di-a-na or Di-an'a. This Latin word, properly denoting a Roman divinity, is the representative of the Greek Artemis, the tutelary goddess of the Ephesians, who plays so important a part in Acts xix. The Ephesian Diana was, however, regarded as invested with very different attributes, and made the object of a different worship, from the ordinary Diana of the Greeks, and rather perhaps = Astarte (ASHTORETH) and other female divinities of the East. In some respects there was doubtless a fusion of the two. Diana was the goddess of rivers, of pools, and of harbors; and these conditions are satisfied by the situation of the sanctuary at EPHEBUS. Again, on coins of Ephesus we sometimes find her exhibited as a huntress and with a stag. But the true Ephesian Diana is represented in a form entirely alien from Greek art, viz. as a many-breasted mummy, and was undoubtedly a symbol of the productive and nutritive powers of nature. The coin below will give some notion of the image, which was grotesque and archaic in character. The head wore a mural crown, each hand held a bar of metal, and the lower part ended in a rude block covered with figures of animals and mystic inscriptions. This idol was regarded as an object of peculiar sanctity, and was believed to have fallen down from heaven (Acts xix. 35). The cry of the mob (28), "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" and the strong expression (27), "whom all Asia and the world worshippeth," may be abundantly illustrated from a variety of sources. The term "great" was evidently a title of honor recognized as belonging to the Ephesian goddess. We find it in inscriptions, &c. Pausanias tells us that the Ephesian Diana was more honored privately than any other deity.

Dib-la'im or Dib'la-im (Heb. double cake? Ges.), mother of Hosea's wife Gomer (Hos. i. 3). Gesenius and Fairbairn make Diblaim the father of Gomer.

Dib'lath (Heb. Diblah), a place named only in Ez. vi. 14, as if situated at one of the extremities of the land of Israel; regarded by Jerome, Michaelis, Gesenius, &c., as a copyist's mistake for Riblah.

Dib'on (Heb. a pinning, wasting, Ges.; river-place, Fü.). 1. A town on the E. side of Jordan, in the rich pastoral country, which was taken possession of and rebuilt by the children of Gad (Num. xxxii. 3, 34). From this circumstance it possibly received the name of DIBON-GAD. Its first mention is in the ancient fragment of poetry Num. xxi. 30, and from this it appears to have belonged originally to the Moabites. We find Dibon counted to Reuben in Josh. xiii. 9, 17. In the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah, however, it was again in possession of Moab (Is. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 18, 22, compare 24). In the same denunciations of Isaiah it appears, probably, under the name of DIMON. In modern times the name Dhibān has been discovered by Seetzen, Irby and Mangles, and Burckhardt as attached to extensive ruins on the Roman road, about three miles N. of the ARNON. All agree, however, in describing these ruins as lying low.—2. One of the towns re-inhabited by the men of Judah after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 25); probably = DIMONAH. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, under "S. country") makes Dibon = Ehdib, a ruined site about four miles E. of Tell 'Arad (Arad).

Dib'on-gad (Heb. wasting of Gad), one of the halting-places of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 45, 46); probably = DIBON 1.

Dib'ri (Heb. eloquent? Ges.; born on the pasture, or Jah distributes promise, Fü.), a Danite, father of SHELOMITH 1 (Lev. xxiv. 11).

* Di-drach'ma [-drak-] (L. fr. Gr. didrachmon = a double drachm) (Mat. xvii. 24, margin). DRACHM; MONEY; SHEKEL.

Did'y-mas (L. fr. Gr. = the twin), a surname of the Apostle THOMAS (Jn. xi. 16, xx. 24, xxi. 2).

* Die, to. DEATH.

Dik'lah (Heb.; see below) (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chr. i. 21), a son of JOKTAN, whose settlements, with those of Joktan's other sons, must be looked for in ARABIA. The name in Hebrew signifies "a palm-tree," hence it is thought that Diklah is a part of Arabia containing many palm-trees. Bochart, and after him Gesenius, refer the descendants of Diklah to the Minæi, a people of Arabia Felix inhabiting a palmiferous country. No trace of Diklah is known to exist in Arabic works, except the mention of a place called Dakalah in El-Yemāneh, with many palm-trees. The Ar. nakhleh also signifies a palm-tree, and is the name of many places, especially Nakhleh el-Yemāneeyeh, and Nakhleh esh-Shāneeyeh, two well-known towns situate near each other. Therefore, 1. Diklah may probably be recovered in the place called Dakalah above mentioned; or, possibly, 2. in one of the places named Nakhleh.

Dil'e-an (Heb. gourd-field, Ges.), one of the cities in the lowlands of Judah (Josh. xv. 38); not identified with certainty. Van de Velde suggests that it may be the modern place Tina, about three miles N. of Tell es-Safeh (Gath?), in the maritime plain of Philistia, S. of Ekron.

Dim'nah (Heb. a place of dung, Fü.), a city in the tribe of Zebulun, given to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 35); possibly a variation of RIMMON (1 Chr. vi. 77). Van de Velde supposes Dimnah at the village of Dāmōn, seven or eight miles E. S. E. of 'Akka (Accho).

Di'mon (Heb. = DIBON, Ges., Fü.), the Waters of, some streams on the E. of the Dead Sea, in the land of Moab, against which Isaiah is here uttering denunciations (Is. xv. 9). Gesenius conjectures that Dimon = DIBON.

Di-mo'nah (Heb. = DIBON, Ges.), a city in the S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 22), probably = DIBON 2. Rowlands (in Fbn. under "S. Country") supposes Dimonah (in LXX. Regma) = 'Ain Rakhunch, about fifteen miles E. S. E. of Beer-sheba.

Di'nah (Heb. judged, avenged; compare DAX), the daughter of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxx. 21). She accompanied her father from Mesopotamia to Canaan, and, having ventured among the inhabitants, was violated by Shechem the son of Hamor, the chieftain of the territory in which her father had settled (xxxiv.). Her age at this time, judging by the subsequent notice of Joseph's age (xxxvii. 2), may have been from thirteen to fifteen, the ordinary period of MARRIAGE in Eastern countries. Shechem proposed to make the usual reparation by paying a sum to the father and marrying her (xxxiv. 12). But in this case the suitor was an alien, and the crown of the offence consisted in its having been committed by an alien against the favored people of God; he had "wrought folly in Israel" (xxxiv. 7). The proposals of Hamor, who acted as his deputy, were framed on the recognition of the hitherto complete separation of the two peoples; he proposed the fusion of the two by the establishment of the rights of intermarriage and commerce. The sons of Jacob, bent upon revenge (ABSAŁOM; BLOOD, AVENGER OF), availed themselves of the eagerness which Shechem showed, to effect their purpose; they demanded, as a condition of the proposed union, the CIRCUMCISION of the Shechemites. They therefore assented; and on the third day, when the pain and fever resulting from the operation were at the highest, Simeon and Levi, own brothers to Dinah, attacked them unexpectedly, slew all the males and plundered their city. Nothing more is certainly known of Dinah; but she probably went with the rest into Egypt (xvi. 15).

Din'-ites (fr. Heb. = a people from some unknown place or region called Din [= a cause, judgment], Fül.), an unknown people of the Assyrian empire, from whom colonists were placed by ASNAPPER in Samaria after the Captivity of the ten tribes (Ezr. iv. 9).

Din'-ha-bah (Heb. lord [i. e. place] of plundering? Ges.; bending aside, concealment, little place, Fül.), the capital city, and probably the birthplace, of Bela, son of Beor, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 32; 1 Chr. i. 43); not identified.

* Din'-er. MEALS.

Di-o-nys'-i-a [-nish'e-a] (L. fr. Gr.) = "the feast of BACCHUS."

Di-o-nys'-i-us [-nish'e-us] (L. fr. Gr. = of Dionysus or BACCHUS) the A-re-op-a-gite (Acts xvii. 34), an eminent Athenian (AREOPAGITE; AREOPAGUS) converted to Christianity by the preaching of St. Paul. Eusebius makes him, on the authority of Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, to have been first bishop of Athens. According to a later tradition he suffered martyrdom at Athens. The writings once attributed to him are now confessed to be the production of some neo-Platonists of the sixth century.

Di-o-ny'-sus (L. fr. Gr.) = BACCHUS (3 Mc. ii. 29).

Di-oc-e-sin'-thi-us (fr. Gr.). MONTH.

Di-ot'-re-phes [-fee-z] (Gr. Jove-nurtured, L. & S.), a professed Christian, ambitious and domineering, who resisted the Apostle John's authority (3 Jn. 9, 10). JOHN, 3D EPISTLE OF.

Dis-ci'-ple [dis-si-pl] (fr. L. = learner, scholar, pupil). CHRISTIAN; EDUCATION.

Dis'-cus (L. fr. Gr. = quoit), a circular plate of stone or metal, made for throwing to a distance as and was introduced among the Jews by the high-priest JASON 4 (2 Mc. iv. 14).

Dis-ca'-ses. MEDICINE.

Dish, the A. V. translation of the Heb. sephel (also translated "bowl"), tsallahath or tsallachath, and ke'ardh (also translated "CHARGER"), also (Mat. xxvi. 23; Mk. xiv. 20) of the Gr. trublion (= a dish, bowl, for eating or drinking, Rbn. N. T. Lex.). BASIN; MEALS.

Di'shan (Heb. = DISHON), youngest son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 28, 30; 1 Chr. i. 38, 42).

* Di'shon (Heb.) (Deut. xiv. 5, marg.). PYGARG.

Di'shon (Heb. antelope; see PYGARG). 1. The fifth son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 26, 30; 1 Chr. i. 41).—2. The son of Anah and grandson of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 25; 1 Chr. i. 38, 41). Dishon and DISHAN belong to the same root. The geographical position of the tribes descended from these patriarchs is uncertain. Knobel places them E. and S. E. of the Gulf of Akabah. ARABIA.

Dis-per'-sion, the Jews of, or simply The Dis-per'-sion (Gr. diaspora, A. V. "the dispersed," [Jn. vii. 35], "which are scattered abroad" [Jas. i. 1], "scattered" [1 Pet. i. 1]; comp. Deut. xxviii. 25; Jer. xxxiv. 17), was the general title applied to those Jews who remained settled in foreign countries after the return from the Babylonian exile, and during the period of the second Temple. The Dispersion, as a distinct element influencing the entire character of the Jews, dates from the Babylonian exile. (CARITIVITY; COMMERCE; CYRUS.) Outwardly and inwardly, by its effects both on the Gentiles and on the people of Israel, the Dispersion appears to have been the clearest providential preparation for the spread of Christianity. At the beginning of the Christian era the Dispersion was divided into three great sections: the Babylonian, the Syrian, the Egyptian. Precedence was yielded to the first. From Babylon the Jews spread throughout Persia, Media, and Parthia; but the settlements in China belong to a modern date. The Greek conquests in Asia extended the limits of the Dispersion. Seleucus Nicator transplanted large bodies of Jewish colonists from Babylonia to the capitals of his western provinces. His policy was followed by his successor Antiochus the Great; and the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes only served to push forward the Jewish emigration to the remoter districts of his empire. Large settlements of Jews were established in Armenia, in CYRRUS, in the islands of the Ægean, and on the western coast of Asia Minor. The Jews of the Syrian provinces gradually formed a closer connection with their new homes, and together with the Greek language adopted in many respects Greek ideas. (HELLENIST.) This Hellenizing tendency, however, found its most free development at ALEXANDRIA. The Jewish settlements established there by Alexander and Ptolemy I. became the source of the African Dispersion, which spread over the N. coast of Africa, and perhaps inland to Abyssinia. At CYRENE and Berenice (Tripoli) the Jewish inhabitants formed a considerable portion of the population. The African Dispersion, like all other Jews, preserved their veneration for the "holy city," and recognized the universal claims of the Temple by the annual tribute. But the distinction in language led to wider differences, which were averted in Babylon by the currency of an Aramaic dialect. After the destruction of the Temple, A. D. 70, the Zealots found a reception in Cyrene; and toward the close of the reign of Trajan, A. D. 116, the Jewish population an exercise of strength and dexterity. The discus or quoit was originally of stone (Homer, Pindar). Discobolus (L. fr. Gr.) = one who throws or pitches the discus. Pitching the discus was one of the principal gymnastic exercises (GAMES) of the Greeks, in Africa rose with terrible ferocity. The Jewish settlements in Rome were consequent upon the occupation of Jerusalem by Pompey, B. C. 63. The captives and emigrants whom he brought with him were located in the trans-Tiberine quarter, and by degrees rose in station and importance. In the reign of CLAUDIUS the Jews became objects of suspicion from their immense numbers; and the internal disputes led to their banishment from the city (Acts xviii. 2). This expulsion, if general, can only have been temporary, for in a few years the Jews at Rome were numerous (xxviii. 17 ff.). The influence of the Dispersion on the rapid promulgation of Christianity can scarcely be overrated. The course of the apostolic preaching followed in a regular progress the line of Jewish settlements. The mixed assembly from which the first converts were gathered on the day of Pentecost represented each division of the Dispersion (Acts ii. 9, 11; [1.] Parthians . . . Mesopotamia; [2.] Judea [i. e. Syria] . . . Pamphylia; [3.] Egypt . . . Greece; [4.] Romans . . .), and these converts naturally prepared the way for the apostles in the interval which preceded the beginning of the separate apostolic missions. • Dis'taff. SPINNING.

• Dives [-veez], a Latin adjective (= rich), often used in theological writings to designate "the rich man" in the parable of Lk. xvi. 19-31, and doubtless derived from the Vulgate version.

Div-i-na-tion (Ez. xiii. 7; Acts xvi. 16, &c.). This art "of taking an aim of divine matters by human, which cannot but breed mixture of imaginations" (Bacon, Essay xvii.), has been universal in all ages and all nations, alike civilized and savage. One kind of divination was called Natural, in which the medium of inspiration was transported from his own individuality, and became the passive instrument of supernatural utterances. The other kind of divination (i. e. by the observation of phenomena) was artificial, and probably originated in an honest conviction that external nature sympathized with and frequently indicated the condition and prospects of mankind; a conviction not in itself ridiculous, and fostered by the accidental synchronism of natural phenomena with human catastrophes. When once this feeling was established the supposed manifestations were infinitely multiplied. The invention of divination is ascribed to Prometheus, to the Phrygians and Etrurians, especially sages, or to the devil. In the same way Zoroaster ascribes all magic to Ahri-man. (PERSIANS.) Similar opinions have prevailed in modern times. Many forms of divination are mentioned in Scripture, and the subject is so frequently alluded to, that it deserves careful examination. 1. Heb. hartumim or chartumnim, A. V. "magicians," are first mentioned as a prominent body at the Egyptian court (Gen. xli. 8, &c.). They were a class of Egyptian priests, eminent for learning. The same name is applied to the MAGI of Babylon (Dan. i. 20, &c.). (MAGIC.) Daniel was made "master of the magicians," &c., by Nebuchadnezzar (v. 11).—2. Heb. hacāmim or chacāmim, A. V. "wise men" (Ex. vii. 11; Esth. i. 13; Jer. l. 35), does not seem to mean any special class, but merely the wise men of Egypt, &c., generally (R. S. Poole). A kindred word, Chal. hacim or chacim, A. V. "wise men," is used similarly in Dan. ii. 12 ff., &c.—3. Heb. m'cashašephim, A. V. "sorcerers," properly = those who use magic formulas, incantations, &c., Ges. (Ex. vii. 11; Dan. ii. 2; Mal. iii. 5); m'cashašeph, sing. masc., A. V. "a witch" (Deut.

xviii. 10); m'cashašephah, sing. fem., A. V. "a witch" (Ex. xxii. 18, Heb. 17). The kindred noun cashašephim is translated in A. V. "sorcerers" (Jer. xxvii. 9). (ENCHANTMENTS 2).—4. Heb. yiddē'otim (Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6, &c.), uniformly translated in A. V. "wizards," or in sing. "wizard," literally knowing or wise ones, but always applied to wizards and false prophets (R. S. Poole).—5. Heb. ōbōth, sing. ōb, A. V. "familiar spirits" ("spirit"), or "those that have familiar spirits" (Lev. xx. 6; Is. viii. 19, xix. 3, &c.); shōel ōb, A. V. "a consulter with familiar spirits" (Deut. xviii. 11). The words properly denote spirits of the dead, and then by an easy metonymy those who consulted them. They are also called Pythones. Hence the "spirit of PYTHON" (Acts xvi. 16, margin). These ventriloquists (so the LXX. render ōbōth) "peeped and muttered" from the earth to imitate the voice of the revealing familiar (Is. xxix. 4, &c.; 1 Sam. xxviii. 8; Lev. xx. 27). Ob properly = a bottle (Job xxiii. 19), and was applied to the magician, because he was supposed to be inflated by the spirit. Of this class was the witch of Endor.—6. Heb. kōsem kēdāmim, literally a diviner of divinations (R. S. Poole), A. V. "that useth divination" (Deut. xviii. 10), or kōsem simply, A. V. "soothsayer," margin "diviner" (Josh. xiii. 22), usually kōsemim in pl., A. V. "diviners" (Deut. xviii. 14, &c.), = a diviner, one who foretells, used only of false prophets, Ges.—7. Heb. m'ōnēn, A. V. "an observer of times" (Mic. v. 12; 2 K. xxi. 6), is derived by Gesenius, &c., from 'ānan, to cover, and may mean generally using hidden arts (Is. ii. 6, A. V. "are soothsayers;" Jer. xxvii. 9, A. V. "enchanters"). If derived from 'ayin, an eye, it = one who fascinates with the eyes, as in the Syriac version. A belief in the evil eye was universal, and is often alluded to in Scripture (Prov. xxiii. 6; Mat. xx. 15; Tob. iv. 7; 1 Sam. xviii. 9, "Saul eyed David"). Others again make the 'ōnēnīm (the form of the word in Is. ii. 6, &c.) = "soothsayers," who predicted "times," as in A. V., from the observation of the clouds. Gesenius says the word "seems rather to imply some kind of divination connected with idolatry." (MEONENIM).—8. Heb. mēnahēsh or mēnāchēsh, A. V. "an enchanter" (Deut. xviii. 10). The verb nāhash or nāchash (SERPENT), from which this comes, translated "use enchantments" (Lev. xix. 26; 2 K. xvii. 17, xxi. 6; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 6), "divine," margin "make trial" (Gen. xlii. 5, 16), "learn by experience" (xxx. 27), &c., = to take auguries, practise divination, prognosticate, augur, Ges. Some understand by it divination by serpents (Ges.). (SERPENT-CHARMING.) The noun nāhash or nāchash is translated "ENCHANTMENT" (Num. xxiii. 23, xxiv. 1). Kindred Hebrew words (lāhash or lāchash, verb, &c.) are translated "charmners" (Ps. lviii. 5, Heb. 6), "ENCHANTMENT" (Eccl. x. 11), "charmed" (Jer. viii. 17). Both verbs properly = to hiss, whisper, especially applied to the whispering or muttering of sorcerers, Ges.—9. Heb. hōbēr hūbārīm or chōbēr chūbārīm, A. V. "charming" literally charming charms (Ps. lviii. 5, Heb. 6); hōbēr hūbēr, A. V. "a charmer," literally one charming a charm (Deut. xviii. 11); = binding with spells, fascinating, charming, spoken of a species of magic practised by binding magic knots (Ges.). The pl. noun, A. V. "enchantments," occurs alone in Is. xlvii. 9, 12. (MAGIC; SERPENT-CHARMING).—10. Belomants, i. e. those who divine by arrows. In Ez. xxi. 21, Nebuchadnezzar, at the parting of two ways, uses divination by arrows to decide whether he shall proceed against Jerusalem or Rabbah. Jerome explains it of mingling in a quiver arrows on which were inscribed the names of various cities, that city being attacked the name of which was drawn out. Estius says he threw up a bundle of arrows to see which way they would light, and falling on the right hand he marched toward Jerusalem.—11. Closely connected with this was divination by rods, or rhabdomancy (Hos. iv. 12, A.V. "staff"). Of this many kinds are mentioned, e. g. striking the ground with a staff and uttering horrid noises, till the diviner becomes frantic, and prophesies; measuring a staff with the finger or hand, and uttering one of a set of words at each measurement; peeling one side of a rod, and throwing it up to see whether the peeled or unpeeled side will fall uppermost; setting up rods and observing which way they fall, &c. (Dr. P. Holmes, in Kitto).—12. Cup divination (Gen. xlv. 5). Parkhurst and others, denying that divination is intended, make it a mere cup of office "for which he would search carefully." But in all probability the A.V. is right (compare No. 8 above and MAGIC). The divination was by means of radiations from the water or from magically inscribed gems, &c., thrown into it.—13. Consultation of TERAPHIM (Zech. x. 2, margin; Ez. xxi. 21, margin, &c.). These were wooden images consulted as "idols," from which the excited worshippers fancied that they received oracular responses.—14. Divination by the liver, or hepatoscopy (Ez. xxi. 21). The liver was the most important part of the sacrifice. Thus the deaths of both Alexander and Hephæstion were foretold.—15. Divination by DREAMS, or oneiromancy (Deut. xiii. 2, 3; Judg. vii. 13; Jer. xxiii. 32). Many warnings occur in Scripture against the impostures attendant on the interpretation of dreams (Zech. x. 2, &c.). We find however no direct trace of seeking for dreams.—16. The consultation of oracles may be considered as another form of divination (Is. xli. 21-24, xlv. 7). (ORACLE.) That there were several oracles of heathen gods known to the Jews we may infer both from the mention of that of Baal-zebub at Ekron (2 K. i. 2-6), and from the towns named DEIR. Moses forbade every species of divination, because a prying into the future clouds the mind with superstition, and because it would have been an incentive to IDOLATRY (2 K. xxi. 6; Is. ii. 6); indeed the frequent denunciations of the sin in the prophets tend to prove that these forbidden arts presented peculiar temptations to apostate Israel. But God supplied His people with substitutes for divination, which would have rendered it superfluous, and left them in no doubt as to His will in circumstances of danger, had they continued faithful. It was only when they were unfaithful that the revelation was withdrawn (1 Sam. xxviii. 6; 2 Sam. ii. 1; v. 23, &c.). Superstition not unfrequently goes hand in hand with skepticism, and hence, amid the general infidelity prevalent through the Roman empire at our Lord's coming, imposture was rampant; as a glance at the pages of Tacitus will suffice to prove. Hence the lucrative trades of such men as Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9), Bar-jesus (xiii. 6, 8), the slave with the spirit of Python (xvi. 16), the vagabond Jews, exorcists (Lk. xi. 19; Acts xix. 13), and others (2 Tim. iii. 13; Rev. xix. 20, &c.), as well as the notorious dealers in magical books at Ephesus (Acts xix. 19). DEMONIACS; INSPIRATION; MAGIC; PROPHET; URM and THUMMIM.

DIVORCE [as in force] (fr. L.). The law regulating this subject is found Deut. xxiv. 1-4, and the cases in which the right of a husband to divorce his wife was lost, are stated xxii. 19, 29. The ground of di-vorice (Heb. 'ervath dābār, A. V. "some uncleanness") is a point on which the Jewish doctors of the period of the N. T. widely differed; the school of Shammai seeming to limit it to a moral delinquency in the woman, whilst that of Hillel extended it to any thing offensive or displeasing, e. g. if the wife burnt the food she was cooking for her husband. The Pharisees wished perhaps to embroil our Saviour with these rival schools by their question (Mat. xix. 8); by His answer to which, as well as by His previous maxim (v. 31), He declares that but for their hardened state of heart, such questions would have no place. Yet from the distinction made, "but I say unto you" (v. 31, 32), it seems to follow, that He regarded all the lesser causes than "fornication" (ADULTERY) as standing on too weak ground, and declined the question of how to interpret the words of Moses. It would be unreasonable, therefore (so Mr. Hayman), to suppose that by "some uncleanness," to which he limited the remedy of divorce, Moses meant "fornication," i. e. adultery, for that would have been to stultify the law "that such should be stoned" (Jn. viii. 5; Lev. xx. 10). But the husband was not bound, so far as appears, to denounce his guilty wife, it being the business of the local police to bring crimes before the local courts for their adjudication. Thus the husband, even in cases of adultery, might give the ordinary bill of divorce, leaving it to common fame to bring the matter before the police magistrates. This view of Jewish usage explains Jer. iii. 8 and Mat. i. 19 (so Pres. Woolsey, in New Englander, xxvi. 220). Knobel says of the Heb. 'ervath dābār, A. V. "some uncleanness," in Deut. xxiv. 1, that the phrase is used of human excrement in Deut. xxiii. 15 (A. V. 14), and is properly a "shame" or disgrace from a thing (Is. xx. 4), i. e. any thing which awakens the feeling of shame and repulsion, inspires aversion and disgust, and nauseates in contact, e. g. bad breath, a secret running sore, &c. He considers the schools of Hillel and Shammai as "both wrong in this, that they built up a general principle upon the words, whilst the author only speaks of the commonest cause of divorce at his time" (Commentary on Deuteronomy, quoted by Pres. Woolsey, in New Englander, xxvi. 92). The practical difficulty, however, which attends on the doubt which is now found in interpreting Moses' words will be lessened if we consider, that the mere giving "a bill of divorce" (compare Is. l. 1; Jer. iii. 8), would in ancient times require the intervention of a Levite, not only to secure the formal correctness of the instrument, but because the art of writing was then generally unknown. This would bring the matter under the cognizance of legal authority, and tend to check the rash exercise of the right by the husband. But the absence of any case in point in the period which lay nearest to the lawgiver himself, or in any, save a much more recent one, makes the whole question one of great uncertainty. It is contrary to all known Oriental usage to suppose that the right of quitting their husband and choosing another, was allowed to women. Salome is noted as the first instance of it (Jos. xv. 7, § 10); one, no doubt, derived from the growing prevalence of heathen laxity.—The N. T. doctrine concerning divorce is to be gathered from Mat. v. 31, 32, xix. 3-9; Mk. x. 2-12; Lk. xvi. 18; Rom. vii. 2, 3; and 1 Cor. vii. 10-16. Our Saviour in the Gospels lays down these four rules: (1.) The man who in conformity with the permission or sufferance of the law puts away his wife by a bill of divorce-ment—"saving for the cause of fornication"—and marries another, commits adultery "against her" (Mark) or to her injury. (2.) The man who thus puts away his wife, causes her to commit adultery, i. e. by placing it within her power to marry whom she pleases leads her to form an adulterous connection, inasmuch as she is still his wife in the eye of God (Matthew). (3.) The man who marries her who has been thus put away commits adultery (Matthew; Luke). (4.) The woman who puts away her husband and is married to another, commits adultery (Mark; Romans). The general principle, serving as the groundwork of all these declarations, is, that legal divorce does not, in the view of God, and according to the correct rule of morals, authorize either husband or wife thus separated to marry again, with the single exception that, when the divorce occurs on account of a sexual crime, the innocent party may without guilt contract a second marriage. In 1 Cor. vii. the apostle notices two cases: (a) when both the parties were Christian believers (ver. 10, 11), for which case the Lord had given commandment in the Gospels; (b) where one of the parties was an unbeliever (12 ff.), which case had not been provided for by the Saviour's authority. In (a) the apostle conceives also of a state of things, in which a woman separated from her husband, perhaps permanently, on account of dissensions between the married pair, shall have no right, according to the Lord's commandment, to marry another man, i. e. of an actual separation from bed and board, without a dissolution of the marriage relation or absolute divorce. This third state between divorce and marriage has then the apostle's qualified sanction, not, of course, as something desirable, but probably as a kind of barricade against divorce, and a defence of the Saviour's commandment. In (b) the apostle's words involve, without expressing fully, the principle that the believing party is not to initiate any steps which will terminate the marriage union, but must remain passive, while all active proceedings are expected to emanate from the other side. Thus, should the unbelieving husband or wife be content to dwell with the Christian partner, the latter may not put the other away. Marriage and the marriage-bed preserve their sanctity, because one of the parties is a consecrated person. Otherwise the children would be unclean, whereas all admit that they are consecrated, and thus certainly separated by a broad line from a family where both partners are unbelievers or heathens. But the heathen, whose husband or wife had become a Christian convert, might be soured or alienated for that very reason, and might insist on terminating the union. The apostle's decision then is, "If the unbelieving depart, let him depart," i. e. if he separates himself from his Christian partner, let him take his course unhindered. A believer has not been, by his profession, brought into slavery, is not in bondage in such cases, is not subjected to the obligation of keeping up the marriage relation and of preventing the disruption by active measures of his own. Such bondage would subject the believer to a state of warfare, but God's call to him, when He invites him into the Gospel, is in the form of peace. And, moreover, let not the believing party think that he ought to take upon him this painful obligation in order to convert the heathen partner. For it is wholly uncertain whether by living with such a partner, when he is bent on separation, any such result will be attained. The apostle clearly had no thought about remarriage in such cases. The Christian wife or husband must accept as a fact what the unbelieving partner has done, but the marriage, so far as the apostle lets his opinion be known, may still have been indissoluble, and the injured believer must remain in a state of desertion. The apostle, therefore, in 1 Cor. vii. advances beyond our Lord's position in a single particular,—in conceiving of, and, to a certain degree, authorizing separation without license of remarriage; but this does not lead him to any departure from our Lord's principles. (This view of the N. T. doctrine is abridged from President Woolsey's article in the New Englander, xxvi. 212 ff.) MARRIAGE; WOMEN.

Dir'a-hab (Heb. of gold, i. e. a place rich in gold, Ges.), a place in the Arabian Desert, mentioned Deut. i. 1, as limiting the position of the spot in which Moses is there represented as addressing the Israelites. It is by Robinson, Gesenius, &c., identified with Dahab, a cape on the W. shore of the Gulf of 'Akabah, E. of Sinai.

* Doc tor (L. teacher). LAWYER; RABBI.

Docus (Gr. dók, fr. Syr. = a tower, Wr.), a "little hold" near Jericho (1 Mc. xvi. 15, compare verse 14) built by Ptolemy, the son of Abubus, in which he entertained and murdered his father-in-law Simon Maccabeus with his two sons. The name still remains attached to the copious and excellent springs of Ain-Duk, which burst forth in the Wady Nawá'imeh, at the foot of the mountain of Quarantania (Kuruntuf), about four miles N.W. of Jericho. Above the springs are traces of ancient foundations, which may be those of Ptolemy's castle, but more probably of that of the Templars, one of whose stations this was.

Dod'al or Dod'a-l (Heb. = Dodo), an Abohitte who commanded the course of the second month (1 Chr. xxvii. 4); probably = Dodo 2.

Dod'a-nim or Do-da-nim (Heb. = DEDAN, Sim.; in some copies and in margin of A. V., 1 Chr. i. 7, RODANIM), a "son," i. e. family or race, descended from Javan, the son of Japheth (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chr. i. 7). The weight of authority is in favor of the former name. Dodanim is referred by Le Clerc and Michaelis to the inhabitants of Dodona in Epirus; but possibly (so Gesenius, First, &c.) = the Dardanians, who were found in historical times in Illyricum and Troy, the former district being regarded as their original seat, and were probably a semi-Pelasgic race, grouped with the CHURIM in the genealogical table, as more closely related to them, than to the other branches of the Pelasgic race. Kalisch identifies Dodanim with the Daunians, who occupied the coast of Apulia; he regards the name as referring to Italy generally.

Dod'a-vah or Do-da'vah (Heb. love of Jhorah, Ges.; Jah is friend, Fü.), a man of Maresah in Judah; in the Jewish traditions son and nephew of Jehoshaphat; father of Eliezer who denounced Jehoshaphat's alliance with Ahaziah (2 Chr. xx. 37).

Do'do (Heb. amatory, Ges.; Jah is friend, Fü.). 1. A man of Bethlehem, father of Elhanan, who was one of David's thirty captains or "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chr. xi. 26). He is a different person from—2. "Dodo the ABOHITTE," father of Eleazar, the second of the three mighty men who were over the thirty (2 Sam. xxiii. 9; 1 Chr. xi. 12). He, or his son—in which case we must suppose the words "Eleazar son of" to have escaped from the text—probably had the command of the second monthly course (1 Chr. xxvii. 4). In the latter passage the name is DODAI.—3. A man of Issachar, forefather of Tola the Judge (Judg. x. 1).

Dō'eg (Heb. yearful, Ges., Fū.), an Edomite, chief of Saul's herdmen. He was at Nob when Ahimelech gave David the sword of Goliath, and not only gave information to Saul, but, when others declined the office, himself executed the king's order to destroy the priests of Nob, to the number of eighty-five persons, with their families, and all their property (1 Sam. xxi. 7, xxii. 9, 18, 22; Ps. lii. title). Probably he was a proselyte, attending under some vow or act of purification at the Tabernacle.

Dog (Heb. celib; Gr. kūn, kunarion), an animal frequently mentioned in Scripture (Canis familiaris, Linn.). It was used by the Hebrews as a watch for their houses (Is. lvi. 10), and for guarding their flocks (Job xxx. 1). Then also, as now, troops of hungry and semi-wild dogs used to wander about the fields and streets of the cities, devouring dead bodies and other offal (1 K. xiv. 11, xvi. 4, xxi. 19, 23, xxii. 38; 2 K. ix. 10, 36; Jer. xv. 3; Ps. lix. 6, 14), and thus became such objects of dislike that fierce and cruel enemies are poetically styled "dogs" in Ps. xxii. 16, 20. Moreover, the dog being an unclean animal (Is. lxvi. 3), the terms "dog," "dead dog," "dog's head" were used as terms of reproach, or of humility in speaking of one's self (1 Sam. xxiv. 14; 2 Sam. iii. 8, ix. 8, xvi. 9; 2 K. viii. 13). Through the East "dog" is a term of reproach for impure and profane persons (Rev. xxii. 15), and in this sense is used by the Jews respecting the Gentiles, and by Mohammedans respecting Christians. In allusion to its lechery "dog" = a male prostitute, sodomite, Ges. (Deut. xxiii. 18). Stanley saw on the very site of Jezreel the descendants of the dogs that devoured Jezebel, prowling on the mounds without the walls for offal and carrion thrown out to them to consume.

Door. GATE; HOUSE.

Doph'kah (Heb. cattle-driving, Fū.), a station in the Desert where the Israelites encamped (Num. xxxiii. 12). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Dor (Heb. circle of houses together, city, Fū.), an ancient royal city of the Canaanites (Josh. xii. 23), whose ruler was an ally of Jabin, king of Hazor, against Joshua (xi. 1, 2). It was probably the most S. settlement of the Phenicians on the coast of Syria. Josephus describes it as a maritime city, on the W. border of Manasseh and the N. border of Dan near Mount Carmel. It appears to have been within the territory of the tribe of Asher, though allotted to Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27). The original inhabitants were never expelled; but during the prosperous reigns of David and Solomon they were made tributary (Judg. i. 27, 28), and the latter monarch stationed at Dor one of his twelve purveyors (1 K. iv. 11). Tryphon, the murderer of Jonathan Maccabeus, and usurper of the throne of Syria, having sought an asylum in Dor, the city was besieged and captured by Antiochus Sidetes (1 Mc. xv. 11 ff., A. V. "Dora"). It was afterward rebuilt, and remained an important place during the early years of the Roman rule in Syria. It became an episcopal city, but was already ruined and deserted in the fourth century. Jerome places it on the coast, "in the ninth mile from Cesarea, on the way to Ptolemais." Just at the point indicated is the small village of Tantūra, probably an Arab corruption of Dora, consisting of about thirty houses, wholly constructed of ancient materials.

Dō'ra (Gr.) = DOR (1 Mc. xv. 11, 13, 25).

Do-rym'e-nes [-rim'e-necz] (L. fr. Gr. = valiant with the spear), father of PROTEMEE 1 (1 Mc. iii. 38; 2 Mc. iv. 45); probably the same Dorymenes who fought against Antiochus the Great.

Do-sith'e-us (L. fr. Gr. = giving to God or given by God). 1. "A priest and Levite," who carried the translation of Esther to Egypt (Esth. xi. 1).—2. A captain of Judas Maccabeus in the battle against Timotheus (2 Mc. xii. 19, 24).—3. A horse-soldier of Bacenor's company, a man of prodigious strength, who, in attempting to capture Gorgias, was cut down by a Thracian (xii. 35).—4. The son of Drimylus, a Jew, who had renounced the law of his fathers, and was in the camp of Ptolemy Philopator at Raphia (3 Mc. i. 3). He was perhaps a chamberlain.

Do'tha-im (Gr.) = DOTHAN.

Do'than (Heb. two cisterns, Ges.; double fountain, Fū.), a place first mentioned (Gen. xxxvii. 17) in connection with the history of JOSEPH 1, and apparently as in the neighborhood of Shechem. It next appears as the residence of ELISHA (2 K. vi. 13). Later still we encounter it as a landmark in the account of Holofernes' campaign against Bethulia (A. V. "Dothaim," Jd. iv. 6, vii. 3, 18, viii. 3). Dothan was known to Eusebius, who places it twelve miles to the N. of Sebaste (Samaria); and here its ruins have been discovered (V. de V., Rbn.) bearing its ancient name unimpaired, situated at the S. end of a plain of the richest pasturage, four or five miles S. W. of Jenin (En-gannim), and separated only by a swell or two of hills from the plain of Esdraelon. The traditional site was at the Khán Jubb Yūsuf (Ar. = the khan of Joseph's Pit), near Tell-Hâm (Capernaum?), at the N. of the sea of Galilee.

* Dough. BREAD.

Dove (Heb. yōnâh; Gr. peristera). The first mention of this bird occurs in Gen. viii. The dove's rapidity of flight is alluded to in Ps. lv. 6; the beauty of its plumage in lxviii. 13; its dwelling in the rocks and valleys in Jer. xlviii. 28, and Ez. vii. 16; its mournful voice in Is. xxxviii. 14, lx. 11; Nah. ii. 7; its harmlessness in Mat. x. 16; its simplicity in Hos. vii. 11. The bride's eyes are represented as dove-like (Cant. i. 15, iv. 1), and "dove" is a term of endearment (ii. 14, v. 2, &c.; Ges.) The dove is a symbol of perfect gentleness, purity, fulness of life, and the power of communicating it (Lange on Mat. iii. 16). Doves are kept in a domesticated state in many parts of the East. The pigeon-cote is a universal feature in the houses of Upper Egypt. In Persia pigeon-houses are erected at a distance from the dwellings, for the purpose of collecting the dung as manure. There is probably an allusion to such a custom in Is. lx. 8. COMMERCE; DOVE'S DUNG; FOOD; SACRIFICE; TURTLE.

Dove's Dung (Heb. kiryonim or chiryonim, Keri dibyonim). Various explanations have been given of the passage in 2 K. vi. 25, which describes the famine of Samaria to have been so excessive, that "an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." The old versions and very many ancient commentators are in favor of a literal interpretation of the Hebrew word. Bochart has labored to show that it denotes a species of cicer, "chick-pea," which he says the Arabs call umân, and sometimes improperly "dove's or sparrow's dung." Linnæus suggested that the Hebrew may signify the bulbous plant, Ornithogalum umbellatum, "Star of Bethlehem." With regard to Bochart's opinion, Celsus, who advocates the literal interpretation, has shown that it is founded on an error. Still there is difficulty in believing that even in the worst horrors of a siege a substance so vile as is implied by the literal rendering (DUNG) should have been sold at the rate of about one pint for six shillings and fourpence sterling; and, with Keil and Gesenius, while we admit the possibility, even the probability of the literal meaning, we do not admit its necessity, and therefore refrain from deciding (so Mr. Houghton).

Dowry. MARRIAGE.

Drachm [drām] (fr. Gr. drachmē, originally what one can hold in the hand, a handful, L. & S.), a Greek silver coin, varying in weight on account of the use of different talents (2 Mc. iv. 19, x. 20, xii. 43; Lk. xv. 8, margin "drachma"). The Jews must have been acquainted with three talents—the Ptolemaic, the Phenician, and the Attic. The drachms of these talents weigh respectively, during the period of the Maccabees, about 55 grains troy, 58.5, and 66, and, according to the present weight of U. S. silver coins, in value = about 14 to 17 cents. In Luke (A. V. "PIECE OF SILVER") the Roman denarius ("PENNY"), of nearly the same value, seems to be intended. MONEY; WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

* Drach'ma [drak-] (L. fr. Gr.) = DRACHM (Lk. xv. 8, margin).

Dragon (fr. Gr.). The A. V., apparently following the Vulgate, rendered by the same word "dragon"—1. Heb. tan, always in the plural, usually tannim (Job xxx. 29; Ps. xlv. 19, Heb. 20; Is. xiii. 22, xxxiv. 13, xxxv. 7, xliii. 20; Jer. ix. 11, Heb. 10, x. 22, xiv. 6, xlix. 33, li. 37; Mic. i. 8), once pl. fem. tannōth (Mal. i. 3). In Lam. iv. 3 an Aramaic plural form (so Gesenius) tannin (Köfī tannin) is translated in A. V. "sea-monsters," margin "sea-calves." It is always applied to some creatures inhabiting the desert, and we should conclude from this that it refers rather to some wild beast than to a serpent. The Syriac (according to Pococke, Gesenius, Alexander on Isaiah, &c.) translates "jackals." They suckle their young (Lam. iv. 3), and utter a wailing cry like that of a child (Job xxx. 29; Mic. i. 8).—2. Heb. tannī, which seems to refer to any great monster, whether of the land or the sea, more usually to some kind of serpent or reptile, but not exclusively restricted to that sense. When we examine special passages, we find the word used in Gen. i. 21 (A. V. "whales"); Ps. cxlviii. 7, and probably in Job vii. 12 (A. V. "whale"), of the great sea-monsters, the representatives of the inhabitants of the deep. On the other hand, in Ex. vii. 9, 10, 12 (A. V. "serpent" in these verses); Deut. xxxii. 33; Ps. xci. 13, it refers to land-serpents of a powerful and deadly kind. It is also applied metaphorically to Pharaoh or to Egypt (Is. xxvii. 1, li. 9; Ez. xxix. 3, xxxii. 2, A. V. "whale," margin "dragon"; perhaps Ps. lxxiv. 13), and, especially as feet are attributed to it, it probably = the crocodile as the well-known emblem of Egypt. When used of the king of Babylon (Jer. li. 31), it probably = some great serpent, such as might inhabit the sandy plains of Babylonia.—3. Gr. drakōn, in the Apocalypse (Rev. xii. 3, 4, 7, 9, 13, 16, 17, &c.), applied metaphorically to "the old SERPENT, called the DEVIL, and SATAN," the description of the "dragon" being dictated by the symbolical meaning of the image rather than by any reference to any actually existing creature. The reason of this scriptural symbol is to be sought not only in the union of gigantic power with craft and malignity, of which the serpent is the natural emblem, but in the record of the serpent's agency in the temptation (Gen. iii.).

* Dragon-well (Heb. 'ēyn hattannin = fountain of the dragon; see AIN; DRAGON 2; FOUNTAIN 1), apparently over against the Valley Gate of JERUSALEM (Neh. ii. 13); probably (so Robinson, Gesenius, &c.) = the fountain or pool of GHION.

Dram, the A. V. translation of Heb. adarcōn, darcēmōn or darcēmōn (Ezr. ii. 69, viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70–72; 1 Chr. xxix. 7), more accurately translated daric = a Persian gold coin current in Palestine after the return from Babylon. The darics which have been discovered are thick pieces of pure gold, of archaic style, bearing on the obverse the figure of a king with bow and javelins, or bow and dagger, and on the reverse an irregular incuse square. (MONEY, II. 2.) Their full weight is about 128 grains troy (about the weight of a U. S. half-eagle).

* Draught [draft], the A. V. translation of—1. Gr. agra (= a catching of game, a hunting or fishing; hence, what is caught, a draught, a catch of fishes) (Lk. v. 4, 9).—2. Gr. aphedrōn (literally = a place of sitting apart, hence a privy, draught, Rbn. N. T. Lxx.) (Mat. xv. 17; Mk. vii. 19). DRAUGHT-HOUSE.

* Draught'-house = a receptacle for filth, a privy (2 K. x. 27). DRAUGHT 2; DUNG.

Dreams.—I. The main difference between our sleeping and waking thoughts appears to lie in this—that, in the former case, the perceptive faculties of the mind are active, while the reflective powers are generally asleep. Yet there is a class of dreams in which the reason is not wholly asleep. In these cases it seems to look on as it were from without, and so to have a double consciousness. In either case the ideas suggested are accepted by the mind in dreams at once and inevitably, instead of being weighed and tested, as in our waking hours. But it is evident that the method of such suggestion is still undetermined, and in fact is no more capable of being accounted for by any single cause than the suggestion of waking thoughts. The material of these latter is supplied either by ourselves, through the senses, the memory, and the imagination, or by other men, generally through the medium of words, or lastly by the direct action of the Spirit of God, or of created spirits of orders superior to our own, or the spirit within us. So also it is in dreams. On the two points in which the material is supplied by ourselves or by other men, experience gives undoubted testimony; as to the third, it can, from the nature of the case, speak but vaguely and uncertainly. The Scripture declares, not as any strange thing, but as a thing of course, that the influence of the Spirit of God upon the soul extends to its sleeping as well as its waking thoughts.—II. It is, of course, with this last class of dreams that we have to do in Scripture. The dreams of memory or imagination are indeed referred to in Eccl. v. 3; Is. xxix. 8; but it is the history of the Revelation of the Spirit of God to the spirit of man, whether sleeping or waking, which is the proper subject of Scripture itself. It must be observed that, in accordance with the principle enunciated by St. Paul in 1 Cor. xiv. 15, dreams, in which the understanding is asleep, are recognized indeed as a method of divine revelation, but placed below the visions of prophecy, in which the understanding plays its part. It is true that the book of Job, standing as it does on the basis of "natural religion," dwells on dreams and "visions in deep sleep" as the chosen method of God's revelation of Himself to man (see Job iv. 13, vii. 14, xxxiii. 15). But in Num. xii. 6; Deut. xiii. 1, 3, 5; Jer. xxvii. 9; Joel ii. 28, &c., dreamers of dreams, whether true or false, are placed below "prophets," and even below "diviners" (so Mr. A. Barry and Jewish doctors; see DIVINATION; PROPHECY); and similarly in the climax of 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, we read that "Jehovah answered Saul not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets." Under the Christian dispensation, while we read frequently of trances and visions, dreams are never referred to as vehicles of divine revelation. In accordance with this principle are the actual records of the dreams sent by God. The greater number of such dreams were granted, for prediction or for warning, to those who were aliens to the Jewish covenant (Gen. xx. 3-7, xxxi. 24, xl. 5, xli. 1-8; Judg. vii. 13; Dan. ii. 1 ff., iv. 10-18; Mat. ii. 12, xxvii. 19). And, where dreams are recorded as means of God's revelation to His chosen servants, they are almost always referred to the periods of their earliest and most imperfect knowledge of Him (Gen. xv. 12, and perhaps 1-9, xxviii. 12-15, xxxvii. 5-10; 1 K. iii. 5; Mat. i. 20, ii. 13, 19, 22). The only exception to this is in the dreams and "visions of the night" given to Daniel (Dan. ii. 19, vii. 1; see also 1 K. ix. 2-9). The general conclusion therefore is, first, that the Scripture claims the dream as a medium through which God may speak to man either directly, or indirectly in virtue of a general influence upon all his thoughts; and secondly, that it lays far greater stress on that divine influence by which the understanding also is affected, and leads us to believe that as such influence extends more and more, revelation by dreams, unless in very peculiar circumstances, might be expected to pass away.

Dress. This subject includes—I. Materials. The earliest and simplest robe was made out of the leaves of a tree (A. V. "fig-leaves"), portions of which were sewn together, so as to form an apron (Gen. iii. 7). After the fall, the skins of animals supplied a more durable material (iii. 21), which was adapted to a rude state of society, and is stated to have been used by various ancient nations. Skins were not wholly disused at later periods: the "mantle" worn by Elijah appears to have been the skin of a sheep or some other animal with the wool left on. It was characteristic of a prophet's office from its mean appearance (Zech. xiii. 4; compare Mat. vii. 15). Pelisses of sheep-skin still form an ordinary article of dress in the East. (LEATHER.) The art of weaving hair was known to the Hebrews at an early period (Ex. xxvi. 7, xxxv. 6); the SACK-CLOTH used by mourners was of this material. John the Baptist's robe was of camel's hair (Mat. iii. 4). (CAMEL.) Wool, we may presume, was introduced at a very early period, the flocks of the pastoral families being kept partly for their wool (Gen. xxxviii. 12); it was at all times largely employed, particularly for the outer garments (Lev. xiii. 47; Deut. xxii. 11, &c.). Probably the acquaintance of the Hebrews with LINEN, and perhaps COTTON, dates from the period of the captivity in Egypt, when they were instructed in the manufacture (1 Chr. iv. 21). After their return to Palestine we have frequent notices of linen. SILK was not introduced until a very late period (Rev. xviii. 12). The use of mixed material, such as wool and flax, was forbidden (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11).—II. Color and decoration. The prevailing color of the Hebrew dress was the natural white of the materials employed, which might be brought to a high state of brilliancy by the art of the FULLER (Mk. ix. 3). It is uncertain when the art of dyeing (COLORS) became known to the Hebrews; the dress worn by Joseph (Heb. cēthōneth passim; see below, III. 1; Gen. xxxvii. 8, 23) is variously taken to be either a "coat of divers colors" (A. V., LXX., Vulg., &c.), or a tunic furnished with sleeves and reaching down to the ankles. The latter is probably the correct sense (Gesenius, Fürst, &c.). The notice of scarlet thread (xxxviii. 28) implies some acquaintance with dyeing. The Egyptians had carried the art of weaving and embroidery to a high state of perfection, and from them the Hebrews learned various methods of producing decorated stuffs. The elements of ornamentation were—(1.) weaving with threads previously dyed (Ex. xxxv. 25); (2.) the introduction of gold thread or wire (Ex. xxxviii. 6 ff.); (3.) the addition of figures. (EMBROIDERER.) Robes decorated with gold (Ps. xlv. 13), and at a later period with silver thread, were worn by royal personages (compare Acts xii. 21); other kinds of embroidered robes were worn by the wealthy both of Tyre (Ez. xvi. 13) and Palestine (Judg. v. 30; Ps. xlv. 14). The art does not appear to have been maintained among the Hebrews; the Babylonians and other Eastern nations (BABYLONISH GARMENT), as well as the Egyptians (Josh. vii. 21; Ez. xxvii. 7, 24), excelled in it. Nor does the art of dyeing appear to have been followed up in Palestine: dyed robes were imported from foreign countries (Zephaniah i. 8), particularly from Phœnicia, and were not much used on account of their expensiveness: purple (Prov. xxxi. 22; Lk. xvi. 19) and scarlet (crimson; see COLORS, II. 3; 2 Sam. i. 24) were occasionally worn by the wealthy. The surrounding nations were more lavish in their use of them: the wealthy Tyrians (Ex. xxvii. 7), the Midianitish kings (Judg. viii. 26), the Assyrian nobles (Ez. xxiii. 6), and Persian officers (Esth. viii. 15), are all represented in purple or blue.—III. The names, forms, and mode of wearing the robes. It is difficult to give a satisfactory account of the various articles of dress mentioned in the Bible. The general characteristics of Oriental dress have indeed preserved a remarkable uniformity in all ages; the modern Arab dresses much as the ancient Hebrew did; there are the same flowing robes, the same distinction between the outer and inner garments, the former heavy and warm, the latter light, adapted to the rapid and excessive changes of temperature in those countries; and there is the same distinction between the costume of the rich and the poor, consisting in the multiplication of robes of a finer texture and more ample dimensions. Hence the numerous illustrations of ancient costume, which may be drawn from the usages of modern Orientals, supplying in great measure the want of contemporaneous representations. The costume of the men and women was very similar; there was sufficient difference, however, to mark the sex, and it was strictly forbidden to a woman to wear the appendages (e. g. the staff, signet-ring, and other ornaments, or, according to Josephus, the weapons) of a man; as well as to a man to wear the outer robe of a woman (Deut. xxii. 5). We shall first describe the robes common to the two sexes, and then those peculiar to women. 1. The most essential article of dress was a closely fitting garment (Heb. cūtōneth, cēthōneth, or ēthōneth; whence the Gr. chiton; properly = a tunic, Ges., Rbn. N. T. Lex.), resembling in form and use our shirt, though unfortunately translated "coat" in the A. V. (Gen. iii. 21, &c.), sometimes "garment" (2 Sam. xiii. 18, 19; Ezr. ii. 69; Neh. vii. 70, 72), once "robe" (Is. xxii. 21). The material of which it was made was either wool, cotton, or linen. The primitive tunic was without sleeves and reached only to the knee. Another kind (Joseph's? see above, II.) reached to the wrists and ankles. It was in either case kept close to the body by a GIRDLE, and the fold formed by the overlapping of the robe served as an inner pocket. A person wearing the tunic alone was described as "naked," A. V. (1 Sam. xix. 24; Is. xx. 2; Am. ii. 16; Jn. xxi. 7). The same expression is elsewhere applied to the poorly clad (Job xxii. 6; Is. lviii. 7; Jas. ii. 15), and to the literally "naked" (Job i. 21, xxiv. 7, 10; Is. xx. 4, &c.). The annexed woodcut (fig. 1) represents the simplest style of Oriental dress, a long loose shirt or tunic without a girdle, reaching nearly to the ankle. The same robe, with the addition of the girdle, is shown in fig. 4. In fig. 2 we have the ordinary dress of the modern Bedouin;

the tunic overlaps the girdle at the waist, leaving an ample fold, which serves as a pocket. Over the tunic he wears the abba or striped plaid, and on his head is the kefiyeh (HEAD-DRESS). 2. The Heb. sadin, Gr. sindon, translated "sheets," margin "shirts" (Judg. xiv. 12, 13), "fine linen," (Prov. xxxi. 24; Is. iii. 23; Mk. xv. 46), "linen cloth" (Mat. xxvii. 59; Mk. xiv. 51, 52), "linen" (Mk. xv. 46; Lk. xxiii. 53), appears to have been a wrapper of fine linen, which might be used in various ways, but especially as a night-shirt (Mk. xiv. 51). 3. The Heb. mē'îl, in A. V. "robe" (Ex. xxviii. 4, 31, 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 4, &c.), "MANTLE" (xv. 27; Ezr. ix. 3, 5, &c.), "coat" (1 Sam. ii. 19), "cloak" (Is. lix. 17), = an upper garment, robe, especially an exterior tunic, fuller and longer than the common one, but without sleeves; that of kings' daughters was with long sleeves (Ges.) It was worn by kings (1 Sam. xxiv. 4), prophets (xxviii. 14), nobles (Job i. 20), youths (1 Sam. ii. 19), women (2 Sam. xiii. 18), priests (Ezr. ix. 3, 5), particularly by the high-priest. (HIGH-PRIEST, I. 2, c; PRIEST.) For this the LXX. use the Gr. ependutes, which in Jn. xxi. 7 = the linen coat worn by Phœnician and Syrian fishermen, A. V. "fisher's coat;" also Gr. stolē, translated "long clothing" in Mk. xii. 38, &c. Where two tunics are mentioned (Lk. iii. 11) as worn at the same time, this would be the second; travellers generally wore two, but this was forbidden to the disciples, when Jesus first sent them forth (Mat. x. 10; Lk. ix. 3; compare xxii. 35, 36). The dress of the middle and upper classes in modern Egypt (fig. 3) illustrates the customs of the Hebrews. In addition to the tunic or shirt, they wear a long vest of striped silk and cotton, called kafûn, descending to the ankles, and with ample sleeves, so that the hands may be concealed at pleasure. The girdle surrounds this vest. The outer robe consists of a long cloth coat, called gibbeh, with sleeves reaching nearly to the wrist. In cold weather the abba is thrown over the shoulders. 4. The ordinary outer garment consisted of a quadrangular piece of woollen cloth, probably resembling in shape a Scotch plaid. The size and texture would vary with the means of the wearer. The Hebrew terms referring to it are—simlâh (occasionally salmâh, A. V. "garment," Gen. ix. 23; Judg. viii. 25; Prov. xxx. 4, &c.), sometimes put for clothes generally (Gen. xxxv. 2, A. V. "garments;" xxxvii. 34, A. V. "clothes;" Ex. iii. 22, xxii. 9; Deut. x. 18, A. V. "raiment" in this and Ex.; Is. iii. 6, 7, A. V. "clothing;" iv. 1, A. V. "apparel," &c.); begeg (Gen. xxxix. 12 ff., A. V. "garment," &c.), which is more usual in speaking of robes of a handsome and substantial character (xxvii. 15, A. V. "raiment;" xli. 42, A. V. "vestures;" Ex. xxviii. 2 ff., A. V. "garments;" 1 Sam. xix. 13, A. V. "cloth;" 1 K. xxii. 10; 2 Chr. xviii. 9, A. V. "robes" in both; Is. lxiii. 1 ff., A. V. "garments," &c.); cēsūth, appropriate to passages where covering or protection is the prominent idea (Ex. xxii. 27, Heb. 26, A. V. "raiment;" Job xxvi. 6, xxxi. 19, A. V. "covering" in both; and lastly lēbūsh, usual in poetry, but specially applied to a warrior's cloak (2 Sam. xx. 8, A. V. "garment"), priests' "vestments" (2 K. x. 22), and royal "apparel" (Esth. vi. 8 ff., viii. 15). A cognate Hebrew term (malbūsh) describes specifically a state-dress, in a royal household (1 K. x. 5; 2 Chr. ix. 4; A. V. "apparel" in both) or for religious festivals (2 K. x. 22, A. V. "vestments"); elsewhere handsome robes (Job xxvii. 16; Is. lxiii. 3; Ez. xvi. 13; Zeph. i. 8; A. V. "apparel" in the last, "raiment" in the others). Another Hebrew term, mad, with its derivations middāh and medev, is expressive of the amplitude of the Hebrew garments (Lev. vi. 10, Heb. 3, A. V. "garment;" Judg. iii. 16, A. V. "raiment;" 2 Sam. xx. 8, A. V. "garment," &c.). The Gr. himation (Mat. v. 40, A. V. "cloak;" Acts ix. 39, A. V. "garments," &c.) and stolé express the corresponding idea, the latter being especially appropriate to "robes" of more than ordinary grandeur (1 Mc. x. 21, xiv. 9, A. V. "apparel;" Mk. xii. 38, A. V. "long clothing;" xvi. 5, A. V. "long garment;" Lk. xv. 22, xx. 46; Rev. vi. 11, vii. 9, 13, 14). The outer garment might be worn in various ways, either wrapped round the body, or worn over the shoulders, like a shawl, with the ends or "skirts" hanging down in front; or it might be thrown over the head, so as to conceal the face (2 Sam. xv. 30; Esth. vi. 12). The ends were skirted with a fringe and bound with a dark purple ribbon (Num. xv. 38): it was confined at the waist of wearing the outer robe, now called abba, is exhibited in figures 2 and 5. The arms, when falling down, are completely covered by it, as in fig. 5; but in holding any weapon, or in active work, the lower part of the arm is exposed, as in fig. 2. (APRON; FRONTLETS; HANDKERCHIEF; MANTLE; SANDAL.) The dress of the women differed from that of the men in regard to the outer garment, the tunic being worn equally by both sexes (Cant. v. 3). The names of their distinctive robes were as follows:—(1.) Heb. mitpahath or mitpachath, a kind of shawl (a wide upper garment of a woman, a mantle, a cloak, Gesenius) (Ru. iii. 15, A. V. "vail," margin "sheet" or "apron;" Is. iii. 22, A. V. "wimples"). (2.) Heb. ma'atāphāh, another kind of shawl (a cloak, mantle, Ges.) (Is. iii. 22, A. V. "mantles"). (3.) Heb. td'iph ("vail," A. V., Ges.) (Gen. xxiv. 65, xxxviii. 14, 19); probably (so Mr. Bevan, after the LXX.) a light summer dress of handsome appearance and of ample dimensions. (4.) Heb. radid ("vail," A. V., Ges.), a similar robe (Is. iii. 23; Cant. v. 7). (5.) Heb. peth-tgil (A. V. "stomacher") a kind of costly raiment, perhaps an embroidered festive garment, Ges. (Is. iii. 24). (6.) Heb. gilyōnim (23), according to Schroeder and the LXX., = transparent garments; in A. V. "glasses;" according to Chaldee, Vulgate, Gesenius, &c., = mirrors, i. e. tablets or plates of polished metal, used by the Hebrew women as mirrors. The garments of females were terminated by an ample bor-

by a girdle, and the fold, formed by the overlapping of the robe, served as a pocket. The ordinary mode der or fringe (HEM OF GARMENT) (Heb. shébel, shúl, A. V. "skirts") which concealed the feet (Jer. xiii. 22). Figures 6 and 7 illustrate some of the peculiarities of female dress; the former is an Egyptian woman (in her walking dress); the latter represents a dress, probably of great antiquity, still worn by the peasants in the S. of Egypt. (MARRIAGE; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL; VEIL.)—The dresses of foreign nations are occasionally referred to in the Bible; that of the PERSIANS is described in Dan. iii. 21, in Chaldaic terms, which Mr. Bevan thus explains by comparison with Herodotus:—(1.) The sarbālin (A. V. "coats") or drawers, which were the distinctive feature in the Persian as compared with the Hebrew dress; (2.) the patish (A. V. "hosen") or inner tunic; (3.) the carbēld (A. V. "hat") or upper tunic, corresponding to the me'il of the Hebrews; (4.) the lēbūsh (A. V. "garment") or cloak, which was worn, like the Hebrew begeg, over all. Gesenius makes

No. 1 = "either long and wide trousers, such as are still worn by the Orientals; or cloaks, mantles:" No. 2 = a tunic, undergarment; No. 3 = mantle or Greek cloak: No. 4 = a garment, vestment, especially a splendid garment = Heb. lēbūsh, above. In addition to these terms we have notice of a robe of state of fine linen and purple, Heb. tachrich, so called from its ample dimensions (Esth. viii. 15). The references to Greek or Roman dress are few: the Gr. chlamus or chlamys (2 Mc. xii. 35, A. V. "coat;" Mat. xxvii. 28, 31, A. V. "robe") was either the L. paludamentum, the military cloak of the Roman soldiery, or the Gr. chlamys itself, which was introduced under the emperors: it was especially worn by officers. The travelling "cloak" (Gr. phelonēs) referred to by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 13) is generally identified with the Roman pænula, which was a thick upper garment, and seems to have been a long sleeveless cloak with an opening for the head (Rbn. N. T. Lex.) It is, however, otherwise explained as a travelling case for carrying clothes or books.—IV. Special usages relating to dress. The loose flowing Hebrew robes admitted of a variety of symbolical actions. Rending them was expressive of grief, &c. (MOURNING.) Generally the outer garment alone was thus rent (Gen. xxxvii. 34; Job i. 20, ii. 12), occasionally the inner (2 Sam. xv. 32), and occasionally both (Ezr. ix. 3; Mat. xxvi. 65; compare Mk. xiv. 63). Shaking the garments, or shaking the dust off them, was a sign of renunciation (Acts xviii. 6) (DUST); spreading them before a person, of loyalty and joyous reception (2 K. ix. 13; Mat. xxi. 8); wrapping them round the head, of awe (1 K. xix. 13), or of grief (2 Sam. xv. 30; Esth. vi. 12; Jer. xiv. 3, 4); casting them off, of excitement (Acts xxii. 23); laying hold of them, of supplication (1 Sam. xv. 27; Is. iii. 6, iv. 1; Zech. viii. 23). (ARM.) The length of the dress rendered it inconvenient for active exercise; hence the outer garments were either left in the house by a person working close by (Mat. xxiv. 18) or were thrown off when the occasion arose (Mk. x. 50; Jn. xiii. 4; Acts vii. 58), or, if this was not possible, as in the case of a person travelling, they were girded up (1 K. xviii. 46; 2 K. iv. 29, ix. 1; 1 Pet. i. 13); on entering a house the upper garment was probably laid aside and resumed on going out (Acts xii. 8). In a sitting posture, the garments concealed the feet; this was held to be an act of reverence (Is. vi. 2). The proverbial expression in 1 Sam. xxv. 22; 1 K. xiv. 10, xxi. 21; 2 K. ix. 8, probably (so Mr. Bevan, &c.) owes its origin to the length of the garments, which made it more natural to perform this office of nature in a sitting posture: the expression is variously understood to mean the lowest or youngest of the people. Gesenius says, "a male person, especially where mention is made of exterminating a whole tribe or family." To cut the garments short was the grossest insult a Jew could receive (2 Sam. x. 4). To raise the border or skirt of a woman's dress was a similar insult, implying her unchastity. The number of suits possessed by the Hebrews was considerable: a single suit (Judg. xvii. 10) consisted of an under and upper garment. The presentation of a robe in many instances amounted to installation or investiture (Gen. xli. 42; Esth. viii. 15; Is. xxii. 21); on the other hand, taking it away amounted to dismissal from office (2 Mc. iv. 38). The production of the best robe was a mark of special honor in a household (Lk. xv. 22). The number of robes thus received or kept in store for presents was very large, and formed one of the main elements of wealth in the East (Job xxvii. 16; Mat. vi. 19; Jas. v. 2), so that "to have clothing" = to be wealthy and powerful (Is. iii. 6, 7). But others understand this = to have still a garment, as an exception to the general destitution of clothing (Alexander on Is. i. c.). On grand occasions the entertainer offered becoming robes to his guests. (BANQUETS; MARRIAGE.) The color of the garments was, as already observed, generally white; hence a spot or stain readily showed itself (Is. lxiii. 3; Jude 23; Rev. iii. 4). (SOAP.) The business of making clothes devolved upon women in a family (Prov. xxxi. 22; Acts ix. 39); little art was required in what we may term the tailoring department; the garments came forth for the most part ready made from the loom, so that the weaver supplanted the tailor. * Drink. See FOOD.—For Drink-offering; see BURNT-OFFERING; MEAT-OFFERING; WINE, &c.

Drink, Strong. The Heb. shêcar (Gr. sikera), in its etymological sense, applies to any intoxicating beverage: it is generally connected with WINE, either as an exhaustive expression for all other liquors (e. g. Judg. xiii. 4; Lk. i. 5), or as parallel to it, particularly in poetical passages (e. g. Is. v. 11; Mic. ii. 11); in Num. xxviii. 7 (A. V. "strong wine;" comp. Ex. xxix. 40) it clearly = wine. (DRINKARD.) We may infer from Cant. viii. 2, that the Hebrews were in the habit of expressing the juice of other fruits besides the grape for the purpose of making wine; the pomegranate, which is there noticed, was probably one out of many fruits so used. In Is. xxiv. 9 there may be a reference to the sweetness of some kind of strong drink. We learn from Jerome, &c., that the following beverages were known to the Jews: 1. Beer, which was largely consumed in Egypt under the name of zythus, and was thence introduced into Palestine. It was made of barley; certain herbs, such as lupin and skirret, were used as substitutes for hops. The boozah of modern Egypt is made of barley-bread, crumbled in water, and left until it has fermented; the Arabians mix it with spices, as described in Is. v. 22. 2. Cider, noticed in the Mishna as apple-wine. 3. Honey-wine, of which there were two sorts: one, consisting of a mixture of wine, honey, and pepper; the other a decoction of the juice of the grape, termed dibash (HONEY) by the Hebrews, and dibs by the modern Syrians. 4. Date-wine, also manufactured in Egypt by mashing the fruit in water in certain proportions. A similar method is still used in Arabia, except that the fruit is not mashed: the palm-wine of modern Egypt is the sap of the tree itself, obtained by an incision into its heart. 5. Various other fruits and vegetables are enumerated by Pliny as supplying materials for factitious or home-made wine, such as figs, millet, the carob fruit, &c. Not improbably the Hebrews applied raisins to this purpose in the simple manner followed by the Arabians, viz., by putting them in jars of water and burying them in the ground until fermentation takes place.

Drom'e-da-ry [drum-], the representative in the A. V. of—1. Heb. bécher or bichrah. (CAMEL 2.)—2. Heb. rechash, in A. V. "dromedaries" (1 K. iv. 28, margin "mules," or "swift beasts"), "mules" (Esth. viii. 10, 14), "swift beast" (Mic. i. 13); no doubt—"a superior kind of horse" (Ges.).—3. Heb. rammâch, only in pl. (Esth. viii. 10), A. V. "young dromedaries," Heb. binéy hárammâchim, literally sons of mares, this being an explanation of the preceding Hebrew word, translated in A. V. "camels," properly (so Gesenius, &c.) mules. CAMEL 4.

* Dropsy occurs only in Lk. xiv. 2, in translation of Greek hadrôpikos (= dropical), A. V. "which had the dropsy." The man afflicted with this well-known disease was healed by our Saviour on the Sabbath. MEDICINE; MIRACLES.

* Drought. AGRICULTURE; FAMINE; RAIN.

* Drown'ing. NOAH; PUNISHMENTS; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF.

* Drunk'ard, Drunk'en-ness. The first recorded instance of drunkenness is in Gen. ix. 21 ff. (NOAH.) Warnings against the use of wine and strong drink are uttered in the Scriptures (Lev. x. 9; Prov. xxiii. 29-32); drunkenness is set forth as abominable (Rom. xiii. 13; Gal. v. 21; Eph. v. 18); examples of its evil consequences are often given (1 K. xvi. 9, xx. 16; Dan. v. 1, &c.); and drunkards are to be excluded from Christian fellowship, and from the kingdom of God (1 Cor. v. 11, vi. 10). Persons are figuratively "drunken," who are intensely excited, or overcome with sorrow, rage, &c. (Is. xxix. 9, li. 21; Rev. xvii. 6, &c.; compare our use of intoxicated). DRINK, STRONG; WINE.

Dru-sil'la (L. fem. diminutive of Drusus, a Roman surname), daughter of HEROD AGRIPPA I. and Cypros. She was at first betrothed to Antiochus Epiphanes, prince of Commagene, but was married to Azizus, king of Emesa. Soon after, FELIX, procurator of Judea, brought about her seduction by means of the Cyprian sorcerer Simon, and took her as his wife. In Acts xxiv. 24, we find her in company with Felix at Caesarea. Felix had by Drusilla a son named Agrippa, who, together with his mother, perished in the eruption of Vesuvius under Titus.

* Duke (fr. L. dux = leader), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. allîph (= head of a family or tribe, chief, chieftain, prince, Ges.), applied to the chiefs of the EDOMITES and HORITES (Gen. xxxvi. 15 ff.; Ex. xv. 15; 1-Chr. i. 51 ff.). The same Hebrew word (A. V. "governor") is also in Zech. ix. 7, xii. 5, 6, applied to the Jewish chiefs. The pl. in Jer. xiii. 21 (A. V. "captains") = chiefs, leaders in general (Ges.).—2. Heb. ndsîch (= one anointed, i. e. a prince consecrated by anointing, Ges.; compare MESSIAH), applied to the princes of MIDIAN under Sihon (Josh. xiii. 21); usually translated "princes" (Ps. lxxxiii. 11, Heb. 12; Ez. xxxii. 30, &c.).

Dul'el-mer [se-] the A. V. translation of the Chal. sumpônyâh, a musical instrument, mentioned in Dan. iii. 5 (margin "symphony," or "singing"), 10, 15. Rabbi Saadia Gaon describes the term as = the bagpipe, an opinion adopted by the majority of biblical critics. The same instrument is still in use among peasants in the N. W. of Asia, and in S. Europe, where it is known by the similar name Sampogna or Zampogna. Some (Gesenius, &c.) trace the etymology of the Chaldee word to the Gr. sumphônia (= Eng. symphony); others regard it as a Semitic word. The modern "dulcimer" is a triangular stringed instrument.

Du'mah (Heb. silence, Ges.), a son of Ishmael; most probably the founder of an Ishmaelite tribe of Arabia, and thence the name of the principal place, or district, inhabited by that tribe (Gen. xxv. 14; 1-Chr. i. 30; Is. xxi. 11). The name of a town in the N. W. part of the peninsula, Doomat el-Jendel, about 4° E. of Petra (so Porter, in Kitto), is held by Gesenius and others to have been thus derived. It signifies "Dumah of the stones or blocks of stone," and seems to indicate that the place was built of unhewn or Cyclopean masonry, similar to that of very ancient structures.

Du'mah (Heb. silence), a city in the mountainous district of Judah, near Hebron (Josh. xv. 52). Robinson passed the ruins of a village called ed-Doumeh, four or five miles S. W. of Hebron, and this may possibly be Dumah.

* Dumb [dum] = unable to speak (Ex. iv. 11, &c.). Jesus Christ's making the dumb to speak was one of the proofs of his Messiahship (Mat. ix. 32, 33, xii. 22, &c.). MIRACLES.

Dung. The uses of dung were twofold, as manure, and as fuel. The manure consisted either of straw steeped in liquid manure (Is. xxv. 10), or the sweepings (Is. v. 25, margin) of the streets and roads, which were carefully removed from about the houses, and collected in heaps outside the walls of the towns at fixed spots (hence the "dung-gate" or "dung-port" at Jerusalem, Neh. ii. 13), and thence removed in due course to the fields. The mode of applying manure to trees was by digging holes about their roots and inserting it (Lk. xiii. 8), as still practised in southern Italy. In the case of sacrifices the dung was burnt outside the camp (Ex. xxix. 14; Lev. iv. 11, viii. 17; Num. xix. 5): hence the extreme opprobrium of the threat in Mal. ii. 3. Particular directions were laid down in the law to enforce cleanliness with regard to human ordure (Deut. xxiii. 12 ff.): it was the grossest insult to turn a man's house into a receptacle for it (2 K. x. 27, A. V. "draught-house;" Ezr. vi. 11; Dan. ii. 5, iii. 29, "dung-hill" A. V.); public establishments of that nature are still found in the large towns of the East. The "dung-hill" was put as the emblem of deep and squalid poverty (so Gesenius) (1 Sam. ii. 8; Ps. cxiii. 7); to "embrace dung-hills" = to lie in the dust, to wallow in filth, Ges. (Lam. iv. 5). In Phil. iii. 8, "dung" A. V. (Gr. pl. skubala) properly = what is thrown to the dogs, refuse, offal, things worthless (Rbn. N. T. Lex.). The difficulty of procuring fuel in Syria, Arabia, and Egypt, has made dung in all ages valuable as a substitute: it was probably used for heating ovens and for baking cakes (Ez. iv. 12, 15), the equable heat, which it produced, adapting it peculiarly for the latter operation. (BREAD; OVEN.) Cow's and camel's dung is still used for a similar purpose by the Bedouins. The dung is mixed with chopped straw, made into cakes, and dried for use (Kitto). DOVE'S DUNG.

* Dung'-gate (Neh. iii. 13, 14, xii. 31) or Dung'-port, a gate of JERUSALEM, perhaps (so Kitto, Bonar, &c.) on the S. near the modern "dung-gate," Bab el-mugharibek, in the Tyropœon. Others place it on the W. or S. W. Kitto supposes it = "the gate between the two walls" (2 K. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4).

Dun'geon [-jun]. CISTERN; PRISON.

Du'ra (Heb. circle, Fû.), the plain where Nebuchadnezzar set up the golden image (Dan. iii. 1), has been sometimes identified with a tract a little below Tekrit, on the left bank of the Tigris, where the name Dur is still found. M. Oppert places the plain (or, as he calls it, the "valley") of Dura to the S. E. of Babylon, in the vicinity of the mound of Dowair or Dûair. He discovered on this site the pedestal of a colossal statue.

* Dust is often used figuratively as well as literally in the Scriptures. (ASHES; EARTH; MORTAR; MOURNING.) To "return to the dust" is closely connected with DEATH or the dissolution of the body (Gen. iii. 19). To "lick the dust" is used hyperbolically of those who prostrate themselves in the dust (Ps. lxxii. 9; Mic. vii. 17); but "to put one's mouth in the dust" = to bow in silence, and await God's help (Gesenius). To throw dust on or at one indicates rage and contempt (2 Sam. xvi. 13; Acts xxii. 23). To shake off the dust of one's feet symbolizes (so Lange) a complete cessation of all fellowship, and a renunciation of influence (Mat. x. 14; Mk. vi. 11; Acts xiii. 51). DRESS.

Ea'gle [ee'gl] (Heb. nesher; Gr. aëtös). The Hebrew word, which occurs frequently in the O. T., and is uniformly in A. V. translated "eagle," may denote a particular species of the Falconide or falcon family, as in Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12, where the "eagle" is distinguished from the OSSIFRAGE, OSPRAY, and other raptorial birds; but the term is used also to express the griffon VULTURE (Vultur fulvus) in two or three passages. At least four distinct kinds of eagles have been observed in Palestine, viz. the golden eagle (Aquila Chrysaetos), the spotted eagle (Aquila naevia), the commonest species in the rocky districts, the imperial eagle (Aquila heliaca), and the very common Circæus gallicus, which preys on the numerous reptiles of Palestine. The Hebrew nesher may stand for any of these different species, though perhaps more particular reference to the golden and imperial eagles and the griffon vulture may be intended. The Scriptures refer to the eagle's swiftness of flight (Deut. xxviii. 49; 2 Sam. i. 23; Jer. iv. 13, xlix. 22; Lam. iv. 19, &c.); its mounting high into the air (Job xxxix. 27; Prov. xxiii. 5, xxx. 19; Is. xl. 31); its strength and vigor (Ps. cii. 5); its predaceous habits (Job ix. 26; Prov. xxx. 17); its setting its nest in high places (Job xxxix. 27; Jer. xlix. 16); its care in training its young to fly (Ex. xix. 4; Deut. xxxii. 11); its powers of vision (Job xxxix. 29). Mic. i. 16, "Enlarge thy baldness as the eagle," has been understood (improbably) by Bochart and others to refer to the eagle at the time of its moulting in the spring. But if the nesher = the griffon vulture the simile is peculiarly appropriate, for the whole head and neck of this bird are destitute of true feathers. Some Jewish interpreters have illustrated Ps. ciii. 5 (see also Is. xl. 31) by a reference to the old fables about the eagle being able to renew his strength when very old; most modern commentators think the verse refers to the eagle after the moulting season, when the bird is more full of activity than before; but Mr. Houghton much prefers Hengstenberg's explanation,—"Thy youth is renewed, so that in point of strength thou art like the eagle." The "eagles" of Mat. xxiv. 28 and Lk. xvii. 37 may include the griffon vulture and the Egyptian vulture (Gize-EAGLE), though, as eagles frequently prey upon dead bodies, there is no necessity to restrict the Greek word to the vulture family. The figure of an eagle is now and has been long a favorite military ensign. The Persians so employed it; a fact which illustrates the passage in Is. xlv. 11. The same bird was similarly employed by the Assyrians and the Romans. See cuts under ENSIGN.

Imperial Eagle (Aquila heliaca).

E'a-nes (1 Esd. ix. 21), a name which stands in the place of HIRIM, MAASEIAH, and ELIJAH, in the parallel list of Ezr. x. 21.

* Ear = the organ of hearing. (DEAF.) In regard to boring the servant's ear, see SLAVE.

* Ear, to, an old English verb = to plough (Deut. xxi. 4; 1 Sam. viii. 12; Is. xxx. 24). So "earring" (Gen. xlv. 6) and "earring time" (Ex. xxxiv. 21) = ploughing, ploughing time.

Ear'nest as a noun (2 Cor. i. 22, v. 5; Eph. i. 14) is the A. V. translation of arrhabôn, a Gr. form of the Heb. 'erabôn, which was introduced by the Phœnicians into Greece, and also into Italy, where it reappears under the L. forms of arrhabo and arrha. It may again be traced in the Fr. arrhes, and in the old English expression Earl's or Arle's money. The Heb. word was used generally for "pledge" (Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18, 20), and in its cognate forms for "pledge" (1 Sam. xvii. 18), "surety" (Prov. xvii. 18), and "hostages" (2 K. xiv. 14; 2 Chr. xxv. 24; literally sons of suretyship). The Gr. derivative, however, acquired a more technical sense as signifying the deposit paid by the purchaser on entering into an agreement for the purchase of any thing. The adjective "earnest" (Rom. viii. 19; Heb. ii. 1, &c.) and adverb "earnestly" (1 Sam. xx. 6, 28; Lk. xxii. 44, 56, &c.) are often used in A. V. in their ordinary meaning, usually in translating some intensive compound or idiomatic expression of the original.

Ear'-rings. The Heb. nezem, by which these ornaments are usually described, is ambiguous, originally referring to the nose-ring (Gen. xxiv. 47, A. V. "ear-ring;" Prov. xi. 22; Is. iii. 21; Ez. xvi. 12; A. V. "jewel" in the last three), and thence transferred to the ear-ring. The Heb. 'agil is also translated "ear-rings" (Num. xxxi. 50; Ez. xvi. 12); and once (Is. iii. 20) Heb. lehdashim (= charms, Ges.; see AMULETS). The material of which ear-rings were made was generally gold (Ex. xxxii. 2), and their form circular. They were worn by women and by youth of both sexes (Ex. i. c.). It has been inferred from the passage quoted, and from Judg. viii. 24, that they were not worn by men: these passages are, however, by no means conclusive. The ear-ring appears to have been regarded with superstitious reverence as an amulet. On this account they were surrendered along with the idols by Jacob's household (Gen. xxxv. 4). Chardin describes ear-rings with talismanic figures and characters on them, as still existing in the East. Jewels (Heb. netiphoth=drops, pendants for the ears, especially of pearls, Ges.; translated in Judg. viii. 26 "collars," margin "sweet jewels," and in Is. iii. 19 "chains," margin "sweet balls") were sometimes attached to the rings. The size of the ear-rings still worn in Eastern countries far exceeds what is usual among ourselves; hence they formed a handsome present (Job xlii. 11), or offering to the service of God (Num. xxxi. 50). ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.

Egyptian Ear-rings.—(From Wilkinson.)

Earth. The term is used in two widely different senses: (1.) for the material of which the earth's surface is composed, Heb. adamah; (2.) as the name of the planet on which man dwells, Heb. erets. The Gr. gê is used in both senses of "earth" (Mat. xiii. 5, &c.; v. 18, &c.).—I. The Heb. adamah is the earth in the sense of soil or ground, particularly as being susceptible of cultivation. The earth supplied the elementary substance of which man's body was formed, and the terms adam (A. V. "man," ADAM) and adamah (A. V. "ground") are brought into juxtaposition, implying an etymological connection (Gen. ii. 7). The law prescribed "earth" as the material out of which altars were to be raised (Ex. xx. 24). (ALTAR).—II. The Heb. erets (and so the Gr. gê in the LXX. and N. T.) is applied in a more or less extended sense:—1. to the whole world (Gen. i. 1); 2. to land as opposed to sea (Gen. i. 10); 3. to a country (Gen. xxi. 32, A. V. "land"); 4. to a plot of ground (Gen. xxiii. 15, A. V. "land"); 5. to the "ground" on which a man stands (Gen. xxxiii. 3); 6. to the inhabitants of the earth (Gen. vi. 11, xi. 1). "Earth" often, especially in the N. T., = the land or country of Judea or Palestine (Lk. xxiii. 44; Rom. ix. 28; Jas. v. 17, &c.).—For the origin of the earth, see CREATION. Probably the Hebrews, in common with other ancient nations, regarded the earth as the grand centre round which the sun and all the heavenly bodies revolve; but it is manifest that the Scriptures, in using the language which, literally and strictly interpreted, would convey this idea, neither make themselves responsible for its scientific accuracy, nor positively inform us what the real belief of the Hebrews on this subject was. Those among us who fully adopt the Copernican system of astronomy, have no hesitation in saying, "The sun rises;" "the moon and stars set," &c.; those who believe that the earth is a sphere still speak of "the level of the earth;" those who believe the dew is simply deposited on the cold earth from the warm air, say with others, "the dew falls;" those who believe that, according to the laws of optics, we only take cognizance of pictures or impressions made on the retina of the eye, do not scruple to affirm that they see the persons before their eyes, &c. In all these cases we use the scientifically incorrect language which is descriptive of appearances; yet we are not misunderstood when we use this convenient language, nor do we ordinarily suppose that we ourselves sanction a false view, or that those whom we address receive from us a false view, or hold it themselves. Much of the Bible (Psalms, Isaiah, &c.) is animated poetry; the whole is so written that it may be the Book for the people. The Scriptures, therefore, use language which all can readily understand when they speak of the sun's rising and going down (Gen. xv. 17, xix. 23, &c.), of Joshua's commanding the sun to stand still upon Gibeon and the moon in the valley of Ajalon (Josh. x. 12, 13), of the heavens as spread out (Job ix. 8), of the earth as having foundations (xxxviii. 4, 6; Ps. civ. 5; Prov. viii. 29) and pillars (Job ix. 6; Ps. lxxv. 3). In Job xxvi. 7, the earth is represented as hung upon nothing. (ASTRONOMY; HEAVEN, &c.) The "pit" or "hell" is spoken of as beneath the earth's surface (Num. xvi. 30; Deut. xxxii. 22; Job xi. 8). There seem to be traces (mostly in poetical passages) of the same ideas as prevailed among the Greeks, that the world was a disc (Is. xl. 22), bordered by the ocean (Deut. xxx. 13; Job xxvi. 10; Ps. cxxxix. 9; Prov. viii. 27), with Jerusalem as its centre (Ez. v. 5), which was thus regarded, like Delphi, as the navel (Judg. ix. 37; Ez. xxxviii. 12), or, according to another view, the highest point of the world. But Jerusalem might be regarded as the centre of the world, not only as the seat of religious light and truth, but to a certain extent in a geographical sense. A different view has been gathered from the expression "four corners," as though implying the quadrangular shape of a garment stretched out; but "corners" may be applied in a metaphorical sense to the extreme ends of the world (Job xxxvii. 3; Is. xi. 12; Ez. vii. 2). As to the size of the earth, the Hebrews had but a very indefinite notion. Without unduly pressing the language of prophecy, it may be said that their views on this point extended but little beyond the nations with which they came in contact; its solidity is frequently noticed, its dimensions but seldom (Job xxxviii. 18; Is. xlii. 5). The Bible abounds in topographical details respecting PALESTINE and the neighboring countries. For fulness of detail in topography, for graphic sketches of scenery, for minute accuracy in the description of natural products, peculiarities of climate, and manners and customs, no history, ancient or modern, can be compared with the Bible (P'tr. in Kit.). Josh. xii.—xxi. contain a remarkable description not only of the general features and boundaries of Palestine, but of the names and situations of its towns and villages. The earth was divided into four quarters or regions corresponding to the four points of the compass; these were described in various ways, sometimes according to their positions relatively to a person facing the E., before, behind, the right hand, and the left hand, thus representing respectively E., W., S., and N. (Job xxiii. 8, 9); sometimes relatively to the sun's course, the rising, the setting (Ps. l. 1); sometimes as the seat of the four winds (Ez. xxxvii. 9). Of the physical objects noticed in the O. T. we may make the following summary, omitting of course the details of the geography of Palestine:—1. Seas—the Mediterranean, termed the "great sea" (Num. xxxiv. 6), the "sea of the Philistines" (Ex. xxiii. 31), and the "uttermost sea" (Deut. xi. 24); the "RED SEA" (Ex. x. 19), or "Egyptian Sea" (Is. xi. 15); the Dead Sea, under the names "Salt Sea" (SEA, THE SALT) (Gen. xiv. 3), "Eastern Sea" (Joel ii. 20), and "Sea of the Plain" (Deut. iv. 49); and the Sea of CHINERETH, or GALILEE (Num. xxxiv. 11). (SEA). 2. Rivers—the EUPHRATES, which was specifically "the river" (Gen. xxi. 21), or "the great river" (Deut. i. 7); the NILE, which was named either "the RIVER" 3 (Gen. xli. 1), or SIHOR (Josh. xiii. 3); the Tigris, under the name of HINDEKEL (Dan. x. 4); the CHEBAR (Ez. i. 3); the HABOR (2 K. xvii. 6); the RIVER OF EGYPT (Num. xxxiv. 5); and the rivers of Damascus, ABANA and PHARPAR (2 K. v. 12). For the Gihon and PISON (Gen. ii. 11, 13), see EDEN. 3. Mountains—ARARAT or Armenia (Gen. viii. 4); SINAI (Ex. xix. 2); Horeb (Ex. iii. 1); HOR (Num. xx. 22) near Petra; LEBANON (Deut. iii. 25); and SEPHAR (Gen. x. 80) in Arabia. The distribution of the nations over the face of the earth is systematically described in Gen. x. (TONGUES, CONFUSION OF), to which account subsequent additions are made in chapters xxv. and xxxvi., and in the prophetic and historical books. The hereditary connection of the Hebrews with MESOPOTAMIA and the importance of the dynasties which bore sway in it make it a prominent feature in the ancient world. The Egyptian bondage introduces to our notice some of the localities in Lower EGYPT, viz. the province of GOSHEN, and the towns RAMESES (Gen. xlvii. 11); ON (xli. 43); PRITHOM (Ex. i. 11); and MIGNOL (xv. 2). It is difficult to estimate the amount of information which the Hebrews derived from the Phenicians; but no doubt from them they learned the route to Ophir, and became acquainted with the positions and productions of a great number of regions comparatively unknown. From Ez. xxvii. we may form some notion of the extended ideas of geography which the Hebrews had obtained. The progress of information on the side of Africa is clearly marked; the distinction between Upper and Lower Egypt is shown by the application of the name PATHROS to the former (Ez. xxix. 14). MEMPHIS, the capital of Lower Egypt, is first mentioned in Hos. ix. 6, and afterward frequently as "Noph" (Is. xix. 13); THEBES, the capital of Upper Egypt, at a later period, as "No-Amon" (Nah. iii. 8) and "No" (Jer. xli. 26); and the distant SYENE (Ez. xxix. 10). Several other towns are noticed in the Delta. The wars with the Assyrians and Babylonians, and the captivities which followed, bring us back again to the geography of the East. Incidental notice is taken of several important places in connection with these events. The names of PERSIA (2 Chr. xxxvi. 20) and INDIA (Esth. i. 1) now occur: whether the far-distant China is noticed at an earlier period under the name SINIM (Is. xlix. 12) admits of doubt. The names of Greece and Italy are hardly noticed in Hebrew geography: the earliest notice of the former, subsequently to Gen. x., occurs in Is. lxvi. 19, under the name of JAVAN. If Italy is described at all, it is under the name CHITTIM (Dan. xi. 30). In the Macabean era the classical names came into common use; and henceforward the geography of the Bible, as far as foreign lands are concerned, is absorbed in the wider field of classical geography.

Earth-en-ware. POTTERY.

Earthquake. Earthquakes, more or less violent, are of frequent occurrence in Palestine, as might be expected from the numerous traces of volcanic agency visible in that country. (ARGOB; SEA, THE SALT, &c.) The instances recorded in the Scriptures, however, are but few (1 Sam. xiv. 16; 1 K. xix. 11, 12; Mat. xxviii. 2; Acts xvi. 26, &c.; see below); the most remarkable occurred in the reign of Uzziah (Am. i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5), which Josephus connected with the sacrilege and consequent punishment of that monarch (2 Chr. xxvi. 16 ff.). From Zech. xiv. 4 we are led to infer that a great convulsion took place at this time in the Mount of Olives, the mountain being split so as to leave a valley between its summits. Josephus (ix. 10, § 4) records something of the sort, but his account is by no means clear. We cannot but think that the two accounts have the same foundation, and that the Mount of Olives was really affected by the earthquake. An earthquake occurred at the time of our Saviour's crucifixion (Mat. xxvii. 51-54), which may be deemed miraculous rather from the conjunction of circumstances than from the nature of the phenomenon itself. Josephus (xv. 5, § 2) records a very violent earthquake, B. C. 31, in which 10,000 people perished. Terrible earthquakes visited Syria and Palestine A. D. 1170, 1202, 1759, &c. That of January 1, 1837, was felt in a region 500 miles long by 90 broad, but the principal scene of ruin was in Upper Galilee. Mr. Calman, who accompanied Rev. W. M. Thomson to minister relief to the sufferers, estimated 5,025 killed, and 405 wounded at Safed, 775 killed and 65 wounded at Tiberias, and more than 1,500 killed in other places (Kitto, Phys. Hist. of Pal., 88 ff.; Thn. i. 429 ff.). Earthquakes are not unfrequently accompanied by fissures of the earth's surface; instances of this are recorded in connection with the destruction of Korah and his company (Num. xvi. 32), and at the time of our Lord's death (Mat. xxvii. 51); the former may be paralleled by a similar occurrence at Oppido in Calabria A. D. 1783, where the earth opened to the extent of 500, and a depth of more than 200 feet. DARKNESS is frequently a concomitant of earthquakes. The awe which an earthquake never fails to inspire rendered it a fitting token of Jehovah's presence (Judg. v. 4; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Ps. lxxvii. 18, xcvii. 4, civ. 32; Am. viii. 8; Hab. iii. 10). An earthquake is a symbol of a wide-spread and terrible calamity, or of a great political convulsion or catastrophe (Rev. vi. 12, &c.).

East. The Hebrew terms, descriptive of the east, differ in idea, and, to a certain extent, in application; (1.) Heb. kedem (and so the forms kédem, kádím, kídímáh, kadmón, kadmóni) properly means that which is before or in front of a person, and was applied to the E. from the custom of turning in that direction when describing the points of the compass, before, behind, the right, and the left, representing respectively E., W., S., and N. (Job xxiii. 8, 9; A. V. "forward," "backward," "on the left hand," "on the right hand"); (2.) Heb. mizräh or mizräch means the place of the sun's rising. Bearing in mind this etymological distinction, it is natural that

No. 1 should be used when the four quarters of the world are described (as in Gen. xiii. 14, xxviii. 14; Job xliii. 8, 9; Ez. xlvii. 18 ff.), and No. 2 when the E. is only distinguished from the W. (Josh. xi. 3; Ps. l. 1, A. V. "from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof;" ciii. 12, cxliii. 3; A. V. "from the rising," &c.; Zech. viii. 7), or from some other one quarter (Dan. viii. 9, xi. 44; Am. viii. 12); exceptions to this usage occur in Ps. cvii. 3, and Is. xliii. 5, each, however, admitting of explanation. Again, No. 2 is used in a strictly geographical sense to describe a spot or country immediately before another in an easterly direction; hence it occurs in Gen. ii. 8, iii. 24, xi. 2 (ARARAT), xiii. 11, xxv. 6, &c.; and hence the subsequent application of the term, as a proper name (Gen. xxv. 6, A. V. "eastward, unto the E. country;" Judg. vi. 3, 33, &c., "children of the E.," literally sons of the E.; Job i. 3, "men" [marg. "sons] of the E.; compare our phrase "the East," and see SEPPIAR), to the lands lying immediately eastward of Palestine, viz. ARABIA, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia; on the other hand, No. 2 is used of the far East with a less definite signification (Is. xli. 2, 25, A. V. "the rising;" xliii. 5, xlv. 11). In the LXX. the Gr. anatolai, plural of anatolē, which literally = No. 2, is used both for No. 1 and No. 2. So in N. T. (Mat. ii. 1, viii. 11, xxiv. 27; Lk. xiii. 29; Rev. xvi. 12). The Greek singular anatolē is translated "East" in Mat. ii. 2, 9; Rev. vii. 2, xxi. 13; but Lange and most recent interpreters translate the Gr. en tē anatolē in Mat. ii. 2, 9, literally in the rising sc. of the star: otherwise "in the E." = in ARABIA. (STAR OF THE WISE MEN.) In Ps. lxxv. 7 (Heb. 6) the Heb. mātsā (= going forth, place of going forth; hence east, whence the sun goes forth, Ges.) is translated "east;" and in Jer. xix. 2 a gate of JERUSALEM is called in A. V. "east gate," marg. "sun gate" (Heb. harsith or charshith in Keri, the text having ā instead of i), translated by Gesenius, Henderson, &c., the pottery gate).—Children, or men, of the East; see above.

Easter, in the A. V. of Acts xii. 4, is chiefly noticeable as an example of the want of consistency in the translators. In the earlier English versions "Easter" had been frequently used as the translation of the Gr. pascha. At the last revision, PASSOVER was substituted in all passages but this.

* East Gate (Neh. iii. 29), a gate of JERUSALEM; perhaps (so Ges.) = the WATER-GATE or HORSE-GATE. In Jer. xix. 2, marg. "sun-gate," Ges. supposes it = the gate by which one went out to the Valley of Hinnom; others suppose it = the VALLEY GATE.

* East Sea, the = the Dead Sea. SEA, THE SALT.

East Wind. WINDS.

* Eat, Eat'ing. FOOD; MEALS.

Ebal (Heb. stone, Ges.; = OBAL, Fū.). 1. Son of Shobal the son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chr. i. 40).

—2. OBAL the son of Joktan (1 Chr. i. 22; comp. Gen. x. 28).

Ebal (Heb. stone, Ges.; bare mount, Fū.), Mount, a mount in the promised land, on which, according to the command of Moses, the Israelites were, after their entrance on the promised land, to "put" the curse which should fall upon them if they disobeyed the commandments of Jehovah. The blessing consequent on obedience was to be similarly localized on Mount GERIZIM (Deut. xi. 26–29). Half the tribes were to stand on Mount Gerizim, responding to blessings, and half on Ebal, responding to curses, as pronounced by the Levites, who remained with the ark in the centre of the interval (xxvii.; compare Josh. viii. 30–35). On Ebal further was to be erected an altar of large unhewn stones, plastered with lime, and inscribed with the words of the law. Where, then, were Ebal and Gerizim situated? The all but unanimous reply to this is, that they are the mounts which form the sides of the fertile valley in which lies Nablûs, the ancient SHECHEM—Ebal on the N. and Gerizim on the S. (1.) It is plain that they were situated near together, with a valley between. A voice can be heard without difficulty across this valley, which, between the lower slopes of the mountains where the tribes probably stood, is about 200 yards wide (Ptr. in Kit.). (2.) Gerizim was very near Shechem (Judg. ix. 7), and in Josephus's time the names appear to have been attached to the mounts, which were then, as now, Ebal on the N. and Gerizim on the S. Eusebius and Jerome place them in the Jordan valley, near Gilgal; but they speak merely from hearsay. It is well known that one of the most serious variations between the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch and the Samaritan text is in reference to Ebal and Gerizim. In Deut. xxvii. 4, the Samaritan has Gerizim, which all critics of eminence, except Kennicott, regard as a corrupt reading (so Ptr. in Kit.), while the Hebrew (as in A. V.) has Ebal, as the mount on which the altar to Jehovah and the inscription of the law were to be erected. Upon this basis the Samaritans ground the sanctity of Gerizim and the authenticity of the temple and holy place, which did exist and still exist there. Ebal is rarely ascended by travellers, but its summit, according to Van de Velde, is about 2,700 feet above the sea, 1,028 feet above Nablûs, and about 100 feet higher than Gerizim. Both mounts are terraced, and there is little or no perceptible difference in soil, &c. The structure of Gerizim is nummulitic limestone, with occasional outcrops of igneous rock, and that of Ebal is probably similar. At its base above the valley of Nablûs are numerous caves and sepulchral excavations. The modern name of Ebal is Sitti Salawîyah, from a Mohammedan female saint, whose tomb is standing on the eastern part of the ridge, a little before the highest point is reached. Stanley (233 n.) gives the modern name of the mount as Imad ed-Dien (the pillar of the religion).

E'bed (Heb. servant, slave). 1. (Many MSS. and the Syriac and Arabic versions, have EBER.) Father of GAAL, who with his brethren assisted the men of Shechem in their revolt against Abimelech (Judg. ix. 26, 28, 30, 31, 35.—2. Son of Jonathan; one of the "sons" of Adin who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 6); written OBEH in 1 Esd.

E'bed-me'lech [-lek] (Heb. see below), an Ethiopian eunuch in the service of King Zedekiah, through whose interference Jeremiah was released from prison, and who was on that account preserved from harm at the taking of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxviii. 7 ff., xxxix. 15 ff.). His name seems to be an official title = King's slave, i. e. minister.

Eb'en-e'zer (Heb. the stone of help), a stone set up by Samuel after a signal defeat of the Philistines, as a memorial of the "help" received on the occasion from Jehovah (1 Sam. vii. 12); named twice previously (iv. 1, v. 1), but not unnaturally, in the narrative written after the event. Its position, still unknown, was between MIZPEH and SHEN.

Eber (Heb. the region beyond, Ges.; production, shoot, Fñ.). 1. Son of Salah, and great-grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 21, 24, 25, xi. 14-17; 1 Chr. i. 18, 19, 25); = HEBER in Lk. iii. 35. In Num. xxiv. 24, "Eber" = the descendants of Eber, or the Hebrews collectively (compare ISRAEL). Eber, according to Gen. xi., not only survived all his own lineal ancestors, but attained nearly twice the age of any of his descendants in the line of Abraham, and indeed outlived all of them down to Abraham himself, dying four years after the latter, at the age of 464 years. Of all who have lived since the flood, only Noah and Shem are recorded as older than Eber at their respective deaths, and their greater age is due to their having lived before as well as after the flood. Eber is as preëminent for his length of life after the flood as METHUSALAH for his before it.—2. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal and descendant of Shaharaim (1 Chr. viii. 12).—3. A priest, chief of the house of Amok under high-priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 20).

E-bi'a-saph (Heb. = ABIASAPH), a Kohathite Levite of the family of Korah, ancestor of the prophet Samuel and of Heman the singer (1 Chr. vi. 23, 37). The same man is probably intended in ix. 19. The name appears = ABIASAPH, and in one passage (1 Chr. xxvi. 1) to be abbreviated to ASAPH.

Ebony (Diospyros Ebenum).

Eb'ony (Heb. hobnīm = wood as hard as stone) occurs only in Ez. xxvii. 15, as one of the valuable commodities imported into Tyre by the men of Dedan. The best kind of ebony is yielded by the Diospyros Ebenum, a tree which grows in Ceylon and Southern India; but there are many trees of the natural order Ebenaceæ which produce this material. The ancients held the black heart-wood in high esteem. It admits of a fine polish, and is used for cabinet-work. There is every reason for believing that the ebony afforded by the Diospyros Ebenum was imported from India or Ceylon by Phœnician traders; though it is equally probable that the Tyrian merchants were supplied with ebony from trees which grew in Ethiopia. It is not known what tree yielded the Ethiopian ebony.

E-bro'nah (Heb. 'abrōnāh = passage, sc. of the sea, Ges.; coast-place, bank-place, Fñ.), a station of the Israelites in the desert, immediately preceding EZION-GABER, possibly a ford across the head of the Elanitic Gulf (Num. xxxiii. 34, 35). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

E-ca'nus, one of the five swift scribes who attended on Esdras (2 Esd. xiv. 24). ASIEL 2.

Ee-bat'a-na, or Ee-bat'a-ne (L. Ecbatana, Ecbatana, from Gr.; Heb. Achmethā, or Achmithā; all from old Persian or Aryan = place of horses, stable, Lassen; place of assemblage, Sir Henry Rawlinson). It is doubtful whether the name of this place is really contained in the Hebrew Scriptures. Many of the best commentators understand the expression, in Ezr. vi. 2, differently, and translate it "in a coffer" (A. V. "Achmetha"; margin "Ecbatana," or "in a coffer"). If a city is meant, there is little doubt of one of the two Ecbatanas being intended, for except these towns there was no place in the province of the Medes which contained a palace, or where records are likely to have been deposited. In the Apocrypha "Ecbatane" is frequently mentioned (Tob. iii. 7, xiv. 12, 14; Jd. i. 1, 2; 2 Mc. ix. 8, &c.). Two cities of the name of Ecbatana seem to have existed in ancient times, one the capital of northern MEDIA, the Media Atropatēnē of Strabo; the other the metropolis of the larger and more important province known as Media Magna. The site of the former Sir H. Rawlinson regards as the very curious ruins at Takht-i-Suleiman (lat. 36° 28', long. 47° 9'); while that of the latter, about 150 miles S. E. of the former, is occupied by Hamadan, which is one of the most important cities of modern Persia. There is generally some difficulty in determining, when Ecbatana is mentioned, whether the northern or the southern metropolis is intended. Few writers are aware of the existence of the two cities, and they lie sufficiently near to one another for geographical notices in most cases to suit either site. The northern city was the "seven-walled town," with battlements coated, five of them with paint of different colors, one with silver, and one with gold, described by Herodotus, and declared by him to have been the capital of Cyrus (Hdt. i. 98, 99, 153); and it was thus most probably there that the roll was found which proved to Darius that Cyrus had really made a decree allowing the Jews to rebuild their temple. The peculiar feature of the site of Takht-i-Suleiman, which Sir H. Rawlinson proposes to identify with the northern Ecbatana, is a conical hill rising to the height of about 150 feet above the plain, and covered both on its top and sides with massive ruins of the most antique and primitive character. A perfect enceinte, formed of large blocks of squared stone, may be traced round the entire hill along its brow; within there is an oval enclosure about 800 yards in its greatest and 400 in its least diameter, strewn with ruins, which cluster round a remarkable lake, filled with water exquisitely clear and pleasant to the taste. On three sides—the S., the W., and the N.—the acclivity is steep, and the height above the plain uniform, but on the E. it abuts upon a hilly tract of ground, and here it is but slightly elevated above the adjacent country. The northern Ecbatana continued to be an important place down to the 13th century after Christ. By the Greeks and Romans it appears to have been known as Gaza, Gazaca, or Canzaca, "the treasure city," on account of the wealth laid up in it; while by the Orientals it was termed Shiz. Its decay is referable to the Mogul conquests about A. D. 1200; and its final ruin is supposed to date from about the 15th or 16th century. In the 2d book of Maccabees (ix. 3, &c.) the "Ecbatane" is undoubtedly the southern city, now represented both in name and site by Hamadan. This place, situated on the northern flank of the great mountain called formerly Orontes, and now Elwend, was perhaps as ancient as the other, and is far better known in history. If not the Median capital of Cyrus, it was at any rate regarded from the time of Darius Hystaspis as the chief city of the Persian satrapy of Media, and as such it became the summer residence of the Persian kings from Darius downward. It was afterward the metropolis of the Parthian empire, and is now a city of from 20,000 to 30,000 inhabitants. The Jews, many of whom reside here, regard it as the residence of Ahasuerus (SHESHAN), and show within its precincts the tomb of Esther and MORDECAI. The "Ecbatane" of Tobit and Judith is thought by Sir H. Rawlinson to be the northern city.

Ec-cle-si-as'tes [ek-klee-ze-as'teez] (L. fr. Gr. = preacher = Heb. Kôheleth; see below).—I. Title. The Hebrew title of this book is taken from the name by which the son of David, or the writer who personates him, speaks of himself throughout it. The apparent anomaly of the feminine termination indicates that the abstract noun has been transferred from the office to the person holding it; and hence, with the single exception of Eccl. vii. 27, the noun, notwithstanding its form, is used throughout in the masculine. The word has been applied to one who speaks publicly in an assembly, and there is, to say the least, a tolerable agreement (LXX., Vulgate, Luther, A. V., Gesenius, Knobel, Stuart, &c.) in favor of this interpretation. On the other hand, Grotius (followed by Herder, Jahn, and Mendelssohn) has suggested "compiler" as a better equivalent.—II. Canonicity. In the Jewish division of the books of the Old Testament, Ecclesiastes ranks as one of "the five Rolls" (BIBL. III. 3, 6.), and its position, as having canonical authority, appears to have been recognized by the Jews from the time in which the idea of a canon first presented itself. We find it in all the Jewish catalogues of the sacred books, and from them it has been received universally by the Christian Church. Some singular passages in the Talmud indicate, however, that the recognition was not altogether unhesitating, and that it was at least questioned how far the book was one which it was expedient to place among the Scriptures that were read publicly.—III. Author and Date. The hypothesis naturally suggested by the account that the writer gives of himself in chapters i. and ii. is, that it was written by the only "son of David" who was "king over Israel in Jerusalem" (i. 1, 12). The belief that Solomon was actually the author was, it need hardly be said, received generally by the Rabbinic commentators and the whole series of Patristic writers. Grotius was indeed almost the first writer who called it in question and started a different hypothesis, viz. that it was written after Solomon's time by some one who personated that king as penitent. The objections urged against the traditional belief by Grotius and later critics, and the hypotheses substituted for it, are drawn chiefly from the book itself.—Objection 1. The language of the book is said to be inconsistent with the belief that it was written by Solomon. It belongs (so Grotius, De Wette, Ewald, and most German critics, Stuart, &c.) to the time when the older Hebrew was becoming largely intermingled with Aramaic forms and words, and as such takes its place in the latest group of books of the O. T. The prevalence of abstract forms is urged as belonging to a later period than that of Solomon in the development of Hebrew thought and language. The answers given to these objections by the defenders of the received belief are (a) that many of what we call Aramaic or Chaldee forms may have belonged to the period of pure Hebrew, though they have not come down to us in any extant writings; and (b) that, so far as they are foreign to the Hebrew of the time of Solomon, he may have learned them from his "strange wives," or from the men who came as ambassadors from other countries.—Objection 2. Would Solomon have been likely to speak of himself as in i. 12, or to describe with bitterness the misery and wrong of which his own misgovernment had been the cause, as in iii. 16, iv. 1? On the hypothesis that he was the writer, the whole book is an acknowledgment of evils which he had occasioned, while yet there is no distinct confession and repentance. The question here raised is worth considering, but it can hardly lead in either direction to a conclusion.—Objection 3. It has been urged that the state of society indicated in this book leads to the same conclusion as its language, and carries us to a period after the return from the Babylonian captivity, when the Jews were enjoying comparative freedom from invasion, but were exposed to the evils of misgovernment under the satraps of the Persian king. Significant, though not conclusive in either direction, is the absence of all reference to any contemporaneous prophetic activity, or to any Messianic hopes. The use throughout of Elohim instead of יהוה, as the divine name (God), leaves the question as to date nearly where it was. The indications of rising questions as to the end of man's life, and the constitution of his nature, of doubts like those which afterward developed into Sadduceism (iii. 19–21), of a copious literature connected with those questions, confirm, it is urged, the hypothesis of the later date. It may be added, too, that the absence of any reference to such a work as this, in the enumeration of Solomon's writings in 1 K. iv. 32, tends at least to the same conclusion. In this case, however, as in others, the arguments of recent criticism are stronger against the traditional belief than in support of any rival theory, and the advocates of that belief might almost be content to rest their case upon the discordant hypotheses of their opponents. On the assumption that the book belongs not to the time of Solomon, but to the period subsequent to the Captivity, the dates which have been assigned to it occupy a range of more than three hundred years. Grotius supposes Zerubbabel to be referred to, in xii. 11, as the "One Shepherd," and so far agrees with Keil, who fixes it in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. Stuart supposes that Ecclesiastes may have been written between the first return of the Jews from Babylon (535 B. C.) and Ezra's time (about eighty years afterward). Ewald and De Wette conjecture the close of the period of Persian or the commencement of that of Macedonian rule; Bertholdt the period between Alexander the Great and Antiochus Epiphanes; Hitzig about 204 B. C.; Hartmann, the time of the Maccabees. On the other hand, the main facts relied on by these critics as fatal to the traditional belief are compatible with any date subsequent to the Captivity.—IV. Plan. The book of Ecclesiastes comes before us as being conspicuously, among the writings of the O. T., the great stumbling-block of commentators. Some at least of the Rabbinical writers were perplexed by its teachings. Little can be gathered from the Patristic interpreters. The book is comparatively seldom quoted by them. No attempt is made to master its plan and to enter into the spirit of its writer. When we descend to the more recent developments of criticism, we meet with an almost incredible divergence of opinion. Luther sees in it a noble design of leading men, in the midst of all the troubles and disorders of human society, to a true endurance and reasonable enjoyment. Grotius finds in it only a collection of many maxims, connected more or less closely with the great problems of human life. Others reject these views as partial and one-sided, and assert that the object of the writer was to point out the secret of a true blessedness in the midst of all the distractions and sorrows of the world as consisting in a calm, thankful enjoyment of the good that comes from God. The variety of these opinions indicates sufficiently that the book is as far removed as possible from the character of a formal treatise. It is that which it professes to be—the confession of a man of wide experience looking back upon his past life, and looking out upon the disorders and calamities which surround him. The true utterances of such a man are the records of his struggles after truth, of his occasional glimpses of it, of his ultimate discovery. The writer of Ecclesiastes is not a didactic moralist, nor a prophet, but a man who has sinned in giving way to selfishness and sensuality, upon whom have come from that sin satiety and weariness of life; in whom the mood of spirit, over-reflective, indisposed to action, has become dominant in its darkest form, but who has, through all this, been under the discipline of a divine education, and has learned from it the lesson which God meant to teach him. What that lesson was will be seen from an examination of the book itself. It is tolerably clear that the recurring burden of "Vanity of vanities" and the teaching which recommends a life of calm enjoyment mark, whenever they occur, a kind of halting-place in the succession of thoughts. Taking this, accordingly, as his guide, Professor Plumptre, the original author of this article, considers the whole book as falling into five divisions, each of the first four, to a certain extent, running parallel to the others in its order and results, and closing with that which, in its position no less than its substance, is "the conclusion of the whole matter." (1.) Chapters i. and ii. This portion of the book more than any other has the character of a personal confession. The Preacher starts with reproducing the phase of despair and weariness into which his experience had led him (i. 2, 3). To the man who is thus satiated with life, the order and regularity of nature are oppressive (i. 4–7). That which seems to be new is but the repetition of the old (i. 8–11). Then, having laid bare the depth to which he had fallen, he retraces the path by which he had travelled thitherward. First he had sought after wisdom as that to which God seemed to call him (i. 13), but the pursuit of it was a sore travail, and there was no satisfaction in its possession. The first experiment in the search after happiness had failed, and he tried another—to surround himself with all the appliances of sensual enjoyment, and yet in thought to hold himself above it (ii. 1-9). But this also failed to give him peace (ii. 11). The first section closes with that which, in different forms, is the main lesson of the book—to make the best of what is actually around one (ii. 24)—to substitute for the reckless, feverish pursuit of pleasure the calm enjoyment which men may yet find both for the senses and the intellect. (2.) Chapters iii. 1-vi. 9. The order of thought in this section has a different starting-point. One who looked out upon the infinitely varied phenomena of men's life might yet discern, in the midst of that variety, traces of an order. There are times and seasons for each of them in its turn, even as there are for the vicissitudes of the world of nature (iii. 1-8). The heart of man with its changes is the mirror of the universe (iii. 11), and is, like that, inscrutable. And from this there comes the same conclusion as from the personal experience. Calmly to accept the changes and chances of life, entering into whatever joy they bring, as one accepts the order of nature, this is the way of peace (iii. 13). The thought of the ever-recurring cycle of nature, which had before been irritating and disturbing, now whispers the same lesson. The transition from this to the opening thoughts of chapter iv. seems at first somewhat abrupt. Instead of the self-centred search after happiness, he looks out upon the miseries and disorders of the world, and learns to sympathize with suffering (iv. 1). And in this survey of life on a large scale, as in that of a personal experience, there is a cycle which is ever being repeated. The opening of chapter v. again presents the appearance of abruptness, but it is because the survey of human life takes a yet wider range. The eye of the Preacher passes from the dwellers in palaces to the worshippers in the Temple, the devout and religious men. Have they found out the secret of life, the path to wisdom and happiness? The answer to that question is, that there the blindness and folly of mankind show themselves in their worst forms. The command "Fear thou God" (verse 7) meant that a man was to take no part in a religion such as this. But that command also suggested the solution of another problem, of that prevalence of injustice and oppression which had before weighed down the spirit of the inquirer. The section ends as before with the conclusion, that to feed the eyes with what is actually before them is better than the ceaseless wanderings of the spirit. (3.) Chapters vi. 10-viii. 15. So far the lines of thought all seemed to converge to one result. The ethical teaching that grew out of the wise man's experience had in it something akin to the higher forms of Epicureanism. But the seeker could not rest in this, and found himself beset with thoughts at once more troubling and leading to a higher truth. The spirit of man looks before and after, and the uncertainties of the future vex it (vi. 12). There are signs (vii. 1-14) of a clearer insight into the end of life. Then comes an oscillation which carries him back to the old problems (vii. 15). The repetition of thoughts that had appeared before is perhaps the natural consequence of such an oscillation, and accordingly in chapter viii. we find the seeker moving in the same round as before. There are the old reflections on the misery of man (viii. 6), and the confusions in the moral order of the universe (viii. 10, 11), the old conclusion that enjoyment, such enjoyment as is compatible with the fear of God, is the only wisdom (viii. 15). (4.) Chapters viii. 16-xii. 8. After the pause implied in his again arriving at the lesson of verse 15, the Preacher retraces the last of his many wanderings. This time the thought with which he started was a profound conviction of the inability of man to unravel the mysteries by which he is surrounded (viii. 17), of the nothingness of man when death is thought of as ending all things (ix. 3-6), of the wisdom of enjoying life while we may (ix. 7-10), of the evils which affect nations or individual man (ix. 11, 12). The wide experience of the Preacher suggests sharp and pointed sayings as to these evils (x. 1-20), each true and weighty in itself, but not leading him on to any firmer standing-ground or clearer solution of the problems which oppressed him. It is here that the traces of plan and method in the book seem most to fail us. In chapter xi., however, the progress is more rapid. The tone of the Preacher becomes more that of direct exhortation, and he speaks in clearer and higher notes. The end of man's life is not to seek enjoyment for himself only, but to do good to others, regardless of the uncertainties or disappointments that may attend his efforts (xi. 1-4). The secret of a true life is that a man should consecrate the vigor of his youth to God (xii. 1). It is well to do that before the night comes, before the slow decay of age benumbs all the faculties of sense (xii. 2, 6), before the spirit returns to God who gave it. The thought of that end rings out once more the knell of the nothingness of all things earthly (xii. 8); but (5.) (xii. 9-14) it leads also to the "conclusion of the whole matter," to that to which all trains of thought and all the experiences of life had been leading the seeker after wisdom, that "to fear God and keep his commandments" was the highest good attainable. If the representation which has been given of the plan and meaning of the book be at all a true one, we find in it, no less than in the book of Job, indications of the struggle with the doubts and difficulties which in all ages of the world have presented themselves to thoughtful observers of the condition of mankind. The writer of the book of Job deals with the great mystery presented by the sufferings of the righteous. In the words of the Preacher, we trace chiefly the weariness or satiety of the pleasure-seeker, and the failure of all schemes of life but one. In both, though by very diverse paths, the inquirer is led to take refuge in the thought that God's kingdom is infinitely great, and that man knows but the smallest fragment of it; that he must refrain from things which are too high for him, and be content with the duties of his own life and the opportunities it presents for his doing the will of God.

Ek-ek-le-as-ti-eus [ek-klee-ze-as'te-kus] (L. fr. Gr. = belonging to the public assembly or church, i. e. church-reading book; see below), the title given in the Latin version to the Apocryphal book which is called in some manuscripts and editions of the LXX. The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, and in the Vat. MS., &c., Wisdom of Sirach. The word, like many others of Greek origin, appears to have been adopted in the African dialect. The right explanation of the word is given by Rufinus, who remarks that "it does not designate the author of the book, but the character of the writing," as publicly used in the services of the church. According to Jerome, the original Hebrew title was Proverbs; and the Wisdom of Sirach shared with the canonical book of Proverbs and the Wisdom of Solomon the title of The book of all virtues. In the Syriac version the book is entitled The book of Jesus the son of Simcon Asiro (i. e. the bound); and the same book is called the wisdom of the son of Asiro. In many places it is simply styled Wisdom. 2. The writer of the present book describes himself as "JESUS (i. e. Jeshua or Joshua) THE SON OF SIRACH, of Jerusalem (l. 27). 3. The language in which the book was originally composed was Hebrew, i. e. perhaps the vernacular Aramean dialect (compare Jn. v. 2, xix. 13, &c.). Jerome says that he had met with the "Hebrew" text. The internal character of the present book bears witness to its foreign source. 4. Nothing, however, remains of the original proverbs of Ben Sira except the few fragments in pure Hebrew which occur in the Talmud and later Rabbinic writers; and even these may have been derived from tradition and not from any written collection. The Greek translation incorporated in the LXX., which is probably the source from which the other translations were derived, was made by the grandson of the author in Egypt "in the reign of Euergetes," for the instruction of those "in a strange country who were previously prepared to live after the law." The date which is thus given is unfortunately ambiguous. Two kings of Egypt bore the surname Euergetes; PTOLEMY III., the son and successor of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, B. C. 247-222; and Ptolemy VII. Physcon, the brother of PTOLEMY VI. PHILOMETOR, B. C. 170-117. Some have supposed that the "Simon the high-priest, the son of Onias," eulogized in chapter I., = Simon I. "the Just," who was high-priest about 310-290 B. C., and that the grandson of Jesus the son of Sirach, who is supposed to have been his younger contemporary, lived in the reign of Ptolemy III.; others again have applied the eulogy to Simon II., also the son of Onias and high-priest when PTOLEMY IV. PHILOPATOR endeavored to force an entrance into the Temple, B. C. 217, and fixed the translation in the time of Ptolemy VII. But both suppositions are attended with serious difficulties. From these considerations it appears best (so Mr. Westcott) to combine the two views. The grandson of the author was already past middle-age when he came to Egypt, and if his visit took place early in the reign of Ptolemy Physcon, it is quite possible that the book itself was written while the name and person of the last of "the men of the great synagogue" were still familiar to his countrymen. 5. The name of the Greek translator is unknown. He is commonly supposed to have borne the same name as his grandfather, but this tradition rests only on conjecture or misunderstanding. 6. It is a more important fact that the book itself appears to recognize the incorporation of earlier collections into its text. Jesus the son of Sirach, while he claims for himself the writing of the book, characterizes his father as one "who poured forth a shower of wisdom from his heart" (l. 27). From the very nature of his work, the author was like "a gleaner after the grape-gatherers" (xxxiii. 16). 7. The Syriac and Old Latin versions, which latter Jerome adopted without alteration, differ considerably from the present Greek text, and it is uncertain whether they were derived from some other Greek recension or from the Hebrew original. The Arabic version is directly derived from the Syriac. 8. The existing Greek MSS. present great discrepancies in order, and numerous interpolations. The arrangement of xxx. 25-xxxvi. 17, in the Vatican and Complutensian editions, is very different. The A. V. follows the latter. 9. "The design of this book" (so Ginsburg in Kitto) "is to propound the true nature of wisdom, and to set forth the religious and social duties which she teaches us to follow through all the varied stages and vicissitudes of this life; thus teaching the practical end of man's existence by reviewing life in all its different bearings and aspects." It is impossible, says Mr. Westcott, to make any satisfactory plan of the book in its present shape. The latter part, xlii. 15-l. 21, is distinguished from all that precedes in style and subject; and "the praise of noble men" seems to form a complete whole in itself (xliv.-l. 24). The words of Jerome imply that the original text presented a triple character answering to the three works of Solomon, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles. Eichhorn supposed that the book was made up of three distinct collections which were afterward united: i.-xxiii.; xxiv.-xlii. 14; xlii. 15-l. 24. Bretschneider sets aside this hypothesis, and at the same time one which he had formerly been inclined to adopt, that the recurrence of the same ideas in xxiv. 32 ff.; xxxiii. 16, 17 (xxx.); l. 27, marks the conclusions of three parts. The last five verses of chapter I. (25-29) form a natural conclusion to the book; and the prayer, which forms the last chapter (li.), is wanting in two MSS. 10. The earliest clear coincidence with the contents of the book occurs in the epistle of Barnabas (ch. xix. = Eccles. iv. 31), but the parallelism consists in the thought, and there is no mark of quotation. The parallels which have been discovered in the N. T. are too general to show that they were derived from the written text, and not from popular language. The first distinct quotations occur in Clement of Alexandria; but from the end of the second century the book was much used and cited with respect. Clement (Alex.) speaks of it continually as Scripture, as the work of Solomon. Origen cites passages with the same formula as the canonical books. The other writers of the Alexandrine school follow the same practice. Augustine quotes the book constantly himself as the work of a prophet, the Word of God, "Scripture," but he expressly notices that it was not in the Hebrew Canon. Jerome, in like manner, contrasts the book with the "Canonical Scriptures," as "doubtful," while they are "sure." The book is not quoted by Irenæus, Hippolytus, or Eusebius; and is not contained in the Canon of Melito, Origen, Cyril, Laodicea, Hilary, or Rufinus. It was never included by the Jews among their Scriptures. (ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ; ΚΑΝΟΝ.) 11. But while the book is destitute of canonical authority, it is a most important monument of the religious state of the Jews at the period of its composition. As an expression of Palestinian theology it stands alone; for there is no sufficient reason for assuming Alexandrine interpolations or direct Alexandrine influence. The book marks the growth of that anxious legalism which was conspicuous in the sayings of the later doctors.

Eclipse of the Sun. No historical notice of an eclipse occurs in the Bible, but there are passages in the prophets which contain manifest allusion to this phenomenon (Am. viii. 9; Mic. iii. 6; Zech. xiv. 6; Joel ii. 10, 31; iii. 15). (Moon; SUN.) Some of these notices probably refer to eclipses that occurred about the time of the respective compositions: thus the date of Amos coincides with a total eclipse which occurred February 9, B. C. 784, and was visible at Jerusalem shortly after noon; that of Micah with the eclipse of June 5, B. C. 716. A passing notice in Jer. xv. 9 coincides in date with the eclipse of September 30, B. C. 610, well known from Herodotus's account (i. 74, 103). The DARKNESS that overspread the world at the crucifixion cannot with reason be attributed to an eclipse, as the moon was at the full at the time of the Passover.

Ed (Heb. witness), a word inserted in the A. V. of Josh. xxii. 34, apparently on the authority of a few MSS., and also of the Syriac and Arabic versions, but not existing in the generally received Hebrew Text except in the last clause of the verse, where it is translated "witness."

Edar (Heb. éder = flock, drove), Tow'er of. 1. A place named only in Gen. xxxv. 21. Jacob's first halting-place between Bethlehem and Hebron was "beyond the tower of Edar." According to Jerome it was 1,000 paces (= one mile) from Bethlehem.—2. The "tower of the flock" (margin "Edar") in Mic. iv. 8 = "the stronghold of the daughter of Zion," i. e. of Mount Zion or Jerusalem.

Ed-di'as (1 Esd. ix. 26) = JEZIAH.

Eden (Heb. delight, pleasure, Ges.). 1. The first residence of man. (ADAM; PARADISE.) It would be difficult, in the whole history of opinion, to find any subject which has so invited, and at the same time so completely baffled, conjecture, as the Garden of Eden. In order more clearly to understand the merit of the several theories, it will be necessary to submit to a careful examination the narrative on which they are founded. Omitting those portions of Gen. ii. 8-14 which do not bear upon the geographical position of Eden, the description is as follows (literally translated by Mr. W. A. Wright, the original author of this article):—"And the Lord God planted a garden in Eden eastward . . . . And a river goeth forth from Eden to water the garden; and from thence it is divided and becomes four heads (or arms). The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where is the gold. And the gold of that land is good: there is the bdellium and the onyx stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon; that is it which compasseth the whole land of Cush (A. V. 'Ethiopia'; see margin). And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; that is it which floweth before Assyria. And the fourth river, that is Euphrates." In the eastern portion, then, of the region of Eden was the garden planted. The river which flowed through Eden watered the garden, and thence branched off into four distinct streams. The first problem to be solved, then, is this:—To find a river which, at some stage of its course, is divided into four streams, two of which are the Tigris and Euphrates. The identity of these rivers with the Hiddekel and Phrath (Heb., A. V. "Euphrates") has never been disputed, and no hypothesis which omits them is worthy of consideration. Setting aside minor differences of detail, the theories with regard to the situation of the terrestrial paradise naturally divide themselves into two classes. The first class includes all those which place the garden of Eden below the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris, and interpret the names Pison and Gihon of certain portions of these rivers: the second, those which seek for it in the high table-land of Armenia, the fruitful parent of many noble streams. The old versions supply us with little or no assistance. It would be a hopeless task to attempt to chronicle the opinions of all the commentators upon this question: their name is legion. Philo is the first who ventured upon an allegorical interpretation. He conceived that by paradise is darkly shadowed forth the governing faculty of the soul; that the tree of life signifies religion, whereby the soul is immortalized; and by the faculty of knowing good and evil the middle sense, by which are discerned things contrary to nature. The four rivers he explains of the several virtues of prudence, temperance, courage, and justice; while the main stream of which they are branches is the generic virtue, goodness, which goeth forth from Eden, the wisdom of God. The opinions of Philo would not be so much worthy of consideration, were it not that he has been followed by many of the Fathers. Among the Hebrew traditions enumerated by Jerome is one that paradise was created before the world was formed, and is therefore beyond its limits. Among the literal interpreters there is an infinite diversity of opinions. What is the river which goes forth from Eden to water the garden? is a question which has been often asked, and still waits for a satisfactory answer. That the ocean stream which surrounded the earth was the source from which the four rivers flowed was the opinion of Josephus. It was the Shat-el-Arab, according to those who place the garden of Eden below the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, and their conjecture would deserve consideration were it not that this stream cannot, with any degree of propriety, be said to rise in Eden. By those who refer the position of Eden to the highlands of Armenia, the "river" from which the four streams diverge is conceived to mean "a collection of springs," or a well-watered district. But this signification of the word is wholly without a parallel. Michaelis, Jahn, Bush, &c., make "river" in verse 10 a collective singular = rivers, i. e. the four rivers afterward specified. The latter part of the verse (A. V. "from thence it was parted, and became into four heads") Bush would understand thus: "afterward the rivers were parted (i. e. assigned in geographical reckoning to their particular districts), and became known as four principal rivers." That the Hiddekel is the Tigris, and the Phrath the Euphrates, has never been denied, except by those who assume that the whole narrative is a myth which originated elsewhere, and was adapted by the Hebrews to their own geographical notions. With regard to the Pison, the most ancient and most universally received opinion (Josephus, Eusebius, Jerome, Augustine, &c.) identifies it with the Ganges. But Rashi maintained that the Pison was the Nile. That the Pison was the Indus was an opinion current long before it was revived by Ewald and adopted by Kalisch, Gesenius, Bush, &c. Philostorgius conjectured that it was the Hydaspes. Some have found the Pison in the Naharmalca, one of the artificial canals which formerly joined the Euphrates and Tigris. (CHALDEA.) Even those commentators who agree in placing the terrestrial paradise on the Shat-el-Arab, the stream formed by the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, between Ctesiphon and Apamea, by no means agree in deciding to which of the branches, into which this stream is again divided, the names Pison and Gihon are to be applied. Calvin, Scaliger, &c., conjectured that the Pison was the most easterly of these channels; Huët and Bochart that it was the westernmost. The advocates of the theory that the true position of Eden is to be sought for in the mountains of Armenia (Reland, Calmet, Rosenmüller, Hartmann, &c.) have identified the Pison with the Phasis. Raumer endeavored to prove that it was the Aras or Araxes, which flows into the Caspian

Sea. Colonel Chesney, from the results of extensive observations in Armenia, was "led to infer that the rivers known by the comparatively modern names of Halys and Araxes are those which, in the book of Genesis, have the names of Pison and Gihon; and that the country within the former is the land of Havilah, whilst that which borders upon the latter is the still more remarkable country of Cush." In Genesis the Pison is defined as that which surrounds the whole land of Havilah. It is, then, absolutely necessary to fix the position of Havilah before proceeding to identify the Pison with any particular river. In Gen. ii. 11, 12, it is described as the land where the best gold was found, and which was besides rich in the treasures of "bdellium" and the "onyx" stone. If the Havilah of Gen. ii. be identical with any one of the countries mentioned in Gen. x. 29, xxv. 18, and 1 Sam. xv. 7, we must look for it on the E. or S. of Arabia, and probably not far from the Persian Gulf. That Havilah is that part of India through which the Ganges flows, and, more generally, the eastern region of the earth; that it is to be found in Susiana (Hopkinson), in Ava (Buttmann), or in the Ural region (Raumer), are conclusions necessarily following upon the assumptions with regard to the Pison. Hartmann, Reland, and Rosenmüller are in favor of Colchis, the scene of the legend of the Golden Fleece. For all these hypotheses there is no more support than the merest conjecture. The second river of Paradise presents difficulties not less insurmountable than the Pison. Those who maintained that the Pison was the Ganges held also (with Gesenius, Bush, &c.) that the Gihon was the Nile. The etymology of Gihon seems to indicate that it was a swiftly flowing, impetuous stream. According to Golius, Jichon is the name given to the Oxus, which has, on this account, been assumed by Rosenmüller, Hartmann, and Michaelis to be the Gihon of Scripture. But the Araxes, too, is called by the Persians Jichon ar-Ras, and from this circumstance it has been adopted by Reland, Calmet, and Colonel Chesney as the modern representative of the Gihon. Bochart and Huet contended that it was the easternmost of the channels by which the united streams of the Euphrates and Tigris fall into the Persian Gulf. Calvin considered it to be the most westerly. That it should be the Orontes (Leclerc), the Ganges (Buttmann and Ewald), the Kur, or Cyrus (Link), necessarily followed from the exigencies of the several theories. Rask and Verbrugge are in favor of the Gyndes of the ancients, a tributary of the Tigris. Cush has been connected with Cuth or Cuthah (2 K. xvii. 24). Bochart identified it with Susiana, Link with the country about the Caucasus, and Hartmann with Bactria or Bálkh, the site of Paradise being, in this case, in the celebrated vale of Kashmir. Cush (A. V. "Ethiopia") is generally applied in the Old Testament to the countries S. of the Israelites. It was the southern limit of Egypt (Ez. xxix. 10), and apparently the most western of the provinces over which the rule of Ahasuerus extended, "from India even unto Ethiopia" (Esth. i. 1, viii. 9). Egypt and Cush are associated in the majority of instances in which the word occurs (Ps. lxxviii. 31; Is. xlviii. 1; Jer. xlv. 9, &c.): but in two passages Cush stands in close juxtaposition with Elam (Is. xi. 11), and Persia (Ez. xxxviii. 5). In 2 Chr. xxi. 16, the Arabians are described as dwelling "beside the Cushites" ("near the Ethiopians," A. V.), and both are mentioned in connection with the Philistines. Further, Cush and Seba (Is. xliii. 3), Cush and the Sabeans (Is. xlv. 14) are associated in a manner consonant with the genealogy of the descendants of Ham (Gen. x. 7), in which Seba is the son of Cush. From all these circumstances it is evident that Cush included both ARABIA and the country S. of Egypt on the western coast of the Red Sea. It is possible, also, that the vast desert tracts W. of Egypt were known to the Hebrews as the land of Cush, but of this we have no certain proof. (See CRUSH, ETHIOPIA, and their derivatives.) In the midst of this diversity of opinions, what is the true conclusion at which we arrive? All the theories which have been advanced share the inevitable fate of conclusions which are based upon inadequate premises. The problem may be indeterminate because the data are insufficient. It would scarcely, on any other hypothesis, have admitted of so many apparent solutions. Other methods of meeting the difficulty have been proposed. Some have unhesitatingly pronounced the whole narrative a spurious interpolation of a later age (Granville Penn). But, even admitting this, the words demand explanation. Luther gave it as his opinion that the garden remained under the guardianship of angels till the deluge, and that its site was known to the descendants of Adam; but that by the flood all traces of it were obliterated. But the narrative is so worded as to convey the idea that the countries and rivers spoken of were still existing in the historian's time. It has been suggested that the description of the Garden of Eden is part of an inspired antediluvian document (Morren, Ros. Geog.). The conjecture is incapable of proof or disproof. The effects of the flood in changing the face of countries, and altering the relations of land and water, are too little known at present to allow any inferences to be drawn from them. Meanwhile, as every expression of opinion results in a confession of ignorance, it will be more honest to acknowledge the difficulty than to rest satisfied with a fictitious solution.—2. One of the marts which supplied the luxury of Tyre with richly embroidered stuffs; associated with Haran, Sheba, and Asshur (Ez. xxvii. 23). In 2 K. xix. 12, and Is. xxxvii. 12, "the children of Eden" are mentioned with Gozan, Haran, and Rezeph, as victims of the Assyrian greed of conquest. According to Bochart, who makes this = No. 1, it may be ADDAN, or Addana, which geographers place on the Euphrates. Michaelis is in favor of the modern Aden, in S. W. Arabia, as the Eden of Ezekiel. In the absence of positive evidence, probability seems to point to the N. W. of Mesopotamia as the locality of Eden.—3. "House of Eden" (Am. i. 5, margin Beth-e den = house of pleasure), probably the name of a country residence of the kings of Damascus. Michaelis, misled by an apparent resemblance in name, identified it with El-den, about a day's journey from Baalbek. But Grotius, with greater appearance of probability, pointed to the Paradise of Ptolemy as the locality of Eden. The desolate and uninteresting ruins of old Jusieh, about two and a half miles in circumference, and one hour S. S. E. from Fibleh (Ptr. ii. 331 ff.), are supposed by Robinson (iii. 556) to mark the site of Ptolemy's ancient town of Paradisa. Others have conjectured that Beth-edon is no other than Beit-Jenn (= the house of Paradise), not far to the S. W. of Damascus, on the eastern slope of Hermon, and a short distance from Medjel.

Eden (Heb., see above). 1. A Gershonite Levite, son of Joah, in the days of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12).—2. Also a Levite, contemporary and probably identical with the preceding (2 Chr. xxxi. 15).

Eder (Heb. a flock). 1. A town of Judah in the extreme S., on the borders of Edom (Josh. xv. 21); perhaps = ARAD. Rowlands (in Fbn. under "S. Country") supposes it at Eddeir or Udheirah, an ancient site ten or twelve miles W. of Sebbeh (Masada).—2. A Levite of the family of Merari, in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiii. 23, xxiv. 30).

Edes [ee'deez] (1 Esd. ix. 35) = JADAU.

Edna (Gr. fr. Heb. = pleasure), the wife of Raguel (Tob. vii. 2, 8, 14, 16; x. 12; xi. 1).

Edom (Heb. red), the name given to ESAR, the first-born son of Isaac, and twin brother of Jacob, when he sold his birthright to the latter for a meal of lentile pottage. The peculiar color of the pottage gave rise to the name Edom = red. (Gen. xxv. 29–34). The country which the Lord subsequently gave to Esau was hence called the "field (A. V. "country") of Edom" (Gen. xxxii. 3), or "land of Edom" (xxxvi. 16; Num. xxxiii. 37), or IDUMEA. Probably its physical aspect may have had something to do with this. Edom was previously called Mount Seir. (SEIR, MOUNT.) The original inhabitants of the country were called HORITES. The boundaries of Edom, though not directly, are yet incidentally defined with tolerable distinctness in the Bible. The country lay along the route pursued by the Israelites from the peninsula of Sinai to Kadesh-barnea, and thence back again to Elath (Deut. i. 2, ii. 1–8); that is, along the E. side of the great valley of ARABAH. (WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.) It reached southward as far as Elath, which stood at the northern end of the gulf of Elath, and was the seaport of the Edomites; but it does not seem to have extended farther, as the Israelites on passing Elath struck out eastward into the desert, so as to pass round the land of Edom (Deut. ii. 8). On the N. of Edom lay the territory of Moab, through which the Israelites were also prevented from going, and were therefore compelled to go from Kadesh by the southern extremity of Edom (Judg. xi. 17, 18; 2 K. iii. 6–9). The boundary between Moab and Edom appears to have been the "brook Zered" (Deut. ii. 13, 14, 18), probably the modern Wady el-Ahzy, which still divides the provinces of Kerak (Moab) and Jebel (Gabalene). But Edom was wholly a mountainous country. It only embraced the narrow mountainous tract (about 100 miles long by 20 broad) extending along the eastern side of the Arabah from the northern end of the gulf of Elath to near the southern end of the Dead Sea. The mountain-range of Edom is at present divided into two districts. The northern is called Jebel. It begins at Wady el-Ahzy, which separates it from Kerak, and it terminates at or near Petra. The southern district is called esh-Shérak, a name which, though it resembles, bears no radical relation to the Hebrew Seir. The physical geography of Edom is somewhat peculiar. Along the western base of the mountain-range are low calcareous hills. To these succeed lofty masses of igneous rock, chiefly porphyry, over which lies red and variegated sandstone in irregular ridges and abrupt cliffs, with deep ravines between. The latter strata give the mountains their most striking features and remarkable colors. The average elevation of the summits is about 2,000 feet above the sea. Along the eastern side runs an almost unbroken limestone ridge, a thousand feet or more higher than the other. This ridge sinks down with an easy slope into the plateau of the Arabian desert. (ARABIA.) While Edom is thus wild, rugged, and almost inaccessible, the deep glens and flat terraces along the mountain sides are covered with rich scill, from which trees, shrubs, and flowers now spring up luxuriantly (compare Gen. xxvii. 39). The ancient capital of Edom was BOZRAH (Luseirah), near the northern border (Gen. xxxvi. 33; Is. xxxiv. 6, lxiii. 1; Jer. xlix. 18, 22). But SELA (Petra) appears to have been the principal stronghold in the days of Amaziah (b. c. 838; 2 K. xiv. 7). ELATH and EZION-GEER were the seaports; they were captured by David, and here Solomon equipped his merchant-fleet (2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 K. ix. 26). When the kingdom of Israel began to decline, the EDMITES not only reconquered their lost cities, but made frequent inroads upon southern Palestine (2 Chr. xxviii. 17). During the Captivity they advanced westward, occupied the whole territory of their brethren the Amalekites (Gen. xxxvi. 12; 1 Sam. xv. 1 ff.), and even took possession of many towns in southern Palestine, including Hebron. The name Edom, or rather Idumea, was now given to the country lying between the valley of Arabah and the shores of the Mediterranean. While Idumea thus extended westward, Edom Proper was taken possession of by the Nabatheans (NEBATHI). They were a powerful people, and held a great part of southern Arabia. They took Petra and established themselves there at least three centuries B. C. Leaving off their nomad habits, they settled down amid the mountains of Edom, engaged in commerce, and founded the little kingdom called by Roman writers Arabia Petraea, which embraced nearly the same territory as the ancient Edom. Some of its monarchs took the name ARETAS. The kingdom was finally subdued by the Romans A. D. 105. Under the Romans the transport trade increased, and roads were constructed. To the Nabatheans Petra owes those great monuments which are still the wonder of the world. Early in the Christian era Edom Proper was included by geographers in Palestine, but in the fifth century a new division was made of the whole country into Palastina Prima, Secunda, and Tertia (= 1st, 2d, and 3d Palestine). The last embraced Edom and some neighboring provinces, and when it became an ecclesiastical division its metropolis was Petra. In the seventh century the Mohammedan conquest gave a death-blow to the commerce and prosperity of Edom. The great cities fell to ruin, and the country became, as it is still, a desert (Ez. xxxv. 3, 4, 7, 9, 14). On a commanding height about twelve miles N. of Petra the Crusaders built a strong fortress called Mons Regalis, now Shébek. From that time until the present century Edom remained an unknown land. In 1812 Burckhardt passed through it, and discovered the wonderful ruins of Petra. In 1828 Laborde visited Petra. Many have since followed the first explorers.

Edom-ites = the descendants of ESAR, or EDM. They soon became a numerous and powerful nation (Gen. xxxvi. 1 ff.; AHOLIBAMAT, &c.). Their first form of government appears to have resembled that of the modern Bedouins; each tribe or clan having a petty chief or sheikh ("DREK," A. V.). The Horites, who inhabited Mount Seir from an early period, and among whom the Edomites still lived, had their sheikhs also. At a later period, probably when the Edomites began a war of extermination against the Horites, they felt the necessity of united action under one competent leader, and then a king was chosen. Against the Horites the children of Edom were completely successful. Having either exterminated or expelled them, they occupied their whole country (Deut. ii. 12). A statement in Gen. xxxvi. 31, and 1 Chr. i. 43, serves to fix the period of the dynasty of the eight kings. They "reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel;" i. e. (so Porter) before the time of Moses, who may be regarded as the first virtual king of Israel (compare Deut. xxxiii. 6; Ex. xviii. 16-19). Esau's bitter hatred to his brother Jacob for fraudulently obtaining his blessing appears to have been inherited by his latest posterity. The Edomites, prepared to resist by force any intrusion, peremptorily refused to permit the Israelites to pass through their land (Num. xx. 14-21). For 400 years we hear no more of the Edomites. They were then attacked and defeated by Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 47). Some forty years later David overthrew their army in the "Valley of Salt," and his general, Joab, following up the victory, destroyed nearly the whole male population (1 K. xi. 15, 16), and placed Jewish garrisons in all the strongholds of Edom (2 Sam. viii. 13, 14). HADAD 4, a member of the royal family of Edom, made his escape with a few followers to Egypt, where he was kindly received by Pharaoh. After the death of David he returned, and tried (Jos. viii. 7, § 6) to excite his countrymen to rebellion against Israel, but failing in the attempt he went on to Syria, where he became one of Solomon's greatest enemies (1 K. xi. 14-22). The Edomites continued subject to Israel (1 K. xxii. 47; 2 K. iii. 9) till the reign of Jehoshaphat (a. c. 914), when they attempted to invade Israel in conjunction with Ammon and Moab, but were miraculously destroyed in the valley of Berachah (2 Chr. xx. 22 ff.). A few years later they revolted against Jehoram, elected a king, and for half a century retained their independence (xxi. 8 ff.). They were then attacked by Amaziah, and Sela, their great stronghold, was captured (2 K. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xxv. 11, 12). Yet the Israelites were never able again completely to subdue them (xxviii. 17). When Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem the Edomites joined him, and took an active part in the plunder of the city and slaughter of the Jews. Their cruelty at that time seems to be specially referred to in Ps. cxxxvii. On account of these acts of cruelty committed upon the Jews in the day of their calamity, the Edomites were fearfully denounced by the later prophets (Is. xxxiv. 5-8, lxiii. 1-4; Jer. xlix. 17; Lam. iv. 21; Ez. xxv. 12 ff., xxxv. 3 ff.; Am. i. 11, 12; Ob. 1 ff.). On the conquest of Judah, the Edomites, probably in reward for their services during the war, were permitted to settle in southern Palestine, and the whole plateau between it and Egypt; but they were about the same time driven out of Edom Proper by the Nabatheans. For more than four centuries they continued to prosper. But during the warlike rule of the Maccabees they were again completely subdued, and even forced by John Hyrcanus to conform to Jewish laws and rites, and submit to the government of Jewish prefects. The Edomites were now incorporated with the Jewish nation, and the whole province was often termed by Greek and Roman writers IDUMEA. One of the prefects, Antipater, an Idumean by birth, became, through the friendship of the Roman emperor, procurator of Judea, and his son was King HEROD the Great. Immediately before the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, 20,000 Idumeans were admitted to the Holy City, which they filled with robbery and bloodshed. From this time the Edomites, as a separate people, disappear from the page of history. The character of the Edomites was drawn by Isaac in his prophetic blessing to Esau—"By thy sword shalt thou live" (Gen. xxvii. 40). Little is known of their religion; but that little shows them to have been idolaters (2 Chr. xxv. 14, 15, 20). Josephus (xv. 7, § 9) refers to both the idols and priests of the Idumeans. The habits of the Idumeans were singular. The Horites, their predecessors in Mount Seir, were, as their name implies, troglodytes, or dwellers in caves; and the Edomites seem to have adopted their dwellings as well as their country (Jer. xlix. 16; Ob. 3, 4). Everywhere we meet with caves and grottoes hewn in the soft sandstone strata. Those at Petra are well known. The nature of the climate, the dryness of the soil, and their great size, render them healthy, pleasant, and commodious habitations, while their security made them specially suitable to a country exposed in every age to incessant attacks of robbers.

Edre-i (Heb. strong, mighty, Ges.; corn-district, plantation, Fül.). 1. One of the two capital cities of BASHAN (Num. xxi. 33; Deut. i. 4, iii. 10; Josh. xii. 4). In Scripture it is only mentioned in connection with the victory gained by the Israelites over the Amorites under Og their king, and the territory thus acquired. Probably the Israelites did not long retain it. The ruins of this ancient city, still bearing the name Edr'a (so Porter), stand on a rocky promontory which projects from the S. W. corner of the Lejah. (ARGON.) The site is a strange one—without water (except in large subterranean cisterns), without access, except over rocks and through defiles all but impracticable, yet in the midst of a fertile plain. The ruins are nearly three miles in circumference, and have a strange, wild look, rising up in black shattered masses from the midst of a wilderness of black rocks. A number of the old houses still remain; they are low, massive, and gloomy, and some of them are half buried beneath heaps of rubbish. In these the present inhabitants (about fifty families in 1854) reside. The monuments show it must have been an important town under the Romans. The identity of this site with the Edrei of Scripture has been questioned by many writers (Roland, Ritter, Burckhardt, &c.), who follow Eusebius, and place the capital of Bashan at the modern Der'a, about fourteen miles further S. in the open plain.—2. A town of northern Palestine, allotted to the tribe of Naphtali, and situated near Kedesh (Josh. xix. 37). About two miles S. of Kedesh is a conical rocky hill called Tell Khur-aiish = hill of the ruin. It is evidently an old site, and Porter supposes it may be that of Edrei. Robinson (iii. 365 f.) regards this as the site of HAZOR 1.

Ed-na-tion. Although nothing is more carefully inculcated in the Law than the duty of parents to teach their CHILDREN its precepts and principles (Ex. xii. 26, xiii. 8, 14; Deut. iv. 5, 9, 10, vi. 2, 7, 20, &c.), yet there is little trace among the Hebrews in earlier times of education in any other subjects. The wisdom therefore and instruction, of which so much is said in the Book of Proverbs, are to be understood chiefly of moral and religious discipline, imparted, according to the direction of the Law, by the teaching and under the example of parents (Prov. i. 2, 8, ii. 2, 10, iv. 1, 7, 20, viii. 1, ix. 1, 10, xii. 1, xvi. 22, xvii. 24, xxxi.). Exceptions to this statement may perhaps be found in the instances of Moses himself, who was brought up in all Egyptian learning (Acts vii. 22); of the writer of the book of Job, who was evidently well versed in natural history and in the astronomy of the day (Job xxxviii. 31, xxxix., xl., xli.); of Daniel and his companions in captivity (Dan. i. 4, 17); and above all, in the intellectual gifts and acquirements of Solomon, which were even more renowned than his political greatness (1 K. iv. 29-34, x. 1-9; 2 Chr. ix. 1-8), and the memory of which has, with much exaggeration, been widely preserved in Oriental tradition. The commands to write the precepts of the Law upon the posts of the house and on the gates (Deut. vi. 9, xi. 20), and upon great stones at Mount Ebal "very plainly" (xxvii. 2-8), presuppose a general knowledge of reading and writing communicated by parents to children. In later times the prophecies, and comments on them as well as on the earlier Scriptures, together with other subjects, were studied. Jerome adds that Jewish children were taught to say by heart the genealogies. Parents were required to teach their children some trade. (HANDICRAFT.) Previous to the Captivity, the chief depositaries of learning were the schools or colleges, from which in most cases (see Am. vii. 14) proceeded that succession of public teachers (PROPHET) who at various times endeavored to reform the moral and religious conduct of both rulers and people. Besides the prophetic schools, instruction was given by the priests in the Temple and elsewhere, but their subjects were doubtless exclusively concerned with religion and worship (Lev. x. 11; Ez. xlv. 23, 24; 1 Chr. xxv. 7, 8; Mal. ii. 7). From the time of the settlement in Canaan there must have been among the Jews persons skilled in writing and in accounts. Perhaps the neighborhood of the tribe of Zebulun to the commercial district of Phenicia may have been the occasion of their reputation in this respect (Judg. v. 14). The municipal officers of the kingdom, especially in the time of Solomon, must have required a staff of well-educated persons under the RECORDER or historiographer, who compiled memorials of the reign (2 Sam. viii. 16, xx. 24; 2 K. xviii. 18; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 8). (SCRIBES.) To the schools of the Prophets succeeded, after the Captivity, the synagogues, which were either themselves used as schools or had places near them for that purpose. (RABBI; SYNAGOGUE.) A school or teacher was required in the Mishna for every twenty-five children; when a community had only forty children they might have a master and an assistant. The age for a boy to go to school was six years; before that the father must instruct his son. Besides these elementary schools, there were colleges, at first confined to Jerusalem, but gradually established in all the countries where the Jews resided. The topics discussed in the colleges, comprehending all the sciences of that time, are preserved in the Talmud (Ginsburg in Kitto). After the destruction of Jerusalem, colleges were maintained for a long time at Japhne in Galilee, at Lydda, at Tiberias, the most famous of all, and Sepphoris. According to the principles laid down in the Mishna, boys at five years of age were to begin the Scriptures, at ten the Mishna, at thirteen they became subject to the whole law, at fifteen they entered the Gemara. Teachers were treated with great respect, and both pupils and teachers were exhorted to respect each other. Physical science formed part of the course of instruction. Unmarried men and women were not allowed to be teachers of boys. In the schools the Rabbins sat on raised seats, and the scholars, according to their age, sat on benches below or on the ground. Of female education we have little account in Scripture. Needlework formed a large, but by no means the only, subject of instruction imparted to females, whose position in society and in the household must by no means be considered as represented in modern Oriental usage (see Prov. xxxi. 16, 26; Sus. 3; Lk. viii. 2, 3, x. 39; Acts xiii. 50; 2 Tim. i. 5). (DRESS; WOMEN.) Among the Mohammedans, education, even of boys, is of a most elementary kind, and of girls still more limited. In one respect it may be considered as the likeness or the caricature of the Jewish system, viz. that besides the most common rules of arithmetic, the Koran is made the staple, if not the only, subject of instruction.

* Egg. BIRD; FOOD; HEN.

Eg'lah (Heb. a heifer), one of David's wives during his reign in Hebron, and mother of his son Ithream (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chr. iii. 3). According to the ancient Hebrew tradition, she was MICHAL.

Eg'la-lam (Heb. two ponds), a place named only in Is. xv. 8, apparently one of the most remote points on the boundary of Moab; perhaps = EN-EGLAIM.

Eg'lon (Heb. vituline, of a calf, Ges.), a king of the Moabites (Judg. iii. 12 ff.), who, aided by the Ammonites and the Amalekites, crossed the Jordan and took "the city of palm-trees" (JERICHO). Here he built himself a palace (so Jos. v. 4, § 1 ff.), and continued for eighteen years to oppress the children of Israel, who paid him tribute. The circumstances of his death are somewhat differently given in Judges and in Josephus. In Judges the Israelites send a present by EHUD (iii. 15); in Josephus Ehud wins his favor by repeated presents of his own. In Judges we have two scenes, the offering of the present and the death scene (18, 19); in Josephus there is but one scene. In Judges the place seems to change from the reception-room into the "summer-parlor," where Ehud found him upon his return (comp. 18, 20). In Josephus the entire action takes place in the summer-parlor. The obesity of Eglon, and the consequent impossibility of recovering the dagger, are not mentioned by Josephus. After this desperate achievement, Ehud repaired to Seirath in the mountains of Ephraim (iii. 26, 27). To this wild central region, commanding, as it did, the plains E. and W., he summoned the Israelites by sound of "trumpet" (CORNET). Descending from the hills, they fell upon the Moabites, killed the greater number at once, seized the fords of Jordan, and not one of the fugitives escaped.

Eg'lon (Heb., see above), a town of Judah in the low country (Josh. xv. 39). During the struggles of the conquest, Eglon was one of a confederacy of five Amorite towns which under Jerusalem (ADON-IZEDEC) attempted resistance, by attacking Gibeon after the treaty of the latter with Israel (Josh. x.). It was destroyed by Joshua (x. 34 ff., xii. 12). The name doubtless survives in the modern 'Ajlan, a shapeless mass of ruins, about ten miles from Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis) and fourteen from Gaza, on the S. of the great maritime plain.

Egypt [ee'jipt] (L. Aegyptus; said to have been named from an ancient king of the country), a country occupying the northeastern angle of Africa, and lying between north latitude 31° 37' and 24° 1', and east longitude 27° 13' and 34° 12'. Its limits appear always to have been very nearly the same. In Ezekiel (xxix. 10, xxx. 6, margin of both), the whole country is spoken of as extending from MIGDOL to SYENE, which indicates the same limits to the E. and S. as at present.—Names. The common name of Egypt in the Bible is "MIZRAIM" (Heb.

Misrayim, generally translated "Egypt" in A. V., or more fully, "the land of Mizraim," A. V. "the land of Egypt." In form Misrayim is a dual, and accordingly it is generally joined with a plural verb. When, therefore, in Gen. x. 6, Mizraim is mentioned as a son of Ham, we must not conclude (so Mr. R. S. Poole, the author of this article), that any thing more is meant than that Egypt was colonized by descendants of Ham. The dual number doubtless indicates the natural division of the country into an upper and lower region. The Heb. singular Mûsôr also occurs, and some suppose that it indicates Lower Egypt, but there is no sure ground for this assertion. The Arabic name of Egypt, Misr, signifies red mud. Egypt is also called in the Bible "the land of Ham" (Ps. cv. 23, 27; compare lxxviii. 51), and "Rahab;" both these appear to be poetical appellations. The common ancient Egyptian name of the country is written in hieroglyphics Kem, which was perhaps pronounced Chem; the demotic form is Kemee. This name signifies, alike in the ancient language and in Coptic, black, and may be supposed to have been given to the land on account of the blackness of its alluvial soil. We may reasonably conjecture that Kem is the Egyptian equivalent of Ham, and also of Mazar, these two words being similar or even the same in sense. Under the Pharaohs Egypt was divided into Upper and Lower, "the two regions" Ta-tee? called respectively "the Southern Region" Ta-ree, and the "Northern Region" Ta-meheet. There were different crowns for the two regions, that of Upper Egypt being white, that of Lower Egypt red, the two together composing the so-called pschent. The sovereign had a special title as ruler of each region: of Upper Egypt he was Suten = king, and of Lower Egypt Shehi = bee, the two combined forming the common title Suten-Shehi. The initial sign of the former name is a bent reed (compare 2 K. xviii. 21; Is. xxxvi. 6; Ez. xxix. 6). In subsequent times this double division obtained. In the time of the Greeks and Romans, Upper Egypt was divided into the Heptanomis and the Thebais, making altogether three provinces, but the division of the whole country into two was even then the most usual.—Superficies. Egypt has a superficies of about 9,582 square geographical miles of soil, which the Nile either does or can water and fertilize. This computation includes the river and lakes as well as sandy tracts which can be inundated; but the whole space either cultivated or fit for cultivation is no more than about 5,626 square miles. Anciently 2,735 square miles more may have been cultivated, and now it would be possible at once to reclaim about 1,295 square miles. The chief differences in the character of the surface in the times B. C. were that the long valley through which flowed the canal between the Nile and the Red Sea was then cultivated (GOSHEN), and that the Gulf of Suez extended much further N. than at present.—Ancient Cities. (ALEXANDRIA; HANES; MEMPHIS; ON; PI-BESETH; PITHOM; RAMESES; SIN; SYENE; TAHFANES; THEBES; ZOAN.)—Nomes. From a remote period Egypt was divided into Nomes Hespu, singular Hesp, each of which had its special objects of worship. They are said to have been first thirty-six in number. Ptolemy enumerates forty-four; Pliny, forty-six; afterward they were further increased. There is no distinct reference to them in the Bible.—General appearance, Climate, &c. The general appearance of the country cannot have greatly changed since the days of Moses. The Delta was always a vast level plain, although of old more perfectly watered than now by the branches of the Nile and numerous canals, while the narrow valley of Upper Egypt must have suffered still less alteration. Anciently, however, the rushes must have been abundant; whereas now they have almost disappeared, except in the lakes. The whole country is remarkable for its extreme fertility, which especially strikes the beholder when the rich green of the fields is contrasted with the utterly bare yellow mountains, or the sand strewn rocky desert on either side. The climate is equable and healthy. Rain is not very unfrequent on the northern coast, but inland very rare. Cultivation nowhere depends upon it. The absence of rain is mentioned in Deut. xi. 10, 11, as rendering artificial irrigation necessary, unlike the case of Palestine, and in Zech. xiv. 18 as peculiar to the country. Egypt has been visited in all ages by severe pestilences, but it cannot be determined that any of those of ancient times were of the character of the modern plague. (MEDICINE; PLAGUES, THE TEX.) Famines are frequent, and one in the middle ages, in the time of the Fâtîmee Khalefeh El-Mustansir-billah, seems to have been even more severe than that of Joseph. (FAMINE.)—Geology. The fertile alluvial plain of the Delta (between the ancient Pelusiac and Canopic mouths of the Nile), and the narrow winding valley of Upper Egypt (which is seldom more than twelve miles across), are bounded by rocky deserts covered or strewn with sand. On either side of the plain they are low, but they overlook the valley, above which they rise so steeply as from the river to present the aspect of cliffs. The formation is limestone as far as the little above Thebes, where sandstone begins. The First Cataract, the southern limit of Egypt, is caused by granite and other primitive rocks, which rise through the sandstone and obstruct the river's bed. Limestone, sandstone, and granite were obtained from quarries near the river; basalt, breccia, and porphyry from others in the eastern desert, between the Thebais and the Red Sea. An important geological change has in the course of centuries raised the country near the head of the Gulf of Suez, and depressed that on the northern side of the isthmus. Since the Christian era the head of the gulf has retired southward (Is. xi. 15, xix. 5).—The Nile. The inundation of the Nile fertilizes and sustains the country, and makes the river its chief blessing; a very low inundation or failure of rising being the cause of famine. The Nile was on this account anciently worshipped. The rise begins in Egypt about the summer solstice, and the inundation commences about two months later. The greatest height is attained about or somewhat after the autumnal equinox. The inundation lasts about three months.—Cultivation, Agriculture, &c. The ancient prosperity of Egypt is attested by the Bible as well as by the numerous monuments of the country. As early as the age of the Great Pyramid it must have been densely populated. The contrast of the present state of Egypt to its former prosperity is more to be ascribed to political than to physical causes. Egypt has lost all strength and energy. It is naturally an agricultural country. As far back as the days of Abraham, we find that, when the produce failed in Palestine, Egypt was the natural resource. In the time of Joseph it was evidently the granary, at least during famines, of the nations around. The inundation, as taking the place of rain, has always rendered the system of agriculture peculiar; and the artificial irrigation during the time of low Nile is necessarily on the same principle. Watering with the foot (Deut. xi. 10, 11) may refer to some mode of irrigation by a machine, but the monuments do not afford a representation of it. (AGRICULTURE.) That now called the shádoof is depicted, and seems to have been the common means of artificial irrigation. (CHALDEA.) There are detailed pictures of breaking up the earth, or ploughing, sowing, harvest, threshing, and storing the wheat in granaries. The processes of agriculture began as soon as the water of the inundation had sunk into the soil, about a month after the autumnal equinox, and the harvest-time was about and soon after the vernal equinox (Ex. ix. 31, 32). Vines were extensively cultivated. Of other fruit-trees, the date-palm was the most common and valuable. The gardens resembled the fields, being watered in the same manner by irrigation. On the tenure of land much light is thrown by the history of JOSEPH. Before the famine each city and large village had its field (Gen. xli. 48); but Joseph gained for Pharaoh all the land, except that of the priests, in exchange for food, and required for the right thus obtained a fifth of the produce, which became a law (xlvi. 20-26). The evidence of the monuments, though not very explicit, seems to show that this law was ever afterward in force under the Pharaohs. The great lakes in the N. of Egypt were anciently of high importance, especially for their fisheries and the growth of the papyrus. The canals are now far less numerous than of old, and many of them are choked and comparatively useless.—Botany. The cultivable land of Egypt consists almost wholly of fields, in which are very few trees. There are no forests and few groves, except of date-palms (PALM-TREE), and in Lower Egypt a few of orange and lemon-trees. There are also sycamores, mulberry-trees and acacias, either planted on the sides of roads or standing singly in the fields. The Theban palm grows in the Thebais, generally in clumps. These were all, except perhaps the mulberry-tree, of old common in the country. The chief fruits are the date, grape, fig, sycamore-fig, pomegranate, banana, many kinds of melons, and the olive; and there are many others less common or important. These were also of old produced in the country. The vegetables are of many kinds and excellent, and form the chief food of the common people (Num. xi. 4, 5). The most important field-produce in ancient times was wheat; after it must be placed barley, millet, flax, and among the vegetables, lentils, peas, and beans. (AGRICULTURE; FOOD; GARDEN.) It is clear from the evidence of the monuments and of ancient writers that, of old, reeds were far more common in Egypt than now. The byblus or papyrus (REED 2) is almost or quite unknown. Anciently it was a common and most important plant: bcats were made of its stalks, and of their thin leaves the famous paper was manufactured. The lotus was anciently the favorite flower, and at feasts it took the place of the rose among the Greeks and Arabs: it is now very rare.—Zoology. Of old Egypt was far more a pastoral country than at present. The neat cattle are still excellent, but lean kine are more common among them than they seem to have been in the days of Joseph's Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 19). Sheep and goats have always been numerous. Anciently swine were kept, but not in great numbers; now there are none, or scarcely any. Under the Pharaohs the horses of the country were in repute among the neighboring nations, who purchased them as well as chariots out of Egypt. Asses were anciently numerous: the breed at the present time is excellent. Dogs were formerly more prized than now, for being held by most of the Muslims to be extremely unclean, they are only used to watch the houses in the villages. The camel has nowhere been found mentioned in the inscriptions of Egypt, or represented on the monuments. Probably camels were not kept in Egypt, but only on the frontier. The deserts have always abounded in wild animals, especially of the canine and antelope kinds. Anciently the hippopotamus (BEHEMOTH) was found in the Egyptian Nile, and hunted. Now, this animal is rarely seen even in Lower Nubia. The elephant may have been, in the remotest historical period, an inhabitant of Egypt, and, as a land animal, has been driven further S. than the hippopotamus. Bats abound in the temples and tombs. The birds of Egypt are not remarkable for beauty of plumage: in so open a country this is natural. Birds of prey are numerous, but the most common are scavengers, as vultures and the kite. Both wading and web-footed birds abound on the islands and sandbanks of the river, and in the sides of the mountains which approach or touch the stream. Among the reptiles, the crocodile (DRAGON 2; LEVIATHAN) must be especially mentioned. Frogs are very numerous in Egypt, and their loud and constant croaking in the autumn makes it not difficult to picture the Plague of Frogs. Serpents and snakes are also common, but the more venomous have their home, like the scorpion, in the desert (compare Deut. viii. 15). The Nile and lakes have an abundance of fish. Among the insects the locusts must be mentioned, which sometimes come upon the cultivated land in a cloud. As to the lice and flies, they are still plagues of Egypt. (PLAGUES, THE TEN.)—Ancient Inhabitants. The old inhabitants of Egypt appear from their monuments and the testimony of ancient writers to have occupied in race a place between the Nigritians and the Caucasians. In the diminution of the Nigritian characteristics as well as in regard to DRESS, manners, and character, the influence of the Arab settlers (ARABIA) is apparent. The ancient Egyptians were very religious and contemplative, but given to base superstition, patriotic, respectful to women, hospitable, generally frugal, but at times luxurious, very sensual, lying, thievish, treacherous, and cringing, and intensely prejudiced, through pride of race, against strangers, although kind to them. This is very much the character of the modern inhabitants, except that Mohammedanism has taken away the respect for women.—Language. The ancient Egyptian language, from the earliest period at which it is known to us, is an agglutinate monosyllabic form of speech. It is expressed by the signs which we call hieroglyphics. The character of the language is compound: it consists of elements resembling those of the Nigritian languages and the Chinese language on the one hand, and those of the SEMITIC LANGUAGES on the other. As early as the age of the twenty-sixth dynasty a vulgar dialect was expressed in the demotic or enchorial writing. This dialect forms the link connecting the old language with the Coptic, which does not very greatly differ from the monumental language (the sacred dialect), except in the presence of many Greek words. The key to the ancient Egyptian language is the celebrated Rosetta stone, a slab of black marble, found by the French in 1799 near the mouth of the Rosetta branch of the Nile, and now in the British Museum. It contains a decree, written in sacred, enchorial, and Greek characters, respecting the coronation of PTOLEMY V. EPIPHANES.—Religion. The basis of the religion was Nigritian fetishism, the lowest kind of nature-worship, differing in different parts of the country, and hence obviously indigenous. On this were engrafted, first, cosmic worship, mixed up with traces of primeval revelation, as in Babylonia; and then, a system of personifications of moral and intellectual abstractions. (IDOLATRY.) There were three orders of gods—the eight great gods (AMON), the twelve lesser, and the Osirian group, comprehending Osiris, his sister and wife Isis, their son Horus, &c. They were represented in human forms, sometimes having the heads of animals sacred to them, or bearing on their heads cosmic or other objects of worship. Osiris, the personification of moral good, was the most remarkable of these gods. Typhon was his adversary. The fetishism included, besides the worship of animals, that of trees, rivers, and hills. Each of these creatures or objects was appropriated to a divinity. There was no prominent hero-worship, although deceased kings and other individuals often received divine honors. Sacrifices of animals, and offerings of food, and libations of wine, oil, &c., were made. The great doctrines of the immortality of the soul, man's responsibility, and future rewards and punishments, were taught, also the transmigration of the soul. Among the rites, circumcision is the most remarkable: it is as old as the time of the fourth dynasty. The Israelites in Egypt appear during the oppression, for the most part, to have adopted the Egyptian religion (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ez. xx. 7, 8). The golden CALF, or rather steer, was probably taken from the bull Apis, certainly from one of the sacred bulls. REMPHAN and Chiun were foreign divinities adopted into the Egyptian Pantheon. ASITORETH was worshipped at Memphis. Doubtless this worship was introduced by the Phenician Shepherds.—Laws. We have no complete account of the laws of the ancient Egyptians either in their own records or in works of ancient writers. The paintings and sculptures of the monuments indicate a very high degree of personal safety, showing us that the people of all ranks commonly went unarmed, and without military protection. Capital punishment appears to have been almost restricted, in practice, to murder. Crimes of violence were more severely treated than offences against religion and morals. Popular feeling seems to have taken the duties of the judge upon itself in the case of impiety alone (Ex. viii. 26).—Government. The government was monarchical, but not of an absolute character. The sovereign was not superior to the laws, and the priests had the power to check the undue exercise of his authority. Nomes and districts were governed by officers whom the Greeks called nomarchs and toparchs. There seems to have been no hereditary aristocracy, except perhaps at the earliest period.—Foreign Policy. The foreign policy of the Egyptians must be regarded in its relation to the admission of foreigners into Egypt, and to the treatment of tributary and allied nations. In the former aspect it was characterized by an exclusiveness which sprang from a national hatred of the yellow and white races, and was maintained by the wisdom of preserving the institutions of the country from the influence of the pirates of the Mediterranean and the Indian Ocean, and the robbers of the deserts. Hence the jealous exclusion of the Greeks from the northern ports until Naucratis was opened to them, and hence, too, the restriction of Shemite settlers in earlier times to the land of Goshen, scarcely regarded as part of Egypt. The general policy of the Egyptians toward their eastern tributaries seems to have been marked by great moderation. The Pharaohs intermarried with them, and neither forced upon them Egyptian garrisons, except in some important positions, nor attempted those deportations that are so marked a feature of Asiatic policy. In the case of those nations which never attacked them, they do not appear to have even exacted tribute. So long as their general supremacy was uncontested, they would not be unwise enough to make favorable or neutral powers their enemies. Of their relation to the Israelites we have for the earlier part of this period no direct information. The explicit account of the later part is fully consistent with the general policy of the Pharaohs. SHISHAK and ZERAH are the only exceptions in a series of friendly kings.—With respect to the African nations a different policy appears to have been pursued. The Rebu (Lebu) or LUBIM, to the W. of Egypt, on the N. coast, were reduced to subjection, and probably employed, like the Shayretana or Cherethim (PELETHITES) as mercenaries. Ethiopia was made a purely Egyptian province, ruled by a viceroy, "the Prince of Kesh (Cush)," and the assimilation was so complete that Ethiopian sovereigns seem to have been received by the Egyptians as native rulers. Further S., the negroes were subject to predatory attacks like the slave-hunts of modern times.—Army. There are some notices of the Egyptian army in the O. T. They show, like the monuments, that its most important branch was the chariot-force. The Pharaoh of the Exodus led 600 chosen chariots besides his whole chariot-force in pursuit of the Israelites. The warriors fighting in chariots are probably the "horsemen" mentioned in the relation of this event and elsewhere, for in Egyptian they are called the "horse" or "cavalry." We have no subsequent indication in the Bible of the constitution of an Egyptian army until the time of the 22d dynasty, when we find that Shishak's invading force was partly composed of foreigners; whether mercenaries or allies, cannot as yet be positively determined, although the monuments make it most probable that they were of the former character. The army of Necho, defeated at Carchemish, seems to have been similarly composed, although it probably contained Greek mercenaries, who soon afterward became the most important foreign element in the Egyptian forces. (ARMS; ARMY; CHARIOT; ENSIGN.)—Domestic Life. The sculptures and paintings of the tombs give us a very full insight into the domestic life of the ancient Egyptians, as may be seen in Sir G. Wilkinson's great work. (BEARD; BREAD; DRESS; FOOD; GATE; HAIR; HEAD-DRESS; HOUSE; MEALS, &c.) What most strikes us in their manners is the high position occupied by women, and the entire absence of the harem system of seclusion. MARRIAGE appears to have been universal, at least with the richer class; and if polygamy were tolerated it was rarely practised. Concubinage (CONCUBINE) was allowed, the concubines taking the place of inferior wives. There were no castes (i. e. civil, religious, military, &c. functions were not, as in India, necessarily hereditary), although great classes were very distinct, especially the priests, soldiers, artisans, and herdsmen, with laborers. The occupations of the higher class were the superintendence of their fields and gardens; their diversions, HUNTING and FISHING. The tending of cattle was left to the most despised of the lower class. (HERD; SHEPHERD.) The Egyptian feasts, and the dances, music, and feats which accompanied them, for the diversion of the guests, as well as the common games, were probably introduced among the Hebrews in the most luxurious days of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. (BANQUETS; BELLS; CORNET; CYMBAL; DANCE; GAMES; HARP; PIPE; TIMBREL, &c.) The account of the noontide dinner of Joseph (Gen. xliii. 16, 31-34) agrees with the representations of the monuments. The funeral ceremonies (BURIAL; EMBALMING) were far more important than any events of the Egyptian life, as the tomb was regarded as the only true home.—Literature and Art. The Egyptians were a very literary people, and time has preserved to us, besides the inscriptions of their tombs and temples, many papyri, of a religious or historical character, and one tale. They bear no resemblance to the books of the O. T., except such as arises from their sometimes enforcing moral truths in a manner not wholly different from that of Proverbs. The moral and religious system is, however, essentially different in its principles and their application. In science, Egyptian influence may be distinctly traced in the Pentateuch. Moses was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts vii. 22), and probably derived from them the astronomical knowledge which was necessary for the calendar. (ASTRONOMY; CHRONOLOGY.) The Egyptians excelled in geometry and mechanics. (ARCH, &c.) They attained a high proficiency in MEDICINE and surgery. Anatomy was practised from the earliest ages. The wonderful remains of MEMPHIS, THEBES, &c., show the attainments of the Egyptians in the arts of architecture, sculpture, and painting.—Magicians. We find frequent reference in the Bible to the magicians of Egypt (Gen. xli. 8; Ex. vii. 11, &c.). (DIVINATION; MAGIC.)—Industrial Arts. The industrial arts held an important place in the occupations of the Egyptians. The workers in fine FLAX and the weavers of white LINEN are mentioned in a manner that shows they were among the chief contributors to the riches of the country (Is. xix. 9). The fine linen of Egypt found its way to Palestine (Prov. vii. 16). POTTERY was a great branch of the native manufactures, and appears to have furnished employment to the Hebrews during the bondage (Ps. lxxxi. 6, lxxviii. 13; compare Ex. i. 14). (BASKET; BELLows; BRICK; CART; GLASS; HANDICRAFT, &c.)—Festivals. The religious festivals were numerous, and some of them were, in the days of Herodotus, kept with great merry-making and license. The feast which the Israelites celebrated when Aaron had made the golden calf seems to have been very much of the same character. (IDOL; IDOLATRY.)—Manners of Modern Inhabitants. The manners of the modern inhabitants are more similar to those of the ancient Hebrews, on account of Arab influence, than were the manners of their predecessors (see above; also ARABIA).—CHRONOLOGY AND HISTORY.—The subject may be divided into three main branches, technical chronology, historical chronology, and history:—1. Technical Chronology. That the Egyptians used various periods of time, and made astronomical observations from a remote age, is equally attested by ancient writers, and by their monuments. There appear to have been at least three years in use with the Egyptians before the Roman domination, the Vague Year, the Tropical Year, and the Sothic Year; but it is not probable that more than two of these were employed at the same time. The Vague Year contained 365 days without any additional fraction, and therefore passed through all the seasons in about 1,500 years. It was used for both civil and religious purposes. The Vague Year was divided into twelve months, each of thirty days, with five additional days, after the twelfth. The months were assigned to three seasons, each comprising four months, called respectively the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th of those seasons. The names by which the Egyptian months are commonly known, Thoth, Paophi, &c., are taken from the divinities to which they were sacred. The seasons are called, according to Mr. Poole's rendering, those of Vegetation, Manifestation, and the Waters or the Inundation: the exact meaning of their names has, however, been much disputed. They evidently refer to the phenomena of a Tropical Year, and such a year we must therefore conclude the Egyptians to have had, at least in a remote period of their history. M. Brugsch in his work on the Egyptian year (Berlin and Paris, 1856) makes the first four months, not, like most Egyptologists, of Vegetation, but of Inundation; the second four, not of Manifestation or Harvest, but of Winter; the third four, not of Inundation, but of Summer. He makes but two seasons of six months each, Summer and Winter, the first half of the period of Inundation, with which he begins the year, belonging to Summer, and the second half to Winter (B. S. xiv. 644 ff.). The Sothic Year was a supposed sidereal year of 365 $\frac{1}{4}$  days, commencing with the so-called heliacal rising of Sothis (= Sirius). The Vague Year, having no intercalation, constantly retreated through the Sothic Year, until a period of 1,461 years of the former kind, and 1,460 of the latter had elapsed, from one coincidence of commencements to another. The Egyptians are known to have used two great cycles, the Sothic Cycle and the Tropical Cycle. The former was a cycle of the coincidence of the Sothic and Vague Years, and therefore consisted of 1,460 years of the former kind. The Tropical Cycle was a cycle of the coincidence of the Tropical and Vague Years. It has been supposed by M. Biot to have a duration of 1,505 years; but the length of the 1,500 Vague Years is preferable. The monuments make mention of Pancyclical Months, which Mr. Poole makes to be periods of thirty years each, and divisions of a year of the same kind.—2. Historical Chronology. The materials for historical chronology are the monuments and the remains of the historical work of Manetho. The remains of Manetho's historical work consist of a list of the Egyptian dynasties and two considerable fragments, one relating to the Shepherds, the other to a tale of the Exodus. The list is only known to us in the epitome given by Africanus, preserved by Syncellus, and that given by Eusebius. These present such great differences that it is not reasonable to hope that we can restore a correct text. The series of dynasties is given as if they were successive, in which case the commencement of the first would be placed full 5000 years B. C., and the reign of the king who built the Great Pyramid 4000. The monuments do not warrant so extreme an antiquity, and the great majority of Egyptologists have therefore held that the dynasties were partly contemporary. The evidence of the monuments leads to the same conclusion. Kings who unquestionably belong to different dynasties are shown by them to be contemporary. The monuments will not, in Mr. Poole's opinion, justify any great extension of the period assigned to the first seventeen dynasties (B. C. 2700–1500). The last date, that of the commencement of the 18th dynasty, cannot be changed more than a few years. The date of the beginning of the first dynasty, or the era of Menes, which Mr. Poole is disposed to place B. C. 2717, is more doubtful, but a concurrence of astronomical evidence points to the 28th century. Some have supposed a much greater antiquity for the commencement of Egyptian history. Lepsius places the accession of Menes B. C. 3892, and Bunsen, 200 years later. Their system is founded upon a passage in the chronological work of Syncellus, which assigns a duration of 3555 to the thirty dynasties. It is by no means certain that this number is given on the authority of Manetho, but apart from this, the whole statement is unmistakably not from the true Manetho.—3. History. That Egypt was colonized by the descendants of Noah in a very remote age is shown by the mention of the migration of the Philistines from CAPHTOR (Gen. x. 14; see CASLUHIM), which had taken place before the arrival of Abraham in Palestine. Before this migration could occur, the Caphtorim and other Mizraites must have occupied Egypt for some time. A remarkable passage (Num. xiii. 22) points to a knowledge of the date at which

Zoan, an ancient city of Egypt, was founded. The evidence of the Egyptians as to the primeval history of their race and country is extremely indefinite. They seem to have separated mankind into two great stocks, and each of these again into two branches, for they appear to have represented themselves and the negroes, the red and black races, as the children of the god Horus, and the Shemites and Europeans, the yellow and white races, as the children of the goddess Pesht. They seem therefore to have held a double origin of the species. The absence of any important traditional period is very remarkable in the fragments of Egyptian history. These commence with the divine dynasties, and pass abruptly to the human dynasties. The indications are of a sudden change of seat, and the settlement in Egypt of a civilized race, which, either wishing to be believed native, or having lost all ties that could keep up the traditions of its first dwelling-place, filled up the commencement of its history with materials drawn from mythology. There is no trace of the tradition of the Deluge which is found in almost every other country of the world. The priests are indeed reported to have told Solon, when he spoke of one deluge, that many had occurred, but the reference is more likely to have been to great floods of the Nile than to any extraordinary catastrophes. The history of the dynasties preceding the eighteenth is not told by any continuous series of monuments. Except those of the fourth and twelfth dynasties there are scarcely any records of the age left to the present day, and thence in a great measure arises the difficulty of determining the chronology. From the time of Menes, the first king, until the Shepherd-invasion, Egypt seems to have enjoyed perfect tranquillity. During this age the Memphite line was the most powerful, and by it, under the fourth dynasty, were the most famous pyramids raised. The Shepherds were foreigners who came from the East, and, in some manner unknown to Manetho, gained the rule of Egypt. Those whose kings composed the fifteenth dynasty were the first and most important. They appear to have been Phenicians. Most probably the PHARAOH 1 of Abraham was of this line. The period of Egyptian history to which the Shepherd-invasion should be assigned is a point of dispute. It is generally placed after the twelfth dynasty, for it is argued that this powerful line could not have reigned at the same time as one or more Shepherd-dynasties. Mr. Poole thinks that this objection is not valid, and that the Shepherd-invasion was anterior to the twelfth dynasty. The rule of the twelfth dynasty, which was of Thebans, lasting about 160 years, was a period of prosperity to Egypt, but after its close those calamities appear to have occurred which made the Shepherds hated by the Egyptians. During the interval to the eighteenth dynasty there seems to have been no native line of any importance but that of the Thebans, and more than one Shepherd dynasty exercised a severe rule over the Egyptians. —We must here notice the history of the Israelites in Egypt with reference to the dynasty of the Pharaohs who favored them, and that of their oppressors. According to the scheme of biblical chronology which Mr. Poole believes to be the most probable, the whole sojourn in Egypt would belong to the period before the eighteenth dynasty. The Israelites would have come in and gone forth during that obscure age for the history of which we have little or no monumental evidence. This would explain the absence of any positive mention of them on the Egyptian monuments. Since the PHARAOH 2 of Joseph must have been a powerful ruler and held Lower Egypt, there can be no question that he was, if the dates be correct, a Shepherd of the fifteenth dynasty. The "new king," "which knew not Joseph," is thought, by many who hold with Mr. Poole as to the previous history, to have been an Egyptian, and head of the eighteenth dynasty. It seems at first sight extremely probable that the king who crushed, if he did not expel the Shepherds, would be the first oppressor of the nation which they protected. But Ex. i. 9, 10, Mr. Poole thinks, points to a divided country and a weak kingdom, and cannot apply to the time of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties. If we conclude that the Exodus most probably occurred before the eighteenth dynasty, we have to ascertain, if possible, whether the Pharaohs of the oppression (PHARAOH 3) appear to have been Egyptians or Shepherds. The change of policy is in favor of their having been Egyptians, but is by no means conclusive. If the chronology be correct, we can only decide in favor of the Shepherds. During the time to which the events are assigned there were no important lines but the Theban, and one or more of Shepherds. Manetho, according to the transcript of Africanus, speaks of three Shepherd-dynasties, the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth, the last of which, according to the present text, was of Shepherds and Thebans, but this is probably incorrect, and the dynasty should rather be considered as of Shepherds alone. Is. lii. 4 indicates that the oppressor was an Assyrian, and therefore not of the fifteenth dynasty, which, according to Manetho, in the Epitomes, was of Phenicians, and opposed to the Assyrians. Among the names of kings of this period in the Royal Turin Papyrus, are two which appear to be Assyrian, so that we may reasonably suppose that some of the foreign rulers were of that race. It is not possible at present to decide whether they were of the sixteenth or seventeenth dynasty. The history of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth dynasties is that of the Egyptian empire. Aahmes, the head of the eighteenth (B. C. about 1525), overthrew the power of the Shepherds, and probably expelled them. Queen Amenemhet and Thothmes II. and III. are the earliest sovereigns of whom great monuments remain in the temple of El-Karnak, the chief sanctuary of Thebes. The last of these rulers, whom Wilkinson regards as the Pharaoh of the Exodus (PHARAOH 4), was a great foreign conqueror, and reduced Nineveh, and perhaps Babylon also, to his sway. Amenoph III., his great-grandson, states on the sacred beetle (scarabæi), struck apparently to commemorate his marriage, that his northern boundary was in Mesopotamia, his southern in Kara (Cholœ?). The head of the nineteenth dynasty, Sethce I., or Sethos (B. C. about 1340), waged great foreign wars, particularly with the Hittites of the valley of the Orontes, whose capital Ketesh, situate near Emesa (now Hums), he captured. His son Rameses II. was the most illustrious of the Pharaohs. If he did not exceed all others in foreign conquests, he far outshone them in the grandeur and beauty of the temples with which he adorned Egypt and Nubia. (THEBES.) His chief campaign was against the Hittites and a great confederacy they had formed. Menptah, the son and successor of Rameses II., is supposed by the advocates of the Rabbinical date of the Exodus (CHRONOLOGY) to have been the Pharaoh in whose time the Israelites went out. One other king of this period must be noticed, Rameses III., of the twentieth dynasty (B. C. about 1200), whose conquests, recorded on the walls of his great temple of Medinet Haboo in western Thebes, seem to have been not less important than those of Rameses II. Under his successors the power of Egypt evidently declined, and toward the close of the dynasty the country seems to have fallen into anarchy, the high-priests of Amen (AMON) having usurped regal power at Thebes and a Lower Egyptian dynasty (the twenty-first) arisen at Tanis. Probably the Egyptian princess who became Solomon's wife was a daughter of a late king of the Tanite dynasty. The head of the twenty-second dynasty, Sheshonk I., the SHISHAK of the Bible, restored the unity of the kingdom, and revived the credit of the Egyptian arms (B. C. about 900). Probably his successor, Osorkon I., is the ZERAH of Scripture, defeated by Asa. Egypt makes no figure in Asiatic history during the twenty-third and twenty-fourth dynasties: under the twenty-fifth it regained, in part at least, its ancient importance. This was an Ethiopian line, the warlike sovereigns of which strove to the utmost to repel the onward stride of Assyria. So, whom Mr. Poole is disposed to identify with Shebek II. or Sebuchus, the second Ethiopian, rather than with Shebek I. or Sabaco, the first, made an alliance with Hoshea, the last king of Israel. Tehrah or TIRHAKAH, the third of this house, advanced against Sennacherib in support of Hezekiah. After this, a native dynasty again occupied the throne, the twenty-sixth, of Saite kings. Psammetek I. or Psammetichus I. (B. C. 664), who may be regarded as the head of this dynasty, warred in Palestine, and took Ashdod, after a siege of twenty-nine years. Neku or Necho (PHARAOH 9), the son of Psammetichus, continued the war in the E., and marched along the coast of Palestine to attack the king of Assyria. At Megiddo, Josiah encountered him (B. C. 608-7), notwithstanding the remonstrance of the Egyptian king, which is very illustrative of the policy of the Pharaohs in the E. (2 Chr. xxxv. 21), no less than is his lenient conduct after the defeat and death of the king of Judah. The army of Necho was after a short space routed at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar, B. C. 605-4 (Jer. xlv. 2). The second successor of Necho, Apries, or Pharaoh-hophra (PHARAOH 10), sent his army into Palestine to the aid of Zedekiah (Jer. xxxvii. 5, 7, 11), so that the siege of Jerusalem was raised for a time, and kindly received the fugitives from the captured city. He seems to have been afterward attacked by Nebuchadnezzar in his own country. There is, however, no certain account of a complete subjugation of Egypt by the king of Babylon. Amasis, the successor of Apries, had a long and prosperous reign, and somewhat restored the weight of Egypt in the E. But the new power of Persia was to prove even more terrible to his house than Babylon had been to the house of Psammetichus, and the son of Amasis had reigned but six months when Cambyes reduced the country to the condition of a province of his empire (B. C. 525). The people frequently revolted, and were as often subdued, but, about 414 B. C., they drove out the Persians, when Amyrtaeus the Saite became the sole king of the twenty-eighth dynasty, and reigned six years. After him came the twenty-ninth or Mendesian dynasty of four kings: then the thirtieth dynasty of three Sebennyte kings, the last of whom, Nectanebo II. or Nekht-nebi, was conquered and dethroned by Artaxerxes Ochus about 350 B. C., when Egypt became again a Persian province. ALEXANDER THE GREAT conquered it, 332 B. C. (ALEXANDRIA.) After him came the Ptolemies or Greek kings (PTOLEMY I., &c.), who ruled Egypt till it became a Roman province under AUGUSTUS CESAR (B. C. 30). It came under the Mohammedan power (ARABIA) A. D. 640, and became a Turkish province in 1517. From 1805 to 1849 Mehemet Ali was pasha, and the vice-royalty of Egypt, as a fief of the Turkish empire, is now hereditary in his family. Prophecy (Jer. xlv. 1; Ez. xxxix., xxx., &c.) has been strikingly fulfilled in regard to Egypt. From the second Persian conquest, more than two thousand years ago, until our own days, not one native ruler has occupied the throne.

* Egypt, River of. RIVER OF EGYPT.

Egyptian [-jip'shan] = one from Egypt (Ex. ii. 19); usually a native of Egypt (ii. 11 f., &c.). The Hebrew word most commonly rendered "Egyptians" (Altegyptim) is the name of the country, and might be appropriately so translated in many cases.

* Egyptian Sea = RED SEA (Is. xi. 15).

* Egyptian Versions. VERSIONS, ANCIENT, OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS.

Ehl (Heb. connection, Fñ.), head of one of the Benjaminite houses (Gen. xlv. 21). AMIRAM.

Ehud (Heb. union, Ges.; strong, powerful, Fñ.).

1. Son of Bilhan, and great-grandson of Benjamin the Patriarch (1 Chr. vii. 10, viii. 6).—2. Son of Gera of the tribe of Benjamin (Judg. iii. 15 ff.); the second Judge of the Israelites (B. C. 1336). In the Bible he is not called a Judge but a deliverer (l. c.): so Othniel (Judg. iii. 9) and all the Judges (Neh. ix. 27). Josephus (v. 4, § 3) makes Ehud Judge eighty years. As a Benjamite he was specially chosen to destroy EGLON, who had established himself in Jericho, which was within that tribe. He was very strong, and "left-handed," literally as in margin, "shut of his right hand." The words are differently rendered: 1. left-handed, and unable to use his right (Targum, Josephus, Arabic, Gesenius, Fürst, A. V., &c.); 2. using his left hand as readily as his right; ambidextrous (LXX., Vulgate, &c.). The fact of drawing the dagger from the right thigh (Judg. iii. 21) is consistent with either opinion.

Eker (Heb. a rooting up, a plant rooted up and transplanted, Ges.), a descendant of Judah through Hezron and Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 27).

Eker-bel (Gr., see below), a place named in Jd. vii. 18 only, apparently in the hill country S. E. of the plain of Esdrælon and of Dothain. The Syriac reading (Ekrabat) points to Acrabbin, mentioned by Eusebius as the capital of a district called Acrabattine (see under AKRABBIM), and now known as Akrabch, a considerable village about seven miles S. E. of Nablus.

Ekrôn (Heb. eradication, Ges.), one of the five towns belonging to the lords of the Philistines, and the most northerly of the five (Josh. xiii. 3). Like the other Philistine cities, its situation was in the lowlands. It fell to the lot of Judah (Josh. xv. 45, 46; Judg. i. 18), and formed a landmark on his N. border, the boundary running thence to the sea at JABNEEL 1. We afterward find it mentioned among the cities of Dan (Josh. xix. 43). But before the monarchy it was again in full possession of the Philistines (1 Sam. v. 10). Ekrôn was the last place to which the ark was carried before its return to Israel, and the mortality there in consequence seems to have been more deadly than at Ashdod or Gath (v. 11, 12). From Ekrôn to Ethelhemesh was a straight highway (vi.). Henceforward Ekron appears to have remained in the hands of the Philistines (xvii. 52; 2 K. i. 2 ff.; Jer. xxv. 20; Am. i. 8; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 7). A sanctuary of Baal-zebub (BAAL 2) was there. 'Akir, the modern representative of Ekron, is a mud village, about five miles S. W. of Ramleh, on the N. side of the fertile valley Wady Surar. In the Apocrypha it appears as ACCARON (1 Mc. x. 89, only), bestowed with its borders by Alexander Balas on Jonathan Maccabeus as a reward for his services.

Ekron-ites = natives or inhabitants of EKRON (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. v. 10).

Elā (Gr.) = ELAM 4 (1 Esd. ix. 27).

El'a-dāh (Heb. whom God puts on, i. e. fills with Himself, Ges.; God is ornament, Fū.), a descendant of Ephraim through SIMELEAH (1 Chr. vii. 20).

El'ah (Heb. strength; hence, OAK, or terebinth, Ges., Fū.). 1. A duke of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 41; 1 Chr. i. 52).—2. Father of Shimei, Solomon's commissary in Benjamin (1 K. iv. 18).—3. Son and successor of Baasha, king of Israel (1 K. xvi. 8 ff.); his reign lasted for little more than a year (compare verse 8 with 10). He was killed, while drunk, by Zimri, in the house of his steward ARZA, and his family was exterminated.—4. Father of Hoshea, the last king of Israel (2 K. xv. 30, xvii. 1).—5. Son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chr. iv. 15).—6. A Benjamite chief, son of Uzzi (ix. 8).

Elah (Heb., see above), the Valley of, a valley in (not "by," as the A. V. has it) which the Israelites were encamped against the Philistines when David killed Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19, xxi. 9). It lay somewhere near SOCON 1 of Judah, and AZEKAN, and was nearer Ekron than any other Philistine town. So 1 Sam. xvii. Socoh probably = Shuweikeh, some fourteen miles S. W. of Jerusalem, on the S. slopes of the Wady es Sunn (= valley of the acacia), a fertile valley which runs off in a northwestern direction into the Philistine plain, and is identified by Robinson (and so Porter in Kitto, &c.) with the valley of Elah. One of the largest terebinths in Palestine still stands in the vicinity (Rbn. ii. 20, 21). The traditional Valley of Elah is the Wady Beit Hanina, which lies about four miles N. W. of Jerusalem, and is crossed by the road to Nebi Samu'el.

Elam (Gr. fr. Heb. = unlimited duration, eternity, Sim.), originally the name of a man, a son of Shem (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chr. i. 17). Commonly, however, it is used as the appellation of a country (Gen. xiv. 1, 2; Is. xi. 11, xxi. 2; Jer. xxv. 25, xlix. 34-39; Ez. xxxii. 24; Dan. viii. 2). The Elam of Scripture appears to be the province lying S. of Assyria, and W. of Persia Proper, to which Herodotus gives the name of Cissia (iii. 91, v. 49, &c.), and which is termed Susis or Susiana by the geographers. It includes a portion of the mountainous country separating between the Mesopotamian plain and the high table-land of Iran, together with a fertile and valuable low tract at the foot of the range, between it and the Tigris. It appears from Gen. x. 22, that this country was originally peopled by descendants of Shem, closely allied to the Arameans (Syrians) and the Assyrians; and from Gen. xiv. 1-12, that by the time of Abraham a very important power had been built up in the same region. (CHEDORLAOMER.) It is plain that at this early time the predominant power in Lower Mesopotamia was Elam, which for a while held the place possessed earlier by Babylon (Gen. x. 10), and later by either Babylon or Assyria. Discoveries made in the country itself confirm this view. (SHUSHAN.) The Elamitic empire established at this time was, however, but of short duration. Toward the close of the Assyrian period she is found allied with Babylon and engaged in hostilities with Assyria; but she seems to have declined in strength after the Assyrian empire was destroyed. Elam was a province of Babylon under Belshazzar. It is uncertain at what time the Persians added Elam to their empire. Possibly it only fell under their dominion together with Babylon; but there is some reason to think that it may have revolted and joined the Persians before the city was besieged (see Is. xxi. 2, xxii. 6). She now became merged in the Persian empire, forming a distinct satrapy. Susa (Shushan), her capital, was made the ordinary residence of the court, and the metropolis of the whole empire.—2. A Korhite Levite, fifth son of Meshelemiah; one of the sons of Asaph, in David's time (1 Chr. xxvi. 3).—3. A Benjamite chief, son of Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 24).—4. "Children of Elam," to the number of 1,254, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 7; Neh. vii. 12; 1 Esd. v. 12), and 71 with Ezra in the second caravan (Ezr. viii. 7; 1 Esd. viii. 33). Six "sons of Elam" were among the husbands of foreign wives in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 26). "Elam" occurs among the chief of the people, who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 14).—5. 1,274 children of a second ("the other") Elam returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 31; Neh. vii. 34).—6. One of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42).

Elam-ites (fr. Heb., see below) = the original inhabitants of the country called ELAM (Ezr. iv. 9); they were descendants of Shem, and perhaps drew their name from an actual man Elam (Gen. x. 22). Strabo says they were skilful archers (compare Is. xxii. 6; Jer. xlix. 35). The "Elamites" in Acts ii. 9 were probably descendants from captive Jews or Israelites in Elam (compare Is. xi. 11). In Jd. i. 6 the name is given from the Greek as ELYMEANS.

El'a-sah (Heb. whom God made, Ges.; God is creator, Fū.; = ELEASAH). 1. A priest, of the sons of Pashur, in Ezra's time, who had married a Gentile wife (Ezr. x. 22).—2. Son of Shaphan; one of the two men sent on a mission by King Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar at Babylon (Jer. xxix. 3).

El'ath (fr. Heb. sing.), E'loth (fr. Heb. pl. = trces, a grove, perhaps palm-grove, Ges.), a town of the land of Edom, commonly mentioned with Ezion-geber, and situate at the head of the Arabian Gulf, which was thence called the Elanitic Gulf. It first occurs in the account of the wanderings (Deut. ii. 8), and in later times must have come under the rule of David in his conquest of Edom (2 Sam. viii. 14). We find the place named again in connection with Solomon's navy (1 K. ix. 26; compare 2 Chr. viii. 17). It was apparently included in the revolt of Edom against Joram recorded in 2 K. viii. 20; but it was taken and rebuilt by Azariah (xiv. 22; 2 Chr. xxvi. 2). Afterward "Rezin king of Syria recovered Elath, and drove out the Jews from Elath; and the Syrians (the Keri, LXX., Vulg., and most expositors read 'Edomites,' instead of 'Syrians') came to Elath, and dwelt there to this day" (xvi. 6). From this time the place is not mentioned until the Roman period, during which it became a frontier town of the south, and the residence of a Christian bishop. Under the rule of the Greeks and Romans it lost its former importance; but in Mohammedan times it again became a place of some note. "Extensive mounds of rubbish mark the site of Ailah, the Elath of Scripture" (Rbn. i. 163). Near these is the castle of 'Akabah, an important station on the route of Egyptian pilgrims to Mecca.

El-beth'el (Heb. God of the House of God, or God of BETHEL), the name which Jacob bestowed on the place at which God appeared to him when he was fleeing from Esau (Gen. xxxv. 7). BETHEL.

El'et-a [-she-a] (fr. Gr. = HILKIAH?), ancestor of Judith, and therefore of the tribe of Simeon (Jd. viii. 1).

El'da-ah (Heb. whom God called) (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33), the last, in order, of the sons of MIDIAN. No satisfactory trace of the tribe which we may suppose to have taken the appellation has yet been found.

El'dad (Heb. whom God loves = THEOPHILUS, Ges.; God is a friend, Fül.) and Me'dad (fr. Heb. = love, Ges., Fül.), two of the seventy elders to whom was communicated the prophetic power of Moses (Num. xi. 16, 26). Although their names were upon the list which Moses had drawn up (xi. 26), they did not repair with the rest of their brethren to the tabernacle, but continued to prophesy in the camp. Moses being requested by Joshua to forbid this, refused to do so, and expressed a wish that the gift of prophecy might be diffused throughout the people. The mode of prophecy in the case of Eldad and Medad was probably the extempore production of hymns, chanted forth to the people (Hammond): compare the case of Saul, 1 Sam. x. 11. PROPHET.

El'der. The term elder (or old man, as the Heb. zākēn, usually, in the plural, translated "elders," literally imports) was one of extensive use, as an official title, among the Hebrews and the surrounding nations. It had reference to various offices, head-servants, officers of Pharaoh's household, master workmen, &c. (Gen. xxiv. 2 [A. V. "eldest"], 1. 7; 2 Sam. xii. 17; Ez. xxvii. 9 [A. V. "ancients"]). As betokening a political office, it applied not only to the Hebrews, but also to the Egyptians (Gen. i. 7), the Moabites and Midianites (Num. xxii. 7). Wherever a patriarchal system is in force, the office of the elder will be found, as the key-stone of the social and political fabric: it is so at the present day among the Arabs, where the Sheikh (= the old man) is the highest authority in the tribe. (AGE, OLD.) The earliest notice of the elders acting in concert as a political body is at the time of the Exodus. They were the representatives of the people, so much so that elders and people are occasionally used as equivalent terms (compare Josh. xxiv. 1 with 2, 19, 21; 1 Sam. viii. 4 with 7, 10, 19). (CONGREGATION.) Their authority was undefined, and extended to all matters concerning the public weal. When the tribes became settled, the elders were distinguished by different titles according as they were acting as national representatives (1 Sam. iv. 3; 1 K. xx. 7; 2 K. xxiii. 1, &c.), as district governors over the several tribes (Deut. xxxi. 28; 2 Sam. xix. 11), or as local magistrates in the provincial towns, whose duty it was to sit in the gate and administer justice (Deut. xix. 12; Ru. iv. 9, 11; 1 K. xxi. 8). (JUDGE.) Their number and influence may be inferred from 1 Sam. xxx. 26 ff. They retained their position under all the political changes which the Jews underwent: under the Judges (Judg. ii. 7; 1 Sam. iv. 3); under the kings (2 Sam. xvii. 4); during the Captivity (Jer. xxix. 1; Ez. viii. 1); subsequently to the return (Ezr. v. 5, vi. 7, 14, x. 8, 14); under the Maccabees, when they were described sometimes as the senate (Gr. gerousia, 1 Mc. xii. 6 [A. V. "elders"]; 2 Mc. i. 10, xi. 27 [A. V. "council" in both], iv. 44 [A. V. "senate"]), sometimes by their ordinary title (Gr. presbiteros, literally one older or more aged, almost uniformly translated "elder," in plural "elders," (1 Mc. vii. 38, xi. 23, xii. 35); and, lastly, at the commencement of the Christian era, when they are noticed as a distinct body from the SANHEDRIM (Mat. xvi. 21, xxi. 23, xxvi. 59). St. Luke describes the whole order by the Greek collective term presbiterion (Lk. xxii. 66 [A. V. "elders"]; Acts xxii. 5 [A. V. "estate of the elders"]), and the same word is translated "presbytery" in 1 Tim. iv. 14. For the position of the elders in the synagogue and the Christian church, see SYNAGOGUE; BISHOP.

El'e-ad (Heb. whom God applauds, Ges.; God is protector, Fül.), a descendant of Ephraim (1 Chr. vii. 21). SHUTHELAI.

E-le'a-leh (Heb. whither God ascends, Ges.; the exalted God, Fül.), a place on the E. of Jordan, in the pastoral country, taken possession of and rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxiii. 3, 37). By Isaiah and Jeremiah it is mentioned as a Moabite town (Is. xv. 4, xvi. 9; Jer. xlviii. 34). The extensive ruins of the place are still to be seen, bearing very nearly their ancient name, El'-Al, a little more than one mile N. E. of Heshbon.

E-le'a-sa (Gr. fr. Heb. = ELEASAH or ADASA?), a place at which Judas Maccabeus encamped before the battle with Bacchides, in which he lost his life (1 Mc. ix. 5). It was apparently not far from Azotus (compare 15). LAISH.

E-le'a-sah or E-le'a'sah (Heb. = ELASAH). 1. Son of Helez; a descendant of Judah, of the family of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 39).—2. Son of Rapha, or Rephaiah; a descendant of Saul through Jonathan and Merib-baal or Mephibosheth (1 Chr. viii. 37, ix. 43).

E-le-a-zar or E-le'a-zar (Heb. whom God helps, Ges.; God is helper, Fül.). 1. Third son of AARON, by Elisheba, daughter of Ammiadab. After the death of Nadab and Abihu without children (Lev. x. 1 ff.; Num. iii. 4), Eleazar was appointed chief over the principal Levites (Num. iii. 32). With his brother Ithamar he ministered as a priest during their father's lifetime, and immediately before his death was invested on Mount Horeb with the sacred garments, as the successor of Aaron in the office of HIGH-PRIEST (xx. 28). One of his first duties was in conjunction with Moses to superintend the census of the people (xxvi. 3). He also assisted at the inauguration of Joshua (xxvii. 22, 23), at the division of the Midianite spoil (xxxi. 21 ff.), and after the conquest of Canaan in the distribution of the land (Josh. xiv. 1, &c.). The time of his death is not mentioned in Scripture; Josephus says it took place about the same time as Joshua's, twenty-five years after the death of Moses. He was buried in the hill of Phineas his son (xxiv. 23).—2. The son of Abinadab, of the hill of Kirjath-jearim, consecrated to take charge of the ark (1 Sam. vii. 1).—3. The son of Dodo the AMONITE; one of the three principal mighty men of David's army (2 Sam. xxiii. 9 ff.; 1 Chr. xi. 12 ff.).—4. A Levite, son of Mahli, and grandson of Merari (1 Chr. xxiii. 21, 22, xxiv. 28).—5. A priest who took part in the feast of dedication under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).—6. A son (i. e. descendant) of Parosh; an Israelite (i. e. a layman) who had married a foreign wife, and had to put her away (Ezr. x. 25; 1 Esd. ix. 26).—7. Son of Phinehas a Levite (Ezr. viii. 33; 1 Esd. viii. 63).—8. In 1 Esd. viii. 43 = ELIEZER 7.—9. Surnamed AVARAN (1 Mc. ii. 5); fourth son of Mattathias; fell by an act of self-devotion in an engagement with Antiochus Eupator, B. C. 164 (vi. 43 ff.). In a former battle with Nicanor, Eleazar was appointed by Judas to read "the holy book" before the attack, and the watch-word in the fight—"The help of God"—was his own name (2 Mc. viii. 23).—10. A distinguished scribe of great age, who suffered martyrdom during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mc. vi. 18-31).—11. Father of Jason, ambassador from Judas Maccabeus to Rome (1 Mc. viii. 18).—12. The son of Eliud, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Mat. i. 15).

* E-lekt' (fr. L. = chosen, selected, especially by God), the A. V. translation of the Heb. bâhir or bâchir (Is. xlii. 1, xlv. 4, xlv. 9, 22) and Gr. eklektos (Mat. xxiv. 22, 24, 31; Mk. xiii. 20, 22, 27; Lk. xviii. 7; Rom. viii. 33; Col. iii. 12; 1 Tim. v. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 10; Tit. i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 2, ii. 6; 2 Jn. 1, 13), each of which is also translated "chosen" in other places (2 Sam. xxi. 6 margin, text "did choose"; 1 Chr. xvi. 13; Ps. lxxxix. 3 [Heb. 4], cv. 6, 43, cvi. 5, 23; Is. xliii. 20, lxxv. 15; Mat. xx. 16, xxii. 14; Lk. xxiii. 35; Rom. xvi. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 4, 9; Rev. xvii. 14). So the Gr. eklogê (= choice, election, selection, Rbn. N. T. Lxx.) is translated "election" in Rom. ix. 11, xi. 5, 7, 28; 1 Th. i. 4; 2 Pet. i. 10, and "chosen" (literally vessel of election) in Acts ix. 15.

E-le-a-zu'rus (1 Esd. ix. 24) = ELIASHIB 4.

El-E-lo-he's-ra-el (fr. Heb. = Almighty, God of Israel), the name bestowed by Jacob on the altar which he erected facing the city of Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 19, 20).

Eleph (Heb. ox or thousand; = ALEPH), a town allotted to Benjamin, named next to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28).

El'e-phant. The word does not occur in the text of A. V. of the canonical Scriptures, but is found as the marginal reading to BEHEMOTH, in Job xl. 15. "Elephants' teeth" is the marginal reading for "ivory" in 1 K. x. 22; 2 Chr. ix. 21. Elephants are mentioned as being used in warfare (1 Mc. i. 17, iii. 34, vi. 34 ff., viii. 6, xi. 56; 2 Mc. xi. 4, xiii. 2, &c.). Elephants are now found native only in S. Asia and in middle and S. Africa. Their great size, strength, sagacity, and docility, are well known. They are distinguished from all other quadrupeds by their flexible proboscis or trunk.

* E-len-the-rop'e-lis (Gr. free city), a city of S. Palestine, not mentioned in the Scriptures, but important as the capital of a large province and the seat of a bishop in the fourth and fifth centuries A. C.; probably so named about A. D. 202; previously called Betogabra, and supposed by Thomson (ii. 360) also = ΓΑΛΥ; now Beit Jibrin, a village with extensive and massive ruins of a fortress, groups of caverns, &c. (Rbn. ii. 24, &c.). It is about twenty miles S. W. from Jerusalem.

E-len-the-rus (L. fr. Gr. = free), a river of Syria mentioned in 1 Mc. xi. 7; xii. 30. In early ages it was a noted border stream. According to Strabo it separated Syria from Phenicia, and formed the N. limit of Celosyria. Of the identity of the Eleutherus with the modern Nahr el-Kebir, "Great River," there cannot be a doubt. Its highest source is at the N. E. base of Lebanon; it sweeps round the N. end of the range, through the opening called in Scripture "the entrance of Hamath" (Num.

xxxiv. 8); and falls into the Mediterranean about eighteen miles N. of Tripolis.

El-ha'n'an (Heb. whom God bestowed, Ges.; God is kind, Fû.). 1. A distinguished warrior in David's time, who performed a memorable exploit against the Philistines.—(a.) 2 Sam. xxi. 19 says that he was the "son of Jaare-oregim the Bethlehemite," and that he "slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam." Here, in the A. V., the words "the brother of" are inserted, to bring the passage into agreement with—(b.) 1 Chr. xx. 5, which states that "Elhanan son of Jair (or Jaor) slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear," &c. Of these two statements the latter is probably the more correct—the differences between them being much smaller in the original than in English. Nearly all the commentators consider the text of Samuel here to be corrupt, and correct it from Chronicles (so Keil). The Hebrew word oregim occurs twice in the verse in Samuel, first as a proper name, and again at the end, "weavers." The former has probably been taken in by an early transcriber from the latter, i. e. from the next line of the MS.—2. The son of Dodo of Bethlehem, one of David's "thirty" valiant men, and named first on the list after Asahel (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chr. xi. 26).

E'li (Heb. ascend, summit, the highest, Ges.), a HIGH-PRIEST descended from AARON through ITHAMAR, the youngest of his two surviving sons (compare 1 K. ii. 27 with 2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chr. xxiv. 3). As the history makes no mention of any high-priest of Ithamar's line before Eli, he is generally supposed to have been the first of that line who held the office. From him, his sons having died before him, it appears to have passed to his grandson, AHITUB (1 Sam. xiv. 3), and it certainly remained in his family till ABIATHAR, the grandson of Ahitub, was "thrust out from being priest unto the Lord" by Solomon for his share in Adonijah's rebellion (1 K. i. 7; ii. 26, 27), and the high-priesthood passed back again to the family of ELEAZAR in the person of ZADOK (ii. 35). This return of it to the elder branch was one part of the evil denounced against Eli during his lifetime, for his culpable negligence in not restraining his sons, when they by their rapacity and licentiousness profaned the priesthood, and brought the rites of religion into abhorrence among the people (1 Sam. ii. 22-36, iii. 11-14, with 1 K. ii. 27). Notwithstanding this one great blemish, the character of Eli is marked by eminent piety, as shown by his meek submission to the divine judgment (1 Sam. iii. 18), and his supreme regard for the ark of God (iv. 18). In addition to the office of high-priest he held that of judge forty years (twenty years in LXX.), being the immediate predecessor of his pupil SAMUEL (vii. 6, 15-17), the last of the judges. It has been suggested that he was sole judge twenty years after having been co-judge with Samson twenty years. He died at the advanced age of ninety-eight years (iv. 18), overcome by the disastrous intelligence that the ark of God had been taken in battle by the Philistines, who had also slain his sons Hophni and Phinehas.

* E'li (Heb. eli, my God), E'li, la'ma (Heb. lîmâ, why? wherefore?) sa-bach'tha-ni (Chal. shêbaktâni, hast thou forsaken me), the words uttered by our Saviour in His agony on the cross (Mat. xxvii. 46), quoted from Ps. xxii. 1 (Heb. 2). The first words are given in Mk. xv. 34 more exactly according to the Aramaic dialect, "E-lo'î, E-lo'î," &c.

E-H'ab (Heb. to whom God is father, Ges.). 1. Son of Helon and leader of the tribe of Zebulun at the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 9, ii. 7, vii. 24, 29, x. 16).—2. A Reubenite, son of Pallu or Phallu, and father or progenitor of Dathan and Abiram (Num. xxvi. 8, 9, xvi. 1, 12; Deut. xi. 6).—3. One of David's brothers, the eldest son of Jesse (1 Chr. ii. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 6, xvii. 13, 28). His daughter Abihail married her second cousin Rehoboam, and bore him three children (2 Chr. xi. 18); although it is difficult not to suspect that "daughter" here = grand-daughter or descendant.—4. A Levite in David's time, who was both a "porter" and a musician on the "psaltery" (1 Chr. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—5. One of the warlike Gadite leaders who came over to David when he was in the wilderness taking refuge from Saul (1 Chr. xii. 9).—6. An ancestor of Samuel the Prophet; a Kohathite Levite, son of Nahath (1 Chr. vi. 27); probably = ELIHU 2 and ELIEL 2.—7. Son of Nathanael; ancestor of Judith, and therefore a Simeonite (Jd. viii. 1).

E-H'a-da (fr. Heb. = whom God knows, i. e. cares for, Ges.). 1. One of David's sons; according to the lists, the youngest but one of the family born to him in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chr. iii. 8); = BEELIADA. From the latter passage it appears he was the son of a wife and not of a concubine.—2. A mighty man of war, a Benjamite, who led 200,000 of his tribe to the army of Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 17).

E-H'a-dah (fr. Heb. = ELIADA), father of REZON (1 K. xi. 23).

E-H'a-das (Gr.) (1 Esd. ix. 28) = ELIOENAI.

E-H'a-dun (1 Esd. v. 58), possibly altered from HENADAD.

E-H'ah (fr. Heb. = ELIJAH). 1. A Benjamite chief, son of Jeroham (1 Chr. viii. 27).—2. A son, i. e. descendant, of Elam in Ezra's time, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 26).

E-H'ah-ba (Heb. whom God hides, Ges.), a Shaalbomite, one of David's thirty "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 32; 1 Chr. xi. 33).

E-H'a-kim (Heb. whom God has set up, Ges.). 1. Son of ILIKIAH 1; master of Hezekiah's household (2 K. xviii. 26, 37; Is. xxxvi. 3, &c.). He succeeded SIEBNA in this office, after the latter had been ejected from it for his pride (Is. xxii. 15-20). Eliakim was a good man, as appears by the title emphatically applied to him by God, "my servant Eliakim" (xxii. 20), and as was evinced by his conduct on the occasion of Sennacherib's invasion (2 K. xviii. 37, xix. 1-5), and also in the discharge of the duties of his high station, in which he acted as a "father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah" (Is. xxii. 21). It was a special mark of the Divine approbation of his character and conduct, of which, however, no further details have been preserved to us, that he was raised to the post of authority and dignity "over the house," which he held at the time of the Assyrian invasion. What this office has been a subject of some perplexity to commentators. The ancients, including the LXX. and Jerome, understood it of the priestly office. But it is certain from the description of the office in Is. xxii., and especially from verse 22, that it was the king's house, and not the House of God, of which Eliakim was prefect.—2. The original name of JEHOIAKIM, king of Judah (2 K. xxiii. 34; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 4).—3. A priest in Nehemiah's time, who assisted at the dedication of the new wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 41).—4. Son of ABIUD, and father of Azor, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Mat. i. 13).—5. Son of Melea, and father of Jonan, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk. iii. 30, 31).

E-H'a-ll (Gr.) (1 Esd. ix. 34), probably = BIRNUI 3.

E-H'am (Heb. = ELIAB, Ges.; God is gatherer, or founder of families and communities, Fñ.). 1. Father of BATH-SHEBA, the wife of David (2 Sam. xi. 3). In 1 Chr. iii. 5, the names of both father and daughter are altered, the former to AMIEL and the latter to BATH-SHUA.—2. Son of Abithophel the Gilonite; one of David's "thirty" warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). The name is omitted in 1 Chr. xi., but probably = "AMIJAH 4 the Pelonite." The ancient Jewish tradition, preserved by Jerome, is that the two Eliams are the same person.

E-H'as, the Greek and Latin form of ELIJAH given in the A. V. of the Apocrypha and N. T.: Eccles. xlviii. 1, 4, 12; 1 Mc. ii. 58; Mat. xi. 14, xvi. 14, xvii. 3, 4, 10, 11, 12, xxvii. 47, 49; Mk. vi. 15, viii. 28, ix. 4, 5, 11-13, xv. 35, 36; Lk. i. 17, iv. 25, 26, ix. 8, 19, 30, 33, 54; Jn. i. 21, 25; Rom. xi. 2; Jas. v. 17. In Rom. xi. 2, the reference is not to the prophet, but to the portion of Scripture designated by his name, the words being literally "in Elias," not as in A. V. "of Elias."

E-H'a-saph (fr. Heb. = whom God has added, Ges.; God is gatherer, i. e. protector, Fñ.). 1. Son of Deuel or Reuel; chief of Gad at the census in the Wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 14, ii. 14, vii. 42, 47, x. 20).—2. Son of Lael; a Levite, and "chief of the house of the father of the Gershonites" at the same time (iii. 24).

E-H'a-shib (fr. Heb. = whom God restores, Ges.; God is requiter, Fñ.). 1. A priest in David's time, the eleventh of the "governors" of the sanctuary (1 Chr. xxiv. 12).—2. A son of Elioenai, descendant of the royal family of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 24).—3. HIGH-PRIEST at Jerusalem at the rebuilding of the walls under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 1, 20, 21); allied to Tobiah and Sanballat (Ezr. x. 6; Neh. xiii. 4, 7, 28). His genealogy is given in xii. 10, 22, 23.—4. A singer in Ezra's time who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 24).—5. A son of Zattu (x. 27), and—6. A son of Bani (x. 36), both of whom had transgressed in the same manner.

E-H'a-thab (Heb. to whom God comes, Ges.), a son of Illeman; a musician in the Temple in David's time, who with twelve of his sons and brethren had the twentieth division of the temple-service (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 27).

E-H'idad (Heb. = ELIAD, Ges., Fñ.), son of Chislon; the Benjamite prince who assisted in the division of the land of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 21).

E-H'el (Heb. to whom God is strength, Ges.; God is God, Fñ.). 1. One of the heads of the tribe of Manasseh on the E. of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).—2. Son of Toah; a Levite, probably = ELIAB 6 and ELIHU 2 (vi. 34).—3. A Benjamite chief, son of Shimhi (viii. 20).—4. A Benjamite chief, son of Shashak (viii. 22).—5. "The Mahavite;" one of David's "valiant men" (xi. 46).—6. Another of the same, but without any express designation (xi. 47).—7. One of the Gadite heroes who came across Jordan to David when he was in the wilderness of Judah hiding from Saul (xii. 11).—8. A Kohathite Levite, chief of the sons of Hebron at the transportation of the ark from the house of Obad-edom to Jerusalem (xv. 9, 11).—9. A Levite in Hezekiah's time; an overseer of the offerings made in the Temple (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).

E-li-e'nal, or E-li-e'na-l (Heb. = ELIOENAI), a Benjamite chief, son of Shimhi (1 Chr. viii. 20).

E-li-e-zer (Heb. God his help, Ges.). 1. Abraham's chief servant, called by him, as the passage is usually translated, "Eliezer of Damascus," or "that Damascene, Eliezer," literally "Damascus Eliezer" (Gen. xv. 2). There is an apparent contradiction in the A. V., for it does not appear how, if he was of "Damascus," he could be "born in Abraham's house" (ver. 3). But the Hebrew phrase translated in A. V. "born in my house," is literally son of my house, which (so some) only imports that he was one of Abraham's household, not that he was born in his house. But Gesenius makes son of my house = my home-born slave. Eliezer may be called "Damascus Eliezer" simply because his family originally came from Damascus (so Kalisch). If ABRAHAM lived for a while in Damascus (as Josephus relates), or if, as Beke supposes, HARAN was in the Damascus district, Eliezer might be both "Damascus Eliezer" and "born in Abraham's house." In verse 2, what is translated in A. V. "the steward of my house," &c., should probably be rendered "the son of possession," i. e. possessor, "of my house, shall be . . . Eliezer." It was most likely, this same Eliezer who is described in Gen. xxiv. 2 (ELDER), and was sent to Padan-aram to take a wife for Isaac.—2. Second son of Moses and Zipporah, to whom his father gave this name, "because, said he, the God of my father was my help, that delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh" (Ex. xviii. 4; 1 Chr. xxiii. 15, 17, xxvi. 25). He remained with his mother and brother Gershom, in the care of Jethro, his grandfather, when Moses returned to Egypt (Ex. iv. 18 ff.), she having been sent back to her father by Moses (xviii. 2), though she set off to accompany him, and went part of the way with him.—3. Son of Becher, and grandson of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 8).—4. A priest in David's reign, appointed to sound with the trumpet before the ark (xv. 24).—5. Son of Zichri, ruler of the Reubenites in David's reign (xxvii. 16).—6. Son of Dodavah, of Mareshah in Judah (2 Chr. xx. 37); a prophet, who rebuked Jehoshaphat for joining himself with Ahaziah king of Israel.—7. A chief Israelite—a "man of understanding"—whom Ezra sent with others from Ahava to Casiphia, to induce some Levites and Nethinim to accompany him to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 16).—8, 9, 10. A priest, a Levite, and an Israelite of the sons of Harim, who, in the time of Ezra, had married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 18, 23, 31).—11. Son of Jorim, in the genealogy of Christ (Lk. iii. 29).

E-li-ho-e'nal or E-li-ho-e'na-l (Heb. = ELIOENAI), son of Zerachiah; one of the sons of Pahath-moab, who with 200 men returned from the Captivity with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 4).

E-li-ho'reph [-ref] (Heb. God his recompense, Ges.), son of Shisha, and one of Solomon's scribes (1 K. iv. 3).

E-li-hu or E-li-hu (Heb. whose God is He, i. e. Jehovah, Ges.). 1. One of the interlocutors in the book of JOB, described as the "son of Barachel the Buzite." In his speech (Job xxxii.-xxxvii.) he describes himself as younger than the three friends, and accordingly his presence is not noticed in the first chapters.—2. Son of Tohu, a forefather of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. i. 1). (ELIAB 6; ELIEL 2).—3. In 1 Chr. xxvii. 18, Elihu "of the brethren of David" (according to ancient Hebrew tradition = ELIAB 3) is mentioned as chief of the tribe of Judah.—4. One of the captains of the thousands of Manasseh (1 Chr. xii. 20) who followed David to Ziklag after he had left the Philistine army on the eve of the battle of Gilboa, and assisted him against the marauding band of the Amalekites (compare 1 Sam. xxx.).—5. A Korhite Levite in the time of David; one of the doorkeepers of the house of Jehovah. He was a son of Shemaiah, and of the family of Obed-edom (1 Chr. xxvi. 7).

E-li-jah (fr. Heb. = my God is Jehovah, Ges.).

1. "Elijah the Tishbite" (in Apocrypha and N. T. ELIAS) has been well entitled "the grandest and the most romantic character that Israel ever produced." Certainly there is no personage in the O. T. whose career is more vividly portrayed, or who exercises on us a more remarkable fascination. His rare, sudden, and brief appearances—his undaunted courage and fiery zeal—the brilliancy of his triumphs—the pathos of his despondency—the glory of his departure, and the calm beauty of his reappearance on the Mount of Transfiguration—throw such a halo of brightness around him as is equalled by none of his compeers in the sacred story. The ignorance in which we are left of the circumstances and antecedents of the man who did and who suffered so much, doubtless contributes to enhance our interest in the story and the character. "Elijah the TISHBITE of the inhabitants of GILEAD" (1 K. xvii. 1) is literally all that is given us of his parentage and locality. He was from the country on the further side of the Jordan—a country of chase and pasture, of tent-villages and mountain-castles, inhabited by a people not settled and civilized like those of Ephraim and Judah, but of wandering, irregular habits, exposed to the attacks of the nomad tribes of the desert, and gradually conforming more and more to the habits of those tribes. Of his appearance as he "stood before" Ahab, with the suddenness of motion to this day characteristic of the Bedouins from his native hills, we can perhaps realize something from the touches, few, but strong, of the narrative. Of his height little is to be inferred; that little is in favor of its being beyond the ordinary size. His chief characteristic was his hair, long and thick, and hanging down his back; which, if not betokening the immense strength of Samson, yet accompanied powers of endurance no less remarkable. His ordinary clothing consisted (so Mr. Grove) of a girdle of skin round his loins (2 K. i. 8), which he tightened when about to move quickly (1 K. xviii. 46). But in addition to this he occasionally wore the MANTLE, or cape, of sheep-skin, which has supplied us with one of our most familiar figures of speech. In this mantle, in moments of emotion, he would hide his face (xix. 13), or when excited would roll it up as into a kind of staff. On one occasion we find him bending himself down upon the ground with his face between his knees. The solitary life in which these external peculiarities had been assumed had also nurtured that fierceness of zeal and that directness of address which so distinguished him. It was in the wild loneliness of the hills and ravines of Gilead that the knowledge of Jehovah, the living God of Israel, had been impressed on his mind, which was to form the subject of his mission to the idolatrous court and country of Israel. The northern kingdom had at this time forsaken almost entirely the faith in Jehovah. The worship of the calves (CALF; IDOLATRY) had been a departure from Ilm, it was a violation of His command against material resemblances; but still it would appear that even in the presence of the calves Jehovah was acknowledged, and they were at any rate a national institution, not one imported from the idolatries of any of the surrounding countries. But the case was quite different when AHAH introduced the foreign religion of his wife's family, the worship of the Phœnician BAAL. (ASHERAH; ASHTORETH; JEZEBEL.) It is as a witness against these two evils that Elijah comes forward.—I. What we may call the first act in his life embraces between three and four years—three years and six months for the duration of the drought, according to the N. T. (Lk. iv. 25; Jas. v. 17), and three or four months more for the journey to Horeb, and the return to Gilead (1 K. xvii. 1–xix. 21). His introduction is of the most startling description: he suddenly appears before Ahab, as with the unrestrained freedom of Eastern manners he would have no difficulty in doing, and proclaims the vengeance of Jehovah for the apostasy of the king. What immediate action followed on this we are not told; but it is plain that Elijah had to fly before some threatened vengeance either of the king, or more probably of the queen (compare xix. 2). Perhaps it was at this juncture that Jezebel “cut off the prophets of Jehovah” (xviii. 4). He was directed to the brook CHERITH. There in the hollow of the torrent-bed he remained, supported in the miraculous manner with which we are all familiar, till the failing of the brook obliged him to forsake it. His next refuge was at ZAREPHATH, a Phœnician town between Tyre and Sidon, certainly the last place at which the enemy of Baal would be looked for. The widow woman in whose house he lived seems, however, to have been an Israelite, and no Baal-worshipper, if we may take her adjuration by “Jehovah thy God” as an indication. Here Elijah performed the miracles of prolonging the oil and the meal; and restored the widow's son to life after his apparent death. In this, or some other retreat, an interval of more than two years must have elapsed. The drought continued, and at last the full horrors of famine, caused by the failure of the crops, descended on Samaria. The king and his chief domestic officer (OBADIAH 10) divided between them the mournful duty of ascertaining that neither round the springs, which are so frequent a feature of central Palestine, nor in the nooks and crannies of the most shaded torrent-beds, was there any of the herbage left, which in those countries is so certain an indication of the presence of moisture. It is the moment for the reappearance of the prophet. He shows himself first to the minister. There, suddenly planted in his path, is the man whom he and his master have been seeking for more than three years. Before the sudden apparition of that wild figure, and that stern, unbroken countenance, Obadiah could not but fall on his face. Elijah, however, soon calms his agitation—“As Jehovah of hosts liveth, before whom I stand, I will surely show myself to Ahab;” and thus relieved of his fear that, as on a former occasion, Elijah would disappear before he could return with the king, Obadiah departs to inform Ahab that the man they seek is there. Ahab arrived, Elijah makes his charge—“Thou hast forsaken Jehovah and followed the Baals.” He then commands that all Israel be collected to Mount CARMEL with the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, and the four hundred of Asherah (Ashtarothe), the latter being under the especial protection of the queen. There are few more sublime stories in history than this. On the one hand the solitary servant of Jehovah, accompanied by his one attendant; with his wild, shaggy hair, his scanty garb and sheepskin cloak, but with calm dignity of demeanor and the minutest regularity of procedure, repairing the ruined altar of Jehovah with twelve stones,—on the other hand the eight hundred and fifty prophets of Baal and Ashtarothe, doubtless in all the splendor of their vestments (2 K. x. 22), with the wild din of their vain repetitions, and the maddened fury of their disappointed hopes, and the silent people surrounding all. The conclusion of the long day need only be glanced at. The fire of Jehovah consuming both sacrifice and altar (MIRACLES; PROPHET)—the prophets of Baal killed, it would seem by Elijah's own hand (xviii. 40; compare Deut. xiii. 1–5, xviii. 20)—the king, with an apathy almost unintelligible, eating and drinking in the very midst of the carnage of his own adherents—the earnest prayer for rain (Jas. v. 18)—the rising storm—the ride across the plain to Jezreel, a distance of at least sixteen miles; the prophet, “the hand of the Lord” being on him, i. e. being supernaturally guided and strengthened, running before the chariot, but stopping short of the city, and going no further than the “entrance of Jezreel.” So far the triumph had been complete; but the spirit of Jezebel was not to be so easily overcome, and her first act is a vow of vengeance against the author of this destruction. Elijah takes refuge in flight. The danger was great, and the refuge must be distant. The first stage on the journey was Beer-sheba. Here Elijah halted. His servant—according to Jewish tradition the boy of Zarephath—he left in the town; while he himself set out alone into the wilderness. His spirit is quite broken, and he wanders forth over the dreary sweeps of those rocky hills wishing for death. But God, who had brought His servant into this difficulty, provided him with the means of escaping from it. The prophet was awakened from his dream of despondency beneath the solitary bush of the wilderness, was fed with the bread and the water which to this day are all a Bedouin's requirements, and went forward, in the strength of that food, a journey of forty days to the mount of God, even to Horeb. Here, in one of the numerous caverns in those awful mountains, he remained (A. V. “lodged”) for certainly one night. In the morning came the “word of Jehovah”—the question, “what doest thou here, Elijah?” In answer to this invitation the Prophet opens his griefs. He has been very zealous for Jehovah; but force has been vain; one cannot stand against a multitude; none follow him, and he is left alone, flying for his life from the sword which has slain his brethren. The reply comes in that ambiguous and indirect form in which it seems necessary that the deepest communications with the human mind should be couched, to be effectual. He is directed to leave the cavern, and stand on the mountain in the open air, face to face with Jehovah. Then, as before with Moses (Ex. xxxiv. 6), “The Lord passed by” in all the terror of His most appalling manifestations, like Elijah's own modes of procedure; and penetrating the dead silence which followed these, came the mysterious symbol—the “still small voice,” and still as it was it spoke in louder accents to the wounded heart of Elijah than the roar and blaze which had preceded it. To him no less unmistakably than to Moses, centuries before, it was proclaimed that Jehovah was “merciful and gracious, long-suffering and abundant in goodness and truth." Elijah knew the call, and at once stepping forward, and hiding his face in his mantle, stood waiting for the divine communication. It is in the same words as before, and so is his answer; but with what different force must the question have fallen on his ears, and the answer left his lips! In the seven thousand unknown worshippers who had not bowed the knee to Baal, was the assurance that Elijah was not alone. Three commands were laid on him—three changes were to be made. Instead of Ben-hadad, Hazael was to be king over Syria; instead of Ahab, Jehu was to be king of Israel; and ELISHA the son of Shaphat was to be his own successor. Of these three commands the two first were reserved for Elisha to accomplish, the last only was executed by Elijah himself. His first search was for Elisha. Apparently he soon found him; we must conclude at his native place, ABEL-MEHOLOAH. Elisha was ploughing at the time, and Elijah "passed over to him"—possibly crossed the river—and cast his mantle, the well-known sheepskin cloak, upon him, as if, by that familiar action, claiming him for his son. A moment of hesitation, and then commenced that long period of service and intercourse which continued till Elijah's removal, and which, after that time, procured for Elisha one of the best titles to esteem and reverence—"Elisha the son of Shaphat, who poured water on the hands of Elijah."—II. Ahab and Jezebel now probably believed that their threats had been effectual, and that they had seen the last of their tormentor (1 K. xxi.). After the murder of NABOTH, Ahab loses no time in entering on his new acquisition. But his triumph was a short one. Elijah had received an intimation from Jehovah of what was taking place, and rapidly as the accusation and death of Naboth had been hurried over, he was there to meet his ancient enemy on the very scene of his crime. And then follows the curse, in terms fearful to any Oriental—peculiarly terrible to a Jew—and most of all significant to a successor of the apostate princes of the northern kingdom. The whole of Elijah's denunciation may possibly be recovered by putting together the words recalled by Jehu, 2 K. ix. 26, 36, 37, and those given in 1 K. xxi. 19–26.—III. A space of three or four years now elapses (compare 1 K. xxii. 1, 51; 2 K. i. 17) before we again catch a glimpse of Elijah. Ahaziah, Ahab's son and successor, has met with a fatal accident, and is on his death-bed (2 K. i. 1, 2; 1 K. xxii. 51). In his extremity he sends to an oracle or shrine of Baal at the Philistine town of Ekron, to ascertain the issue of his illness. But the oracle is nearer at hand than the distant Ekron. An intimation is conveyed to the prophet, probably at that time inhabiting one of the recesses of Carmel, and, as on the former occasions, he suddenly appears on the path of the messengers, without preface or inquiry utters his message of death (2 K. i. 3, 4), and as rapidly disappears. But this check only roused the wrath of Ahaziah. A captain was dispatched, with a party of fifty, to take Elijah prisoner. "And there came down fire from heaven and consumed him and his fifty." A second party was sent, only to meet the same fate. In this execution of judgment Elijah was not gratifying his personal feelings, which our Lord's disciples afterward were inclined to do (Lk. ix. 58–59), but vindicating the honor of Jehovah, which was involved in the protection of His prophet against the impious violence of Ahaziah and his ungodly messengers (compare Ex. xvi. 7; Lk. x. 16). Hence a change in their course was followed by a change in the mode of dealing with them (compare 1 K. xxi. 28, 29). The altered tone of the leader of a third party brought Elijah down. But the message was delivered to the king's face in the same words as it had been to the messengers, and Elijah was allowed to go harmless.—IV. It must have been shortly after the death of Ahaziah that Elijah made a communication with the southern kingdom. When Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat began "to walk in the ways of the kings of Israel," Elijah sent him a letter denouncing his evil doings, and predicting his death (2 Chr. xxi. 12–15). In its contents the letter bears a strong resemblance to the speeches of Elijah, while in the details of style it is very peculiar and quite different from the narrative in which it is imbedded. Mr. Grove regards the chronological difficulty, that Elijah's removal must have taken place before Jehoshaphat's death (2 K. iii. 11), as solved by Jehoram's beginning to reign during Jehoshaphat's lifetime (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JEHO- RAM 2): but his slaying his brethren, which the writing reproves, was evidently after Jehoshaphat's death (compare 2 Chr. xxi. 1–4 with 13). The ancient Jewish commentators got over the apparent difficulty by saying that the letter was written and sent after Elijah's translation. Others believed it was the production of Elisha, for whose name that of Elijah had been substituted by copyists; others, that it was prepared by the spirit of prophecy before Elijah's departure, but not sent to Jehoram till afterward; others, that Elijah's name is associated with it, because it proceeded from the Elijah school of prophecy (2 K. ii.), of which he was still regarded as the ideal head (compare Mal. iv. 5). We cannot positively decide the matter, from lack of knowledge; but we can see that it may be explained in several different ways.—V. The closing transaction of Elijah's life introduces us to a locality heretofore unconnected with him (2 K. ii. 1, &c.). It was at GILGAL 2—probably on the western edge of the hills of Ephraim—that the prophet received the divine intimation that his departure was at hand. He was at the time with Elisha, who seems now to have become his constant companion, and whom he endeavors to persuade to remain behind while he goes on an errand of Jehovah. But Elisha will not so easily give up his master. They went together to Bethel. Again Elijah attempts to escape to Jericho, and again Elisha protests that he will not be separated from him. At Jericho he makes a final effort to avoid what they both so much dread. But Elisha is not to be conquered, and the two set off across the undulating plain of burning sand, to the distant river—Elijah in his "mantle" of sheepskin, Elisha in ordinary clothes. Fifty men of the sons of the prophets ascend the abrupt heights behind the town to watch what happens in the distance. Talking as they go, the two reach the river, and stand on the shelving bank beside its swift brown current. But they are not to stop even here. It is as if the aged Gileadite cannot rest till he again sets foot on his own side of the river. He rolls up his mantle as into a staff (A. V. "wrapped it together"), and with his old energy strikes the waters as Moses had done before him,—strikes them as if they were an enemy; and they are divided hither and thither, and the two go over on dry ground. "And it came to pass, as they still went on and talked, that, behold, a chariot of fire and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder, and Elijah went up by the (A. V. 'a') whirlwind into heaven." (MIRACLES).—And here ends all the information in the O. T. of the life and work of this great prophet. How deep was the impression which he made on the mind of the nation may be judged of from the fixed belief which many centuries after prevailed that Elijah would again appear for the relief and restoration of his country (Mat. xvi. 14; Mk. vi. 15; Jn. i. 21). (JOHN THE BAPTIST.) But on the other hand, the deep impression which Elijah had thus made on his nation only renders more remarkable the departure which the image conveyed by the later references to him evinces, from that so sharply presented in the records of his actual life. With the exception of the eulogiums in Eccles. xlviii. and 1 Mc. ii. 58, and the allusion in Lk. ix. 54, none of these later references allude to his works of destruction or of portent. They all set forth a very different side of his character from that brought out in the historical narrative. They speak of his being a man of like passions with ourselves (Jas. v. 17); of his kindness to the widow of Sarepta (Lk. iv. 26); of his "restoring all things" (Mat. xvii. 11); "turning the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just" (Mal. iv. 5, 6; Lk. i. 17). He appeared with Moses in heavenly light on the Mount of Transfiguration, and then talked to our Lord "of His decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem" (Mat. xvii. 1 ff.; Mk. ix. 2 ff.; Lk. ix. 28 ff.). Elijah has been canonized (St. Elias) in both the Greek and Latin churches, and is celebrated in the Latin church as connected with the great order of the barefooted Carmelites. (CARMEL 1.)—2. A priest of the sons of Harim, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 21).

El'-ka or El'-ka (Heb. God is rejecter, sc. of a people, Fii.), a Harodite, one of David's "thirty" valiant men (2 Sam. xxiii. 25).

Elim (fr. Heb. = trees, perhaps palm-trees, Ges.), the second station where the Israelites encamped after crossing the Red Sea, distinguished as having had "twelve wells (rather 'fountains') of water, and seventy palm-trees" (Ex. xv. 27; Num. xxxiii. 9). Laborer supposed Elim at Wady Useit, the second of four wadys lying between 29° 7', and 29° 20', which descend from the range of et-Tih (here nearly parallel to the shore) toward the sea. Stanley says "Elim must be Ghurundel, Useit, or Taiyibeh." Lepsius takes another view, that Elim is to be found in Wady Shubeikeh, the last of the four. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Elim'e-leh [-lek] (Heb. God is king, Ges., Fii.), a man of the tribe of Judah, and of the family of the Hezronites, who dwelt in Bethlehem-Ephratah in the days of the Judges. In consequence of a great dearth in the land, he went with his wife Naomi, and his two sons, Mahlon and Chilion, to dwell in Moab, where he and his sons died without posterity (Ru. i. 2, 3, &c.).

El-i-o-e-nal or El-i-o-e-na-l (Heb. toward Jehovah are my eyes, Ges.; = ELIOENAI and ELIENAI). 1. Eldest son of Neariah, the son of Shemaiah (1 Chr. iii. 23, 24).—2. Head of a family of the Simeonites (iv. 36).—3. A Benjaminite chief, son of Becher (vii. 8).—4. Seventh son of Meshelemiah, the son of Kore, of the sons of Asaph; a Korhite Levite, and a doorkeeper of the "house of Jehovah" (xxvi. 3).—5. A priest of the sons of Pashur, in Ezra's time, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 22): possibly = 6. mentioned in Neh. xii. 41, as one of the priests who accompanied Nehemiah with trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem.—7. An Israelite, of the sons of Zattu, who had also married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 27).

El-i-o-nas (Gr.). 1. ELIOENAI 5 (1 Esd. ix. 22).—2. ELIEZER 10 (1 Esd. ix. 32).

El'-phal or El'-phal (Heb. whom God judges, Ges.), son of Ur (1 Chr. xi. 35); = ELIPHELET 3.

El-iph'a-lat (Gr.) = ELIPHELET 6 (1 Esd. ix. 33).

El-iph'a-let (fr. Heb. = ELIPHELET). 1. The last of the thirteen sons born to David, after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chr. xiv. 7); = ELIPHELET 2.—2. ELIPHELET 5 (1 Esd. viii. 39).

El'-phaz or El'-phaz (Heb. God his strength, Ges.). 1. Son of Esau and Adah, and father of TEMAN, AMALEK, &c., "dukes in the land of Edom" (Gen. xxxvi. 4, 10-12, 15, 16; 1 Chr. i. 35, 36).—2. The chief of the "three friends" of JOB. He is called "the Temanite;" hence it is naturally inferred that he was a descendant of Teman, son of No. 1. On him falls the main burden of the argument that God's retribution in this world is perfect and certain, and that consequently suffering must be a proof of previous sin (Job iv., v., xv., xxii.). The great truth brought out by him is the unapproachable majesty and purity of God (iv. 12-21, xv. 12-16). Still he, with the other two friends, is condemned for having, in defence of God's providence, spoken of Him "the thing that is not right." On sacrifice and the intercession of Job all three are pardoned (xlii. 7-9).

El-iph'e-leh (fr. Heb. = whom God makes distinguished, Ges.), a Levite of the second order; one of the gate-keepers appointed by David to play on the harp "on the Sheminith" on the occasion of bringing up the ark to the city of David (1 Chr. xv. 18, 21).

El-iph'e-let (Heb. God his deliverance). 1. A son of David, born to him after his establishment in Jerusalem (1 Chr. iii. 6); = ELIPHALET.—2. Another son of David, born also in Jerusalem (iii. 8); = ELIPHALET 1.—3. Son of Abisbai, son of the Maachathite; one of David's "thirty" warriors (2 Sam. xxiii. 34); = ELIPHAL.—4. Son of Eshek, a descendant of king Saul through Jonathan (1 Chr. viii. 39).—5. A leader of the sons of Adonikam, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 13).—6. One of the sons of Hashum in Ezra's time who had married a foreign wife (x. 33).

El-i-s'a-beth [-liz-] (Gr. fr. Heb. = ELISHEBA), the wife of Zacharias, and mother of JOHN THE BAPTIST (Lk. i. 5 ff.). She was herself of the priestly family, and a relation (i. 36) of the mother of our Lord. (MARY THE VIRGIN.) She was a person of great piety, and was the first to greet Mary, on her coming to visit her, as the mother of our Lord (i. 42 ff.).

El-i-se-us (L. Elisæus, fr. Heb. ELISHA), the form in which the name ELISHA appears in the A. V. of the Apocrypha and the N. T. (Eccles. xlviii. 12; Lk. iv. 27).

El'-sha (Heb. God his salvation, Ges.; in N. T. and Apocrypha ELISEUS), son of Shaphat of ARI-MEHOIAH; the attendant and disciple of ELIJAH, and subsequently his successor as PROPHET of the kingdom of Israel. The earliest mention of his name is in the command to Elijah in the cave at Horeb (1 K. xix. 16, 17). But our first introduction to the future prophet is in the fields of his native place, probably in the valley of the Jordan. Elijah, on his way from Sinai to Damascus by the Jordan valley, lights on his successor engaged in the labors of the field. To cross to him, to throw over his shoulders the rough mantle—a token at once of investiture with the prophet's office, and of adoption, as a son—was to Elijah but the work of an instant, and the prophet strode on as if what he had done were nothing—"Go back again, for what have I done unto thee?" Elisha was not a man who, having put his hand to the plough, was likely to look back; he delayed merely to give the farewell kiss to his father and mother, and preside at a parting feast with his people, and then followed the great prophet on his northward road, to become to him what Joshua had been to Moses. Seven or eight years must have passed between the call of Elisha and the removal of his master, and during the whole of that time we hear nothing of him. But when that period has elapsed he reappears, to become the most prominent figure in the history of his country during the rest of his long life. In almost every respect Elisha presents the most complete contrast to Elijah. The copious collection of his sayings and doings preserved in 2 K. iii.-ix., though in many respects deficient in that remarkable vividness which we have noticed in the records of Elijah, is yet full of testimonies to this contrast. Elijah was a true child of the desert, like a Bedouin. The clefts of the Cherith, the wild shrubs of the desert, the cave at Horeb, the top of Carmel, were his haunts and his resting-places. If he enters a city, it is only to deliver his message of fire and be gone. Elisha, on the other hand, is a civilized man, an inhabitant of cities (ii. 18, 25, v. 3, 9, 24, vi. 14, 32). And as with his manners so with his appearance. The slight touches of the narrative show that his dress was the ordinary garment of an Israelite, the Heb. beged (A. V. "clothes;" see DRESS, III. 4; 2 K. ii. 12), that his hair was worn trimmed behind (so Mr. Grove; rather, he was bald) in contrast to the disordered locks of Elijah (ii. 23, as explained below), and that he used a walking-staff (iv. 29) of the kind ordinarily carried by grave or aged citizens (Zech. viii. 4). If from these external peculiarities we turn to the internal characteristics of the two, and to the results which they produced on their contemporaries, the differences are highly instructive. Elijah was emphatically a destroyer. His mission was to slay and demolish whatever opposed or interfered with the rights of Jehovah. Elisha was the healer, strikingly characterized by beneficence. On him Elijah's mantle descended, and he was gifted with a double portion of his spirit. By his miracles of mercy (so Mr. Ayre), Elisha gained an influence over even irreligious princes; he was the bulwark of the land against foreign foes; he was a witness for God, known among the neighboring nations, and teaching them that the only true God was Jehovah, God of Israel; he fostered the prophetic schools, and thus preserved a nucleus of piety in the nation, where doubtless were many more than the 7,000 of Elijah's time who had never bowed the knee at any idol altar. The call of Elisha seems to have taken place about four years before the death of Ahab. He died in the reign of Joash, the grandson of Jehu. This embraces a period of not less than 65 years, for certainly 55 of which he held the office of "prophet in Israel" (v. 8).—I. After the departure of his master, Elisha returned to dwell at Jericho (ii. 18). The town had been lately rebuilt (1 K. xvi. 34), and was the residence of a body of the "sons of the prophets" (2 K. ii. 5, 15), who earnestly sought and finally obtained from Elisha permission to send fifty of their number to search the land for Elijah. But their three days' search was in vain (ii. 16, 17). No one who has visited the site of Jericho can forget how prominent a feature in the scene are the two perennial springs which rise at the base of the steep hills of Quarantania behind the town. One of the springs was noxious at the time of Elisha's visit. At the request of the men of Jericho he remedied this evil. He took salt in a new vessel, and cast it into the water at its source in the name of Jehovah. From the time of Josephus to the present, the tradition of the cure has been attached to the large spring nearly two miles N. W. of the present town, which now bears, probably in reference to some later event, the name of 'Ain es-Sultan.—II. We next meet with Elisha at BETHEL, the seat of Jeroboam's calf-worship as well as of a school of the prophets, on his way from Jericho to Mount Carmel (ii. 23). His last visit had been made in company with Elijah on their road down to the Jordan (ii. 2). The road to the town winds up the defile of the Wady Sueeinit. Here the boys of the town were clustered, waiting, as they still wait at the entrance of the villages of Palestine, for the chance passer-by. In the short-trimmed locks of Elisha, how were they to recognize the successor of the prophet, with whose shaggy hair streaming over his shoulders they were all familiar? So with the license of the Eastern children they scoff at the new-comer as he walks by—"Go up, roundhead! go up, roundhead!" (So Mr. Grove, after Ewald. But Gesenius and most interpreters agree with the A. V. in the translation "bald-head." Gesenius makes the Heb. = a bald-head, having a bald spot on the crown or hinder part of the head.) For once Elisha assumed the sternness of his master. He turned upon them and cursed them in the name of Jehovah, and "there came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them." Elisha thus vindicated, against rudeness, infidelity, and impiety, his title to respect as a prophet of the living God (compare i. 9-12; ELIJAH).—III. Elisha extricates Jehoram king of Israel, and the kings of Judah and Edom, from their difficulty in the campaign against Moab, arising from want of water (iii. 4-27). This incident probably took place at the S. E. end of the Dead Sea.—IV. The widow of one of the sons of the prophets is in debt, and her two sons are about to be taken from her and sold as slaves (iv. 1 ff.). She has no property but a pot of oil. This Elisha causes (in his absence, iv. 5) to multiply, until the widow has filled with it all the vessels which she could borrow.—V. The next occurrence is at Shunem and Mount Carmel (iv. 8-37). The story divides itself into two parts, separated from each other by several years. (a.) Elisha, probably on his way between Carmel and the Jordan valley, calls accidentally at Shunem. Here he is hospitably entertained by a woman of substance, apparently at that time ignorant of the character of her guest. There is no occasion here to quote the details of this charming narrative. (b.) An interval has elapsed of several years. The boy is now old enough to accompany his father to the corn-field, where the harvest is proceeding. The fierce rays of the morning sun are too powerful for him, and he is carried home to his mother only to die at noon. She says nothing of their loss to her husband, but, depositing her child on the bed of the man of God, at once starts in quest of him to Mount Carmel, fifteen or sixteen miles. No explanation is needed to tell Elisha the exact state of the case. The heat of the season will allow of no delay in taking the necessary steps, and Gehazi is at once dispatched to run back to Shunem with the utmost speed. He takes the prophet's walking-staff in his hand which he is to lay on the face of the child. The mother and Elisha follow in haste. Before they reach the village the sun of that long, anxious summer afternoon must have set. Gehazi meets them on the road, but he has no reassuring report to give, the placing of the staff on the face of the dead boy had called forth no sign of life. Then Elisha enters the house, goes up to his own chamber, "and he shut the door upon them twain, and prayed unto Jehovah." The child is restored to life.—VI. The scene now changes to GILGAL 2, apparently at a time when Elisha was residing there (iv. 38-41). The sons of the prophets are sitting round him. It is a time of famine. The food of the party must consist of any herbs that can be found. The great caldron is put on at the command of Elisha, and one of the company brings his blanket full of such wild vegetables (Gourd 2) as he has collected, and empties it into the pottage. But no sooner have they begun their meal than the taste betrays the presence of some noxious herb, and they cry out, "There is death in the pot, O man of God!" In this case the cure was effected by meal which Elisha cast into the pottage in the caldron.—VII. (iv. 42-44). This probably belongs to the same time, and also to the same place as the preceding. A man from Baal-shalisha brings the man of God a present of the first-fruits, which under the law (Num. xviii. 8, 12; Deut. xviii. 3, 4) were the perquisite of the ministers of the sanctuary. This moderate provision is by the word of Jehovah rendered more than sufficient for 100 men.—VIII. The simple records of these domestic incidents amongst the sons of the prophets are now interrupted by an occurrence of a more important character (v. 1-27). The chief captain of the army of Syria (NAAMAN), to whom his country was indebted for some signal success, was afflicted with leprosy. One of the members of his establishment was an Israelite girl, kidnapped by the Syrian marauders in one of their forays over the border, and she brings into that household the fame of the name and skill of Elisha. The news is communicated by Naaman himself to the king. Ben-hadad had yet to learn the position and character of Elisha. He writes to the king of Israel a letter very characteristic of a military prince. With this letter, and with a present, and a full retinue of attendants (13, 15, 23), Naaman proceeds to Samaria. The king of Israel is dismayed; but in consequence of a message from the prophet, Naaman goes to Elisha's house with his whole cavalcade. Elisha still keeps in the background, and, while Naaman stands at the doorway, contents himself with sending out a messenger with the simple direction to bathe seven times in the Jordan. The independent behavior of the prophet, and the simplicity of the prescription, all combined to enrage Naaman. His servants, however, knew how to deal with the quick but not ungenerous temper of their master, and the result is that he goes down to the Jordan and dips himself seven times, "and his flesh came again like the flesh of a little child, and he was clean." His first business after his cure is to thank his benefactor. He returns with "all his company," and this time he will not be denied the presence of Elisha, but making his way in, and standing before him, he gratefully acknowledges the power of the God of Israel, and entreats him to accept the present which he has brought from Damascus. Elisha is firm, and refuses the offer, though repeated with the strongest adjuration. But Gehazi cannot allow such treasures thus to escape him. So he frames a story by which the generous Naaman is made to send back with him to Elisha's house a considerable present in money and clothes. He then went in and stood before his master as if nothing had happened. But the prophet was not to be so deceived. His heart had gone after his servant through the whole transaction, even to its minutest details, and he visits Gehazi with the tremendous punishment of the leprosy, from which he had just relieved Naaman.—IX. (vi. 1-7). We now return to the sons of the prophets, but this time the scene appears to be changed, and is probably at Jericho, and during the residence of Elisha there. Their habitation had become too small. They therefore move to the close neighborhood of the Jordan, and cutting down beams make there a new dwelling-place. As one of them was cutting at a tree overhanging the stream, the iron of his axe flew off and sank into the water. His cry soon brought the man of God to his aid. The stream of the Jordan is deep up to the very bank, especially when the water is so low as to leave the wood dry, and is moreover so turbid that search would be useless. But the place at which the lost axe entered the water is shown to Elisha; he breaks off a stick and casts it into the stream, and the iron appears on the surface, and is recovered by its possessor.—X. (vi. 8-23). Elisha is now residing at DOTHAN, halfway between Samaria and Jezreel. The incursions of the Syrian marauding bands (compare v. 2) still continue; but apparently with greater boldness. Their manœuvres are not hid from the man of God, and by his warnings he saves the king "not once nor twice." A strong party with chariots is dispatched to capture Elisha. They march by night, and before morning take up their station round the base of the eminence on which the ruins of Dothan still stand. Elisha's servant—not Gehazi, but apparently a new-comer—is the first to discover the danger. But Elisha remains unmoved by his fears; and at his request the eyes of the youth are opened to behold the spiritual guards which are protecting them. Again he prays to Jehovah, and the whole of the Syrian warriors are struck blind. Then descending, he offers to lead them to the person and the place they seek. He conducts them to Samaria. There, at the prayer of the prophet, their sight is restored, and they find themselves not in a retired country village, but in the midst of the capital of Israel, and in the presence of the king and his troops. The king, eager to destroy them, at Elisha's word feeds them, and sends them away to their master. After such a repulse, it is not surprising that the marauding forays of the Syrian troops ceased.—XI. (vi. 24-vii. 2). But the king of Syria could not rest under such dishonor. He abandons his marauding system, and gathers a regular army, with which he lays siege to SAMARIA. The awful extremities to which the inhabitants of the place were driven need not here be recalled. (DOVE'S DUNG.) The king—Joram (so Josephus)—vents his wrath on the prophet; his emissary starts to execute the sentence; Elisha receives a miraculous intimation of the danger, and orders the door to be shut; the messenger arrives, followed immediately by the king and one of his officers. The king's hereditary love of Baal bursts forth: "This evil is from Jehovah," the ancient enemy of my house, "why should I wait for Jehovah any longer?" Elisha answers, predicting plenty on the morrow. This the officer declares incredible. Elisha replies: "Thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof"—a prediction which was fulfilled on the following day of plenty, after the Syrians had deserted their camp, by his being trodden upon in the gate by the people, so that he died (vii. 20).—XII. (viii. 1-6). We now go back several years to an incident connected with the woman of Shunem, at a period antecedent to the cure of Naaman and the transfer of his leprosy to Gehazi (v. 1, 27). Elisha had been made aware of a famine which Jehovah was about to bring upon the land for seven years; and he had warned his friend the Shunammite thereof that she might provide for her safety. At the end of the seven years she returned to her native place, to find that during her absence her house with the field-land attached to it had been appropriated by some other person. To the king, therefore, the Shunammite had recourse. And now occurred one of those rare coincidences which it is impossible not to ascribe to something more than mere chance. At the very moment of the entrance of the woman and her son, the king was listening to a recital by Gehazi of "all the great things which Elisha had done," the crowning feat of all being that which he was then actually relating—the restoration to life of the boy of Shunem. The woman and her son were instantly recognized by Gehazi. From her own mouth the king hears the repetition of the wonderful tale, and, whether from regard to Elisha, or struck by the extraordinary coincidence, orders her land to be restored with the value of all its produce during her absence.—XIII. (viii. 7-15). Hitherto we have met with the prophet only in his own country. We now find him at Damascus. He is there to carry out the command given to Elijah on Horeb to anoint HAZAEL to be king over Syria. At the time of his arrival, BEN-HADAD was prostrate with his last illness. The king's first desire is naturally to ascertain his own fate; and Hazael is commissioned to be the bearer of a present to the prophet, and to ask the question on the part of his master, "Shall I recover of this disease?" The present is one of royal dimensions; a caravan of forty camels, laden with the riches and luxuries which that wealthy city could alone furnish. The reply, probably originally ambiguous, is doubly uncertain in the present doubtful state of the Hebrew text in verse 10; but the general conclusion was unmistakable:—"Jehovah hath showed me that he shall surely die." But this was not all that had been revealed to the prophet. If Ben-hadad died, who would be king in his stead but the man who now stood before him? The prospect was one which drew forth the tears of the man of God. At Hazael's request, Elisha confesses the reason of his tears. But the prospect is one which has no sorrow for Hazael. His only doubt is the possibility of such good fortune for one so mean. "But what is thy slave, dog that he is, that he should do this great thing?" To which Elisha replies, "Jehovah hath showed me that thou wilt be king over Syria." Returning to the king, Hazael tells him only half the dark saying of the man of God—"He told me that thou shouldest surely recover." But that was the last day of Ben-hadad's life.—XIV. (ix. 1-10). Two of the injunctions laid on Elijah had now been carried out; the third still remained. The time was come for the fulfilment of the curse upon Ahab by anointing

JEHU king over Israel. Elisha's personal share in the transaction was confined to giving directions to one of the sons of the prophets.—XV. Beyond this we have no record of Elisha's having taken any part in the revolution of Jehu, or the events which followed it. He does not again appear till we find him on his deathbed in his own house (xiii. 14-19). King Joash, Jehu's grandson, is come to weep over the approaching departure of the great and good prophet. His words are the same as Elisha's when Elijah was taken away, "My father! my father! the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" But one final effort against Syria must be made before Elisha's aid becomes unobtainable. At the prophet's command "the arrow of Jehovah's deliverance" is discharged toward Syria, and thrice the king smote the bundle of arrows on the ground, "and stayed. And the man of God was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldest have smitten five or six times, then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst conquered it; whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice." (Joash 2.)—XVI. (xiii. 20-22). The power of the prophet, however, does not terminate with his death. Even in the tomb he restores the dead to life. It is the only instance in the whole Bible of restoration wrought by the inanimate remains of prophet or saint.—We must not omit to notice the parallel which Elisha presents to our Lord—the more necessary because, unlike the resemblance between Elijah and John the Baptist, no attention is called to it in the N. T. It is not merely because he healed a leper, raised a dead man, or increased the loaves, that Elisha resembled Christ, but rather because of that loving, gentle temper and kindness of disposition—characteristic of him above all the saints of the O. T.—ever ready to soothe, to heal, and to conciliate, which attracted to him women and simple people, and made him the universal friend and "father," not only consulted by kings and generals, but resorted to by widows and poor prophets in their little troubles and perplexities.—Elisha is canonized in the Greek church. His day is June 14.

E-l'shah (Heb. firm binding, firm bond, Sim.; see below), the eldest son of Javan and grandson of Japheth (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chr. i. 7). The residence of his descendants is described in Ez. xxvii. 7, as the "isles of Elishah," whence the Phenicians obtained their purple and blue dyes. Josephus identified the race of Elishah with the Æolians, who were one of the two leading Greek tribes, and formerly inhabited Thessaly, Bœotia, Anatolia, Peloponnesus, &c. His view is adopted by Knobel and Fürst in preference to the more generally received opinion of Bochart, Gesenius, &c., that Elishah = Ætis (a district of the Peloponnesus), and in a more extended sense Peloponnesus, and to the view of Michaelis, that Elishah = Hellus (i. e. ancient Greece). It appears correct to treat it as the designation of a race rather than of a locality. GREEK.

E-l'sh'a-ma (Heb. whom God hears, Ges.). 1. Son of Ammihud; the "prince" or "captain" of the tribe of Ephraim in the Wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 10, ii. 18, vii. 48, 53, x. 22); grandfather of JOSHUA 1 (1 Chr. vii. 26).—2. A son of King David, born of one of his wives after his establishment in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chr. iii. 8, xiv. 7).—3. Another son of David (iii. 6), also called ELISHUA.—4. A descendant of Judah; son of Jekamiah (ii. 41); apparently identified in Jewish traditions with—5. The father of Nethaniah and grandfather of ISHMAEL 6 (2 K. xxv. 25; Jer. xli. 1).—6.

Scribe to King Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxvi. 12, 20, 21).—7. A priest in Jehoshaphat's time, sent to teach the people (2 Chr. xvii. 8).

E-lsh'e-phat (Heb. whom God judges, Ges.), son of Zichri; one of the captains of hundreds in the time of Jehoiada (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).

E-lsh'e-ba (Heb. God her oath, i. e. worshipper of God, Ges.), the wife of AARON (Ex. vi. 23). She was daughter of Amminadab, and sister of NAHSHON the captain of Judah.

El-i-shu'a or E-lsh'u-a (Heb. God his salvation, Ges.), one of David's sons, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. xiv. 5); = ELISHAMA 3.

E-lis'i-mus = ELIASHUB 5 (1 Esd. ix. 28).

E-l'i-a (= ELIHU), ancestor of Judith (Jd. viii. 1).

E-l'ud (L. fr. Heb. = God of the Jews), son of Achim in the genealogy of Christ (Mat. i. 14, 15).

E-liz'a-phan (fr. Heb. = whom God protects, Ges.). 1. A Levite, son of Uzziel, chief of the Kohathites at the census in the Wilderness of Sinai (Num. iii. 20).—2. Son of Parnach; the prince of Zebulun who assisted in the division of Canaan (xxxiv. 25).

E-l'zar (fr. Heb. = God his rock, Ges.), son of Shedeur; prince of Reuben in the Wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 5, ii. 10, vii. 30, 35, x. 18).

El'ka-nah (Heb. whom God created, Ges.). 1. A Kohathite Levite, son or rather grandson (1 Chr. vi. 23; [Heb. 8]) of Korah (Ex. vi. 24).—2. A descendant of No. 1, son of Joel (1 Chr. vi. 25, 36).—3. Another descendant of No. 1 in the line of Ahimoth, otherwise Mahath (vi. 26, 35 [Heb. 11, 20]).—4. Another Kohathite Levite, in the line of Heman the singer; son of Jeroham, and father of SAMUEL the Prophet (vi. 27, 34). He lived at Ramathaim-zophim, in Mount Ephraim, in Eli's time; was a pious man of some wealth who went up yearly to Shiloh to worship and sacrifice; had two wives, HANNAH and Peninnah, and children by the latter but none by the former, till the birth of Samuel, after which he had by Hannah three sons and two daughters (1 Sam. i. 1, 4, 8, 19, 21, 23, ii. 2, 20).—5. A Levite (1 Chr. ix. 16); perhaps the same as—6. A doorkeeper of the Ark in David's time (xv. 23).—7. A Korhite who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 6).—8. An officer in the household of Ahaz, king of Judah, slain by Zichri the Ephraimite, when Pekah invaded Judah. He seems to have been the second in command under the prefect of the palace (2 Chr. xxviii. 7).

El'kosh (Heb. God's bow, i. e. power, might, Fül.), the birthplace of the prophet NAHUM, hence called "the Elkoshite" (Nah. i. 1). Two widely differing Jewish traditions assign as widely different localities to this place. In the time of Jerome it was believed to exist in a small village of Galilee. According to Schwartz, the grave of Nahum is shown at Kefr Tanchum, a village two and a half English miles N. of Tiberias. But mediaeval tradition attached the fame of the prophet's burial-place to El'kush, a village E. of the Tigris, near the monastery of Rabban Hormezd, and about thirty miles N. of Mosul (B. S. ix. 642-3). The former is more in accordance with the internal evidence afforded by the prophecy, which gives no sign of having been written in Assyria.

El'la-sar (Heb. oak of Assyria? Jerusalem Targum, Fül.) (Gen. xiv. 1, 9) has been considered a district or region = THELASAR; but Rawlinson regards it as the city of Arioch, and the Hebrew representative of the old Chaldean town called in the native dialect Larsa or Larancha. Larsa was a town of Lower Babylonia or Chaldaea, situated nearly halfway between Ur (Mugheir) and Erech (Warka), on the left bank of the Euphrates. It is now Senkerch.

Elm (Hos. iv. 13). OAK 2.

El-mo'dam (Gr., apparently = ALMODAN), son of Er, in the genealogy of Joseph (Lk. iii. 28).

El'na-am (Heb. God his delight, Ges.), the father of Jeribai and Joshaviah, two of David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 46).

El'na-than or El-na'than (Heb. whom God has given = Theodore, Ges.). 1. The maternal grandfather of Jehoiachin, distinguished as "Eliathan of Jerusalem" (2 K. xxiv. 8); doubtless = EL-nathan the son of Achbor (Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12, 25).—2. The name of three among the "chief men" and "men of understanding" in Ezra's time (Ezr. viii. 16).

* El'o'him, a Heb. pl. applied as a pl. of excellence to the true "God" (JEROVAH), or as a simple pl. to the "gods" (IDOL) of the heathen.

E'lon (fr. Heb. = OAK, Ges.). 1. A Hittite, whose daughter (ADAH; BASHMATH) was one of Esau's wives (Gen. xxvi. 34, xxxvi. 2).—2. The second of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. xli. 14; Num. xxvi. 26); founder of the family of the ELOSITES.—3. "Elon the Zebulonite" judged Israel ten years, and was buried in Aijalon in Zebulun (Judg. xii. 11, 12).

E'lon (fr. Heb. = OAK, Ges.), a city in the border of Dan (Josh. xix. 43); not identified.

E'lon-beth-ha'nan (fr. Heb. = oak of the house of grace) is named with two Danite towns in one of Solomon's commissariat districts (1 K. iv. 9).

E'lon-ites, the (Num. xxvi. 26). ELON 2.

Eloth = ELATH (1 K. ix. 26; 2 K. xvi. 6 margin; 2 Chr. viii. 17, xxvi. 2).

Elpa-al (Heb. God his wages, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Hushim and brother of Abitub (1 Chr. viii. 11); founder of a numerous family.

Elpa-let (Heb. = ELIPHLEET), one of David's sons born in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xiv. 5); = ELIPHLEET 1.

El-pa'ran (fr. Heb. = the terebinth or OAK of PARAN) (Gen. xiv. 6). PARAN.

El'te-keb (Heb. God its fear, Ges.), a city in the border of Dan (Josh. xiv. 44), allotted to the Kohathite Levites (xxi. 23).

El'te-kon (Heb. God its foundation, Ges.), a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 59). WILSON (i. 387) suggests that Eltekon perhaps = TEKOA.

El'to-lad (Heb. perhaps = God its race or posterity, Ges.), a city in the S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 50), allotted to Simeon (xix. 4), and in possession of that tribe until the time of David (1 Chr. iv. 29). (TOLAD.) Wilton (The Negeb) places it in the Wady el-Thoula or Lusdan, sixty or seventy miles S. of Gaza. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, under "South Country") supposes its site may be in Wady Salud, thirty or forty miles S. E. of Gaza.

El'ul (Heb.) (Neh. vi. 15; 1 Mc. xiv. 27). MONTH.

El-u'zal or E-lu'za-l (Heb. God is my praise, i. e. the object of my praise, Ges.), one of the warriors of Benjamin, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5).

Ely-me'ans (fr. Gr.) = ELAMITES (Jd. i. 6). ELYMAIS.

* Ely-ma'is (Gr. = ELAN), the country of the Elymeans (Tob. ii. 10); a district of the Persian empire, E. of Susiana (so Strabo); a part of Su-siana on the Persian gulf (so Ptolemy). A city Elynais (1 Mc. vi. 1) has no existence (so Winer). ELAM; NANEIA.

El'y-mas (L. fr. Ar. = wise, learned, Rbn. N. T. Lxx. [MAGI], a name of the Jewish sorcerer (MAGIC) BAR-JESUS, who had attached himself to the proconsul of Cyprus, SERGIUS PAULUS (Acts xiii. 6 ff.). On his attempting to dissuade the proconsul from embracing the Christian faith, he was struck with miraculous blindness by the Apostle PAUL.

El'za-bad (Heb. whom God has given = Theodore, Ges.). 1. One of the Gadite heroes who came across the Jordan to David in the wilderness of Judah (1 Chr. xii. 12).—2. A Korhite Levite, son of Shemaiah, and grandson of Obed-edom (xxvi. 7).

in connection with this people that the two instances in the O. T. are mentioned (Gen. i. 2, 26). Of the Egyptian method of embalming there remain two minute accounts (by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus), which have a general kind of agreement, though they differ in details. Herodotus (ii. 86-89) describes three modes, varying in completeness and expense, and practised by persons regularly trained to the profession, who were initiated into the mysteries of the art by their ancestors. The most costly mode, which is estimated by Diodorus Siculus (i. 91) at a talent of silver (more than $1,000), was said by the Egyptian priests to belong to him whose name in such a matter it was not lawful to mention, viz. Osiris. The embalmers first removed part of the brain through the nostrils, by means of a crooked iron, and destroyed the rest by injecting caustic drugs. An incision was then made along the flank with a sharp Ethiopian stone, and the whole of the intestines removed. The cavity was rinsed out with palm-wine, and afterward scoured with pounded perfumes. It was then filled with pure myrrh pounded, cassia, and other aromatics, except frankincense. This done, the body was sewn up and steeped in natron for seventy days. When the seventy days were accomplished, the embalmers washed the corpse and swathed it in bandages of linen, cut in strips and smeared with gum. They then gave it up to the relatives of the deceased, who provided for it a wooden case, made in the shape of a man, in which the dead was placed, and deposited in an erect position against the wall of the sepulchral chamber. Diodorus Siculus omits all mention of the steeping in natron, but gives some particulars omitted by Herodotus. When the body was laid out for embalming, the scribe marked out the part of the left flank for the incision. The dissector then hastily cut through as much flesh as the law enjoined, and fled, pursued by curses and volleys of stones from the spectators. One embalmer extracted the intestines, except the heart and kidneys; another cleansed and rinsed them in palm wine and perfumes. The body was then washed with oil of cedar, &c., for more than thirty days, and afterward sprinkled with myrrh, cinnamon, &c.

The second mode of embalming cost about twenty minæ=one-third of a talent. In this case no incision was made in the body, nor were the intestines removed, but cedar-oil was injected into the stomach by the rectum. The oil was prevented from escaping, and the body was then steeped in natron for the appointed number of days. On the last day the oil was withdrawn, and carried off with it the stomach and intestines in a state of solution, while the flesh was consumed by the natron, and nothing was left but the skin and bones. The body in this state was returned to the relatives of the deceased. The third mode, which was adopted by the poorer classes, and cost but little, consisted in rinsing out the intestines with syrmæa, an infusion of senna and cassia, and steeping the body for the usual number of days in natron. The medicaments employed in embalming were various. From a chemical analysis of the substances found in mummies, M. Rouelle detected three modes of embalming—1. with asphaltum, or Jew's pitch, called also funeral gum, or gum of mummies; 2. with a mixture of asphaltum and cedria, the liquor distilled from the cedar; 3. with this mixture together with some resinous and aromatic ingredients. The powdered aromatics mentioned by Herodotus were not mixed with the bituminous matter, but sprinkled into the cavities of the body. But the differences in the descriptions of Herodotus and Diodorus, and the impossibility of reconciling these descriptions in all points with the results of scientific observations upon existing mummies, lead to the conclusion that these descriptions, if correct in themselves, do not include every method of embalming which was practised, and that consequently any discrepancies between them and the Bible narrative cannot be fairly attributed to a want of accuracy in the latter. The events of Genesis were more than 1,000 years before Herodotus, who lived 400 years before Diodorus. The Egyptians practised embalming (so Herodotus) in accordance with their peculiar doctrine of the transmigra-tion of souls. When the practice ceased entirely is unknown. It does not appear that embalming, properly so called, was practised by the Hebrews. BURIAL; EGYPT.

Em-broid'er-er, in the A. V. = the Heb. rôkém, the productions of the art being described as "needlework" or "broidered work" (Heb. rikmah). In Exodus xxxv. 35, &c., the embroiderer is contrasted with the "cunning workman" (Heb. hōshēb or chōshēb). Various explanations have been offered as to the distinction between them, but most of these overlook the distinction marked in the Bible itself, viz. that the "embroiderer" wove simply a variegated texture, without gold thread or figures, and that the "cunning workman" interwove gold thread or figures into the variegated texture. The distinction, as given by the Talmudists, Gesenius, and Bähr, is this—that rikmah, or "needlework," was where a pattern was attached to the stuff by being sewn on to it on one side, and the work of the "cunning workman" when the pattern was worked into the stuff by the loom, and so appeared on both sides. This view appears (so Mr. Bevan) to be entirely inconsistent with the statements of the Bible, and with the sense of the word rikmah elsewhere. The absence of the figure or the gold thread in the one, and its presence in the other, constitute the essence of the distinction. The word translated "cunning workman" involves the idea of invention or designing patterns; that translated "needlework" the idea of texture as well as variegated color, also of a regular disposition of colors, which demanded no inventive genius. The Heb. verb shābats, translated in the A. V. "embroider" (Ex. xxviii. 39), and its derivative tashbēts, translated "broidered" in ver. 4, refer to stuff worked in a tesseled manner, i. e. with square cavities such as stones might be set in (the same verb is translated "set" in ver. 20). The art of embroidery by the loom was extensively practised among the nations of antiquity. In addition to the Egyptians, the Babylonians were celebrated for it (BABYLONISH GARMENT); but embroidery in the proper sense of the term, i. e. with the needle, was a Phrygian invention of later date (Pliny viii. 48). DRESS; GIRDLE.

Em'e-rald, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. nōphech, a precious stone, first in the second row on the breastplate of the high-priest (Ex. xxviii. 18, xxxix. 11), imported to Tyre from Syria (Ez. xxvii. 16), used as an ornament of clothing (xxviii. 13, margin "chrysoprase"). In Exodus, and perhaps in Ezekiel xxviii. 13, the LXX. translate by anthrax, and the Vulgate by carbunculus (see CARBUNCLE 3); in Ezekiel xxvii. both vary from the Hebrew, and give no equivalent for this word. Gesenius translates "a gem, precious stone, of an uncertain kind." Fürst has "a carbuncle, or a ruby." (Contrast CARBUNCLE 2.)—2. Gr. smaragdus, a precious stone, used as a seal or signet (Ecclus. xxxii. 6), as an ornament of bed furniture (Jd. x. 21), and spoken of as one of the foundations of Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19; Tob. xiii. 16). The rainbow round the throne is compared to emerald in Rev. iv. 3. Under this Greek name the ancients comprehended not only the true emerald, but also green carbonate of copper or malachite, also sulphate of copper (chrysocolla), and other stones, more or less transparent, of similar color. The emerald, as a gem, ranks in value next to the diamond and ruby. It is a compound of silica, alumina, and glucina, and differs from BERYL in its rich green color, which is due to oxide of chrome.

Em'e-rods (Heb. 'āphōlīm, tēhōrīm or tēlōrīm), a disease which God threatened to inflict on the disobedient Israelites (Deut. xxviii. 27), and which He actually inflicted on the Philistines who had the A.K. (1 Sam. v. 6, 9, 12, vi. 4, 5, 11, 17). It appears probable (so Mr. Hayman) that the former of these two Hebrew words (which is in the text, except in 1 Sam. vi. 11, 17) means the disease, and the latter (which is in the text in these last passages, and in the Keri elsewhere) the part affected, which must necessarily have been included in the actually existing image of it, and have struck the eye as the essential thing represented, to which the disease was an incident. As some morbid swelling, then, seems the most probable nature of the disease, so no more probable conjecture has been advanced than that hemorrhoidal tumors, or bleeding piles, are intended. These are very common in Syria at present, oriental habits of want of exercise and improper food, producing derangement of the liver, constipation, &c., being such as to cause them.

Em'im, or Em'ims (Heb. terrōr, i. e. terrible ones), a tribe or family of gigantic stature (GIANTS), smitten by Chedorlaomer at Shaveh Kiriathaim (Gen. xiv. 5), and occupying the country afterward held by the Moabites (Deut. ii. 10, 11). They were related to the ANAKIM, and were generally called by the same name; but the Moabites termed them Emim.

Em-man'u-el (L. fr. Heb.) = IMMANUEL (Mat. i. 23).

Em-ma'us (L. fr. Heb. = warm bath, Jos.; see HAMMATH), the village to which the two disciples were going when our Lord appeared to them on the way, on the day of His resurrection (Lk. xxiv. 13). Luke makes its distance from Jerusalem sixty stadia (A. V. "threescore furlongs"), or about 7½ miles; and Josephus mentions "a village called En-ma'us" at the same distance. From the earliest period of which we have any record down to the 14th century, the opinion prevailed among Christian writers that the Emmaus of Luke = the Emmaus No. 2 on the border of the plain of Philistia, some 20 miles from Jerusalem (so Eusebius and Jerome, Robinson, &c.). About A. D. 1300 it began to be supposed that the site of Emmaus was at the little village of Kubich, about seven miles N. W. from Jerusalem. Thomson (ii. 308, 540) and Williams (Churches in Palestine 7) suppose the site at Kuriat el-'Enab (KIRIATH-JEARIM). The distance from Jerusalem is the main argument for both these last suppositions. Mr. Porter thinks the site of Emmaus remains yet to be identified.—2. A town in the plain of Philistia, at the foot of the mountains of Judah, twenty-two Roman miles from Jerusalem, and ten from Lydda. It was fortified by Bacchides, the general of Antiochus Epiphanes, in the war with Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Mc. ix. 50). In the plain beside this city Judas Maccabeus had signally defeated the Syrians with a mere handful of men (1 Mc. iii. 40, 57, iv. 3, &c.). Emmaus became the capital of a toparchy under the Romans; was burned by the Roman general Varus about A. D. 4; rebuilt and named Nicopolis about A. D. 220. A small miserable village called Amuás still occupies the site of the ancient city.

Em'mer (Gr.) = IMMER 1 (1 Esd. ix. 21).

Em'mor (Gr.) = HAMOR (Acts vii. 16).

En'am (fr. Heb. 'Ēynām = the double spring), a city in the lowland (VALLEY 5) of Judah (Josh. xv.

34). From its mention with towns known to have been near Timnath, this is very probably the place in the "doorway" or entrance of which Tamar sat before her interview with her father-in-law (Gen. xxxviii. 14, A. V. "in an open place," margin "in the door of eyes" or "of Enajim;" verse 21, A. V. "openly," margin "in Enajim").

Enan (fr. Heb. = having eyes, Ges.), father of Ahira, "prince" of Naphtali in the numbering in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 15, &c.).

E-nas'l-bus (fr. Gr.) = ELIASHIB 6 (1 Esd. ix. 34).

En-campment (Heb. mach'neh or mach'aneh, in all places except 2 K. vi. 8, where tah'noth or tach'noth is used, A. V. usually "camp"). The word primarily denoted the resting-place of an army or company of travellers at night (Ex. xvi. 13; Gen. xxxii. 21, A. V. "company"), and was hence applied to the army or caravan when on its march (Ex. xiv. 19; Josh. x. 5, xi. 4, A. V. "hosts" in both; Gen. xxxii. 7, A. V. "bands;" 8, A. V. "company"). Among nomadic tribes war never attained to the dignity of a science, and their encampments were consequently devoid of all the appliances of more systematic warfare. The description of the camp of the Israelites on their march from Egypt (Num. ii. iii.), supplies the greatest amount of information on the subject: whatever else may be gleaned is from scattered hints. (ARMY.) The tabernacle, corresponding to the chieftain's tent of an ordinary encampment, was placed in the centre, and around and facing it, arranged in four grand divisions, corresponding to the four points of the compass, lay the host of Israel, according to their standards (i. 52, ii. 2 ff.). In the centre, round the tabernacle, and with no standard but the cloudy or fiery pillar which rested over it, were the tents of the priests and Levites, the former, with Moses and Aaron at their head, on the E. side; the Kohathites on the S.; the Gershonites on the W.; the Merarites on the N. (iii. 23, 29, 35, 38). The order of encampment was preserved on the march (ii. 17), the signal for which was given by a blast of the two silver trumpets (x. 5). In this description of the order of the encampment no mention is made of sentinels, who, it is reasonable to suppose, were placed at the gates (Ex. xxxii. 26, 27) in the four quarters of the camp. This was evidently the case in the camp of the Levites (compare 1 Chr. ix. 18, 24; 2 Chr. xxxi. 2). The sanitary regulations of the camp of the Israelites were for the twofold purpose of preserving the health of the vast multitude and the purity of the camp as the dwelling-place of God (Num. v. 3; Deut. xxiii. 10, 12, 14). The dead were buried without the camp (Lev. x. 4, 5); lepers and all with loathsome diseases were excluded (xiii. 46, xiv. 3; Num. xii. 14, 15); all defiled by contact with the dead, and captives taken in war, were kept without for seven days (xxxi. 19). The ashes from the sacrifices were poured out without the camp at an appointed place, where the entrails and all not offered in sacrifice were burnt (Lev. iv. 11, 12, vi. 11, viii. 17). The execution of criminals took place without the camp (Lev. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 35, 36; Josh. vii. 24), as did the burning of the young bullock for the sin-offering (Lev. iv. 12). These circumstances combined explain Heb. xiii. 12, and John xix. 17, 20. High ground appears to have been uniformly selected for the camp, whether on a hill or mountain side, or in an inaccessible pass (Judg. vii. 1, 8, x. 17; 1 Sam. xiii. 2, &c.). The carelessness of the Midianites in encamping in the plain exposed them to the night surprise by Gideon, and resulted in their consequent discomfiture (Judg. vi. 33, vii. 8, 12). But another important consideration in fixing upon a position for a camp was the nearness of water: hence it is found that in most instances camps were pitched near a spring or well (vii. 1; 1 Mc. ix. 33). The camp was surrounded by the ma'gûlah (1 Sam. xvii. 20), or ma'gâl (xvii. 5, 7), which Hebrew words some explain as an earthwork thrown up round the encampment (A. V. "trench"), others as the barriers formed by the baggage-waggons (CARRIAGE 5). We know that, in the case of a siege, the attacking army, if possible, surrounded the place attacked (1 Mc. xiii. 43, &c.). (WAR.) But there was not so much need of a formal intrenchment, as but few instances occur in which engagements were fought in the camps themselves, and these only when the attack was made at night. To guard against these attacks, sentinels were posted round the camp (Judg. vii. 19; 1 Mc. xii. 27). The valley which separated the hostile camps was generally selected as the fighting-ground upon which the contest was decided, and hence the valleys of Palestine have played so conspicuous a part in its history (Josh. viii. 13; Judg. vi. 33; 2 Sam. v. 22, viii. 13, &c.). When the fighting-men went forth to the place of marshalling, a detachment was left to protect the camp and baggage (1 Sam. xvii. 20-22, xxx. 24). The beasts of burden were probably tethered to the tent-pegs (2 K. vii. 10; Zech. xiv. 15). GARRISON; MAHANAIM; MAHANEH-DAN.

En-chauf'ments. Several Hebrew words are translated by this and kindred terms. 1. Heb. lûtim or lehûtim (Ex. vii. 11, 22, viii. 7, 18) = secret arts.—2. Cshâphim, A. V. "witchcrafts" (2 K. ix. 22; Mic. v. 12; Nah. iii. 4), "sorceries" (Is. xlvi. 9, 12), = muttered spells. The belief in the power of certain formulæ was universal in the ancient world.—3. Lahash or lachash, A. V. "enchantment" (Eccl. x. 11), in the pl. "ear-rings," i. e. AMULETS (Is. iii. 20), &c. (DIVINATION 8.) This word is especially used of the charming of serpents.—4. The kindred word nahash or nachash, A. V. "enchantment" = (so Gesenius) incantation, enchantment (Num. xxiii. 23); augury, omen, which one takes (xxiv. 1). (DIVINATION 8).—5. Heber or cheber = spell, enchantment, Ges. DIVINATION 9; MAGIC.

En-dor (fr. Heb. 'eyn-Dôr = spring of Dor; fount of the dwelling, Ges.), a place in the territory of Issachar, and yet possessed by Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 11); long held in memory by the Jewish people as connected with the great victory over Sisera and Jabin (Ps. lxxxiii. 9, 10); the place where Saul, on the eve of his last engagement with the Philistines, consulted a woman that had "a familiar spirit" (1 Sam. xxviii. 7). (MAGIC.) Eusebius describes it as a large village four miles S. of Tabor. Here on the N. E. corner of Jabl el-Duhî, seven or eight miles from the slopes of Gilboa, the name still lingers, attached to a miserable village. The rock of the mountain, on which it stands, is hollowed into caves, one of which may well have been the scene of the witch's incantation.

En-eg-la'im (fr. Heb. = spring of two heifers), a place named only by Ezekiel (xlvii. 10), apparently as on the Dead Sea. Jerome locates it at the mouth of the Jordan. Some make it = EGLAIM, but the two words are different.

En-e-me'ssar (Gr.), a corruption of the name SHALMANESER (Tob. i. 2, 15, &c.).

E-ne'ni-us (fr. Gr.), one of the leaders of the people who returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 8); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

En-gad di = EN-GEDI (Ecclus. xxiv. 14).

En-gan'nim (fr. Heb. = spring of gardens). 1. A city in the low country of Judah, named between Zanoah and Tappuah (Josh. xv. 34).—2. A city on the border of Issachar (xix. 21), allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 29); probably (Rbn. ii. 315) = the Ginaia of Josephus (xx. 6, § 1), which again, there can be little doubt, survives in the modern Jenin, the first village encountered on the ascent from the great plain of Esdraelon into the hills of the central country. Jenin contains about 2,000 inhabitants and is the capital of a large district. It is still surrounded by "orchards" or "gardens," and the "spring" is to this day the characteristic object in the place. ANEM; GARDEN-HOUSE.

En-ge-di (fr. Heb. = the fountain of the kid), a town in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv. 62), on the W. shore of the Dead Sea (Ez. xlvii. 10); originally HAZEZON-TAMAR. Its site is now well known. It is about the middle of the W. shore of the lake. Here is a rich plain, half a mile square, sloping very gently from the base of the mountains to the water, and shut in on the N. by a lofty promontory. About one mile up the western acclivity, and some four hundred feet above the plain, is the fountain of 'Ain Jidy, from which the place gets its name. Its banks are now cultivated by a few families of Arabs, who generally pitch their tents near this spot. Traces of the old city exist upon the plain and lower declivity of the mountain, on the S. bank of the brook. (See the view in the article SEA, THE SALT.) The history of En-gedi, though it reaches back nearly 4,000 years, may be told in a few sentences. Immediately after an assault upon the "Amorites, that dwelt in Hazezon-Tamar," the five Mesopotamian kings were attacked by the rulers of the plain of Sodom (Gen. xiv. 7; compare 2 Chr. xx. 2). Saul was told that David was in the "wilderness of En-gedi (i. e. the wild region in its neighborhood, full of caverns, ravines, &c.);" and he took "3,000 men, and went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats" (1 Sam. xxiii. 29, xxiv. 1-4). At a later period En-gedi was the gathering-place of the Moabites and Ammonites who went up against Jerusalem, and fell in the valley of Berachah (2 Chr. xx. 2). The vineyards of En-gedi were celebrated by Solomon (Cant. i. 14), its balsam by Josephus, and its palms by Pliny and in Ecclus. xxiv. 14. But vineyards no longer clothe the mountain-side, and neither palm-tree nor balsam is seen on the plain.

En'gine [jin], a term exclusively applied to military affairs in the Bible. The engines of king Uzziah, in 2 Chr. xxvi. 15, were designed to propel various missiles from the walls of a besieged town: one, like the L. balista, was for stones, consisting probably of a strong spring and a tube to give the right direction to the stone; another, like the L. catapulta, for arrows, an enormous stationary bow (compare 1 Mc. vi. 51, 52). Another war-engine was the battering-ram (Ez. iv. 2, xxi. 22, xxvi. 9). (RAM, BATTERING.) The marginal rendering, "engine of shot" (Jer. vi. 6, xxxii. 24; Ez. xxvi. 8), is incorrect; the text has "mount," i. e. mound. WAR.

* En'glish [ing'lish] Ver'sions. VERSION, AUTHORIZED.

En-gra-ver, the A. V. translation of Heb. hārāsh or chārāsh in Ex. xxviii. 11, xxxv. 35, xxxviii. 23. The term = any artificer in wood, stone, or metal. (CHARASHIM; HANDICRAFT.) The chief business of an "engraver in stone" (xxviii. 11) was cutting names or devices on rings and seals; the only notices of engraving are in connection with the high-priest's dress—the two onyx-stones, the twelve jewels, and the mitre-plate having inscriptions on them (xxviii. 11, 21, 36). But the same artisan (e. g. AHOLIAB, BEZALFEL, HIRAM 2) combined, in skill and practice, many branches, which modern division of labor distinguishes and assigns to different men (Dr. P. Holmes in Kitto). PRINT; SEAL.

En-had'dah (fr. Heb. = sharp or swift spring), a city on the border of Issachar named next to Engannim (Josh. xix. 21). Van de Velde would identify it with 'Ain-haud on the W. side of Carmel, and about two miles only from the sea; but this is surely out of the limits of Issachar, and rather in Asher or Manasseh.

En-hak'ko-re (fr. Heb. = the spring of the crier) the spring which burst out in answer to the cry of Samson after his exploit with the jawbone (Judg. xv. 17). Van de Velde improbably endeavors to identify LEHI with Tell el-Lekizah four miles N. of Beer-sheba, and En-hakkore with the large spring between the Tell and Khevelfeh (KEILAH?).

En-ha'zer (fr. Heb. = spring of the village), a fenced city in Naphtali, distinct from HAZOR (Josh. xix. 37); not yet identified.

En-mish'pat (fr. Heb. = fountain of judgment, Ges.) = KADESH (Gen. xiv. 7).

Enoch [-nok] (Gr. fr. Heb. Hānōch or Chānōch = initiated or initiating, Ges.; = HAKOCH). 1. The eldest son of Cain (Gen. iv. 17), who called the city which he built after his name (18). Ewald fancies that there is a reference to the Phrygian Iconium. Other places have been identified with the site of Enoch with little probability: e. g. Anachta in Susiana, the Heniochi in the Caucasus, &c.—2. The son of Jared and father of Methuselah (Gen. v. 21 ff.; Lk. iii. 37); = HENUCH in 1 Chr. i. 3. In Jude 14 he is described as "the seventh from Adam;" and the number is probably noticed as conveying the idea of divine completion and rest, while Enoch was himself a type of perfected humanity. The other numbers connected with his history appear too symmetrical to be without meaning (162 = 9 × 6 × 3, 65 = 5 × 6 + 7, 365, &c.). After the birth of Methuselah it is said (Gen. v. 22-4) that Enoch "walked with God 300 years . . . and he was not; for God took him." The phrase

Assyrian War Engines, from Botta, plate 160.

"walked with God" is elsewhere only used of Noah (vi. 9; compare xvii. 1, &c.), and is to be explained of a prophetic life spent in immediate converse with the spiritual world. In Eccles. xlv. 16, xlix. 14, he is spoken of among the "famous men" as "translated," "taken" up "from the earth." In Heb. xi. 5 the spring and issue of Enoch's life are clearly marked. The biblical notices of Enoch were a fruitful source of speculation in later times. Some theologians disputed with subtlety as to the place to which he was removed. Both the Latin and Greek fathers commonly coupled Enoch and ELIJAH as historic witnesses of the possibility of a resurrection of the body and of a true human existence in glory; and the voice of early ecclesiastical tradition is almost unanimous in regarding them as "the two witnesses" (Rev. xi. 3 ff.) who should fall before "the beast."—3. In 2 Esd. vi. 49, 51, Enoch stands in the Latin (and English) Version for Behemoth in the Ethiopic. Enoch, Book of.

Enoch (fr. Heb.; see above), the Book of, is one of the most important remains of that early apocalyptic literature of which the book of Daniel is the great prototype. I. The history of the book is remarkable. The first trace of its existence is generally found in Jude 14, 15 (compare Enoch i. 9), but the words of the apostle leave it uncertain whether he derived his quotation from tradition or from writing, though the wide spread of the book in the second century seems almost decisive in favor of the latter supposition. It appears to have been known to Justin, Irenæus, and Anatolius. Clement of Alexandria and Origen both make use of it. Tertullian expressly quotes the book as one which was "not received by some, nor admitted into the Jewish canon," but defends it on account of its reference to Christ. Considerable fragments are preserved in the Chronographia of Georgius Syncellus (about 792 A. D.), and these, with the scanty notices of earlier writers, constituted the sole remains of the book known in Europe till the close of the last century. Meanwhile, however, a report was current that the entire book was preserved in Abyssinia; and at length, in 1773, Bruce brought with him on his return from Egypt three MSS. containing the complete Ethiopic translation. It was published (Oxford, England, 1838) by Archbishop Laurence, who published an English translation with an introduction and notes (1821, 1833, 1838). Dillmann edited the Ethiopic text from five MSS. (Leipsic, 1851), and afterward gave a German translation with a good introduction and commentary (1853).—II. The Ethiopic translation was made from the Greek, and probably toward the middle or close of the fourth century. The general coincidence of the translation with the patristic quotations of corresponding passages shows satisfactorily that the text from which it was derived was the same as that current in the early Church. But it is still uncertain whether the Greek text was the original, or itself a translation. One of the earliest references to the book occurs in the Hebrew Book of Jubilees, and the names of the angels and winds are derived from Aramaic roots. In addition to this, a Hebrew book of Enoch was known and used by Jewish writers till the thirteenth century, so that on these grounds, among others, many have supposed that the book was first composed in Hebrew (Aramaean).—III. In its present shape the book consists of a series of revelations supposed to have been given to Enoch and Noah, which extend to the most varied aspects of nature and life, and are designed to offer a comprehensive vindication of the action of Providence. It has one hundred and eight chapters, and may be divided into five parts. The first part (chs. 1–36), after a general introduction, contains an account of the fall of the angels (Gen. vi. 1) and of the judgment to come on them and on the giants, their offspring (chs. 6–16); and this is followed by the description of the journey of Enoch through the earth and lower heaven in company with an angel, who showed to him many of the great mysteries of nature, the treasure-houses of the storms and winds, and fires of heaven, the prison of the fallen and the land of the blessed (chs. 17–36). The second part (chs. 37–71), styled "a vision of wisdom," consists of three "parables," in which Enoch relates the revelations of the higher secrets of heaven and of the spiritual world which were given to him. The first parable (chs. 38–44) gives chiefly a picture of the future blessings and manifestations of the righteous, with further details as to the heavenly bodies: the second (chs. 45–57) describes in splendid imagery the coming of Messiah, and the results which it should work among "the elect" and the gainsayers: the third (chs. 58–69) draws out at further length the blessedness of "the elect and holy," and the confusion and wretchedness of the world's sinful rulers. The third part (chs. 72–82), styled "the book of the course of the lights of heaven," deals with the motions of the sun and moon, and the changes of the seasons; and with this the narrative of the journey of Enoch closes. The fourth part (chs. 83–91), not distinguished by any special name, contains the record of a dream which was granted to Enoch in his youth, in which he saw the history of the kingdoms of God and of the world up to the final establishment of the throne of Messiah. The fifth part (chs. 92–105) contains the last addresses of Enoch to his children, in which the teaching of the former chapters is made the groundwork of earnest exhortation. The signs which attended Noah's birth are next noticed (chs. 106–7); and another short "writing of Enoch" (ch. 108) forms the close to the whole book.—IV. The general unity which the book possesses in its present form marks it, in the main, as the work of one man; but internal coincidence shows with equal clearness that different fragments were incorporated by the author into his work, and some additions were probably made afterward. The whole book appears to be distinctly of Jewish origin, and it may be regarded as describing an important phase of Jewish opinion shortly before the coming of Christ (so Mr. Westcott, the original author of this article). Hoffmann and Weiss place the composition of the whole book after Christ; so Stuart, Volkmar and Alford. Ewald distinguishes as the originals three books of Enoch, an appendix, and a book of Noah, the earliest composed about B. C. 144, and the whole edited about B. C. 50 with transpositions, abridgments, &c. Davidson (in Kitto) agrees in the main with Ewald, but supposes only two original books of Enoch and a book of Noah. Dillmann upholds more decidedly the unity of the book, and assigns the chief part of it to an Aramean writer about 110 B. C. The book (so Mr. Westcott) is distinguished from 2d Esdras by its tone of triumphant expectation. It seems to repeat in every form the great principle that the world, natural, moral, and spiritual, is under the immediate government of God. Hence it follows that there is a terrible retribution reserved for sinners, and a glorious kingdom prepared for the righteous, and Messiah is regarded as the Divine Mediator of this double issue. Notwithstanding the quotation in Jude, and the wide circulation of the book itself, the apocalypse of Enoch was uniformly and distinctly separated from the canonical Scriptures. CANON.

Enon (L. Ennon; Gr. Αινών; fr. Chal. pl. Eynāvān = fountains), a place, "near to SALIM" (SHALEM), at which John baptized (Jn. iii. 28); according to the Onomasticon eight miles S. of Scythopolis, but not yet identified; probably (so Robinson, N. T. Lex.) in one of the lateral valleys running down to the valley of the Jordan from the W. (compare iii. 22 with 26, and i. 28). Mr. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, art. Salim) mentions Ainān as an ancient site with some ruins five or six miles N. E. of Nābulus (Shechem) and about five miles N. of Salim. (SALIM 2.) Barclay places it at Wady Furah, a secluded valley about five miles N. E. of Jerusalem.

Enos (L. fr. Heb. enōsh = man, Ges.), son of Seth; properly ENOSH (Gen. iv. 26, v. 6, 7, 9, 10, 11; Lk. iii. 38).

En-rimmon (fr. Heb. = fount of the pomegranate), one of the places which the men of Judah inhabited after their return from the Captivity (Neh. xi. 29). Grotius, Rosenmüller, Knobel, Keil, and Van de Velde suppose that "AIN 2 and RIMMON," originally near each other (Josh. xv. 32, xix. 7; 1 Chr. iv. 32), were united after the Captivity as one town. Van de Velde places Ain on a hill about half a mile from Um er-Rumānīn (Rimmon?), and about eight miles N. of Beer-sheba. At the base of the hill is a copious fountain (Dr. P. Holmes in Kitto). Wilton and Fairbairn (under "Rimmon") make En-rimmon = Um er-Rumānīn, and believe one and the same place intended by "Ain and Rimmon" (Josh. xv. 32), and "Ain, Remmon" (xix. 7). Rowlands (in Fairbairn under "S. Country") supposes Ain-Rimmon or En-rimmon was on or near a prominent round hill, Rās es-Serām, having the Wady el-'Ain on its S., and situated about forty miles S. W. of Beer-sheba.

En-rogel (fr. Heb. spring of the fuller, Targum; fountain of the scout, Ges.), a spring, near JERUSALEM, on the boundary-line between Judah (Josh. xv. 7) and Benjamin (xviii. 16). Here, apparently concealed from the view of the city, Jonathan and Ahimaaz remained, after the flight of David, awaiting intelligence from within the walls (2 Sam. xvii. 17); and here, by the stone ZOHLETH, Adonijah held the feast which was the first and last act of his attempt on the crown (1 K. i. 9). By Josephus its situation is given as "without the city, in the royal garden." In more modern times, a tradition, apparently first recorded by Brocardus, and accepted by Robinson, Thomson, &c., would make En-rogel the well of Job or Nehemiah (Bir Eyūb), below the junction of the valleys of Kidron and Hinnom, and S. of the Pool of Siloam. Against this general belief some strong arguments are urged by Dr. Bonar in favor of identifying En-rogel with the present "Fountain of the Virgin," Ain Umm ed-Daraj—the perennial source from which the Pool of Siloam is supplied.

En-she-mesh (Heb. = spring of the sun), a spring on the N. boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 7) and the S. boundary of Benjamin (xviii. 17). The 'Ain-Haud or 'Ain-Chôt—the "Well of the Apostles"—about one mile below Bethany, is generally identified with En-she-mesh.

En'sign [-sine] (Heb. nēs; in the A. V. generally rendered "ensign," or "standard," sometimes "banner," &c.; degel, "standard," except in Cant. ii. 4, "banner;" ōth, "ensign" in Num. ii. 2 and Ps. lxxiv.

4, but usually "sign" or "token"). The distinction between these three Hebrew terms is sufficiently marked by their respective uses: nēs is a signal; degel a military standard for a large division of an army; and ōth, the same for a small one. Neither of them, however, expresses the idea which "standard" conveys to our mind, viz. a flag; the standards in use among the Hebrews probably resembled those of the Egyptians and Assyrians—a figure or device of some kind elevated on a pole. (1.) The notices of the nēs or "ensign" are most frequent; it consisted of some well-understood signal exhibited on the top of a pole from a bare mountain top (Is. xiii. 2 [A. V. "banner"], xviii. 3). What the nature of the signal was, we have no means of stating. The important point to be observed is, that the nēs was an occasional signal, and not a military standard. (2.) The term degel is used to describe the standards given to each of the four divisions of the Israelite army at the Exodus (Num. i. 52, ii. 2 ff., x. 14 ff.). The character of the Hebrew military standards is a matter of conjecture; they probably resembled the Egyptian, which consisted of a sacred emblem such as an animal, a boat, or the king's name.

En-tap-pu-ah (fr. Heb. = spring of the apple or citron; see APPLE), probably = TAPPUAH 2 (Josh. xvii. 7).

Ep'a-phras (Gr. probably = EPAPHRODITUS), a fellow-laborer with the Apostle Paul, mentioned Col. i. 7, as having taught the Colossian church the grace of God in truth, and designated a faithful minister of Christ on their behalf. He was at that time with St. Paul at Rome (iv. 12), and seems by the expression there used (A. V. "one of you") to have been a Colossian by birth. We find him again mentioned in Philemon (ver. 23), which was sent at the same time as Colossians. Epaphras may be the same person as EPAPHRODITUS, but the notices in the N. T. do not enable us to speak with any confidence.

Epaph-ro-d'i-tus (L. fr. Gr. = favoured by Aphrodite or Venus, lovely, fascinating, L. & S.), "messenger" of the Philippian church to the Apostle Paul at Rome, and bearer of the Epistle to the Philippians; highly esteemed and commended by St. Paul (Phil. ii. 25, iv. 18). Conybeare and Howson suppose Epaphroditus was probably a leading presbyter of the church at Philippi. EPAPHRAS.

Epen'e-tus (L. Epeneletus, fr. Gr. = praiseworthy or praised, L. & S.), a Christian at Rome, greeted by St. Paul in Rom. xvi. 5, and designated as his beloved, and the first fruit of Asia (A. V. "Achaia") unto Christ; according to unreliable tradition, first bishop of Carthage.

Ephah (fr. Heb. = darkness, Ges.), the first, in order, of the sons of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33); afterward mentioned as a tribe (Is. lx. 6), but not satisfactorily identified.

Ephah (see above). 1. Concubine of CALEB 1, in the line of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 46).—2. Son of Jahdai, also in the line of Judah (ii. 47).

Ephah (Heb. fr. Egyptian = measure). WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Ephal (fr. Heb. = weary, languid, Ges.), a Netophathite, whose sons were among the "captains of the forces" left in Judah after the deportation to Babylon (Jer. xl. 8, compare xli. 11 ff.). ISHMAEL 6; JOHANAN 3.

Epher (Heb. calf, young animal, Ges.), the second, in order, of the sons of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chr. i. 33). His settlements have not been identified with any probability.

Epher (see above). 1. A son of Ezra, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 17).—2. One of the heads of the families of Manasseh E. of Jordan (v. 24).

Ephes-dam'mim (Heb. end or boundary of blood?), a place between Socoh and Azekah, at which the Philistines were encamped before Goliath was killed (1 Sam. xvii. 1); = PAS-DAMMIM (1 Chr. xi. 13); identified by Van de Velde with a ruined site, Damûn or Chirbet Damoun, about three miles E. of Shuweikeh (Socoh). ELAH, VALLEY OF.

E-ph'e-sians [-zhanz] (= people of EPHESUS), the E-pis'tle to the, was written by the Apostle Paul during his first captivity at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16), apparently immediately after he had written Colossians (COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO), and during that period (perhaps the early part of A. D. 62) when his imprisonment had not assumed the severer character which seems to have marked its close. This sublime epistle was addressed to the Christian church at Ephesus, that church which the Apostle had himself founded (Acts xix. 1 ff., compare xviii. 19), with which he abode so long (xx. 31), and from the elders of which he parted with such a warm-hearted and affecting farewell (xx. 18-35). The contents of this epistle easily admit of being divided into two portions, the first mainly doctrinal (ch. i.-iii.), the second hortatory and practical. With regard to the authenticity and genuineness of this epistle, there are no just grounds for doubt. The testimonies of antiquity are unusually strong. Without pressing the supposed allusions in Ignatius and Polycarp, we can confidently adduce Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Tertullian, and after them the constant and persistent tradition of the ancient Church. Even Marcion did not deny that the epistle was written by St. Paul, nor did heretics refuse occasionally to cite it as confessedly due to him as its author. In recent times, however, its genuineness has been somewhat vehemently called in question. De Wette labors to prove that it is a mere spiritless expansion of Colossians, though compiled in the Apostolic age; Schweglar, Baur, and others advance a step further, and reject both epistles as of no higher antiquity than the age of Montanism and early Gnosticism. But the arguments of De Wette and Baur are wholly destitute of any sound historical basis (Meyer, Davidson, Alford, &c.). Two special points require a brief notice:—(1.) The readers for whom this epistle was designed. In Eph. i. 1 the words translated "at Ephesus" are omitted by the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., both having them in the margin, by No. 67, Basil, and possibly Tertullian. This, combined with the somewhat noticeable omission of all greetings to the members of a church with which the apostle stood in such affectionate relation, and some other internal objections, have suggested a doubt whether these words really formed a part of the original text. At first sight these doubts seem plausible; but when we oppose to them (a) the overwhelming weight of diplomatic evidence for the insertion of the words, (b) the testimony of all the versions, (c) the universal designation of this epistle by the ancient Church (Marcion standing alone in his assertion that it was written to the Laodiceans) as an epistle to the Ephesians, (d) the extreme difficulty in giving any satisfactory meaning to the isolated particle translated "which are," and the absence of any parallel usage in the apostle's writings—we can scarcely feel any doubt as to the propriety of removing the brackets in which these words are enclosed in the second edition of Tischendorf, and of considering them an integral part of the original text. The special greetings might have been separately entrusted to the bearer Tychicus (Eph. vi. 22). —(2.) The question of priority in respect of composition between this epistle and Colossians is very difficult to adjust. On the whole, both internal and external considerations seem somewhat in favor of the priority of Colossians. On the similarity of contents, see COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO.

Eph'e-sus (L. fr. Gr.; named [so one legend] from its founder, Ephesus, son of the Cayster; or [so another] from Gr. epheis = permission, because the Amazons were permitted by Hercules to settle there), an illustrious city in the district of Ionia, nearly opposite the island of Samos, and about the middle of the western coast of the peninsula commonly called Asia Minor. It stood partly on the level ground, partly on some hills, Mounts Prion, Coressus, &c., rising abruptly from it, on the S. side, and near the mouth of the river Cayster. Of the Roman province of Asia, Ephesus was the capital.—1. Geographical Relations. All the cities of Ionia were remarkably well situated for the growth of commercial prosperity, and none more so than Ephesus. With a fertile neighborhood and an excellent climate, in the time of Augustus it was the great emporium of all the regions of Asia within the Taurus: its harbor (named Panormus), at the mouth of the Cayster, was elaborately constructed. St. Paul's life furnishes illustrations of its mercantile relations with Achaia on the W., Macedonia on the N., Syria on the E. (Acts xviii. 19, 21, 22, xix. 21, xx. 1 ff., &c.), and to the inland regions of the continent. The "upper coasts" (Acts xix. 1) through which he passed when about to take up his residence in the city, were the Phrygian table-lands of the interior. Two great roads at least, in the Roman times, led eastward from Ephesus; one through the passes of Tmolus to Sardis, and thence to Galatia and the N. E., the other round the extremity of Pactyas to Magnesia, and so up the valley of the Meander to Iconium, whence the communication was direct to the Euphrates and to the Syrian Antioch. There seem to have been Sardian and Magnesian gates on the E. side of Ephesus corresponding to these roads respectively. There were also coast-roads leading northward to Smyrna and southward to Miletus. By the latter of these probably the Ephesian elders travelled to meet Paul at the latter city (xx. 17, 18).—2. Temple and Worship of Diana. Conspicuous at the head of the harbor of Ephesus was the great temple of DIANA or Artemis, the tutelary divinity of the city. This building was raised on immense substructions, in consequence of the swampy nature of the ground. The earlier temple, begun before the Persian war, was burnt down in the night when Alexander the Great was born (B. C. 356); and another structure, raised by the enthusiastic coöperation of all the inhabitants of "Asia," had taken its place. The magnificence of this sanctuary—425 feet long, 220 broad, built of cedar, cypress, white marble, gold, &c., with 127 columns, each 60 feet high—was a proverb throughout the civilized world. Criminals were exempted from arrest at the temple or within one-eighth of a mile of it. In consequence of this devotion to the goddess, the city of Ephesus was called in Gr. neókoros (Acts xix. 35, A. V. "worshipper," margin "temple-keeper") or "warden" of Diana. Another consequence of the celebrity of Diana's worship at Ephesus was, that a large manufactory grew up there of portable shrines, which strangers purchased, and devotees carried with them on journeys or set up in their houses. Of the manufacturers engaged in this business, perhaps Alexander the "coppersmith" (2 Tim. iv. 14) was one. The case of DEMETRIUS the "silversmith" is explicit. (For the public games connected with the worship of Diana, see ASIARCHS; GAMES.)—3. Study and Practice of Magic. There was a remarkable prevalence of magical arts at Ephesus. In illustration of the magical books which were publicly burnt (Acts xix. 19) under the influence of St. Paul's preaching, it is enough here to refer to the Ephesian letters (mentioned by Plutarch and others), which were regarded as a charm when pronounced, and when written down were carried about as AMULETS. (MAGIC.)—4. Provincial and Municipal Government. It is well known that ASIA was a proconsular province; and accordingly we find proconsuls (A. V. "deputies") specially mentioned (xix. 38). Again we learn from Pliny (v. 31) that Ephesus was an assize-town; and in Acts xix. 38 we find the court days alluded to as actually being held (A. V. "the law is open;" margin "the court-days are kept") during the uproar. Ephesus itself was a "free city," and had its own assemblies and its own magistrates. The senate is mentioned by Josephus; and St. Luke, in Acts xix., speaks of the démos, i. e. the privileged order of citizens (verses 30, 33, A. V. "the people") and of its customary assemblies (ver. 39, A. V. "a lawful assembly"). We even find conspicuous mention made of one of the most important municipal officers of Ephesus, the "TOWN-CLERK" or keeper of the records, whom we know from other sources to have been a person of great influence and responsibility. The theatre in Greek cities was often the place for large assemblages (ver. 29, 31). At a meeting in the theatre at Cesarea, Agrippa I. received his death-stroke (xii. 23). The theatre at Ephesus, the largest of its kind ever constructed, was 660 feet in diameter, and could accommodate 56,700 spectators (Fairbairn). It is remarkable how all these political and religious characteristics of Ephesus, which appear in the sacred narrative, are illustrated by inscriptions and coins. The coins of Ephesus are full of allusions to the worship of Diana in various aspects.—That Jews were established there in considerable numbers is known from Josephus, and might be inferred from its mercantile eminence; but it is also evident from Acts ii. 9, vi. 9. It is here, and here only, that we find disciples of John the Baptist explicitly mentioned after the ascension of Christ (xviii. 25, xix. 3). The case of APOLLOS (xviii. 24) is an exemplification further of the intercourse between this place and Alexandria.—The first seeds of Christian truth were possibly sown at Ephesus immediately after the Great Pentecost (ii.). St. Paul's first visit was on his return from the second missionary circuit; and, after a very short stay, he left there AQUILA and Priscilla (xviii. 19–21). In St. Paul's stay of more than two years (xix. 8, 10, xx. 31), which formed the most important passage of his third circuit, and during which he labored, first in the synagogue (xix. 8) and then in the school of Tyrannus (ver. 9), and also in private houses (xx. 20), and during which he wrote 1 Corinthians, we have the period of the chief evangelization of this shore of the Ægean. The address at Miletus (xx. 18 ff.) shows that the church at Ephesus was thoroughly organized under its presbyters. At a later period TIMOTHY was set over them, as we learn from the two epistles addressed to him. St. Paul's companions, TROPHIMUS and TYCHICUS, were natives of Asia (xx. 4), and the latter probably (2 Tim. iv. 12), the former certainly (Acts xxi. 29), of Ephesus. In the same connection we ought to mention ONESIPHORUS (2 Tim. i. 16-18) and his household (iv. 19). On the other hand must be noticed certain specified Ephesian antagonists of the apostle, the sons of Sceva and his party (Acts xix. 14), Hymeneus and Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 14), and Phygellus and Hermogenes (2 Tim. i. 15). The church had declined from its first love when the epistle to it in Rev. ii. 1-7 was written. (See also JOHN THE APOSTLE.) The site of ancient Ephesus has been visited and examined by many travellers during the last two hundred years. The whole place is now utterly desolate, with the exception of the small Turkish village at Ayasuluk. The ruins are of vast extent, both on Coressus and on the plain; but there is great doubt as to many topographical details. It is satisfactory, however, that the position of the theatre on Mount Prion is absolutely certain. The situation of the temple is doubtful.

Eph'ial (Heb. judgment, Ges.), a descendant of Judah through Hezron and Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 37).

Eph'od (Heb. something girded on : veiling, clothing, Fül.), a sacred vestment originally appropriate to the HIGH-PRIEST (Ex. xxviii. 4), but afterward worn by ordinary priests (1 Sam. xxii. 18), and deemed characteristic of the office (ii. 28, xiv. 3; Hos. iii. 4). The importance of the ephod, as the receptacle of the breastplate, led to its adoption in the idolatrous forms of worship instituted in the time of the Judges (Judg. viii. 27, xvii. 5, xviii. 14 ff.). A kind of ephod was worn by Samuel (1 Sam. ii. 18), and by David, when he brought the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Chr. xv. 27); it was made of ordinary linen (Heb. bad), the priestly ephod of fine linen (Heb. shesh) (so Mr. Bevan) LINEN.

* Eph'pha-tha (Aram.) = be thou opened (Mk. vii. 34).

Ephraim (fr. Heb. = double fruitfulness; double land, twin land? Ges.; fruit, posterity, Fül.). 1. Second son of JOSEPH 1 by his wife Asenath (Gen. xli. 52, xlii. 20). The first indication of that ascendancy over his elder brother Manasseh, which at a later period the tribe of Ephraim so unmistakably possessed, is in the blessing of the children by Jacob (Gen. xlviii.), a passage on the age and genuineness of which the severest criticism has cast no doubt. Ephraim was probably at that time about twenty-one years old. He was born before the beginning of the seven years of famine, toward the latter part of which Jacob had come to Egypt, seventeen years before his death (xlvii. 28). Before Joseph's death Ephraim's family had reached the third generation (i. 23), and it must have been about this time that the affray mentioned in 1 Chr. vii. 21 occurred (so Mr. Grove). (BERIAH 2; SHUTHIELAH.) To this early period, too, must probably be referred the circumstance alluded to in Ps. lxxviii. 9. The numbers of the tribe do not at once fulfil the promise of the blessing of Jacob. At the census in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. i. 32, 33, ii. 19) its numbers were 40,500, placing it at the head of the children of Rachel; Manasseh's number being 32,200, and Benjamin's 35,400. But forty years later (xxvi. 37), while Manasseh had advanced to 52,700, and Benjamin to 45,600, Ephraim had decreased to 32,500, the only smaller number being that of Simeon, 22,200, and Levi (ver. 62). During the march through the wilderness, the position of the sons of Joseph with Benjamin was on the W. side of the tabernacle (ii. 18-24), and the prince of Ephraim was Elishama (i. 10). At the sending of the spies, we are first introduced to the great hero to whom the tribe owed much of its subsequent greatness. Under JOSHUA 1, and in spite of the smallness of its numbers, the tribe must have taken a high position in the nation, to judge from the tone which the Ephraimites assumed on occasions shortly subsequent to the conquest. The boundaries of the portion of Ephraim are given in Josh. xvi. 1-10. The S. boundary was coincident for part of its length with the N. boundary of Benjamin. Commencing at the Jordan, at the reach opposite Jericho, it ran to the "water of Jericho," probably the 'Ain Dūk or 'Ain Sultān; thence, by one of the ravines, the Wady Harith or Wady Suweinū, it ascended through the wilderness (DESERT 2) to Mount Bethel and Luz; and thence by Ataroth, "the coast of Japhleti," BETH-HORON the lower, and Gezer, to the Mediterranean, probably about Joppa. The general direction of this line is N. W. by W. In Josh. xvi. 8 we probably have a fragment of the N. boundary (comp. xvii. 10). (ASHER; KANAH; MANASSEH; TAPPUAH 2.) But very possibly there never was any definite subdivision of the territory assigned to the two brother tribes (xvii. 14-18). It is not possible now to make out any such subdivision, except, generally, that Ephraim lay to the S., and the half-tribe of MANASSEH to the N. Among the towns named as Manasseh's were BETH-SHEAN in the Jordan Valley, EN-DOR on the slopes of the "Little Hermon," TAANACH on the E. side of Carmel, and DOR on the sea-coast S. of the same mountain. Here the boundary—the N. boundary—joined that of Asher, which dipped below Carmel to take in an angle of the plain of Sharon: N. and N. W. of Manasseh lay Zebulun and Issachar respectively. The territory thus allotted to the "house of Joseph" embraced the larger part of what was called SAMARIA in the time of Christ. Central PALESTINE consists of an elevated district which rises from the flat ranges of the wilderness on the S. of Judah, and terminates on the N. with the slopes which descend into the great plain of Esdraelon. On the W. a flat strip separates it from the sea, and on the E. another flat strip forms the valley of the Jordan. Of this district the N. half was occupied by the tribe of Ephraim and the half-tribe of Manasseh. Here was the "Mount Ephraim," a district which seems to extend as far S. as RAMAH 2 and Bethel (1 Sam. i. 1, vii. 17; 2 Chr. xiii. 4, 19, compared with xv. 8), places but a few miles N. of Jerusalem, and within the limits of Benjamin. In structure it is limestone—rounded hills separated by valleys of denudation, but much less regular and monotonous than the part more to the S., about and below Jerusalem; with wide plains in the heart of the mountains, streams of running water, and continuous tracts of vegetation. All travellers bear testimony to the general growing richness and beauty of the country in going N. from Jerusalem. The wealth of their possession had not the same immediately degrading effect on the tribe of Ephraim that it had on some of its northern brethren. (ASHER.) Various causes may have helped to avert this evil. (1.) The central situation of Ephraim, in the highway of all communications from one part of the country to another. (2.) The position of SUECHEM, with the two sacred mountains of EBAL and GERIZIM, and of SHILOH, and further of the tomb and patrimony of Joshua—all in the heart of the tribe. (3.) There was a spirit about the tribe itself which may have been both a cause and a consequence of these advantages of position. That spirit, though sometimes taking the form of noble remonstrance and reparation (2 Chr. xxviii. 9–15), usually manifests itself in jealous complaint at some enterprise undertaken or advantage gained in which they had not a chief share. The unsettled state of the country in general, and of the interior of Ephraim in particular (Judg. ix.), and the continual incursions of foreigners, prevented the power of the tribe from manifesting itself in a more formidable manner than by these murmurs, during the time of the Judges and the first stage of the monarchy (viii. 1, xii. 1 [JEPHTHAH; SHIBBOLETH]; 2 Sam. xix. 41–43). Samuel, though a Levite, was a native of Mount Ephraim; Saul belonged to a tribe closely allied to the house of Joseph; David's brilliant successes and his wide influence and religious zeal kept matters smooth for another period. But the reign of Solomon, splendid in appearance but oppressive to the people, developed both the circumstances of revolt and the leader who was to turn them to account. Solomon saw through the crisis, and, if he could have succeeded in killing JEROBOAM I as he tried to do (1 K. xi. 40), the disruption might have been postponed for another century. As it was, the outbreak was deferred for a time, but the irritation was not allayed, and the insane folly of his son REHOBOAM brought the mischief to a head. From the time of the revolt, the history of Ephraim is in two senses the history of the kingdom of Israel, since not only did the tribe become a kingdom, but the kingdom embraced little besides the tribe. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) This is not surprising, and quite susceptible of explanation. N. of Ephraim the country appears never to have been really taken possession of by the Israelites (Judg. i. 27 ff.). And in addition to this original defect there is much in the physical formation and circumstances of the upper portion of Palestine to explain why those tribes—exposed to the inroads and seductions of their surrounding heathen neighbors, Phenicians, Syrians, Assyrians, &c.—never took any active part in the kingdom. But on the other hand the position of Ephraim was altogether different. It was one at once of great richness and great security. Her fertile plains and well-watered valleys could only be reached by a laborious ascent through steep and narrow ravines, all but impassable for an army. There is no record of any attack on the central kingdom, either from the Jordan Valley or the maritime plain. On the N. side, from the plain of Esdraelon, it was more accessible, and it was from this side that the final invasion appears to have been made. There are few things more mournful in the sacred story than the descent of this haughty and jealous tribe from the culminating point at which it stood when it entered on the fairest portion of the Land of Promise—the chief sanctuary and the chief settlement of the nation within its limits, its leader the leader of the whole people—through the distrust which marked its intercourse with its fellows, while a member of the confederacy, and the tumult, dissension, and ungodliness which characterized its independent existence, down to the sudden captivity and total oblivion which closed its career (IIos. xi. 1–8).—2. In “Baal-hazor which is by (A. V. ‘beside’) Ephraim” was Absalom's sheep-farm, at which took place the murder of Amnon, one of the earliest precursors of the great revolt (2 Sam. xiii. 23). (EPIRAIN).—3. A city “in the district (A. V. ‘country’) near the wilderness,” to which our Lord retired with His disciples when threatened with violence by the priests (Jn. xi. 54). Robinson conjectures that it = OPHRAH 1, and that their modern representative is et-Taigibeh, a village four or five miles E. of Bethel, and sixteen from Jerusalem.

Ephraim (Heb., see above), Gate of, one of the gates of JERUSALEM (2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Chr. xxv. 23; Neh. viii. 16, xii. 39), probably at or near the position of the present “Damascus gate,” and named from its leading toward the tribe of Ephraim; probably also = the gate of Benjamin. BENJAMIN, GATE OF.

* Ephraim (Heb., see above), Mount. EPHRAIM 1. Ephraim (Heb., see above), the Wood of, a wood, or rather a FOREST on the E. of Jordan, in which the fatal battle was fought between the armies of David and of ABSALOM (2 Sam. xviii. 6). Grotius suggested that the name was derived from the slaughter of Ephraim at the fords of Jordan by the Gileadites under Jephthah (Judg. xii. 1, 4 ff.). Is it not at least equally probable (Mr. Grove asks) that the forest derived its name from this very battle, in which the tribe of Ephraim must have been conspicuous?

Ephraim-ite = a descendant of EPHRAIM 1; one of the tribe of Ephraim; elsewhere called “Ephrathite” (Josh. xvi. 10; Judg. xii. 5).

Ephraim (fr. Heb. = the two fawns, Ges.), a city of Israel, which with its dependent hamlets Abijah and the army of Judah captured from Jeroboam (2 Chr. xiii. 19); conjectured = EPHRAIM 2, 3, and OPHRAH 1.

Ephraim, and Ephrath, or Ephrath (Heb. land, region, Ges.; fruit, posterity, Fū.). 1. Second wife of Caleb the son of Hezron; mother of Hur, and grandmother of Bezaleel the artificer (1 Chr. ii. 19, 50, iv. 4). (See CALEB 1, 3, 4; and No. 2 below).—2. The ancient name of Bethlehem-judah (Gen. xxxv. 16, 19, xlviii. 7; Ru. iv. 11). (BETHLEHEM 1.) Lord A. C. Hervey supposes Ephrathah (No. 1, above), the mother of Hur, was so called from the town of her birth, and that she probably was the owner of the town and district.—3. Gesenius thinks that, in Ps. cxxxii. 6, Ephrathah means Ephraim. So First, who understands by it especially Shiloh, and Kirjath-jearim by “the fields of the wood” in the same verse.

* Ephrath or Ephrath (Heb.) = EPHRATHAH.

Ephrathite or Ephrathite. 1. An inhabitant of EPHRATH, i. e. Bethlehem (Ru. i. 2; 1 Sam. xvii. 12).—2. An Ephraimite (1 K. xi. 26). In 1 Sam. i. 1 “Ephrathite” = Ephraimite (so Gesenius [doubtfully], Lord A. C. Hervey, &c.); or it may show some connection with Ephrath, i. e. Bethlehem (Ayre); or it may simply denote a native of Mount Ephraim or of the region held by the tribe of Ephraim. SAMUEL.

Ephron (Heb. fawn-like, Ges.), son of Zohar a Hittite, from whom Abraham bought the field and cave of Machpelah (Gen. xxiii. 8–17, xxv. 9, xlix. 29, 30, l. 13).

Ephron (see above), a very strong city on the E. of Jordan between Carnaim (ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM) and BETH-SHEAN, attacked and demolished by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. v. 46-52; 2 Mc. xii. 27); site unknown.

Ephron (see above), Mount. The "cities of Mount Ephron" are mentioned as on the N. boundary of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 9). Ephron is probably the range of hills on the W. side of Wady Beit-Hanina, the traditional valley of ELAH. Winer supposes it = Mount Ephraim. EPHRAIM 1.

Ep-i-cu-re-ans, the, derived their name from Epicurus (342-271 B. C.), a philosopher of Attic descent, whose "Garden" at Athens rivalled in popularity the "Porch" and the "Academy." The doctrines of Epicurus found wide acceptance in Asia Minor and Alexandria, and they gained a brilliant advocate at Rome in Lucretius (95-60 B. C.). The object of Epicurus was to find in philosophy a practical guide to happiness. True pleasure and not absolute truth was the end at which he aimed; experience and not reason the test on which he relied. It is obvious that a system thus framed would degenerate by a natural descent into mere materialism; and in this form Epicureism was the popular philosophy at the beginning of the Christian era. It maintained the claims of the body to be considered a necessary part of man's nature coördinate with the soul, and affirmed the existence of individual freedom against the Stoic doctrines of pure spiritualism and absolute fate. When St. Paul addressed "Epicureans and Stoics" (Acts xvii. 18) at Athens, the philosophy of life was practically reduced to the teaching of those two antagonistic schools. In the address of St. Paul, the affirmation of the doctrines of creation (verse 24), providence (verse 26), man's dependence (verse 28), resurrection and judgment (verse 31), appears to be directed against the cardinal errors of Epicureism. PHILOSOPHY.

E-piph'a-nes [-neez] (Gr. illustrious) (1 Mc. i. 10, x. 1). ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES.

Ep'i-phi (Gr. fr. Egyptian) (3 Mc. vi. 38), name of the eleventh month of the Egyptian Vague year, and the Alexandrian or Egyptian Julian year.

E-plis'tle [-e-pis'l] (fr. Gr. epistolē = something sent by a messenger, a letter). The use of written letters implies, it needs hardly be said, a considerable progress in the development of civilized life. (WRITING.) In the early nomadic stages of society, accordingly, we find no traces of any but oral communications. The first recorded letter in the history of the O. T. was that which David wrote to Joab, and sent by the hand of Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14), and this must obviously have been sealed with the king's SEAL. Written communications become more frequent in the later history (1 K. xxi. 8 ff.; 2 K. v. 5, 6, x. 1 ff.; 2 Chr. xxi. 12). Hezekiah introduces a system of couriers (FOOTMAN 2; POST II.) like that afterward under the Persian kings (2 Chr. xxx. 6, 10; Esth. viii. 10, 14; see COMPEL 5), and receives from Sennacherib the letter which he spreads before the Lord (2 K. xix. 14). Jeremiah writes a letter to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. xxix. 1, 3). Ezra and Nehemiah contain or refer to many such documents (Ezr. iv. 6, 7, 11, v. 6, vii. 11; Neh. ii. 7, 9, vi. 5). The stress laid on the "open letter" sent by Sanballat (Neh. vi. 5) indicates that this was a breach of the customary etiquette of the Persian court. The influence of Persian, and yet more, perhaps, of Greek civilization, led to the more frequent use of letters as a means of intercourse (1 Mc. xi. 30, xii. 6, 20, xv. 1, 16; 2 Mc. xi. 16, 34; Acts xv. 23 ff., xxiii. 25 ff., xxv. 26). The Epistles of the N. T. in their outward form are such as might be expected from men brought into contact with Greek and Roman customs, themselves belonging to a different race, and so reproducing the imported style with only partial accuracy. They are twenty-one in number, fourteen of them (see HEBREWS, EPISTLE TO THE) generally ascribed to PAUL, the other seven to JAMES, PETER, JOHN, and JUDE. They begin (Hebrews and 1 John excepted) with the names of the writer and of those to whom the Epistle is addressed. Then follows the formula of salutation. Then the letter itself commences, in the first person, the singular and plural being used indiscriminately. When the substance of the letter has been completed, come the individual messages. The conclusion in St. Paul's Epistles was probably modified by the fact that the letters were dictated to an amanuensis. When he had done his work, the apostle took up the pen or reed, and added, in his own large characters (Gal. vi. 11), the authenticating autograph. In one instance (Rom. xvi. 22), the amanuensis in his own name adds his salutation. An allusion in 2 Cor. iii. 1 brings before us another class of letters which must have been in frequent use in the early ages of the Christian Church, by which travellers or teachers were commended by one church to the good offices of others.

Er (Heb. watchful). 1. First-born of Judah by the daughter of Shuah. Er "was wicked in the sight of the Lord; and the Lord slew him." It does not appear what the nature of his sin was; but, from his Canaanitish birth on the mother's side, it was probably connected with the abominable idolatries of Canaan (Gen. xxxviii. 3-7; Num. xxvi. 19).—2. Descendant of Shelah the son of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 21).—3. Son of Josec, and father of Elmodam, in cur Lord's genealogy (Lk. iii. 28).

* Er'a. CHRONOLOGY; JESUS CHRIST.

E'ran (Heb. = ER, Ges.), son of Shuthelah, Ephraim's eldest son; ancestor of the ERANITES (Num. xxvi. 36).

E'ran-ites, the = descendants of ERAN (Num. xxvi. 36).

E-ras'tus (L. fr. Gr. = beloved, lovely, L. & S.). 1. One of the attendants of St. Paul at Ephesus, who with Timothy was sent forward into Macedonia while the apostle himself remained in Asia (Acts xix. 22); probably = the Erastus mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 20, though not the same with—2. "ERASTUS the CHAMBERLAIN," or rather the public treasurer of Corinth, who was one of the early converts to Christianity (Rom. xvi. 23). According to the traditions of the Greek church, he was first treasurer to the church at Jerusalem, and afterward bishop of Pincas.

E'rech [-rek] (Heb. length, Ges.), one of the cities of Nimrod's kingdom in the land of Shinar (Gen. x. 10); doubtless = Orchoë of Ptolemy, eighty-two miles S. and forty-three E. of Babylon, the modern designations of the site, Warka, Irka, and Irak, bearing a considerable affinity to the original name (so Mr. Bevan, after Col. Taylor, Rawlinson, &c.). This place appears to have been the necropolis of the Assyrian kings, the whole neighborhood being covered with mounds, and strewed with the remains of bricks and coffins.

E'ri (Heb. watching [i. e. worshipping] Jehorah, Ges.), son of Gad (Gen. xlii. 16), and ancestor of the ERITES (Num. xxvi. 16).

* E'rites (fr. Heb.) = descendants of ERI (Num. xxvi. 16).

E-sa-las [e-za'yas] (Gr.) in the N. T. = ISALAH (Mat. iii. 3, iv. 14, &c.).

E'sar-had'don (Heb. fr. Assyrian; perhaps = gift of fire, Böhlen, Ges.; victorious commander, Fö.), one of the greatest of the kings of ASSYRIA; son of Sennacherib and grandson of Sargon who succeeded Shalmaneser. Nothing is really known of Esar-haddon until his accession (about B. C. 680 [so Rawlinson; see SENNACHERIB]; 2 K. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38). He appears by his monuments to have been one of the most powerful—if not the most powerful—of all the Assyrian monarchs. He carried his arms over all Asia between the Persian Gulf, the Armenian mountains, and the Mediterranean. In consequence of the disaffection of Babylon, and its frequent revolts from former Assyrian kings, Esar-haddon, having subdued the sons of Merodach-baladan who headed the national party, introduced the new policy of substituting, for the former government by viceroys, a direct dependence upon the Assyrian crown. He is the only Assyrian monarch whom we find to have actually reigned at Babylon, where he built himself a palace, bricks from which have been recently recovered bearing his name. His Babylonian reign lasted thirteen years, from B. C. 680 to B. C. 667. He placed colonists in SAMARIA (Ezr. iv. 2). MANASSEH, king of Judah, was brought before him at Babylon (2 Chr. xxxiii. 11), and detained for a time as prisoner there, but eventually restored to his throne. As a builder of great works Esar-haddon is particularly distinguished. Besides his palace at Babylon, he built at least three others in different parts of his dominions, either for himself or his son; while in a single inscription he mentions the erection by his hands of no fewer than thirty temples in Assyria and Mesopotamia. The S. W. palace at Nimrud, the great hall of which was 220 feet long by 100 broad, and the porch or antechamber 160 feet by 60, is the best preserved of his constructions. It is impossible (so Rawlinson) to fix the length of Esar-haddon's reign or the order of events in it. It has been conjectured that he died about B. C. 660, after occupying the throne for twenty years.

Esau (L. fr. Heb. Êsâv = hairy, rough, Ges.). 1. Eldest son of ISAAC, and twin-brother of JACOB. The singular appearance of the child at his birth originated the name (Gen. xxv. 25). This was not the only remarkable circumstance connected with the birth of the infant. Even in the womb the twin-brothers struggled together, and Rebekah was divinely informed that the elder should serve the younger (ver. 22, 23). Esau's robust frame and "rough" aspect were the types of a wild and daring nature. The peculiarities of his character soon began to develop themselves. He was, in fact, a thorough Bedouin, a "son of the desert," who delighted to roam free as the wind of heaven, and who was impatient of the restraints of civilized or settled life. His old father, by a caprice of affection not uncommon, loved his wilful, vagrant boy; and his keen relish for savory food being gratified by Esau's venison, he liked him all the better for his skill in hunting (xxv. 28). An event occurred which exhibited the reckless character of Esau on the one hand, and the selfish, grasping nature of his brother on the other (29-34; Heb. xii. 16, 17). Jacob takes advantage of his brother's distress to rob him of that which was as dear as life itself to an Eastern patriarch. (FIRST-BORN.) Esau, under the pressure of temporary suffering, despises his birthright by selling it for a mess of pottage. It is evident the whole transaction was public, for it resulted in a new name, seldom applied, however, to Esau himself, though almost universally given to the country he settled in and to his posterity (EDOM; EDMITES). Esau married at the age of forty, and contrary to the wish of his parents. (AHOLIBAMAH; BASHMATH.) His wives were both Canaanites; and they "were bitterness of spirit unto Isaac and to Rebekah" (Gen. xxvi. 34, 35). The next episode in the history of Esau and Jacob (xxvii.) is still more painful than the former. Jacob, through the craft of his mother, is again successful, and secures irrevocably the covenant blessing. Esau vows vengeance. But he knew not a mother's watchful care. By a characteristic piece of domestic policy Rebekah succeeded both in exciting Isaac's anger against Esau, and obtaining his consent to Jacob's departure. When Esau heard that his father had commanded Jacob to take a wife of the daughters of his kinsman Laban, he also resolved to try whether by a new alliance he could propitiate his parents. He accordingly married his cousin Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael (xxviii. 8, 9). This marriage appears to have brought him into connection with the Ishmaelitic tribes beyond the valley of Arabah. He soon afterward established himself in Mount Seir (SEIR, MOUNT); still retaining, however, some interest in his father's property in southern Palestine. He was residing in Mount Seir when Jacob returned from Padan-aram, and had then become so rich and powerful that the impression of his brother's early offences seem to have been almost completely effaced (so Porter; but see Gen. xxxii., xxxiii.). It does not appear that the brothers again met until the death of their father about twenty years afterward. They united in laying Isaac's body in the cave of Machpelah (xxxv. 29). Esau knew that the covenant blessing was Jacob's; that God had inalienably allotted the land of Canaan to Jacob's posterity; and that Mount Seir was given to himself (compare xxvii. 39, xxxii. 3; Deut. ii. 5); and he was therefore desirous now to enter into full possession of his country, and drive out its old inhabitants (Gen. xxxvi. 6-8; Deut. ii. 12). He "lived by his sword" (Gen. xxvii. 40), and the rocky fastnesses of Edom would be a safer and more suitable abode than southern Palestine. Of Esau's subsequent history nothing is known; for that of his descendants (Gen. xxxvi.; 1 Chr. i. 35 ff.) see EDM and EDMITES.—2. ZIHA 1 (1 Esd. v. 29).

Esay [s as z] = ISAIAH (Ecclus. xlviii. 20, 22; 2 Esd. ii. 18).

* Es-dræ'lon [-dree-] (Gr. Esdrélom = JEZREEL) = ES-DRELOM.

Es-dræ'lon (Gr. Esdrélom = JEZREEL). This name occurs in this exact shape only twice in the A. V. (Jud. iii. 9, iv. 6). In Judith vii. 3 it is "ESDRELOM," and in i. 8 "ESDRELOM," with the addition of the "great plain." In the O. T. the plain is called the "Valley of Jezreel;" by Josephus "the great plain." The name is derived from the old royal city of JEZREEL, which occupied a commanding site, near the eastern extremity of the plain, on a spur of Mount Gilboa. "The great plain" of Esdrelon extends across Central Palestine from the Mediterranean to the Jordan, separating the mountain ranges of Carmel and Samaria from those of Galilee. The western section of it is properly the plain of ACCHO, or 'Akka. The main body of the plain is a triangle. Its base on the E. extends from Jenin (the ancient En-gannim) to the foot of the hills below Nazareth, and is about fifteen miles long; the N. side, formed by the hills of Galilee, is about twelve miles long; and the S. side, formed by the Samaria ridge, is about eighteen miles. The apex on the W. is a narrow pass opening into the plain of 'Akka. The plain of Esdrelon has a gently undulating surface, dotted with several low gray hills, and near the sides with a few olive-groves. Here Barak triumphed, and Josiah was defeated and received his death-wound (Judg. v.; 2 Chr. xxxv.). The river Kishon drains the plain. (MEGIDDO.) From the base of this triangular plain three branches stretch out eastward, like fingers from a hand, divided by two bleak, gray ridges—one bearing the familiar name of Mount Gilboa; and the other called by Franks Little Hermon, but by natives Jebel ed-Düh. Into the N. branch, between Tabor and Little Hermon, the troops of Barak defiled from Tabor (Judg. iv. 14). Across the S. branch, between Jenin and Gilboa, Ahaziah fled from Jehu (2 K. ix. 27). The central branch is the richest as well as the most celebrated. This is the "Valley of Jezreel" proper—the battle-field on which Gideon triumphed, and Saul and Jonathan were overthrown (Judg. vii. 1 ff.; 1 Sam. xxix. and xxxi.). Two things are worthy of special notice in the plain of Esdraelon: 1. its wonderful richness; 2. its desolation. If we except the eastern branches, there is not a single inhabited village on its whole surface, and not more than one-sixth of its soil is cultivated. It is the home of the wild wandering Arabs, and is now known among them only as Merj ibn 'Amer (= the plain of the son of 'Amer). It has always been insecure—exposed to every hasty incursion and every shock of war. The whole borders of the plain are dotted with places of high interest. On the E. we have Endor, Nain, Shunem, Beth-shean, Gilboa, Jezreel; on the S., En-gannim, Taanach, and Megiddo; at the W., Carmel, &c.; on the N., Nazareth, Tabor, &c.

Esdras (Gr.) in 1 and 2 Esd. = EZRA the scribe.

Esdras (Gr. = EZRA), First Book of, the first in order of the Apocryphal books in the English Bible. In the Vatican and modern editions of the LXX., our 1 Esd. is called the first Book of Esdras, in relation to the canonical Book of Ezra which follows it and is called the second Esdras. But in the Vulgate, 1 Esd. = the canonical Book of Ezra, and 2 Esd. or Neh. = our Nehemiah, according to the primitive Hebrew arrangement, mentioned by Jerome, in which Ezra and Nehemiah made up two parts of the one book of Ezra; and 3 and 4 Esd. = our 1 and 2 Esdras. These last, with the prayer of Manasses, are the only books of the Apocrypha not declared canonical by the Council of Trent. In all the earlier editions of the English Bible the books of Esdras are numbered as in the Vulgate. The Geneva Bible first adopted the classification used in our present Bibles, in which Ezra and Nehemiah = the two canonical books, and the two Apocryphal become 1 and 2 Esdras. As regards the antiquity of this book and the rank assigned to it in the early Church, it may suffice to mention that Josephus quotes largely from it, and follows its authority. It is quoted also by Clemens Alexandrinus, by Cyprian, Augustine, Athanasius, and other fathers. Nothing can be clearer on the other hand than that it is rightly included by us among the APOCRYPHA, not only on the ground of its historical inaccuracy, and contradiction of Ezra, but also on the external evidence of the early Church. That it was never known to exist in Hebrew and formed no part of the Hebrew Canon, is admitted by all. As regards the contents of the book, and the author or authors of it—the first chapter is a transcript of the two last chapters of 2 Chr., for the most part verbatim, and only in one or two parts slightly abridged and paraphrased, and showing some corruptions of the text, the use of a different Greek version, and some various readings. Chapters iii.-v. 6 are the original portions of the book, containing the legend of the three young Jews (Zerubbabel, &c.) at the court of Darius, and the rest is a transcript more or less exact of Ezra, with the chapters transposed and quite otherwise arranged, and a portion of Nehemiah. Hence a twofold design in the compiler is discernible: one to introduce and give Scriptural sanction to the legend about Zerubbabel; the other to explain the great obscurities of Ezra, in which, however, he has signally failed. As regards the time and place when the compilation was made, the original portion is that which alone affords much clew. This seems to indicate that the writer was thoroughly conversant with Hebrew and the Hebrew Scriptures, even if he did not write the book in that language. But that he did not live under the Persian kings, appears by his indiscriminating use of the phrase Medes and Persians, or Persians and Medes, according as he was imitating the language of Daniel or of Esther (so Lord A. C. Hervey, the original author of this article). Dr. C. D. Ginsburg (in Kit.) regards the author as a master of the Greek language, who lived in Palestine at least 100 years B. C. Dr. S. Davidson says (Introduction to the O. T. and Apocrypha), "He was a Hellenist, or Greek-speaking Jew, who lived in Palestine."

Esdras (Gr. = EZRA), the Second Book of, in the English Version of the APOCRYPHA, and so called by the author (2 Esd. i. 1), is more commonly known, according to the reckoning of the Latin Version, as the fourth book of Ezra. (ESDRAS, FIRST BOOK OF.) The original title, "the Apocalypse of Ezra," is far more appropriate.—I. For a long time this Book of Ezra was known only by an old Latin version, which is preserved in some MSS. of the Vulgate. A second Arabic text was discovered by Mr. Gregory about the middle of the 17th century in two Bodleian MSS. A third Ethiopic text was published in 1820 by Archbishop Laurence with English and Latin translations, likewise from a Bodleian MS.—II. The three versions were all made directly from a Greek text; and in default of direct evidence to the contrary, it must be supposed that the book was composed in Greek.—III. The common Latin text, which is followed in the English version, contains two important interpolations (Chs. i. ii.; xv. xvi.) which are not found in the Arabic and Ethiopic versions, and are separated from the genuine Apocalypse in the best Latin MSS. Both of these passages are evidently of Christian origin (so Mr. Westcott, the original author of this article). Another smaller interpolation occurs in the Latin version in vii. 28, where filius meus Jesus (A. V. "my son Jesus") answers to "My Messiah" in the Ethiopic, and to "My Son Messiah" in the Arabic. (On the other hand, a long passage occurs in the Ethiopic and Arabic versions after vii. 35, which is not found in the Latin.—IV. The original Apocalypse (1 Esd. iii.-xiv.) consists of a series of angelic revelations and visions in which Ezra is instructed in some of the great mysteries of the moral world, and assured of the final triumph of the righteous. The subject of the first revelation (iii.-v. 15) is the unsearchableness of God's purposes, and the signs of the last age. The second revelation (v. 16-vi. 34) carries out this teaching yet further, and lays open the gradual progress of the plan of Providence, and the nearness of the visitation before which evil must attain its most terrible climax. The third revelation (vi. 35-ix. 28) answers the objections from the apparent narrowness of the limits within which the hope of blessedness is confined, and describes the coming of Messiah and the last scene of Judgment. After this follow three visions. The first vision (ix. 26-x. 59) is of a woman (Sion) in deep sorrow, lamenting the death, upon his bridal day, of her only son (the city built by Solomon), who had been born to her after she had had no child for thirty years. But while Ezra looked, her face "upon a sudden shined exceedingly," and "the woman appeared no more, but there was a city builded." The second vision (xi., xii.), in a dream, is of an eagle (Rome) which "came up from the sea" and "spread her wings over all the earth." After some strange transformations, suddenly a lion (Messiah) came forth and with a man's voice rebuked the eagle, and it was burnt up. The third vision (xiii.), in a dream, is of a man (Messiah) "flying with the clouds of heaven," against whom the nations of the earth are gathered, till he destroys them with the blast of his mouth, and gathers together the lost tribes of Israel and offers Sion, "prepared and builded," to His people. Chapter xiv. recounts an appearance to Ezra of the Lord who showed himself to Moses in the bush, at whose command he receives again the law which had been burnt, and with the help of scribes writes down ninety-four books (the twenty-four canonical books of the O. T., and seventy of secret mysteries).—V. The date of the book is much disputed, though the limits within which opinions vary are narrower than in the case of the book of Enoch. Lücke places it in the time of Cesar; Van der Vlis shortly after the death of Cesar. Laurence and Hilgenfeld bring it down somewhat lower, to 28-25 B. C. On the other hand, Gfrörer, Wieseler, and Bauer assign the book to the time of Domitian, A. D. 81-96. Dr. Ginsburg (in Kit.) assigns it to about 50 B. C.—VI. The chief characteristics of the "three-headed eagle," which refer apparently to historic details, are "twelve feathered wings," "eight counter-fathers," and "three heads;" but though the writer expressly interprets these of kings (xii. 14, 20) and "kingdoms" (xii. 23), he is, perhaps intentionally, so obscure in his allusions, that the interpretation only increases the difficulties of the vision itself. One point only may be considered certain,—the eagle can typify no other empire than Rome. But when it is established that the interpretation of the vision is to be sought in the history of Rome, the chief difficulties of the problem begin. All is evidently as yet vague and uncertain, and will probably remain so till some clearer light can be thrown upon Jewish thought and history during the critical period 100 B. C.—100 A. C.—VII. But the book, i. e. chapters iii.—xiv., is a genuine product of Jewish thought, probably written in Egypt; the opening and closing chapters certainly were.—VIII. In tone and character the Apocalypse of Ezra offers a striking contrast to that of Enoch. (ENOCH, BOOK OF.) Triumphant anticipations are overshadowed by gloomy forebodings of the destiny of the world. The idea of victory is lost in that of revenge.—IX. One tradition which the book contains obtained a wide reception in early times, and served as a pendant to the legend of the origin of the LXX. Ezra, it is said, for forty days and forty nights dictated to his scribes, who wrote ninety-four books, of which twenty-four were delivered to the people in place of the books which were lost (xiv. 20-48). This strange story probably owed its origin to the tradition which regarded Ezra as the representative of the men of the "Great Synagogue." (CANON; SYN-AGOGUE, THE GREAT.)—X. Though the book was assigned to the "prophet" Ezra by Clement of Alexandria, it did not maintain its ecclesiastical position in the Church. Jerome speaks of it with contempt, and it is rarely found in MSS. of the Latin Bible. It is found, however, in the printed copies of the Vulgate older than the Council of Trent. On the other hand, though this book is included among those which are "read for examples of life" by the English Church, no use of it is there made in public worship.

* Es-die'lom (Gr.) = ESDRÆLON; JEZREEL (Jd. i. 8).

Es'e-brî-as = SHEREBIAH (1 Esd. viii. 54).

Esek (Heb. strife), a well, which the herdsmen of Isaac dug in the valley of Gerar (Gen. xxvi. 20).

Esh'-ba-al (-bay-) (Heb. Baal's man), fourth son of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 33, ix. 39), doubtless = ISH-BOSHETH. Compare MERIB-BAAL.

Esh'ban (Heb. = HESHBON, Ges.), a Horite, son of DIHON (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chr. i. 41).

Esh'col (Heb. cluster), brother of Mamre the Amorite, and of Aner; one of Abraham's companions in his pursuit of the four kings who had carried off Lot (Gen. xiv. 13, 24).

Esh'col (Heb. cluster), the Valley, or the Brook, or, a wady (BROOK 4; VALLEY 3) in the neighborhood of HEBRON, explored by the spies sent by Moses from Kadesh-barnea. From the terms of two of the notices of this transaction (Num. xxxii. 9; Deut. i. 24), it might be gathered that Eshcol was the farthest point to which the spies penetrated. But this would contradict the express statement of Num. xiii. 21, that they went as far as Rehob. From this fruitful valley they brought back a huge cluster of grapes (Num. xiii. 23, 24). The valley, Wady Tefûh, coming down toward Hebron from the N. W., and distinguished for its fine vineyards, which "produce the largest and best grapes in all the country," Robinson (Phys. Geog. 121) "without hesitation" identifies with Eshcol; but says the fountain, a few minutes N. of the city, which Van de Velde (ii. 64) gives as 'Ain Eskali (fountain of Eshcol)' is 'Ain Kaskhala, according to the Arabic scholar G. Rosen.

Eshe-an (Heb. prop, support, Ges.), a city in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 52); site unknown.

Esh'ka-lon-ites (fr. Heb.) the, = inhabitants of ASHKELON (Josh. xiii. 3).

Esh'ta-ol (Heb., perhaps = a receding, retreat, Ges.; hollow way, Fü.), a town in the low country (VALLEY 5) of Judah, the first of the first group of cities in that district (Josh. xv. 33). Zorah and Eshtaol were two of the towns allotted to the tribe of Dan out of Judah (xix. 41). From them went out the Danites who took Laish (xviii. 2, 8, 11). Here, among the old warriors of the tribe, Samson spent his boyhood, and hither after his last exploit his body was brought (xiii. 25, xvi. 31). In the Onomasticon Eshtaol is twice mentioned—(1.) as Ashtaol of Judah, described as then existing between Azotus and Ascalon under the name of Astho; (2.) as Esthaul of Dan, ten miles N. of Eleutheropolis. Porter (in Kitto) supposes it at the modern village of Yeshû'a or Eshwa', about two miles E. of Sûr'a (Zorah), at the end of a valley.

Esh'ta-ul-ites (fr. Heb. = natives or descendants of ESHTAOL), the, with the Zareathites, were among the families of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chr. ii. 53).

Esh-te-mo'a, and Esh'te-moh (both Heb. = obedience, Ges.), a town of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 50), allotted to the priests (xxi. 14; 1 Chr. vi. 57). It was one of the places frequented by David and his followers during their wanderings (1 Sam. xxx. 28, compare 31). There is little doubt that it has been discovered by Robinson at Semû'a, a village seven miles S. of Hebron. Eshtemoa appears to have been founded by the descendants of the Egyptian wife of a certain Mered (1 Chr. iv. 17). "Eshtemoa the Maachathite" (ver. 19) appears to be an actual person.

* Esh'te-moh (Heb.) = ESHTEMOA.

Esh'ton (Heb. womanish, uxorious, Ges.), a name in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 11, 12).

Es'll (Gr., probably = AZALIAH), son of Nagge, and father of Naum, in the genealogy of Christ (Lk. iii. 25).

E-so'ra (fr. Gr.), a place fortified by the Jews on the approach of the Assyrian army under Holofernes (Jd. iv. 4); perhaps = HAZOR, or ZORAH.

* Es-pous'als. MARRIAGE.

Es'll (Gr.) (1 Esd. ix. 34). AZAREEL, or SHARAI.

Es'rom (Gr.) = HEZRON 2 (Mat. i. 3; Lk. iii. 33).

Es-senes' (-senz) (Gr. Essénoi; see below). I. In the description of Josephus (B. J. ii. 8, &c.) the Essenes appear to combine the ascetic virtues of the Pythagoreans and Stoics with a spiritual knowledge of the Divine Law. Though not mentioned by the name Essenes in the N. T., Dr. Ginsburg (in Kitto) thinks they are referred to in Mat. xix. 12, 1 Cor. vii., &c. II. Various derivations have been proposed for the name Essene, and all are more or less open to objection. Mr. Westcott supposes that Essene represents a Chaldean or Aramaic word = seer (so Suidas), or the silent, the mysterious. Dr. Ginsburg (in Kitto) favors the derivation from hâsi or châsi = pious (compare ASSIDEANS). III. The obscurity of the Essenes as a distinct body arises from the fact that they represented originally a tendency rather than an organization. As a sect they were distinguished by an aspiration after ideal purity rather than by any special code of doctrines. From the Maccabean age there was a continuous effort among the stricter Jews to attain an absolute standard of holiness. (ASSIDEANS.) Each class of devotees was looked upon as practically impure by their successors, who carried the laws of purity still further; and the Essenes stand at the extreme limit of the mystic asceticism thus gradually reduced to shape. To the PHARISEES they stood nearly in the same relation as that in which the Pharisees themselves stood with regard to the mass of the people (so Mr. Westcott, original author of this article; see below, VII.) VII. The traces of the existence of Essenes in common society are not wanting nor confined to individual cases. Not only was a gate at Jerusalem named from them, but a later tradition mentions the existence of a congregation there which devoted "one-third of the day to study, one-third to prayer, and one-third to labor." The isolated communities of Essenes furnished the type preserved in the popular descriptions. These were regulated by strict rules, analogous to those of the monastic institutions of a later date. The full membership in these was attained after two novitiates, the first of one year, the second of two years, when the novice bound himself by awful oaths—though oaths were absolutely forbidden at other times—to observe piety, justice, obedience, honesty, and secrecy. V. The order itself was regulated by an internal jurisdiction. Excommunication was equivalent to a slow death, since an Essene could not take food prepared by strangers for fear of pollution. All things were held in common, without distinction of property or house; and special provision was made for the relief of the poor. Self-denial, temperance, and labor—especially agriculture—were the marks of the outward life of the Essenes; purity and divine communion the objects of their aspiration. Slavery, war, and commerce were alike forbidden. VI. In doctrine, they did not differ essentially from strict Pharisees. Moses was honored by them next to God. They observed the Sabbath with singular strictness, and though unable to offer sacrifices at Jerusalem, probably from regard to purity, they sent gifts thither. Like most ascetics, they turned their attention specially to the mysteries of the spiritual world, and looked upon the body as a mere prison of the soul. The Essenes (so Ginsburg, in Kitto) were simply an order of PHARISEES, living in celibacy. They believed that to obey diligently the commandments of the Lord, to lead a pure and holy life, to mortify the flesh and the lusts thereof, and to be meek and lowly in spirit, would bring them in closer communion with their Creator, and make them the temples of the Holy Ghost, when they would be able to prophesy and perform miracles, and, like Elias (ELIJAH), be ultimately the forerunners of the Messiah. VII. The number of the Essenes is roughly estimated by Philo at 4,000. Their best-known settlements were on the N. W. shore of the Dead Sea. VIII. In the Talmudic writings there is no direct mention of the Essenes, but their existence is recognized by the notice of peculiar points of practice and teaching. IX. The character of Essenism limited its spread. Out of Palestine Levitical purity was impossible, for the very land was impure; and thus there is no trace of the sect in Babylonia. The case was different in Egypt, and the tendency which gave birth to the Essenes found a fresh development in the pure speculation of the Therapeutæ. (ALEXANDRIA.) X. From the nature of the case, Essenism in its extreme form could exercise very little influence on Christianity. In all its practical bearings it was diametrically opposed to the apostolic teaching. The only real similarity between Essenism and Christianity lay in the common element of true Judaism. Nationally, however, the Essenes occupy the same position as that to which John the Baptist was personally called. They mark the close of the old, the longing for the new, but in this case without the promise. At a later time traces of Essenism appear in the Clementines. After the Jewish war the Essenes disappear from history.

Es'ther [-ter] (Gr. fr. Pers. = the planet Venus; star, good fortune, happiness, compare ASHTORETH, Ges.), a name of HADASSAH, daughter of Abihail, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjaminite (Esth. ii. 5, 15). Esther was a beautiful Jewish maiden, an orphan, brought up by her cousin MORDECAI, who had an office in the household of ACHASUERUS 3, king of Persia, and dwelt at "Shushan the palace." When VASHTI had been dismissed from being queen, and all the fairest virgins of the kingdom had been collected at Shushan for the king to choose her successor from among them, the choice fell upon Esther. The king was not aware, however, of her race and parentage; and so, in the representation of HAMAN the Agagite, that the Jews scattered through his empire were a pernicious race, he gave him full power and authority to kill them all, young and old, women and children, and take possession of all their property. The means taken by Esther to avert this great calamity from her people and her kindred, and the success of her scheme, by which she became forever especially honored among her countrymen (PURIM), are fully related in Esther. (ESTHER, BOOK OF.) Profane history is wholly silent both about Vashti and Esther. Herodotus only mentions one of Xerxes' wives; Scripture only mentions two, if indeed either of them was a wife at all. Lord A. C. Hervey thinks that Esther, a captive, and one of the harem, was not of the highest rank of wives, but that a special honor, with the name of queen, may have been given to her, as to Vashti before her, as the favorite concubine or inferior wife, whose offspring, however, if she had any, would not have succeeded to the Persian throne.

Esther [-ter] (Gr., see above), Book of, one of the latest of the canonical books of Scripture, written (so Lord A. C. Hervey, &c.) late in the reign of Xerxes (AHASUERUS 3), or early in that of his son Artaxerxes Longimanus. The book has its name from ESTHER, who is so prominent in the narrative. The author is not known, but may very probably have been MORDECAI himself. Those who ascribe it to Ezra, or the men of the Great Synagogue, may have merely meant that Ezra edited and added it to the canon of Scripture, which he probably did. Esther appears in a different form in the LXX., and the translations therefrom, from that in which it is found in the Hebrew Bible.—I. The canonical Esther is placed among the hagiographa by the Jews, and in that first portion of them which they call "the five rolls." (BIBLE III. 8.) It is sometimes emphatically called Megillah (Heb. = roll), without other distinction, and is read through by the Jews in their synagogues at the feast of PURIM. It has often been remarked as a peculiarity of this book, that the name of God does not once occur in it. It was always reckoned in the Jewish canon, and is named or implied in almost every enumeration of the books composing it, from Josephus downward. Jerome mentions it by name, as do Augustine, Origen, and many others. The style of writing is remarkably chaste and simple. It does not in the least savor of romance. The Hebrew is very like that of Ezra and parts of 1 & 2 Chronicles; generally pure, but mixed with some words of Persian origin, and some of Chaldaic affinity. In short, it is just what one would expect to find in a work of the age to which Esther professes to belong.—II. The LXX. version of the book consists of the canonical Esther with various interpolations prefixed, interspersed, and added at the close. The chief additions are—what in the A. V. (Apocrypha) constitutes xi. 2–xii. 6, is in the LXX. placed before i. 1 (A. V.); xiii. 1–7 (A. V.) follows iii. 13 (A. V.); xiii. 8–xiv. 19 (A. V.) follows iv. 17 (A. V.); xv. (A. V.) is an amplification of v. 1, 2 (A. V.); xvi. (A. V.) is an interpolation in viii. 13 (A. V.); x. 4–xi. 1 (A. V.) follows x. 3 (A. V.). Though the interpolations of the Greek copy are manifest, they make a consistent and intelligible story. But the Apocryphal additions as inserted in some editions of the Latin Vulgate, and in the English Bible under the title, "The rest of the Chapters of the Book of Esther, which are found neither in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee," are incomprehensible; the history of which is this:—When Jerome translated Esther, he first gave the version of the Hebrew alone as being alone authentic. He then added at the end a version in Latin of those several passages in the LXX. which were not in the Hebrew, stating where each passage came in, and marking them all with an obelus [†]. The first passage so given is x. 4–13, xi. 1 (A. V.), which form the conclusion of the book in the LXX. Having annexed this conclusion, he then gives the Proemium (L. = Introduction), which he says forms the beginning of the Greek Vulgate (xi. 2–xii. 6 [A. V.]); and so proceeds with the other passages. But in subsequent editions all Jerome's explanatory matter has been swept away, and the disjointed portions have been printed as chapters xi., xii., xiii., xiv., xv., xvi., as if they formed a narrative in continuance of the canonical book. Esther, in the LXX., in the Vatican edition, and most others, comes between Judith and Job. Tobit and Judith have been placed between it and Nehemiah, doubtless for chronological reasons. But in the very ancient Codex or MS. published by Tischendorf, and called C. Friderico-Augustanus (i. e. the Frederico-Augustus MS.), Esther immediately follows Nehemiah, and precedes Tobit. The Apocryphal additions to Esther were probably written in Greek by a Hellenistic Jew or Jews to supply the name of God, and point out more distinctly His interposition in behalf of His chosen people. The Council of Trent pronounced the whole of Esther, including these additions, to be canonical, but all Protestants reject them. APOCRYPHA.

Etam (L. fr. Heb. = place of ravenous beasts, Ges.). 1. A village or city of Simeon, specified only in 1 Chr. iv. 32; = ETHER? (compare Josh. xix. 7). —2. A place in Judah, fortified and garrisoned by Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 6). From its position in this list we may conclude that it was near Bethlehem and Tekoah. Here, according to Josephus (viii. 7, § 3) and the Talmudists, were the sources of the water from which Solomon's gardens and pleasure-grounds were fed, and Bethlehem and the Temple supplied. Robinson (i. 477, iii. 273) supposes Etam at the ruined village of Urtâs, about one and a half miles S. of Bethlehem. (ETAM, THE ROCK). —3. A name in the lists of Judah's descendants (1 Chr. iv. 3), but probably referring to No. 2.

Etam (see above), the Rock, a cliff or lofty rock, into a cleft or chasm of which Samson retired after his slaughter of the Philistines (Judg. xv. 8, 11). This natural stronghold was in the tribe of Judah; and near it, probably at its foot was Lehi or Ramath-lehi, and En-hakkore (xv. 9, 14, 17, 19). The extremely uneven and broken country round the modern Urtâs (ETAM 2) is a fitting scene for the adventure of Samson. In the abundant springs and the numerous eminences of the district round Urtâs, the cliff Etam, Ramath-lehi, and En-hakkore may be yet discovered.

* E-ter-nal (fr. L.), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. 'ôlâm once (Is. lx. 15), usually translated "for ever" (Gen. iii. 22; Ex. iii. 15, xii. 14, 17, &c.), or "everlasting" (Gen. ix. 16, xvii. 7, 8, 13, 19, xli. 33, &c.); also translated "always" or "always" (Gen. vi. 3; 1 Chr. xvi. 15; Job vii. 16, &c.), "perpetual" (Gen. ix. 12; Ex. xxix. 9, &c.), "of old" (Gen. vi. 4; Ps. cxix. 52, &c.), "old" (Deut. xxxii. 7; Job xxii. 15, &c.), "world" (Ps. lxxiii. 12; Eccl. iii. 11; see below), &c. The Heb. word (so Gesenius) properly = hidden; specifically, hidden time, i. e. obscure and long, of which the beginning or end is uncertain or indefinite, duration, everlasting, eternity, spoken—(a) of time long past, of old, everlasting (Gen. vi. 4; Deut. xxxii. 7, &c.);—(b) of future time, ever, forever, evermore, in such a way that the duration to which it extends is to be determined from the nature of the subject, as the whole period of life (Deut. xv. 17, A. V. "ever," &c.), the whole duration of a race, dynasty, or people (Gen. xvii. 7, 8, &c.), the duration of the earth and the universe (Is. civ. 5, A. V. "ever," &c.), and of human things after death (Jer. li. 39, 57, A. V. "perpetual" in both; Dan. xii. 2, A. V. "everlasting" twice, &c.), the existence of God (Gen. xxi. 33, &c.; compare Gen. iii. 22, &c.), the eternity of life, prosperity, &c., which is hyperbolically expressed in good wishes (1 K. i. 31, A. V. "for ever," &c.). (ETERNITY.) In Eccl. iii. 11, 'ôlâm, in A. V., LXX., Vulgate, is translated "the world;" by Baur, Rosenmüller, &c., eternity; by Gesenius, the world, hence tone of worldly things, worldliness (compare No. 4 below); by Gaab, Spohn, Hitzig, Stuart, intelligence. In Ps. lxxiii. 12 (A. V. "in the world"), Gesenius, J. A. Alexander, &c., translated ever, for ever.—2. Heb. kedem once (Deut. xxxiii. 27); once translated "from everlasting" (Hab. i. 12), frequently "of old" (Neh. xii. 46; Ps. lxxiv. 2, 12, &c.), &c. This Heb. word (so Gesenius) properly = the front, what is before; and is used of place = "east" (Gen. x. 30, &c.), and poetically of time = former times, aforesaid, ancient days, like No. 1 (Ps. lxxiv. 12, &c.), also of eternity, at least that which has no beginning (Deut. xxxiii. 27, &c.).—3. Gr. aïdios (= everlasting; fr. Gr. ai = ever, always, L. & S., Rbn. N. T. Lex.), once applied to God (Rom. i. 20); translated in the only other passage of its occurrence in the N. T. "everlasting" (Jude 6), and there applied to the "chains" of the fallen angels.—4. Gr. aïôn (so Robinson, N. T. Lex.), properly (compare No. 1) = duration, the course or flow of time, in various relations, as determined by the context, viz.: (a), human life, existence, in Homer, &c.; (b), time indefinite, a period of the world, the world (see below for N. T.; in LXX. for Nos. 1 & 2; also in other Greek writers); (c), endless duration, perpetuity, eternity (Eph. iii. 11; 1 Tim. i. 17, see below; in LXX. for No. 1; also in Plato and other Greek writers). This word in different phrases is differently translated. Thus, under (b), the Gr. ap' aïónos (sing.) is translated "since the world began" (Lk. i. 70; Acts iii. 21), "from the beginning of the world" (xv. 18); ap' tón aïónón (pl.) "from the beginning of the world" (Eph. iii. 9), "from ages" (Col. i. 26); ek tou aïónos, "since the world began" (Jn. ix. 32); pro tón aïónón, "before the world" (1 Cor. ii. 7); ho aïón houtos, "this world" (Mat. xii. 32, xiii. 22, 40; Mk. iv. 19; Lk. xvi. 8, xx. 34; Rom. xii. 2; 1 Cor. i. 20, ii. 6, 8, iii. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Gal. i. 4; Eph. i. 21, vi. 12; 1 Tim. vi. 17; 2 Tim. iv. 10; Tit. ii. 12); hē sunteleia tou aïónos (sing.) (Mat. xiii. 39, 49, xxiv. 3, xxviii. 20) and hē sunteleia tón aïónón (pl.) (Heb. ix. 26), both translated "the end of the world;" ta telē tón aïónón (1 Cor. x. 11), "the ends of the world;" kata tón aïóna tou kormou toutou (Eph. ii. 2), "according to the course of this world;" the pl. is translated "worlds" (i. e. heaven and earth, the universe) in references to the creation (Heb. i. 2, xi. 3). Under (c), it is twice in the pl. translated "eternal" (literally of durations or of eternities), once of God's purpose (Eph. iii. 11), and once of God himself (1 Tim. i. 17). Here belong the Greek phrases eis hēmeran aïónos (literally to eternity's day) (2 Pet. iii. 18), translated "for ever;" eis tón aïóna (literally to the eternity), translated "for ever" (Mat. xxi. 19; Mk. xi. 14; Lk. i. 55; Jn. vi. 51, 58, viii. 35, xii. 34, xiv. 16; 2 Cor. ix. 9; Heb.

v. 6, vi. 20, vii. 17, 21, 24; 1 Pet. i. 23, 25; 1 Jn. ii. 17; 2 Jn. 2; Jude 13), "while the world standeth" (1 Cor. viii. 13), "for evermore" (Heb. vii. 28), with a negative in Greek usually translated "never" (Mk. iii. 29; Jn. iv. 14, viii. 51, 52, x. 28, xi. 26, xiii. 8); eis aïóna (literally to eternity), also translated "for ever" (2 Pet. ii. 17); eis tous aïónas (literally to the eternities), also translated "for ever" (Mat. vi. 13; Lk. i. 33; Rom. i. 25, ix. 5, xi. 36, xvi. 27; Heb. xiii. 8), "for evermore" (2 Cor. xi. 31); eis tous aïónas tón aïónón (literally to the eternities of the eternities), translated "for ever and ever" (Gal. i. 5; Phil. iv. 20; 1 Tim. i. 17; 2 Tim. iv. 18; Heb. xiii. 21; 1 Pet. iv. 11, v. 11; Rev. i. 6, iv. 9, 10, v. 13, 14, vii. 12, x. 6, xi. 15, xv. 7, xix. 3, xx. 10, xxii. 5), "for evermore" (Rev. i. 18); eis aïónas aïónón (literally to eternities of eternities), also translated "for ever and ever" (Rev. xiv. 11); eis tón aïóna tou aïónos (literally to the eternity of the eternity), also translated "for ever and ever" (Heb. i. 8); tou aïónos tón aïónón (literally of the eternity of the eternities), translated "world without end" (Eph. iii. 21); eis pantas tous aïónas (literally to all the eternities), translated "ever" (Jude 25); millōn aïón, translated "the world to come" (Heb. vi. 5; in Mat. xii. 32, A. V. "the world to come," and Eph. i. 21, A. V. "that which is to come," the word aïón = "world" is to be supplied from the preceding part of the sentence); ho aïón ho erchomenos, also translated "the world to come" (Mk. x. 30; Lk. xviii. 30); ho aïón ckeinos, translated "that world" (Lk. xx. 35); hoi aïónes hoi erchomenoi, translated "the ages to come" (Eph. ii. 7).—5. Gr. aïónios, (adj. fr. No. 4) = (so Rbn. N. T. Lex.) ever enduring, perpetual, everlasting; used (like No. 1) (a) of time long past and indefinite, primeval, most ancient, of old, in the Greek phrases chronois aïóniois (literally in times of old), translated "since the world began" (Rom. xvi. 25); pro chronōn aïóniōn (literally before times of old), translated "before the world began" (2 Tim. i. 9; Tit. i. 2); (b) of endless duration, eternal, everlasting, sometimes of that without beginning or end (Rom. xvi. 26, A. V. "everlasting;" Heb. ix. 14, A. V. "eternal"), but usually of the endless future only, translated indiscriminately in A. V. "everlasting" (Mat. xviii. 8, xix. 29, xxv. 41; Lk. xvi. 9, xviii. 30; Jn. iii. 16, 36, iv. 14, v. 24, vi. 27, 40, 47, xii. 50; Acts xiii. 46; Rom. vi. 22; Gal. vi. 8; 2 Th. i. 9, ii. 16; 1 Tim. i. 16, vi. 16; Heb. xiii. 20; 2 Pet. i. 11; Rev. xiv. 6) and "eternal" (Mat. xix. 16; Mk. iii. 29, x. 17, 30; Lk. x. 25, xviii. 18; Jn. iii. 15, iv. 36, v. 39, vi. 54, 68, x. 28, xii. 25, xvii. 2, 3; Acts xiii. 48; Rom. ii. 7, v. 21, vi. 23; 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18, v. 1; 1 Tim. vi. 12, 19; 2 Tim. ii. 10; Tit. i. 2, iii. 7; Heb. v. 9, vi. 2, ix. 12, 15; 1 Pet. v. 10; 1 Jn. i. 2, ii. 25, iii. 15, v. 11, 13, 20; Jude 7, 21), once both "everlasting" and "eternal" in the same verse (Mat. xxv. 46), and once "for ever" (Phn. 15). DAMNATION; DEATH; ETERNITY; LIFE.

* E-ter-nal-ty (fr. L.), occurs once only in the text of the A. V. of the canonical Scriptures, viz., as the translation in Is. lviii. 15 of the Heb. 'ad (properly a passing, progress, in space; also duration in time; hence perpetual time, eternity; = Heb. 'ôlâm, Ges. [ETERNAL 1]) in the sentence "the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity," i. e. that sitteth enthroned for ever (Gesenius). The Heb. 'ad is twice in A. V. translated "everlasting," viz., in the phrases "everlasting Father" (Is. ix. 6, Heb. 5) and "everlasting mountains" (Hab. iii. 6), and once "perpetually" (Am. i. 11), but usually with a Hebrew preposition = "for ever" (Ps. cxi. 3, 10, &c.), or in connection with Heb. 'ôlām, = "for ever and ever" (Ex. xv. 18; Ps. x. 16, cxi. 8, &c.). "Eternity" occurs three times in the margin of A.V., viz., twice as the translation of Heb. 'ôlām (Jer. x. 10, text "everlasting King," margin "King of eternity;" Mic. v. 2 [Heb. 1], text "from everlasting," margin "from the days of eternity" [ETERNAL 1]), and once for Heb. nētsach or nētsach (1 Sam. xv. 29, text "strength," margin "eternity," or "victory;" Gesenius translates here confidence or object of confidence), which most commonly = perpetuity, eternity, is in A.V. usually translated "ever" or "for ever" (2 Sam. ii. 26; Is. xxxiii. 20; Am. i. 11, &c.), but a limit of a like variation in meaning with 'ôlām (ETERNAL 1).—Eternity in the most unlimited sense (i. e. existence without beginning or end) belongs to God (Deut. xxxiii. 27; Ps. xc. 2, &c.); as having a beginning, but no end in the future, it describes the immortal existence of man and of created spiritual beings, and the endless duration of their future happiness or misery (Mat. xxv. 41, 46; Jn. iii. 15, 16, 36, &c.). ANGELS; DAMNATION; DEATH; ETERNAL; HINNOM, VALLEY OF, &c.

Etham (Heb. fr. Egyptian = boundary of the sea? Jablonsky, Ges.), a station of the Israelites as they were leaving Egypt. EXODUS, THE.

Ethan (L. fr. Heb. = perpetuity, firmness, Ges.; Got as very ancient, Fä.). 1. "The EZRAHITE," one of the four sons of MAHOL, whose wisdom was excelled by Solomon (1 K. iv. 31; 1 Chr. ii. 6). (DARDA; HEMAN 1, 2.) His name is in the title of Ps. lxxxix.—2. Son of Kishi or Kushiath; head of the Merarite Levites in David's time (1 Chr. vi. 44, Heb. 29), and a "singer." With Heman and Asaph, the heads of the other two families of Levites, Ethan was appointed to sound with cymbals (xv. 17, 19). It has been conjectured that the two names Ethan and Jeduthun belonged to one man, or are identical, but there is no direct evidence of this.—3. A Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph the singer (1 Chr. vi. 42, Heb. 27). JOAH 2.

Eth'an-ām. MONTH.

Eth'ba-al [-bay-] (Heb. with Baal), king of Sidon and father of Jezebel (1 K. xvi. 31). Josephus represents him as king of the Tyrians as well as the Sidonians. We may thus identify him with Ethibabalus or Ithobalus, noticed by Menander, a priest of Astarte, who, after having assassinated Phœles, usurped the throne of Tyre for thirty-two years. The date of Ethbaal's reign may be given as about B. C. 940–908.

Ether (Heb. abundance, Ges.), a city of Judah in the low country (Josh. xv. 42), allotted to Simeon (ix. 7); = ERAM 1, or TOCHEN (?). Wilton (in Fairbairn, art. Libnah) identifies Ether with 'Attarah near Gaza.

Ethi-o-pl-a (L. Æthiopia, fr. Gr. Aithiopia, Aithiops = burnt [i. e. dark, swarthy] countenance; see below), the country called by the Hebrews "Cush," lying S. of Egypt, and embracing, in its most extended sense, the modern Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan, and N. Abyssinia, and in its more definite sense the kingdom of Meroë, from the junction of the Blue and White branches of the Nile to the border of Egypt. The only direction in which a clear boundary can be fixed is in the N., where SYENE marked the division between Ethiopia and Egypt (Ez. xxix. 10); in other directions the boundaries may be generally described as the Red Sea on the E., the Libyan desert on the W., and the Abyssinian highlands on the S. The name "Ethiopia" is probably an adaptation of the Egyptian name "Ethaush" (so Mr. Bevan, &c.). The Hebrews do not appear to have had much practical acquaintance with Ethiopia itself, though the Ethiopians were well known to them through their intercourse with Egypt. They were, however, perfectly aware of its position (Is. xviii. 1; Ez. xxix. 10; Zeph. iii. 10) and its tropical characteristics, and they carried on commercial intercourse with it (Job xxviii. 19; Is. xlv. 14). The country is for the most part mountainous, the ranges gradually increasing in altitude toward the S., until they attain an elevation of about 8,000 feet in Abyssinia. The inhabitants of Ethiopia were a Hamitic race (Gen. x. 6), dark-complexioned (Jer. xiii. 23) and stalwart (Is. xlv. 14). They were divided into various tribes, of which the Sabeans were the most powerful. (SEBA; SUKKIMS.) The history of Ethiopia is closely interwoven with that of Egypt. The two countries were not unfrequently united under the same sovereign. (So; TIRHAKAH; ZERAH 4.) Esar-haddon is stated in the Assyrian inscriptions to have conquered both Egypt and Ethiopia. At the time of the conquest of Egypt, Cambyses advanced against Meroë and subdued it; but the Persian rule did not take any root there, nor did the influence of the Ptolemies generally extend beyond N. Ethiopia. Shortly before our Saviour's birth, a native dynasty of females, holding the official title of CANDACE, held sway in Ethiopia, and even resisted the advance of the Roman arms. Prophecies against Ethiopia are recorded (Is. xviii. xx.; Ez. xxx.; Zeph. ii. 12; see also Nah. iii. 9). The conversion of Ethiopia is predicted (Ps. lxxviii. 31; Is. xlv. 14; Zeph. iii. 10?). See the five articles below.

Ethi-o-pl-an (= one from ETHIOPIA), properly a "CUSHITE" (Jer. xiii. 23); use of ZERAH (2 Chr. xiv. 9 [Heb. 8]), and EBED-MELECH (Jer. xxxviii. 7, 10, 12, xxxix. 16). ETHIOPIANS.

Ethi-o-pl-an Wo'man (ETHIOPIAN). The wife of Moses is so described in Num. xii. 1 (margin "Cushite"). She is elsewhere said to have been the daughter of a Midianite, and in consequence of this some have supposed that the allusion is to another wife whom Moses married after the death of ZIPORAH.

Ethi-o-pl-ans (see ETHIOPIAN), properly "CUSH" or "ETHIOPIA" in Is. xx. 4; Jer. xlv. 9; elsewhere "Cushites," or inhabitants of Ethiopia (2 Chr. xii. 8, xiv. 12 f. [Heb. 11 f.], xvi. 8, xxi. 16; Dan. xi. 43; Am. ix. 7; Zeph. ii. 12).

Eth'ma (Gr. in 1 Esd. ix. 35 apparently a corruption of NEBO in the parallel list of Ezr. x. 43).

Eth'nan (Heb. a gift, hire, Ges.), a descendant of Judah, and son of Helah the wife of Ashur (1 Chr. iv. 7).

Eth'ni (Heb. giving, munificent, Ges.; Jehovah rewards, Fä.), a Gershonite Levite, ancestor of Asaph (1 Chr. vi. 41, Heb. 26).

Eu-bu'lus (L. fr. Gr. = of good counsel, shrewd, prudent, L. & S.), a Christian at Rome mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim. iv. 21).

Eu-er-ges-tes [-je-teez] (Gr. a benefactor), a common surname and title of honor in Greek states. (BENEFACITOR.) The title was borne by two of the Ptolemies, PTOLEMY III. EUEGETES I., B. C. 247–222, and Ptolemy VII. Euergetes II., also called Ptolemy Physcon, the brother, rival, and successor of PTOLEMY VI. PHILOMETOR, B. C. (170) 146–117.

The Euergetes mentioned in the prologue to Ecclesiasticus has been identified with each of these.

Eu-me-nes [-neez] (Gr. well-disposed, kind, friendly, L. & S.) II., king of Pergamus, succeeded his father Attalus I., B. C. 197. In the war with Antiochus the Great, he rendered the most important services to the Romans. After peace was made (B. C. 189), he repaired to Rome to claim the reward of his loyalty; and the Senate conferred on him the provinces of Mysia, Lydia, and Ionia (with some exceptions), Phrygia, Lycania, and the Thracian Chersonese (1 Mc. viii. 8 wrongly says "the country of India, and Media," &c.). The exact date of his death is not mentioned, but it must have taken place in B. C. 159.

Eu-na-tan (1 Esd. viii. 44), apparently a corruption of ELNATHAN (compare Ezr. viii. 16).

Eu-nice [yu'nis; in L. pron. yu-ni'see] (L. fr. Gr. Euniké = well-victorious), a Jewess of "unfeigned faith," mother of TIMOTHY (2 Tim. i. 5). Her husband was a Greek (Acts xvi. 1).

Eu-nuch [yu'nuk] (fr. Gr.; see No. 2 below), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. saris (2 K. ix. 32, xx. 18; Is. xxxix. 7, lvi. 3, 4; Jer. xxix. 2, xxxiv. 19, xxxviii. 7, xli. 16, lii. 25; Dan. i. 3, 7 ff.), often the marginal translation (1 Sam. viii. 15; 1 K. xxii. 9; 2 K. viii. 6, xxiii. 11, xxiv. 12, 15, xxv. 19; 1 Chr. xxviii. 1; 2 Chr. xviii. 8; Esth. i. 10, 12, iv. 4). The Hebrew word is also translated "CHAMBERLAIN" (2 K. ix. 32 [margin], xxiii. 11; Esth. i. 10, 12, 15, ii. 3, 14, 15, 21, iv. 4, 5, vi. 2, 14, vii. 9; Jer. xxix. 2 [margin]), and "OFFICER" (Gen. xxxvii. 36, xxxix. 1, xl. 2, 7; 1 Sam. viii. 15; 1 K. xxii. 9; 2 K. viii. 6, xxiii. 11 [margin], xxiv. 12, 15, xxv. 19; 1 Chr. xxviii. 1; 2 Chr. xviii. 8).—2. Gr. eunouchos (literally bed-keeper, chamberlain) (Mat. xix. 12; Acts viii. 27 ff.). The original Hebrew word clearly implies the incapacity which mutilation involves, and perhaps includes all the classes mentioned in Mat. xix. 12 (see below), not signifying an office merely. The law (Deut. xxiii. 1; compare Lev. xxi. 19, xxii. 24) is repugnant to thus treating any Israelite; and Samuel, when describing the arbitrary power of the future king (1 Sam. viii. 15, margin), mentions "his eunuchs," but does not say that he would make "their sons" such. This, if we compare 2 K. xx. 18 and Is. xxxix. 7, possibly implies that these persons would be foreigners. It was a barbarous custom of the East thus to treat captives (Hdt. iii. 49, vi. 32), not only of tender age, but, it would seem, when past puberty. The "officer" POTIPHAR (Gen. xxxvii. 36, xxxix. 1, margin "eunuch") was an Egyptian, was married, and was the "captain of the guard;" but (so Gesenius) many eunuchs are not wholly impotent, and they sometimes live in matrimony (see Terence, Juvenal, Chardin, &c.). In the Assyrian monuments a eunuch with a bloated, beardless face and double chin often appears, sometimes armed, and in warlike capacity, or as a scribe, noting the number of heads and amount of spoil, as receiving the prisoners, and even as officiating in religious ceremonies. The origin of the practice is ascribed to Semiramis, and is no doubt as early, or nearly so, as Eastern despotism itself. The complete assimilation of the kingdom of Israel, and latterly of Judah, to the neighboring models of despotism, is traceable in the rank and prominence of eunuchs (see references above). They mostly appear in one of two relations, either military as "set over the men of war," greater trustworthiness possibly counterbalancing inferior courage and military vigor, or associated, as we mostly recognize them, with women and children. We find the Assyrian RAB-SARIS, or chief eunuch (2 K. xviii. 17), employed together with other high officials as ambassador. It is probable that Daniel and his companions were thus treated, in fulfillment of 2 K. xx. 17, 18 and Is. xxxix. 7; compare Dan. i. 3, 7. The court of Herod of course had its eunuchs, as had also that of Queen Candace (Acts viii. 27). Three classes of "eunuchs" are mentioned in Mat. xix. 12—(1.) those born incapable of procreation; (2.) those made so by emasculation; (3.) those figuratively said to make themselves so, because they voluntarily live like eunuchs in abstinence. See Robinson, N. T. Lex., &c.

Eu-o-di-as (Gr. Euodia = a good journey, prosperous course, L. & S.; correctly Evodia), a Christian woman at Philippi, exhorted to live in harmony with SYNTYCHE (Phil. iv. 2).

Eu-plu-rates [-teez] (Gr.; Heb. Pirath; probably fr. Aryan = the good and abounding river), a river, most frequently denoted in the Bible by the term "the river;" the largest, the longest, and by far the most important river of Western Asia. It rises from two chief sources in the Armenian mountains (ARMENIA), one of them at Domti, twenty-five miles N. E. of Erzeroum, and little more than a degree from the Black Sea; the other on the N. slope of the mountain range called Ala-Tagh, near the village of Diqadin, and not far from Mount ARARAT. Both branches flow at first toward the W. or S. W., passing through the wildest mountain districts of Armenia; they meet at Kebban-Maden, nearly in longitude 39° E. from Greenwich, having run respectively 400 and 270 miles. Here the stream formed by their combined waters is 120 yards wide, rapid, and very deep; it now flows nearly S., but in a tortuous course, forcing a way through the ranges of Taurus and Anti-Taurus, and still seeming as if it would empty itself into the Mediterranean; but prevented from so doing by the longitudinal ranges of Amanus and Lebanon, here parallel to the Syrian coast, and at no great distance from it, the river at last in about latitude 36° turns toward the S. E., and proceeds in this direction for above 1,000 miles to its mouth in the Persian Gulf. The entire course is calculated at 1,780 miles, and of this distance more than two-thirds (1,200 miles) is navigable for boats and for small steamers. The width of the river is greatest at the distance of 700 or 800 miles from its mouth, i. e. from its junction with the Khabour to the village of Werdi. It there averages 400 yards. From the entire lack of tributaries below the Khabour, the employment of the water in irrigation, and the tendency to run off and waste itself in vast marshes, the lower course of the river is continually varying, and it is doubted whether at present, except in the inundation, any portion of the Euphrates water is poured into the Shat-el-Arab (the stream formed by the junction of the Euphrates and TIGRIS). The annual inundation of the Euphrates is caused by the melting of the snows in the Armenian highlands. It occurs in May. The great hydraulic works ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar had for their main object to control the inundation by turning the waters into canals and distributing them. The Euphrates has at all times been of some importance as furnishing a line of traffic between the East and the West. Herodotus speaks of persons, probably merchants, using it regularly on their passage from the Mediterranean to Babylon. He also describes the circular boats in use, of wicker-work coated with bitumen, sometimes covered with skins. Boats of this kind, called kufas, still abound on the river. The disadvantage of the route was the difficulty of conveying return cargoes against the current. But probably throughout the Babylonian and Persian periods this route was made use of by the merchants of various nations, and by it the East and West continually interchanged their most important products. The Euphrates is first mentioned in Scripture as one of the four rivers of EDEN 1 (Gen. ii. 14); next in the covenant made with Abraham (xv. 18), where the whole country, "from the RIVER OF EGYPT unto the great river, the river Euphrates," is promised to the chosen race (Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4). From 1 Chr. v. 9 it appears that the tribe of Reuben did actually extend itself to the Euphrates in the times anterior to Saul. During the reigns of David and Solomon the dominion of Israel actually attained to the full extent both ways of the original promise, the Euphrates forming the boundary of their empire to the N. E., and the river of Egypt to the S. W. (2 Sam. viii. 8-8; 1 K. iv. 21; 1 Chr. xviii. 3 ff.; 2 Chr. ix. 26). This wide-spread territory was lost upon the disruption of the empire under Rehoboam; and no more is heard in Scripture of the Euphrates until the expedition of Necho against the Babylonians in the reign of Josiah. The river still brings down as much water as of old, but the precious element is wasted by the neglect of man; the various water-courses along which it was in former times conveyed are dry; the main channel has shrunk; and the water stagnates in unwholesome marshes. The Euphrates is mentioned in the N. T. only in Rev. ix. 14, xvi. 12. ASSYRIA; BABEL; CARCHEMISH; CHALDEA; MESOPOTAMIA.

Eu-pol'e-mus (L. fr. Gr. = good at war, L. & S.), "the son of John, the son of Accos," one of the envoys sent to Rome by Judas Maccabeus, cir. B. C. 161 (1 Mc. viii. 17; 2 Mc. iv. 11). He has been identified with the historian of the same name mentioned by Josephus (Ap. i. 23), but it is by no means clear that the historian was of Jewish descent.

Eu-ro'e-ly-don (fr. Gr. Eurokludón, compounded of Euros, E. wind, and kludón, a wave, Rbu. N. T. Lex.), the name given (Acts xxvii. 14) to the gale of wind which off the S. coast of Crete seized the ship in which St. Paul was ultimately wrecked on the coast of Malta. It came down from the island, and therefore must have blown, more or less, from the N. Next, the wind is described as being like a typhoon or whirlwind (A. V. "tempestuous"). The long duration of the gale (verse 27), the overclouded state of the sky (20), and even the heavy rain which concluded the storm (xxviii. 2), could easily be matched with parallel instances in modern times. We have seen that the wind was more or less northerly. The context (xxvii. 14, 16, 17) gives us full materials for determining its direction with great exactitude. Dr. Howson concludes that it blew from the N. E. or E. N. E. This is quite in harmony with the natural sense of the Gr. Eurakulón (= a N. E. wind, L. & S.; Euroaquil, Vulg.), which is regarded as the true reading by Bentley, and is found in some of the best MSS.; but Dr. Howson adheres to the Received Text.

Eu'ty-chus [-kus] (L. fr. Gr. = well off, fortunate), a youth at Troas (Acts xx. 9), who, having fallen asleep while St. Paul was discoursing far into the night, fell from his seat in a window of the third story, and, being taken up dead, was miraculously restored to life by the apostle.

E-van'ge-list (fr. Gr. euaggelistés, see below). The constitution of the Apostolic Church included an order or body of men known as Evangelists. The meaning of the name, "The publishers of glad tidings," seems common to the work of the Christian ministry generally, yet in Eph. iv. 11, the "evangelists" appear on the one hand after the "apostles" and "prophets:" on the other before the "pastors" and "teachers." This passage accordingly would lead us to think of them as standing between the two other groups—sent forth as missionary preachers of the Gospel by the first, and as such preparing the way for the labors of the second. The same inference would seem to follow the occurrence of the word as applied to Philip in Acts xxi. 8. (PHILIP THE EVANGELIST.) TIMOTHY is to "preach the word;" in doing this he is to fulfil "the work of an Evangelist" (2 Tim. iv. 2, 5). It follows from what has been said that the calling of the Evangelist is the proclamation of the glad tidings to those who have not known them, rather than the instruction and pastoral care of those who have believed and been baptized. It follows also that the name denotes a work rather than an order. The Evangelist might or might not be a Bishop-Elder or a Deacon. The apostles, so far as they evangelized (A. V. "preached the Gospel;" Acts viii. 25, xiv. 7; 1 Cor. i. 17), might claim the title, though there were many Evangelists who were not apostles. Theodoret describes the Evangelists as travelling missionaries. The account given by Eusebius, though somewhat rhetorical and vague, gives prominence to the idea of itinerant missionary preaching. If the Gospel was a written book, and the office of the Evangelists was to read or distribute it, then the writers of such books were preëminently "THE Evangelists" (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles.). (GOSPELS.) In later liturgical language the word was applied to the reader of the Gospel for the day.

Eve (fr. Heb. Havvâh or Chavvâh = living, alive, or life), the name given in Scripture to the first woman (Adam's wife). The account of Eve's creation is in Gen. ii. 21, 22. (MARRIAGE.) Through the subtlety of the SERPENT, Eve was beguiled into a violation of the commandment imposed upon her and ADAM (iii.; 2 Cor. xi. 3). The different aspects under which Eve regarded her mission as a mother are seen in the names of her sons (CAIN; ABEL; SETH). The Scripture account of Eve closes with the birth of Seth (Gen. iv. 25).

* E'v'er and For e'v'er. ETERNAL; ETERNITY.

E'vi (Heb. desire or dwelling, Ges.), one of the five kings or princes of Midian, slain by the Israelites (Num. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).

E'vil-me-re'-dach [-dak] (Heb. Merodach's fool, but probably a name of Assyrian or Babylonian origin is concealed under the Hebrew word translated "fool," Ges.; terrible Merodach, Fü. [MERODACH]), according to Berosus and Abydenus, the son and successor of NEBUCHADNEZZAR, as king of Babylon. (BABEL.) He reigned but a short time, having ascended the throne on the death of Nebuchadnezzar in B. C. 561, and being himself murdered and succeeded by Neriglissar in B. C. 559. He treated JEHOIACHIN kindly (2 K. xxv. 27; Jer. lii. 31).

Ex-com-mu-ni-ca-tion (fr. L. = a putting out of the community), is a power founded upon a right inherent in all religious societies, and is analogous to the powers of capital punishment, banishment, and exclusion from membership, which are exercised by political and municipal bodies.—I. Jewish Excommunication. The Jewish system of excommunication was threefold. For a first offence a delinquent was subjected to the penalty of Niddui. The twenty-four offences for which it was inflicted are various, and range in heinousness from keeping a fierce dog to taking God's name in vain. The offender was first cited to appear in court; and if he refused to appear or to make amends, his sentence was pronounced. He was prohibited the use of the bath, razor, or convivial table; and all who had to do with him must keep him at four cubits' distance. He was allowed to go to the Temple, but not to make the circuit in the ordinary manner. The term of this punishment was thirty days; and it was extended to a second and to a third thirty days when necessary. If at the end of that time the offender was still contumacious, he was subjected to the secand excommunication termed Hêrem, or Chêrem (ANATHEMA). Now the offender was not allowed to teach or to be taught with others, to hire or to be hired, or to perform any commercial transactions beyond purchasing the necessities of life. The sentence was delivered by a court of ten, and was accompanied by a solemn malediction. Lastly followed Shammâthâ, which was an entire cutting off from the congregation. It has been supposed by some that these two latter forms of excommunication were undistinguishable from each other. The punishment of excommunication is not appointed by the Law of Moses. It is founded on the natural right of self-protection which all societies enjoy. The case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Num. xvi.), the curse denounced on Meroz (Judg. v. 23), the commission and proclamation of Ezra (Ezr. vii. 26, x. 8), and the reformation of Nehemiah (Neh. xiii. 25), are appealed to by the Talmudists as precedents by which their proceedings are regulated. In the New Testament, Jewish excommunication is brought prominently before us in the case of the man that was born blind (Jn. ix.). The expressions here used refer, no doubt, to the first form of excommunication, or Niddûi. In Luke vi. 22, it has been thought that our Lord referred specifically to the three forms of Jewish excommunication: "Blessed are ye when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of Man's sake." The three words very accurately express the simple narration, the additional malediction, and the final exclusion—niddûi, hêrem or chêrem, and shammâthâ. (SYNAGOGUE.)—II. Christian Excommunication. Excommunication, as exercised by the Christian Church, is not merely founded on the natural right possessed by all societies, nor merely on the example of the Jewish church and nation. It was instituted by our Lord (Mat. xviii. 15-19), and it was practised and commanded by St. Paul (1 Tim. i. 20; 1 Cor. v. 2-5, 11; Tit. iii. 10). In the epistles we find St. Paul frequently claiming the right to exercise discipline over his converts (compare 2 Cor. i. 23, xiii. 10). In two cases (1 Cor. v. 2-5; 1 Tim. i. 19, 20) we find him exercising this authority to the extent of cutting off offenders from the Church. What is the full meaning of the expression, "deliver unto Satan," is doubtful. All agree that excommunication is contained in it, but whether it implies any further punishment, inflicted by the extraordinary powers committed specially to the apostles, has been questioned. (HYMENS.)—Apostolic Precept. In addition to the claim to exercise discipline, and its actual exercise in the form of excommunication, by the apostles, we find apostolic precepts directing that discipline should be exercised by the Church, and that in some cases excommunication should be resorted to (Rom. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. xvi. 22; Gal. i. 8, 9, v. 12; 2 Th. iii. 14; 1 Tim. vi. 3; Tit. iii. 10; 2 Jn. 10; 3 Jn. 10; Rev. ii. 20). It has been supposed that the two expressions, "let him be ANATHEMA" (A.V. "accursed") (Gal. i. 8, 9), "let him be ANATHEMA MARANATHA" (1 Cor. xvi. 22), refer respectively to the two later stages of Jewish excommunication—the hêrem or chêrem, and the shammâthâ; but this view (so Conybeare & Howson) appears to be without foundation.—Restoration to Communion. Two cases of excommunication are related (see above); and in one of them the restitution of the offender is specially directed (2 Cor. ii.).—The Nature of Excommunication is made more evident by these acts of St. Paul than by any investigation of Jewish practice or of the etymology of words. We thus find, (1.) that it is a spiritual penalty, involving no temporal punishment, except accidentally; (2.) that it consists in separation from the communion of the Church; (3.) that its object is the good of the sufferer (1 Cor. v. 5), and the protection of the sound members of the Church (6, 7; 2 Tim. iii. 17); (4.) that its subjects are those who are guilty of heresy (1 Tim. i. 20), or gross immorality (1 Cor. v. 1); (5.) that penitence is the condition on which restoration to communion is granted (2 Cor. ii. 7). Ex-ecution-er, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. tabbâh or tabbâch (literally = slaughterer, slayer, Ges.) in the margin (Gen. xxxvii. 36; Jer. xxxix. 9; Dan. ii. 14), translated uniformly in the text, when used in the plural, "GUARD;" twice in the singular "cook" (1 Sam. ix. 23, 24). The Hebrew word describes first, the office of executioner, and secondly, the general duties of a monarch's body-guard. Thus Potiphar was "chief of the executioners" (Gen. xxxvii. 36, margin; "captain of the guard" in text). (So Nebuzar-adan and Arioch.) That the "captain of the guard" himself occasionally performed the duty of an executioner appears from 1 K. ii. 25, 34. Nevertheless the post was one of high dignity.—2. The Gr. spekoulâtôr (Mk. vi. 27), borrowed from the Latin speculator; originally a military spy or scout, but under the emperors transferred to the body-guard.

Ex'o-dus (L. fr. Gr. = a going out, L. & S.), the second book of the Law or PENTATEUCH.—A. Contents. The book may be divided into two principal parts: I. Historical, i.-xviii.; and II. Legislative, xix.-xl. The former of these may be subdivided into (1.) the preparation for the deliverance of Israel from their bondage in Egypt; (2.) the accomplishment of that deliverance. I. (1.) The first section (i. 1-xii. 36) contains an account of—The great increase of Jacob's posterity in Egypt, and their oppression under a new dynasty, after the death of Joseph (chapter i.); the birth, education, and flight of Moses (ii.); his solemn call to be the deliverer of his people (iii. 1-iv. 17), and his return to Egypt in consequence (iv. 18-31); his first ineffectual attempt to prevail upon Pharaoh to let the Israelites go, which only resulted in an increase of their burdens v. 1-21); a further preparation of Moses and Aaron for their office, together with the account of their genealogies (v. 22-vii. 7); the successive signs and wonders, by means of which the deliverance of Israel from the land of bondage is at length accomplished (PLAGUES, THE TEN, &c.), and the institution of the PASSOVER (vii. 8-xii. 36). (2.) A narrative of events from the departure out of Egypt to the arrival of the Israelites at Mount SINAI (xii. 37-xviii. 27). (EXODUS, THE; PASSOVER; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF, &c.) II. The solemn establishment of the Theocracy on Mount Sinai (xix.-xl.; TEN COMMANDMENTS; CALF; LAW OF MOSES; ALTAR; ARK; HIGH-PRIEST; PRIESTS; TABERNACLE, &c.). This book, in short, gives a sketch of the early history of Israel as a nation: and the history has three clearly-marked stages. First we see a nation enslaved; next a nation redeemed; lastly a nation set apart, and through the blending of its religious and political life consecrated to the service of God.—B. Integrity. According to Von Lengerke (Kenaan lxxxviii., xc.), the following portions of the book belong to the original or Elohist document (GENESIS):—Chapter i. 1-14, ii. 23-25, vi. 2-vii. 7, xii. 1-28, 37,

38, 40-51 (xiii. 1, 2, perhaps), xvi. xix. 1, xx., xxv.-xxxi., xxxv.-xl. Stähelin and De Wette agree in the main with this division. Knobel, the most recent writer on the subject, in the introduction to his commentary on Exodus and Leviticus, has sifted these books still more carefully, and assigns to each of the so-called original and supplementary documents passages that Von Lengerke assigns to the other. A mere comparison of the two lists of passages selected by these different writers as belonging to the original document is sufficient to show how very uncertain all such critical processes must be. None of these critics attempt to make the Divine names a criterion to distinguish the several documents. De Wette and his school set down every thing which savored of a miracle as proof of later authorship. Nor are Knobel's critical tests conclusive. There is nothing indeed forced or improbable in the supposition, either that Moses himself incorporated in his memoirs ancient tradition whether oral or written, or that a writer later than Moses made use of materials left by the great legislator in a somewhat fragmentary form. But the unity of Exodus as a part of the "five books of Moses" was undisputed till modern times. (PENTATEUCH.)—C. Credibility. Almost every historical fact mentioned in Exodus has at some time or other been called in question. But it is certain that all investigation has hitherto tended only to establish the veracity of the narrator. A comparison with other writers and an examination of the monuments confirm, or at least do not contradict, the most material statements of this book. Thus, e.g. Manetho's story of the Hyksos points at least to some early connection between the Israelites and the Egyptians, and is corroborative of the fact implied in the Pentateuch that, at the time of the Israelitish sojourn, Egypt was ruled by a foreign dynasty. Manetho speaks, too, of strangers from the E. who occupied the eastern part of Lower Egypt. And his account shows that the Israelites had become a numerous and formidable people. According to Exodus xii. 37, the number of men, besides women and children, who left Egypt was 600,000. This would give for the whole nation about two and a half millions. There is no doubt some difficulty in accounting for this immense increase, if we suppose (as on many accounts seems probable) that the actual residence of the children of Israel was only 215 years. We must remember that the number who went into Egypt with Jacob was considerably more than "threescore and ten souls" (CHRONOLOGY); we must also take into account the extraordinary fruitfulness of Egypt (concerning which all writers are agreed), and especially of that part of it in which the Israelites dwelt. According to De Wette, the story of MOSES' birth is mythical, and arises from an attempt to account etymologically for his name. Other objections are of a very arbitrary kind. The ten plagues (PLAGUES, THE TEN) are physically, many of them, what might be expected in Egypt, although in their intensity and in their rapid succession they are clearly supernatural. The institution of the PASSOVER (ch. xii.) has been subjected to severe criticism. This has also been called a mythic fiction. The critics rest mainly on the difference between the directions given for the observance of this the first, and those given for subsequent passovers. But there is no reason why, considering the very remarkable circumstances under which it was instituted, the first Passover should not have had its own peculiar solemnities, or why instructions should not then have been given for a somewhat different observance for the future. In minor details the writer shows a remarkable acquaintance with EGYPT, e.g. Pharaoh's daughter goes to the river to bathe (Ex. ii. 5). Herodotus tells us (also the monuments), that in ancient Egypt the women were under no restraint, but apparently lived more in public than the men. Besides, the Egyptians supposed a sovereign virtue to reside in the Nile-waters. According to the monuments, the Pharaohs led their armies to battle, and the armies consisted entirely of infantry and chariots (xiv. 6, 7). Many other facts have been disputed, such as the passage of the Red Sea (EXODUS, THE; RED SEA, PASSAGE OF THE), the giving of the MANNA, &c. (MIRACLES).—D. The authorship and date of the book are discussed under PENTATEUCH.

EXODUS, the (L. fr. Gr., literally a going out, especially = the departure of the Israelites under Moses from Egypt). 1. Date. Mr. R. S. Poole places the Exodus B. C. 1652 (CHRONOLOGY; EGYPT; PHARAOH 4), Hales B. C. 1648, Usher B. C. 1491, and Bunsen B. C. 1320.—2. History. The Exodus is a great turning-point in Biblical history. With it the Patriarchal dispensation (PATRIARCH) ends, and the Law (LAW OF MOSES) begins, and with it the Israelites cease to be a family and become a nation. (JOSEPH 1; MOSES.) The history of the Exodus commences with the close of the Ten Plagues. (EXODUS; PLAGUES, THE TEN.) In the night in which, at midnight, the first-born were slain (Ex. xii. 29), Pharaoh urged the departure of the Israelites (31, 32). (PASSOVER.) They at once set forth from Rameses (37, 39), apparently during the night (42), but toward morning, on the fifteenth day of the first month (Num. xxxiii. 3). They made three journeys and encamped by the Red Sea. Here Pharaoh overtook them, and the great miracle (MIRACLES) occurred by which they were saved, while the pursuer and his army were destroyed (Ex. xiv.; Ps. cxxxvi. 13-15).—3. Geography. The following points must be settled exactly or approximately:—the situation of the land of GOSHEN, the length of each day's march, the position of the first station (RAMESES), and the direction of the journey. The Land of Goshen must have been an outer E. province of Lower Egypt. The Israelites, setting out from a town of Goshen, made two days' journey toward the Red Sea, and then entered the wilderness, a day's journey or less from the sea. They could only therefore have gone by the valley now called the Wadi-t-Tumeylât, for every other cultivated or cultivable tract is too far from the Red Sea. It is not difficult to fix very nearly the length of each day's march of the Israelites. As they had with them women, children, and cattle, it cannot be supposed that they went more than fifteen miles daily; at the same time it is unlikely that they fell far short of this. The three journeys would therefore give a distance of about forty-five miles. There seems, however, to have been a deflection from a direct course, so that we cannot consider the whole distance from the starting-point, Rameses, to the shore of the Red Sea as much more than about thirty miles in a direct line (Ex. xiii. 17, 18). Measuring from the ancient western shore of the Arabian Gulf due E. of the Wadi-t-Tumeylât, a distance of thirty miles in a direct line places the site of Rameses near the mound called in the present day E'-Abhisceeyeh, not far from the W. end of the valley (so Mr. R. S. Poole, the original author of this article). After the first day's journey the Israelites encamped at SUCCOTH 2—obviously a name very difficult of identification — probably a mere resting-place of caravans, or a military station, or else a town named from one of the two. The next camping-place was ETHAM, the position of which may be very nearly fixed from its being described as "in the edge of the wilderness" (Ex. xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii. 6, 7). It is reasonable to place Etham where the cultivable land ceases, near the Seba Biâr, or Seven Wells, about three miles from the W. side of the ancient head of the gulf. After leaving Etham, the direction of the route changed. The Israelites were commanded "to turn and encamp before Pi-HAHITHOTH, between MIDOL 1 and the sea, over against BAAL-ZEPHON" (Ex. xiv. 2). Mr. Poole regards the identification of the places mentioned in the narratives with modern sites as impossible without the discovery of ancient Egyptian names, and their positive appropriation to such sites. From the names of the places Mr. Poole supposes the encampment was in a depression, partly marshy, having on either hand an elevation marked by a watch-tower. There can be no doubt that the direction was from the W. to the E., and that the breadth of the sea at the place of crossing was great, since the whole Egyptian army perished. RED SEA, PASSAGE OF.

Ex'or-cist [-sist] (fr. Gr., literally one who administers an oath, L. & S.; but usually, one who expels, or professes to expel, demons by adjurations, incantations, &c.). The use of the term "exorcists" in Acts xix. 13 confirms what we know from other sources as to the common practice of exorcism among the Jews. That some, at least, of them, not only pretended to, but possessed, the power of exorcising, appears by our Lord's admission when he asks the Pharisees, "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your disciples (A. V. 'children') cast them out?" (Mat. xii. 27). What means were employed by real exorcists we are not informed. David, by playing skilfully on a harp, procured the temporary departure of the evil spirit which troubled Saul (1 Sam. xvi. 23). Justin Martyr has an interesting suggestion as to the possibility of a Jew successfully exorcising a devil, by employing the name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But he goes on to say that the Jewish exorcists, as a class, had sunk down to the superstitious rites and usages of the heathen. With this agrees the account given by Josephus (viii. 2, § 5), of an exorcism which he saw performed by Eleazar, a Jew, in the presence of his sons, though the virtue of the cure is attributed to the mention of the name of Solomon, and to the use of a root and of certain incantations said to have been prescribed by him (compare Jos. B. J. vii. 6, § 3). It was the profane use of the name of Jesus as a mere charm or spell which led to the disastrous issue recorded in Acts xix. 13-16. The power of casting out devils was bestowed by Christ while on earth upon the apostles (Mat. x. 8) and the seventy disciples (Lk. x. 17-19), and was, according to His promise (Mk. xvi. 17), exercised by believers after His Ascension (Acts xvi. 18); but to the Christian miracle, whether as performed by our Lord Himself, or by His followers, the N. T. writers never apply the terms "exorcise" or "exorcist." DEMONIACS; MAGIC; MIRACLES.

Ez-e-el'as [-ki-] (L. = HEZEKIAH). 1. JAHIAZIAH (1 Esd. ix. 14).—2. HEZEKIAH 1 (2 Esd. vii. 40).

Ez-e-el'as [-si-] (= HEZEKIAH) in 1 Esd. ix. 43 = HILKIAH 5 in Neh. viii. 4.

Ez-e-ki'as (Gr.) = HEZEKIAH 1 (Ecclus. xlviii. 17, 22, xlix. 4; 2 Mc. xv. 22; Mat. i. v. 10).

Ez-e-ki-el (fr. Heb. Yehzekél, or Yehzekél = God will strengthen, or the strength of God), one of the four greater prophets. He was the son of a priest named Buzi. The Rabbis absurdly identify Buzi with Jeremiah. Another tradition makes Ezekiel the servant of Jeremiah. Ezekiel rarely alludes to the facts of his own life, and we have to complete the imperfect picture by the colors of late and dubious tradition. He was taken captive with Jehoiachin, eleven years before the destruction of Jerusalem. Josephus says this happened when he was a boy, yet the statement is questionable. He was a member of a community of Jewish exiles on the banks of the CHEBAR. By this river "in the land of the Chaldeans," God's message first reached him (Ez. i. 3). His call took place B. C. 595, "in the fifth year of King Jehoiachin's captivity" (i. 2), "in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month" (i. 1). Many commentators (Origen, Carpzov, Fairbairn, &c.) make the latter expression = the thirtieth year of his age, the supposed period of assuming full priestly functions. (LEVITE; PRIEST.) The Chaldee paraphrase by Jonathan ben Uzziel has—"thirty years after Hilkiah the high-priest had found the book of the Law in the sanctuary . . . in the days of Josiah" (and so Jerome, Usher, Hävernicks, &c.). Hitzig, following many early commentators, supposes it the thirtieth year from the Jubilee. It now seems generally agreed that it was the thirtieth year from the new era of Nabopolassar, father of Nebuchadnezzar, who began to reign B. C. 625. (BABEL.) The use of this Chaldee epoch is the more appropriate as the prophet wrote in Babylonia, and he gives a Jewish chronology in verse 2. The decision of the question is the less important because in all other places Ezekiel dates from the year of Jehoiachin's captivity (xxix. 17, xxx. 20, &c.). We learn from an incidental allusion (xxiv. 18)—the only reference which he makes to his personal history—that he was married, and had a house (viii. 1) in his place of exile, and lost his wife by a sudden and unforeseen stroke. He lived in the highest consideration among his companions in exile, and their elders consulted him on all occasions (viii. 1, xi. 25, xiv. 1, xx. 1, &c.). The last date he mentions is the twenty-seventh year of the captivity (xxix. 17), so that his mission extended over twenty-two years, during part of which period Daniel was probably living, and already famous (Ez. xiv. 14, xxviii. 3). He is said to have been murdered in Babylon by some Jewish prince whom he had convicted of idolatry, and to have been buried in the tomb of Slem and Arphaxad, on the banks of the Euphrates. The tomb, said to have been built by Jehoiachin, was shown a few days' journey from Bagdad. But, as Hävernicks remarks, "by the side of the scattered data of his external life, those of his internal life appear so much the richer." He was distinguished by his stern and inflexible energy of will and character; and we also observe a devoted adherence to the rites and ceremonies of his national religion. Ezekiel is no cosmopolite, but displays everywhere the peculiar tendencies of a Hebrew educated under Levitical training. The priestly bias is always visible. We may also note in Ezekiel the absorbing recognition of his high calling which enabled him cheerfully to endure any deprivation or misery, if thereby he may give any warning or lesson to his people (iv., xxiv. 15, 16, &c.), whom he so ardently loved (ix. 8, xi. 18). His predictions are marvelously varied. He has instances of visions (viii.-xi.), symbolical actions (as iv. 8), similitudes (xii., xv.), parables (as xvii.), proverbs (as xii. 22, xviii. 1 ff.), poems (as xix.), allegories (as xxiii., xxiv.), open prophecies (as vi., vii., xx., &c.). Among the most splendid passages are chapters i. (CHERUBIM), viii. (vision of Judah's idolatries), xxvi.-xxviii. (against Tyros), xxxi. (against Assyria). The depth of his matter and the marvellous nature of his visions make him occasionally obscure. Hence his prophecy was placed by the Jews among the "treasures," those portions of Scripture which (like the early part of Genesis, and Canticles) were not allowed to be read till the age of thirty. The Jews classed him in the very highest rank of prophets.—Of the authenticity of Ezekiel's prophecy there has been no real dispute, although a few rash critics have raised questions about the last chapters, even suggesting that they might have been written by a Samaritan, to incite the Jews to suffer the coöperation in rebuilding the Temple. The book is divided into two great parts—of which the destruction of Jerusalem is the turning-point; chapters i.-xxiv. contain predictions delivered before that event, and xxv.-xlvi. after it, as we see from xxvi. 2. Again, chapters i.-xxxii. are mainly occupied with correction, denunciation, and reproof, while the remainder deal chiefly in consolation and promise. A parenthetical section in the middle of the book (xxv.-xxxii.) contains a group of prophecies against seven foreign nations, the septenary arrangement being apparently intentional. Hävernicks divides the book into nine sections, distinguished by their superscriptions, as follows:—I. Ezekiel's call (i.-iii. 15). II. The general carrying out of the commission (iii. 16-vii.). III. The rejection of the people because of their idolatrous worship (viii.-xi.). IV. The sins of the age rebuked in detail (xii.-xix.). V. The nature of the judgment, and the guilt which caused it (xx.-xxiii.). VI. The meaning of the now commencing punishment (xxiv.). VII. God's judgment denounced on seven heathen nations (xxv.-xxxii.). VIII. Prophecies, after the destruction of Jerusalem, concerning the future condition of Israel (xxxiii.-xxxix.). IX. The glorious consummation (xl.-xlviii.). There are no direct quotations from Ezekiel in the N. T., but in the Apocalypse there are many parallels and obvious allusions to the later chapters (xl.-xlviii.). Of these chapters Fairbairn (on Ezekiel) gives the four main lines of interpretation, viz., 1. The historico-literal (of Villalpandus, Grotius, &c.), which makes all a prosaic description to preserve the memory of Solomon's temple. 2. The historico-ideal (of Eichhorn, Dathe, &c.), which reduces them to "a sort of vague and well-meaning announcement of future good." 3. The Jewish-carnal (of Lightfoot, Hofmann, &c.), which maintains that their outline was actually adopted by the exiles. 4. The Christian-spiritual, or Messianic (of Luther, Calvin, and most of the Fathers and modern commentators), which makes them "a grand, complicated symbol of the good God had in reserve for His Church." TEMPLE.

Ezel (Heb. departure, Ges.), the Stone, a well-known stone near Saul's residence, the scene of the parting of David and Jonathan when David finally fled from the court (1 Sam. xx. 19).

Ezem (fr. Heb. = bone, Ges.), a town of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 29); = AZEM.

Ezer (No. 1 fr. Heb. = treasure, Ges.; union, Fü.: No. 2-6, Heb. help, Ges., Fü.). 1. A Horite "duke" descended from Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 27, 30; 1 Chr. i. 42); inconsistently spelled EZAR in verse 38.—2. Father of Hushah, in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 4).—3. A son of Ephraim, slain by the men of Gath (vii. 21). (BERIAH 2; SHUTHELAH).—4. The first of the Gadite heroes who joined David in the wilderness (xii. 9).—5. A Levite, son of Jeshua; one of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 19).—6. A priest who assisted in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (xii. 42).

Ez-r'as (Gr.) = AZARIAH 7 (1 Esd. viii. 1).

Ez-r'as (Gr.) = AZARIAH 25; AZIEI (1 Esd. viii. 2). Ez-on-ga'ber, or Ez-on-ge'ber (fr. Heb. = the giant's backbone), the last station of the Israelites before they came to the wilderness of Zin, afterward the station of Solomon's navy (ELATH), and where Jehoshaphat's was "broken," probably destroyed on the rocks (Num. xxxiii. 35, 36; Deut. ii. 8; 1 K. ix. 26, xxii. 48; 2 Chr. viii. 17, xx. 36). Kiepert's map (1856) places it at 'Ain el-Hudyan, about twenty miles up what is now the dry bed of the ARABAH, but, as he supposed, then the N. end of the gulf. EXODUS, THE; RED SEA; WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Eznite (fr. Heb. 'etsni, the reading of the Keri; the Hebrew text has 'elsno, which Gesenius translates "his spear"), the. According to 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, "Adino the Eznite" was another name for "Jashob-basbet the Tachmonite (margin; text of A.V. 'the Tachmonite that sat in the seat'), chief among the captains." (JASHOBEAM.) The passage is most probably corrupt.

Ez'ra (Heb. help). 1. A descendant of Judah. The name occurs in the obscure genealogy of 1 Chr. iv. 17.—2. The famous scribe and priest (in Apocrypha "ESDRAS"); son of SERAIAS 7, and descendant of HILKIAH 2, the high-priest in Josiah's reign (Ezr. vii. 1). All that is really known of Ezra is contained in Ezr. vii.-x. and in Neh. viii. and xii. 26, 36. From these passages we gather that he was a learned and pious priest residing at Babylon in the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus. The origin of his influence with the king does not appear, but in the seventh year of his reign, in spite of the unfavorable report which had been sent by Rehum and Shimshai (Ezr. iv. 8 ff.), he obtained leave to go to Jerusalem, and to take with him a company of Israelites, together with priests, Levites, singers, porters, and Nethinim. The journey of Ezra and his companions from Babylon to Jerusalem took just four months; and they brought up with them a large free-will offering of gold and silver, and silver vessels. It appears that his great design was to effect a religious reformation among the Palestine Jews, and to bring them back to the observance of the Law of Moses, from which they had grievously declined. His first step, accordingly, was to enforce a separation from their wives upon all who had made heathen marriages, in which number were many priests and Levites, as well as other Israelites. This was effected in little more than six months after his arrival at Jerusalem. With the detailed account of this important transaction Ezra's autobiography ends abruptly, and we hear nothing more of him till, thirteen years afterward, in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, we find him again at Jerusalem with Nehemiah "the Tirshatha." It seems probable that after he had effected the above-named reformation, and had appointed competent judges and magistrates, with authority to maintain it, he himself returned to the king of Persia. The functions he executed under Nehemiah's government were purely of a priestly and ecclesiastical character. But in such he filled the first place. As Ezra is not mentioned after Nehemiah's departure for Babylon in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes, and as every thing fell into confusion during Nehemiah's absence (Neh. xiii.), it is not unlikely that Ezra died or returned to Babylon before that year. Josephus vaguely says (xi. 5, § 5), "he died an old man, and was buried in a magnificent manner at Jerusalem." Some Jewish chroniclers say, he died in the year in which ALEXANDER THE GREAT came to Jerusalem, in the same year with Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. Other traditions relate that he died at Babylon, aged 120 years. The Talmud says he died at Zamzum, a town on the Tigris, while on his way from Jerusalem to Susa. His reputed tomb (see cut) is shown on the Tigris, about twenty miles above its junction with the Euphrates (Kitto). The principal works ascribed to him by the Jews are:—1. The institution of the Great Synagogue. (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.) 2. The settling the CANON of Scripture, and restoring, correcting, and editing the whole sacred volume. 3. The introduction of the Chaldee character instead of the old Hebrew or Samaritan. (SHEMITIC LANGUAGES; WRITING.) 4. The authorship of the books of CHRONICLES, EZRA (EZRA, BOOK OF), NEHEMIAH (NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF), and, some add, Esther; and, many of the Jews say, also of Ezekiel, Daniel, and the twelve prophets. 5. The establishment of synagogues. (SYNAGOGUE.)—3. The head of one of the twenty-two courses of priests which returned with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 1, 13). —4. One who assisted at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 33); perhaps = No. 3.

Ezra (Heb. help), Book of. The book of Ezra is manifestly a continuation of the books of CHRONICLES (so Lord A. C. Hervey, the original author of this article). Like these books, it consists of the contemporary historical journals kept from time to time, which were afterward strung together, and either abridged or added to, as the case required, by a later hand. That later hand, in Ezra, was doubtless Ezra's own, as appears by the four last chapters, as well as by other matter inserted in the previous chapters. It has already been suggested (CHRONICLES) that the chief portion of the last chapter of 2 Chr. and Ezr. i. may probably have been written by Daniel. The evidences of this in Ezr. i. must now be given more fully. Daniel passes over in utter silence the first year of Cyrus, to which pointed allusion is made in Dan. i. 21, and Cyrus's decree, and proceeds in ch. x. to the third year of Cyrus. But Ezr. i., if placed between Dan. ix. and x., exactly fills up the gap, and records the event of the first year of Cyrus, in which Daniel was so deeply interested. And not only so, but the manner of the record is exactly Daniel's (so Lord A. C. Hervey; compare Ezr. i. 1 with Dan. i. 1, ii. 1, &c.). The giving the text of the decree (Ezr. i. 2-4; compare Dan. iv.), the mention of the name of "Mithredath the treasurer" (Ezr. i. 8; compare Dan. i. 3, 11), the allusion to the sacred vessels placed by Nebuchadnezzar in the house of his god (Ezr. i. 7; compare Dan. i. 2), the giving the Chaldee name of Zerubbabel (Ezr. i. 8, 11; compare Dan. i. 7), and the whole stand-point of the narrator, who evidently wrote at Babylon, not at Jerusalem, are all circumstances which in a marked manner point to Daniel as the writer of Ezr. i. Ezr. ii.-iii. 1 is found (with the exception of clerical errors) in Neh. vii. (NEHEMIAH, BOOK OF.) The next portion (iii. 2-vi.), except one large explanatory addition by Ezra to illustrate the opposition by the heathen to the rebuilding of the Temple (iv. 6-23; ACHASERUS 2; ARTAXERXES 1), is the work of a writer contemporary with Zerubbabel and Jeshua, and an eye-witness of the rebuilding of the Temple in the beginning of the reign of Darius Hystaspis. That it was the prophet Haggai becomes tolerably sure when we observe further the remarkable coincidences in style (so Lord A. C. Hervey). Chapters vii.-x. are Ezra's own, and continue the history after a gap of fifty-eight years—from the sixth of Darius to the seventh of Artaxerxes. Keil, Hävernick, Fairbairn, &c., maintain the unity of the book as proceeding from Ezra, but allow that he used previously existing documents; Dr. S. Davidson maintains that Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah originally formed but one book, compiled by one who put together (in Ezra) materials written by Ezra and others, interspersing his own here and there.—The text of Ezra is not in a good condition. There are many palpable corruptions both in the names and numerals, and perhaps in some other points. It is written partly in Hebrew, and partly in Chaldee. The Chaldee begins at iv. 8, and continues to the end of vi. 18. The letter or decree of Artaxerxes, vii. 12-26, is also given in the original Chaldee. There has never been any doubt about Ezra being canonical, although there is no quotation from it in the N. T. (CANON.) The period covered by the book is eighty years, from the first of Cyrus, B. C. 536, to the beginning of the eighth of Artaxerxes, B. C. 456. ESDRAS, 1ST BOOK OF.

Ezra-hite (fr. Heb. = descendant of Ezrah or Ezrach, i. e. of ZERAH, Ges.), the, a title attached to ETHAN 1 (1 K. iv. 31; Ps. lxxxix. title), and HEMAN (Ps. lxxxviii. title).

Ezri (Heb. help of Jehovah, Ges.), son of Chelub, superintendent of King David's farm-laborers (1 Chr. xxvii. 26).

F

Fable (fr. L. fabula, literally what is spoken or told, a narrative, especially a fictional narrative or story). Taking the words fable and parable, not in their strict etymological meaning, but in that which has been stamped upon them by current usage, looking, i. e. at the fables of Æsop as the type of the one, at the parables of the N. T. as the type of the other, we have to ask (1.) in what relation they stand to each other, as instruments of moral teaching? (2.) what use is made in the Bible of this or of that form? Perhaps the most satisfactory summing up of the chief distinctive features of each is in the following extract from Neander:—"The parable is distinguished from the fable by this, that, in the latter, qualities, or acts of a higher class of beings may be attributed to a lower (e. g. those of men to brutes); while in the former, the lower sphere is kept perfectly distinct from that which it seems to illustrate. The beings and powers thus introduced in the parable always follow the law of their nature, but their acts, according to this law, are used to figure those of a higher race." Of the fable, as thus distinguished from the parable, we have but two examples in the Bible:

(1.) that of the trees choosing their king, addressed by Jotham to the men of Shechem (Judg. ix. 8-15); (2.) that of the cedar of Lebanon and the thistle, as the answer of Jehoash to the challenge of Amaziah (2 K. xiv. 9). The appearance of the fable thus early in the history of Israel, and its entire absence from the direct teaching both of the O. and N. T. are, each of them in its way, significant. Taking the received chronology, the fable of Jotham was spoken about 1209 B. C. The Arabian traditions of Lokman do not assign to him an earlier date than that of David. The first example in the history of Rome is the apologue of Menenius Agrippa B. C. 494, and its genuineness has been questioned on the ground that the fable could hardly at that time have found its way to Latium. The land of Canaan is, so far as we have any data to conclude from, the fatherland of fable. The absence of fables from the teaching of the O. T. must be ascribed to their want of fitness to be the media of the truths which that teaching was to convey. The points in which brutes or inanimate objects present analogies to man are chiefly those which belong to his lower nature, his pride, indolence, cunning, and the like. Hence the fable, apart from the associations of a grotesque and ludicrous nature which gather round it, is inadequate as the exponent of the higher truths which belong to man's spiritual life. It may serve to exhibit the relations between man and man; it fails to represent those between man and God. To do that is the office of the PARABLE. The fables of false teachers claiming to belong to the Christian Church, alluded to by writers of the N. T. (Gr. muthos [= L. fabula, above], literally what is spoken; in N. T. = a myth, fable, legend, mythic tale or discourse, Rbn. N. T. Lex.; 1 Tim. i. 4, iv. 7; 2 Tim. iv. 4; Tit. i. 14; 2 Pet. i. 16), do not appear to have had the character of fables, properly so called.

* FACE, besides being used for the outside or surface of any thing (Gen. i. 29, &c.), and for the human countenance (iii. 19, &c.), is figuratively used of God, indicating some special manifestation of His presence, power, favor, &c. (Ps. xxiv. 16, &c.). As it was esteemed a special privilege to see the face of an Eastern monarch, and implied high dignity and favor to have constantly this privilege (Esth. i. 14), this is figuratively transferred to God (Job xxxiii. 26; Ps. xvii. 15; Mat. xviii. 10, &c.).

FAIR HAVENS [bay'vnz], the (an English translation of the Gr. Kaloi limenes, probably originally a descriptive title), a harbor in the island of CRETE (Acts xxvii. 8), not mentioned in any other ancient writing, but still known by its own Greek name. Fair Havens appears to have been practically the harbor of LASEA. These places are situated four or five miles to the E. of Cape Matala, which is the most conspicuous headland on the S. coast of Crete, and immediately to the W. of which the coast trends suddenly to the N. In Fair Havens the ship which conveyed St. Paul was sheltered from the violent and long-continuing N. W. winds to which it would be fully exposed beyond Cape Matala.

FAIRS, the A. V. translation of the Heb. pl. 'izē-bônim (Ex. xxvii. 12, 14, 16, 19, 22, 27), translated "wares" in verse 33. Mr. Bevan, with Fürst, Hitzig, &c., would translate "wares" throughout. Gesenius, supposing, with Fürst, the primary meaning to be traffic, commerce, translates a fair, market, market-place, except in verses 27, 33, where he translates gains, earnings, profits from traffic. Hävernick translates throughout exchanges or equivalent, and this Dr. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto) approves.

* FAITH, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ēmūn = faithfulness, fidelity, Ges. (Deut. xxxii. 20 only), elsewhere translated "faithful" (Prov. xiii. 17, xiv. 5, xx. 6), "truth" (Is. xxvi. 2, margin "truths").—2. Heb. ēmūndh (kindred to No. 1 and to AMEN) once (Hab. ii. 4), elsewhere translated "faithfulness" (1 Sam. xxvi. 23; Lam. iii. 23, &c.), "faithful" (Ps. cxix. 86, 138; Prov. xxviii. 20), "faithfully" (2 K. xxii. 7, &c.), "truth" (Deut. xxxii. 4; Ps. xxxiii. 4, &c.), "set office," margin "trust" (1 Chr. ix. 22, 26, 31, &c.), "verily," margin "in truth," or "stablens" (Ps. xxxvii. 3), "truly" (Prov. xii. 22), "steady" (Ex. xvii. 12), "stability" (Is. xxxiii. 6). Gesenius makes the Heb. = (a) firmness, stability (Ex. xvii. 12); (b) security (Is. xxxiii. 6); (c) faithfulness, fidelity, especially in fulfilling promises (Deut. xxxii. 4; Prov. xxviii. 20, &c.); also faith, trust, confidence of men toward God (Ps. xxxvii. 3; Hab. ii. 4).—3. Gr. elpis once (Heb. x. 23), elsewhere uniformly translated "hope" (Acts ii. 26; Rom. iv. 18, v. 2, 4, 5, &c.).—4. Gr. pistis more than 200 times in N. T. (Mat. viii. 10, &c.), once "belief" (2 Th. ii. 13), once "assurance" (Acts xvii. 31), once "fidelity" (Tit. ii. 10), twice translated by a phrase including a verb (Rom. iii. 26, "him which believeth," literally the one of [from] faith; Heb. x. 39, "of them that believe," literally of faith). The kindred Greek verb pisteō is translated more than 200 times by the verb "believe" (Mat. viii. 13, &c.), seven times by "commit," or "commit to one's trust" (Lk. xvi. 11; Jn. ii. 24; Rom. iii. 2; 1 Cor. ix. 17; Gal. ii. 7; 1 Tim. i. 11; Tit. i. 3), once "put in trust" (1 Th. ii. 4). The kindred Greek adjective pistos is translated "faithful" more than fifty times (Mat. xxiv. 45, &c.), once "faithfully" (3 Jn. 5), twice "true" (2 Cor. i. 18; 1 Tim. iii. 1), once "sure" (Acts xiii. 34), twice "believing" (Jn. xx. 27; 1 Tim. vi. 2), once in plural "believers" (1 Tim. iv. 12), also in a phrase including "believe" (Acts x. 45, xvi. 1; 2 Cor. vi. 15; 1 Tim. iv. 3, 10, v. 16). According to Robinson's N. T. Lex., the Gr. pistis properly = firm persuasion, confiding belief in the truth, veracity, reality of any person or thing; used sometimes in the N. T. as in classic Greek = faith, belief in general (Acts xvii. 31, A. V. "assurance," margin "faith," &c.), or good faith, fidelity, sincerity, faithfulness (Mat. xxiii. 23, &c.); but especially in reference to God and divine things, to Christ and His gospel = that faith, that confiding belief, which is the essential trait of Christian life and character (Mat. viii. 10; Rom. iii. 22; Phil. i. 25, 27; Heb. vi. 1, &c.); by metonymy, the object of Christian faith, the faith, the gospel (Acts vi. 7; Rom. i. 5, &c.).—In true Christian faith is included not only the intellectual assent to the truth of the gospel (Jas. ii. 17, 19, &c.), but the consent of the will and the correspondence of the life to what this truth involves (Rom. iv.; Gal. v. 6; Heb. xi.; Jas. ii. 20-26). But the full development of this inportant subject would require a treatise on practical theology. ATONEMENT; JUSTIFY, &c.

* Fall of Man. ADAM.

Fallow-deer (Heb. yahmûr or yachmûr). The Hebrew word, mentioned only in Deut. xiv. 5 as an animal allowed for food, and in 1 K. iv. 23 as forming part of the provisions for Solomon's table, appears to point (so Mr. Houghton) to the Antelope Bubalis, or Alcelaphus Bubalis, a species of antelope, about the size of a stag, and resembling both the calf and the stag. It is common in northern Africa, and lives in herds. The modern name is bekker-el-wash (wild ox). Col. C. H. Smith (in Kitto) refers the Hebrew name to the Oryx leucoryx, a species of antelope frequently represented on the monuments of Egypt and Nubia. The true fallow-deer, Cervus Dama, is undoubtedly a native of Asia, and is regarded by Gesenius and A. V. as the animal meant by the Hebrew word. HART.

* Fa-mil'lar Spirit. DIVINATION; MAGIC.

Famine [-in] = a scarcity of food, usually prevalent in Palestine, &c., when the sweet influences of the Pleiades are bound, i. e. when the best and most fertilizing rains, which fall when the Pleiades set at dawn, at the end of autumn, fail. In Egypt a deficiency in the rise of the Nile, with drying winds, produces the same results. The famines recorded in the Bible are traceable to both these phenomena; and we generally find that Egypt was resorted to when scarcity afflicted Palestine. In the whole of Syria and Arabia, the fruits of the earth must ever be dependent on rain; the watersheds having few large springs, and the small rivers not being sufficient for the irrigation of even the level lands. If, therefore, the heavy rains of November and December fail, the sustenance of the people is cut off in the parching drought of harvest-time, when the country is almost devoid of moisture. EGYPT, again, owes all its fertility to its mighty river, whose annual rise inundates nearly the whole land and renders its cultivation an easy certainty. The causes of dearth and famine in Egypt are occasioned by defective inundation, preceded and accompanied and followed by prevalent easterly and southerly winds. The first famine recorded in the Bible is that of Abraham after he had pitched his tent on the E. of Bethel (Gen. xii. 10). We may conclude that this famine was extensive, although this is not quite proved by the fact of Abraham's going to Egypt; for in the second famine, Isaac found refuge with Abimelech, king of the Philistines, in Gerar (xxvi. 1 ff.). We hear no more of times of scarcity until the great famine of Egypt, which "was over all the face of the earth" (xli. 56, 57; JOSEPH 1). In the seven years of plenty, Joseph was enabled to provide against the coming dearth, and to supply not only the population of Egypt with corn, but those of the surrounding countries (xli. 53-57). The modern history of Egypt throws some curious light on these ancient records of famines, and may assist us in understanding their course and extent. The most remarkable famine was in the reign of the Fâtîmee Khalcefeh, El-Mustansir billâh, the only seven years' famine in Egypt on record since Joseph's time (in the year of the hejira 457-464, A. D. 1064-1071). This famine exceeded in severity all others of modern times, and was aggravated by the anarchy which then ravaged the country. Vehement drought and pestilence, says Es-Suyootee, continued for seven consecutive years, so that the people ate corpses, and animals that died of themselves; the cattle perished; a dog was sold for five deenârs, and a cat for three deenârs . . . and an ardebb (about five bushels) of wheat for 100 deenârs, and then it failed altogether. He adds, that all the horses of the Khalcefeh, save three, perished, and gives numerous instances of the straits to which the wretched inhabitants were driven, and of the organized bands of kidnappers who infested Cairo and caught passengers in the streets by ropes furnished with hooks and let down from the houses. The famine of Samaria (2 K. vi. 25) resembled it in many particulars; and that very briefly recorded in 2 K. viii. 1, 2, affords another instance of one of seven years. Famines are often spoken of in the Scriptures as occurring in Palestine (Judg. vi. 4-6; Ru. i. 1; 2 Sam. xxi. 1; 1 K. xvii. 1, 7, xviii. 2; 2 K. iv. 38, &c.), and were classed among "sore judgments" (Ex. xiv. 21). The evils of famine are now much diminished in civilized countries by the great increase of productive labor applied to agriculture, of facilities for commercial exchanges, of improvements in the arts, &c.; but they still exist. In Arabia, famines are of frequent occurrence. "Famine" is used figuratively in Am. viii. 11.

* Fan. AGRICULTURE.

* Fann. AGRICULTURE.

Farthing. the A. V. translation of two names of coins in the N. T.—1. Gr. kodrantês, fr. L. quadrans, literally = one-fourth sc. of the Roman as, see No. 2 (Mat. v. 26; Mk. xii. 42); a coin current in Palestine in the time of our Lord = two lepta (A. V. "mites") = three-eighths of a cent (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).—2. Gr. assarion (Mat. x. 29; Lk. xii. 6), properly a small as, but in the time of our Lord used as = L. as = one and a half cents (Rbn. N. T. Lex.). MONEY.

Fasts.—1. One fast only was appointed by the law, that on the day of Atonement (ATONEMENT, DAY OF). There is no mention of any other periodical fast in the O. T., except in Zech. vii. 1-7, viii. 19. From these passages it appears that the Jews, during their captivity, observed four annual fasts, in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months. Zechariah simply distinguishes the fasts by the months in which they were observed; but the Mishna and Jerome give statements of certain historical events which they were intended to commemorate: The fast of the fourth month to commemorate the breaking of the tables of the law by Moses (Ex. xxxii.), and the storming of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. lii.). The fast of the fifth month to commemorate the return of the spies, &c. (Num. xiii., xiv.), the Temple burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, and again by Titus; and the ploughing up of the site of the Temple, with the capture of Bethel. The fast of the seventh month to commemorate the complete sack of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar and the death of Gedaliah (2 K. xxv.). The fast of the tenth month to commemorate the receiving by Ezekiel and the other captives in Babylon of the news of the destruction of Jerusalem. Some other events mentioned in the Mishna are omitted as unimportant. Of those here stated, several could have had nothing to do with the fasts in the time of the prophet. The number of annual fasts in the present Jewish calendar has been multiplied to twenty-eight, a list of which is given by Reland.—II. Public fasts were occasionally proclaimed to express national humiliation, and to supplicate divine favor. In the case of public danger, the proclamation appears to have been accompanied with the blowing of trumpets (Joel ii. 1-15). The following instances are recorded of strictly national fasts: Samuel gathered "all Israel" to Mizpeh and proclaimed a fast (1 Sam. vii. 6); Jehoshaphat appointed one "throughout all Judah" when he was preparing for war against Moab and Ammon (2 Chr. xx. 3); in the reign of Jehoiakim, one was proclaimed for "all the people in Jerusalem and all who came thither out of the cities of Judah," when the prophecy of Jeremiah was publicly read by Baruch (Jer. xxxvi. 6-10; compare Baruch i. 5); three days after the feast of Tabernacles, when the second Temple was completed, "the children of Israel assembled with fasting and with sackclothes and earth upon them" to hear the law read, and to confess their sins (Neh. ix. 1). There are references to general fasts in the Prophets (Joel i. 14, ii. 15; Is. lviii.), and two are noticed in 1 and 2 Maccabees (1 Mc. iii. 46, 47; 2 Mc. xiii. 10-12). There are a considerable number of instances of cities and bodies of men observing fasts on occasions in which they were especially concerned (Judg. xx. 26; 1 Sam. xxxi. 13; 2 Sam. i. 12; 1 K. xxi. 9-12; Ezr. viii. 21-23; Esth. iv. 16).—III. Private occasional fasts are recognized in Num. xxx. 13. The instances given of individuals fasting under the influence of grief, vexation, or anxiety, are numerous (1 Sam. i. 7, xx. 34; 2 Sam. iii. 35, xii. 16; 1 K. xxi. 27; Ezr. x. 6; Neh. i. 4; Dan. ix. 3, x. 3). The fasts of forty days of Moses (Ex. xxiv. 18, xxxiv. 28; Deut. ix. 9, 18) and Elijah (1 K. xix. 8) were special acts of spiritual discipline.—IV. In the N. T. the only references to the Jewish fasts are the mention of "the Fast," in Acts xxvii. 9 (generally understood to denote the Day of Atonement), and the allusions to the weekly fasts (Mat. ix. 14; Mk. ii. 18; Lk. v. 33, xviii. 12; Acts x. 30). These fasts originated some time after the Captivity. They were observed on the second and fifth days of the week, which, being appointed as the days for public fasts, seem to have been selected for these private voluntary fasts. A time of fasting for believers is foretold (Mat. ix. 15), and a caution is given (vi. 16-18). Fasting and prayer are great sources of spiritual strength (Mat. xvii. 21; Mk. ix. 29; 1 Cor. vii. 5), and are sometimes especially appropriate (Acts xiii. 3, xiv. 23). Our Saviour fasted forty days and forty nights (Mat. iv. 2). Anna fasted and prayed (Lk. ii. 38).—V. The Jewish fasts were observed with various degrees of strictness. Sometimes there was entire abstinence from food (Esth. iv. 16, &c.). On other occasions, there appears to have been only a restriction to a very plain diet (Dan. x. 3). Rules are given in the Talmud as to the mode in which fasting is to be observed on particular occasions. Those who fasted frequently dressed in sackcloth or rent their clothes, put ashes on their head, and went barefoot (1 K. xxi. 27; Neh. ix. 1; Ps. xxxv. 13). (MOURNING).—VI. The sacrifice of the personal will, which gives to fasting all its value, is expressed in the old term used in the law, afflicting the soul. But the Jews were prone in their formal fasts to lose the idea of a spiritual discipline (Is. lviii. 3; Zech. vii. 5, 6; compare Mat. vi. 16).

Fat. The Hebrews distinguished between the suet or pure fat of an animal (Heb. hêleb or chêleb), and the fat which was intermixed with the lean (Heb. mashmannim), (Neh. viii. 10). Certain restrictions were imposed upon them in reference to the former: some parts of the suet, viz., about the stomach, the entrails, the kidneys, and the tail of a sheep, which grows to an excessive size in many Eastern countries, and produces a large quantity of rich fat, were forbidden to be eaten in the case of animals offered to Jehovah in sacrifice (Lev. iii. 3, 9, 17, vii. 3, 23). The ground of the prohibition was that the fat was the richest part of the animal, and therefore belonged to Him (iii. 16). The presentation of the fat as the richest part of the animal was agreeable to the dictates of natural feeling, and was the ordinary practice even of heathen nations. The burning of the fat of sacrifices was particularly specified in each kind of offering. The Hebrews fully appreciated the luxury of well-fatted meat, and had their stall-fed oxen and calves (1 K. iv. 23; Jer. xlvi. 21; Lk. xv. 23). "Fat" figuratively = the best of any production (Gen. xlv. 18; Num. xviii. 12 margin; Ps. lxxxi. 16 margin, cxlvii. 14 margin; compare 2 Sam. i. 22; Judg. iii. 29 margin; Is. x. 16). FOOD; SACRIFICE.

Fat (i. e. VAT), the A. V. translation of the Heb. yekeb (Joel ii. 24, iii. 13), commonly translated "WINE-PRESS," once "press-fat" (Hag. ii. 16).

Father (Heb. ab; Gr. pater). The position and authority of the father as the head of the family is expressly assumed and sanctioned in Scripture, as a likeness of that of the Almighty over His creatures. It lies of course at the root of that so-called patriarchal government (PATRIARCH) (Gen. iii. 16; 1 Cor. xi. 3), which was introductory to the more definite systems which followed, and which in part, but not wholly, superseded it. (LAW OF MOSES.) The father's blessing was regarded as conferring special benefit, but his malediction special injury, on those on whom it fell (Gen. ix. 25, 27, xxvii. 27-40, xlviii. 15, 20, xlix.). The sin of a parent affected in certain cases the welfare of his descendants (2 K. v. 27; Ex. xx. 5; Eli); though the law forbade to punish the son for his father's transgression (Deut. xxiv. 16). Instances of legal enactments in support of parental authority are found in Ex. xxii. 17; Num. xxx. 3, 5; Deut. xxi. 18, 21; Lev. xx. 9, xxi. 9, xxii. 12; and the spirit of the law in this direction may be seen in Prov. xiii. 1, xv. 5, xx. 20, xxviii. 24, xxx. 17; Is. xlv. 10; Mal. i. 6. (AGE, OLD; CHILD; DAUGHTER; EDUCATION; MARRIAGE; MOTHER; PUNISHMENTS.) Among Mohammedans parental authority has great weight during the time of pupil-age.—“Father” in the Scriptures = 1 The male parent (Gen. ix. 22, 23, &c.); in the plural sometimes = both parents (Eph. vi. 4, compare 2). 2. An ancestor or forefather, especially a patriarch or founder of a tribe, people, city, &c. (Gen. xxviii. 13; Num. xviii. 1; 1 Chr. ii. 49 ff.; Mat. iii. 9, &c.); in plural = ancestors in general (Gen. xv. 15, &c.). Hence the originator of an art, as the founder of a family composed of those who practise it (Gen. iv. 21, &c.), the beginner of any series or line of succession (Gen. xvii. 4; Jn. viii. 44; Rom. iv. 11, &c.), &c. 3. The author or maker of any thing, especially a creator (Job xxxviii. 28; Jas. i. 17). 4. One who acts or is regarded as acting in any respect as a father, e. g. a benefactor, protector, teacher, adviser, &c. (Job xxix. 16; Ps. lxxviii. 5; Judg. xvii. 10; Gen. xlv. 8, &c.). God as the great creator, preserver, governor, is in a sense the Father of all men; but especially the Father of His covenant people (Jer. xxxi. 9; Mat. vi. 9, &c.). “The Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost” are expressly distinguished (Mat. xxviii. 19, &c.). SON OF GOD; SPIRIT, THE HOLY.

Fath'om. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

* Fat'ling. BEAST; FAT; FOOD, &c.

Feasts. BANQUET; FESTIVALS.

* Feasts of Char-ity (Gr. agapai, pl. of agapé, = loves; see CHARITY) (Jude 12 only, compare 2 Pet. ii. 13 and 1 Cor. xi. 17 ff.) = certain banquets or social meals among the early Christians, intended as an exhibition of their mutual love, and usually celebrated in connection with the Lord's Supper; also called love-feasts (L. agapæ). The food was contributed by the wealthier members, and shared among all Christians who chose to partake (Acts ii. 46, vi. 2). Portions were also sent to the sick and absent members. In consequence of abuses they were forbidden by the Council of Laodicea A. D. 361, and by the third Council of Carthage A. D. 397, to be held in houses of worship, and after the prohibitions by the Council of Orleans A. D. 541, and of Trullo A. D. 692, &c., were entirely disused. LORD'S SUPPER.

* Feet, plural of Foot.

Felix (L. happy), a Roman procurator of Judea, appointed by the Emperor Claudius, whose freedman he was, on the banishment of Ventidius Cumanus in A. D. 53. Tacitus states that Felix and Cumanus were joint procurators; Cumanus having Galilee, and Felix Samaria. Felix was the brother of Claudius's powerful freedman Pallas. He ruled the province in a mean, cruel, and profligate manner. His period of office was full of troubles and seditions. St. PAUL was brought before Felix in Cesarea. He was remanded to prison, and kept there two years, in hopes of extorting money from him (Acts xxiii. xxiv.). At the end of that time Porcius Festus was appointed to supersede Felix, who, on his return to Rome, was accused by the Jews in Cesarea, and would have suffered the penalty due to his atrocities, had not his brother Pallas prevailed with the Emperor Nero to spare him. This was probably in 60 A. D. Felix's wife was DRUSILLA, daughter of Herod Agrippa I.

Fenced City [fenst sit'e] (Heb. mitsar). The broad distinction between a CITY and a VILLAGE in Biblical language consisted in the possession of walls. The city had walls, the village was unwall'd, or had only a watchman's tower, to which the villagers resorted in times of danger. A threefold distinction is thus obtained—1. “cities;” 2. unwall'd “villages;” 3. villages with “castles” or towers

(1 Chr. xxvii. 25). The district E. of the Jordan, forming the kingdoms of Moab and Bashan (ARABOS), is said to have abounded from very early times in castles and fortresses, such as were built by Uzziah to protect the cattle, and to repel the inroads of the neighboring tribes, besides unwall'd towns (Deut. iii. 5; 2 Chr. xxvi. 10). The fortifications of the cities of Palestine, thus regularly “fenced,” consisted of one or more walls crowned with battlemented parapets, having towers at regular intervals (xxxii. 5; Jer. xxxi. 38) (JERUSALEM), on which, in later times, engines of war (ENGINE) were placed, and watch was kept by day and night in time of war (2 Chr. xxvi. 9, 15; 2 K. ix. 17). The gateways of fortified towns were also fortified and closed with strong doors (Neh. ii. 8, iii. 3, 6, &c.). In advance of the wall there appears to have been sometimes an outwork (Heb. hêyl or chêyl, 2 Sam. xx. 15, A. V.

The so-called Golden Gate of Jerusalem, showing supposed remains of the old Jewish wall.

“in the trench,” margin “against the outmost wall;” 1 K. xxi. 23, A. V. “wall,” margin “ditch”), which was perhaps either a palisade or wall lining the ditch, or a wall raised midway within the ditch itself. In many towns there was a keep or citadel for a last resource to the defenders. These fotts were well furnished with cisterns. (ANTONIA.) But the fortified places of Palestine served only in a few instances to check effectually the progress of an invading force, though many instances of determined and protracted resistance are on record, as of SAMARIA for three years (2 K. xviii. 10), JERUSALEM (xxv. 3) for four months, and in later times of Jotapata, Gamala, Machærus, Masada, and, above all, JERUSALEM itself, the strength of whose defences drew forth the admiration of the conqueror Titus.—The walls of ANTIOCH I, large portions of which still remain were of great size and strength, from thirty to fifty feet high, and fifteen feet thick, flanked by numerous square towers, and carried up and down the steep mountain-side.—The earlier Egyptian fortifications consisted usually of a quadrangular and sometimes double wall of sun-dried brick, fifteen feet thick, and often fifty feet in height, with square towers at intervals, of the same height as the walls, both crowned with a parapet, and a round-headed battlement in shape like a shield. A second lower wall with towers at the entrance was added, distant thirteen or twenty feet from the main wall, and sometimes another was made of seventy or one hundred feet in length, projecting at right angles from the main wall, to enable the defenders to annoy the assailants in flank. ANTIOCH; BABYLON; NINEVEH; TYRE; WAR; ZIDON.

Ferret, the A. V. translation of the Heb. ʾanākāh, one of the unclean creeping things in Lev. xi. 30; according to the LXX. and Vulgate = the shrew-mouse (Mus araneus); probably a reptile of the lizard tribe (so Mr. Drake, with Gesenius, Fürst, &c.). The "ferret" (Mustela furo, Linn.) is an animal of the weasel kind, often used to hunt rabbits.

• Ferry-boat, the translation by the A. V., Gesenius, Fürst, &c., of the Heb. ʾabārāh in 2 Sam. xix. 18; perhaps a shallow, flat-bottomed boat, or a raft or float of reeds like those used in crossing the Nile.

Festivals. I. The religious times ordained in the Law fall under three heads:—1. Those formally connected with the institution of the Sabbath; (a) The weekly SABBATH itself. (b) The seventh new moon or Feast of Trumpets. (TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.) (c) The SABBATICAL YEAR. (d) The Year of JUBILEE.—2. The great feasts:—(a) The PASSOVER. (b) The Feast of PENTECOST, of Weeks, of Wheat-harvest, or, of the FIRST-FRUIT. (c) The Feast of Tabernacles, or of Ingathering. (TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.) On each of these occasions every male Israelite was commanded "to appear before the Lord," i. e. to attend in the court of the Tabernacle or the Temple, and to make his offering with a joyful heart (Lev. xxiii. 40; Deut. xxvi. 11; Neh. viii. 9-12). The attendance of women was voluntary, but the zealous often went up to the Passover (1 Sam. i. 7, ii. 19; Lk. ii. 41). On all the days of Holy Convocation there was to be an entire suspension of ordinary labor of all kinds (Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xvi. 29, xxiii. 21, 24, 25, 35). But on the intervening days of the longer festivals work might be carried on. Besides their religious purpose, the great festivals must have had an important bearing on the maintenance of a feeling of national unity. The frequent recurrence of the sabbatical number (=7) in the organization of these festivals is remarkable. Pentecost occurs seven weeks after the Passover; the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles last seven days each; the days of Holy Convocation are seven in the year; the Feast of Tabernacles and the Day of Atonement fall in the seventh month of the sacred year; the cycle of annual feasts occupies seven months, from Nisan to Tisri. The agricultural significance of the three great festivals is already set forth in the account of the Jewish sacred year in Lev. xxiii. (AGRICULTURE.) The times of the festivals were evidently ordained in wisdom, so as to interfere as little as possible with the industry of the people.—3. The Day of Atonement. (ATONEMENT, DAY OF.)—II. After the Captivity, the Feast of PURIM (Esth. ix. 20 ff.) and that of the DEDICATION (1 Mc. iv. 56) were instituted. The Feast of Wood-carrying, on the fifteenth of the fifth month, is mentioned by Josephus and the Mishna (Neh. x. 34). The feasts of Nicanor on the thirteenth of the twelfth month (1 Mc. vii. 49), of Acra (A. V. "the tower") on the twenty-third of the second month (xiii. 50-52), of Water-drawing on the twenty-second of the seventh month (compare Jn. vii. 37), and some others, were instituted after the Captivity, but subsequently discontinued (Dr. Ginsburg, in Kitto). The term "the Festival of the Basket" is applied by Philo to the offering of the FIRST-FRUIT described in Deut. xxvi. 1-11. BANQUETS.

Festus (L. of the holidays, festival; a Roman surname), Porcius (L., the name common to members of a certain Roman clan, from porcus, a hog?), successor of Felix as procurator of Judea (Acts xxiv. 27), sent by Nero, probably in the autumn of 60 A. D. A few weeks after Festus reached his province, he heard the cause of St. PAUL, who had been left a prisoner by Felix, in the presence of Herod Agrippa II. and Bernice his sister (xxv. 11, 12). Judea was in the same disturbed state during Festus's procuratorship as through that of his predecessor. He died probably in the summer of A. D. 62, having ruled the province less than two years.

Fetters (= chains to confine the feet), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. nēhushtayim or nēhushtayim, in the dual number, expressing the material of which fetters were usually made, viz. "BRASS," and also that they were made in pairs (Judg. xvi. 21; 2 Sam. iii. 34; 2 K. xxv. 7; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 11, xxxvi. 6; Jer. xxxix. 7, lii. 11, margin in both, text "chains").—2. Heb. cebel, once in singular, perhaps = the link which connected the fetters (Ps. cv. 18, cxlix. 8). Iron is here mentioned as the material.—3. Heb. pl. zikkim (Job xxxvi. 8), usually translated "chains" (Ps. cxlix. 8; Is. xlv. 14; Nah. iii. 10), but its radical sense appears to refer to the contraction of the feet by a CHAIN.—4. Gr. pl. pedai (Mk. v. 4; Lk. viii. 29).

Fever. The Heb. kaddahath or kaddachath is translated in A. V. "burning ague" (Lev. xxvi. 16), and "fever" (Deut. xxviii. 22); also in xxviii. 22 Heb. dalleketh is translated "inflammation," and harhur or charchur is translated "extreme burning." In the N. T. the Gr. noun pyretos is translated "fever" (Mat. viii. 15; Mk. i. 31; Lk. iv. 38, 39; Jn. iv. 52; Acts xxviii. 8), and the kindred Gr. fem. participle pyressoua is translated "sick of a fever" (Mat. viii. 14; Mk. i. 30). Dr. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto) supposes the second (A. V. "inflammation") to be the ague; the third (A. V. "extreme burning") to be dysentery, or some inflammatory fever.—These words, from various roots signifying heat or inflammation, are suggestive of fever, or a feverish affection. Fever constantly accompanies the bloody flux, or dysentery (Acts xxviii. 8). Fever and ague, &c., are very common in Jerusalem (Rbn. Phys. Geog. 309). Malignant fevers are still prevalent, especially in summer and autumn, about the sea of Galilee (Thomson, i. 547).

Field. The Hebrew sâdeh, usually translated "field" = unenclosed land, the open fields, the country, Ges. It embraces both tilled fields and pastures (Gen. xxxi. 4, xxxvii. 7, &c.), also mountainous land and fields, planted with trees (Judg. ix. 32, compare 36; Ps. cxxxii. 6). It is frequently contrasted with what is enclosed, whether a vineyard, a garden, or a walled town. In many passages the term implies what is remote from a house (Gen. iv. 8, xxiv. 63; Deut. xxii. 25) or settled habitation, as in the case of Esau (Gen. xxv. 27). (BEAST.) The separate plots of ground were marked off by stones (A. V. "land-marks"), which might easily be removed (Deut. xix. 14, xxvii. 17; compare Job xxiv. 2; Prov. xxii. 28, xxiii. 10): the absence of fences rendered the fields liable to damage from straying cattle (Ex. xxii. 5) or fire (ver. 6; 2 Sam. xiv. 30): hence the necessity of constantly watching flocks and herds. From the absence of enclosures, cultivated land of any size might be termed a field. Similar remarks apply to the Gr. agros (= Heb. sâdeh, LXX.), usually translated "field" in the N. T. (Mat. vi. 28, 30, xiii. 24 ff., &c.). The expressions "fruitful field" (Is. x. 18, xxix. 17, xxxii. 15, 16), and "plentiful field" (Is. xvi. 10; Jer. xlviii. 33), are the A. V. translation of Heb. carmel = a garden, orchard, park, or well-kept wood, as distinct from a wilderness or a forest. CARMEL; FULLER'S FIELD; POTTER'S FIELD.

Fig, Fig-tree, both occur as = Heb. tēnûh, which signifies the tree Ficus Carica of Linnæus, and also its fruit. In N. T. the Gr. sukê = "the fig-tree," and the Gr. plural suka = "figs." The fig-tree is very common in Palestine (Deut. viii. 8). Its fruit is a well-known and highly-esteemed article of food. In the East this is of three kinds; (1.) the early fig (Heb. biccûrah, below), ripening about the end of (Rbn. N. T. Lex.). The blossoms of the fig-tree are within the receptacle or so-called "fruit," and not visible outwardly; and this fruit begins to develop before the leaves. Hence the fig-tree which had leaves before the usual time might naturally have been expected to have also some figs on it (Mk. xi. 13); but it was not true to its pretensions. The "fig-leaves," of which our first parents made themselves "aprons" (Gen. iii. 7), have been supposed to be leaves of the banyan or Indian fig (Ficus Indica) (so Milton), or the enormous leaves of the banana (Musa paradisiaca) (so Celsius, Gesenius, &c.), but were probably the large and beautiful leaves of the common fig-tree. Mount Olivet was famous for its fig-trees in ancient times, and they are still found there. "To sit under one's own vine and one's own fig-tree" became a proverbial expression among the Jews to denote peace and prosperity (1 K. iv. 25; Mic. iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10). The Heb. biccûrah (Hos. ix. 10; Mic. vii. 1) = the first ripe of the fig-tree; Heb. pag (Cant. ii. 13; A. V. "green figs") = the unripe fig, which hangs through the winter; Heb. dibêlah = a round cake of figs dried and compressed into a mass, used for food (1 Sam. xxv. 18, &c.), also (A. V. "a lump of figs") laid on Hezekiah's boil (2 K. xx. 7; Is. xxxviii. 21).

* Fle, the A. V. translation of Heb. pêlîrâh (1 Sam. xiii. 21 only), which Gesenius translates dullness, bluntness, literally the being notched. The sense thus would be: "the Israelites went down to the Philistines to sharpen every man his share," &c.—"when the mattocks, &c., were dull;" literally when there was notchedness of mouths (i. e. dullness of edges) to the mattocks, &c.

* Fines. PUNISHMENTS.

* Fin'ger [fin'ger] (Heb. etsba'; Gr. daktulos) = one of the five extremities of the hand. The priest sprinkled with his fore-finger (Lev. iv. 6 ff., xiv. 16, 27, &c.). "Putting forth the finger," i. e. pointing with it (Is. lviii. 9) indicated contempt. "The finger of God" (Ex. viii. 19; Lk. xi. 20) figuratively = God's power. One of the Philistine giants had six fingers on each hand (2 Sam. xxi. 20; 1 Chr. xx. 6). WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Fir, the A. V. translation of the Heb. bêrâsh, bêrôth, denoting a tree whose timber was used for musical instruments (2 Sam. vi. 5), doors (1 K. vi. 34), gilded ceilings (2 Chr. iii. 5), boards or decks of ships (Ez. xxvii. v). Mr. Houghton supposes the Hebrew = the Pinus Haicpensis (Aleppo pine), or the Juniperus excelsa (tall juniper), both of which grow on Lebanon, and would supply excellent timber for these purposes. (CEDAR.) Gesenius and ancient interpreters translate the Hebrew by CYPRESS; Celsius regards it as the cedar of Lebanon; Fürst infers that several trees (cypress, cedar, pine, &c.) were designated by the term.

Fire (Heb. esh; Gr. pur).—1. Religious. (1.) That which consumed the burnt sacrifice, and the incense-offering, beginning with the sacrifice of Noah (Gen. viii. 20), and continued in the ever-burning fire on the altar, first kindled from heaven (Lev. vi. 9, 13, ix. 24), and rekindled at the dedication of Solomon's Temple (2 Chr. vii. 1, 3). (ALTAR; BURNT-OFFERING; INCENSE; SACRIFICE.) (2.) The symbol of Jehovah's presence, and the instrument of His power, in the way either of approval or of destruction (Ex. iii. 2, xiv. 19, &c.). Parallel with this application of fire and with its symbolical meaning is to be noted the similar use for sacrificial purposes, and the respect paid to it, or to the heavenly bodies

June; (2.) the summer fig, ripening in August; (3.) the winter fig, larger and darker than No. 2, hanging and ripening late on the tree, even after the leaves were shed, and sometimes gathered in the spring as symbols of deity, which prevailed among so many nations of antiquity, and of which the traces are not even now extinct: e. g. the Sabeian and Magian systems of worship, and their alleged connection with Abraham; the occasional relapse of the Jews themselves into sun-worship, or its corrupted form of fire-worship (Is. xxvii. 9; Deut. xvii. 3, &c.), the worship or deification of heavenly bodies or of fire, prevailing to some extent, as among the Persians, so also even in Egypt. (IDOLATRY.) Fire for sacred purposes obtained elsewhere than from the altar was called "strange fire," and for use of such Nadab and Abihu were punished with death by fire from God (Lev. x. 1, 2; Num. iii. 4, xxvi. 61). (3.) Of the spoil taken from the Midianites, such articles as could bear it were purified by fire as well as in the water appointed for the purpose (Num. xxxi. 23). The victims slain for sin-offerings were afterwards consumed by fire outside the camp (Lev. iv. 12, 21, vi. 30, xvi. 27; Heb. xiii. 11). (NAZARITE.)—II. Domestic. Besides for cooking purposes, fire is often required in Palestine for warmth (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Mk. xiv. 54; Jn. xviii. 18). (BREAD; COAL; COOKING; OVEN.) For this purpose a hearth with a chimney is sometimes constructed, on which either lighted wood or pans of charcoal are placed. On the Sabbath, the Law forbade any fire to be kindled even for cooking (Ex. xxxv. 3; Num. xv. 32).—III. The dryness of the land in the hot season, in Syria, of course increases liability to accident from fire. The Law therefore ordered that any one kindling a fire which caused damage to corn in a field should make restitution (Ex. xxii. 6; compare Judg. xv. 4, 5; 2 Sam. xiv. 30). (PUNISHMENTS.)—IV. Fire or flame is used in a metaphorical sense to express excited feeling and divine inspiration, also to describe temporal calamities and future punishments (Ps. lvi. 12; Jer. xx. 9; Joel ii. 30; Mal. iii. 2; Mat. xxv. 41; Mk. ix. 43; Rev. xx. 15). BRIMSTONE; BURIAL; DEATH; ETERNAL; ETERNITY; FURNACE; HANDICRAFT; MOLECH; REFINER; SHECHINAH; WAR.

Fire pan, the A. V. translation of the Heb. mahtûh or machûh, one of the vessels of the temple service (Ex. xxvii. 3, xxxviii. 3; 2 K. xxv. 15; Jer. lii. 19), elsewhere rendered "snuff-dish" (Ex. xxv. 38, xxxvii. 28; Num. iv. 9) and "censer" (Lev. x. 1, xvi. 12; Num. xvi. 6 ff.). (ALTAR.) There appear, therefore, to have been two articles so called: one, like a chafing-dish, to carry live coals for burning incense; another, like a snuffer-dish, used in trimming the lamps, to carry the snuffers and convey away the snuff.

FIR'KIN. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Firma-ment (fr. L. firmamentum = a strengthening, support, prop), the A. V. translation of the Heb. râkîa' (Gen. i. 6 ff.; Ps. xix. 1 [Heb. 2], cl. 1; Ez. i. 22 ff. x. 1; Dan. xii. 3), generally regarded as expressive of simple expansion, and so rendered in the margin of Gen. i. 6. The Heb. root râka' = (so Gesenius) (1.) to beat, to smite with the feet, to "stamp" (Ez. vi. 11, xxv. 6), hence to tread down enemies (2 Sam. xxii. 42, A. V. "did spread them abroad"); (2.) to beat out, i. e. to spread out or expand by beating, whether by the hand, the foot, or any instrument; used of beating out metals into thin plates (Ex. xxxix. 3; Num. xvi. 39, A. V. "they were made broad plates"). The sense of solidity, therefore, is combined with the ideas of expansion and tenuity in the term (so Mr. Bevan, &c.). Gesenius says, "hence, simply to spread out, to expand, as God the earth" (Ps. cxxxvi. 6, A. V. "stretched out;" Is. xlii. 5, A. V. "spread forth;" xlv. 24,

A. V. "spreadeth abroad"), and the heavens (Job xxxvii. 18, A. V. "spread out"). It is unfair for us to take such poetical descriptions as those in which the heavens are compared to a mirror of shining metal, &c. (Job xxxvii. 18; compare Gen. i. 20 and Deut. xxviii. 28), and interpret them as scientific statements; for modern poets use language fully as unscientific. The "firmament" was to serve as a division between the waters above and the waters below (Gen. i. 7). In it were placed the heavenly bodies, sun, moon, and stars (i. 14); "above" it, in Ezekiel's vision of the CHERUBIM (Ez. i. 22-26), was "the likeness of a throne" (God's). "There seems no reason for thinking that the sacred writers conceived of" it "as a solid substance; they seem rather to have thought of it as a wide expansion, in which the clouds, and winds, and heavenly bodies had their place, and from which the rain came down" (Dr. W. L. Alexander in Kitto). CREATION; EARTH; HEAVEN.

First-born (Heb. bēchôr; Gr. prôtotokos), applied to animals and human beings. That some rights of primogeniture existed in very early times is plain, but it is not so clear in what they consisted. They have been classed as (a) authority over the rest of the family; (b) priesthood; (c) a double portion of the inheritance (Gen. xxv. 23, 31, 34, xxxvii. 29, 33, 36, xlix. 3; 1 Chr. v. 1, 2; Heb. xii. 16). (ESAU; REUBEN.) Under the Law, in memory of the EXODUS (PLAGUES, THE TEN, No. 10), the eldest son was regarded as devoted to God, and was in every case to be redeemed by an offering not exceeding five shekels, within one month from birth. If he died before the expiration of thirty days, the Jewish doctors held the father excused, but liable to the payment if he outlived that time (Ex. xiii. 12-15, xxii. 29; Num. viii. 17, xviii. 15, 16; Lev. xxvii. 6). (CHILD.) This devotion of the first-born was believed to indicate a priesthood belonging to the eldest sons of families, which being set aside in the case of Reuben, was transferred to the tribe of Levi. The eldest son received a double portion of the father's inheritance (Deut. xxi. 15-17), but not of the mother's. Under the monarchy, the eldest son usually, but not always, as appears in the case of Solomon, succeeded his father in the kingdom (1 K. i. 30, ii. 22). The male first-born of animals was also devoted to God (Ex. xiii. 2, 12, 13, xxxiv. 19, 20; Deut. xii. 5-7, xiv. 23). (BLEMISH.) Unclean animals were to be redeemed with the addition of one-fifth of the value, or else put to death; or, if not redeemed, to be sold, and the price given to the priests (Lev. xxvii. 13, 27, 28). "First-born," or "first-begotten," figuratively denotes preëminence = first, chief, as "the first-born of death," i. e. the chief among deadly diseases (Job xviii. 13), "the first-born of the poor," i. e. the chief among the sons of the poor, or the poorest of the poor (Is. xiv. 30), "the church of the first-born," i. e. distinguished saints (Hob. xii. 23). This title is especially applied to the Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15, 18; Heb. i. 6; Rev. i. 5; compare Ps. lxxxix. 27).

First'-fruits (Heb. biccûrim, rêshûh; Gr. aparchê).

1. The Law ordered in general, that the first of all ripe fruits and of liquors, or, as it is twice expressed, the first of first-fruits, should be offered in God's house (Ex. xxii. 29, xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26). 2. On the morrow after the Passover sabbath, i. e. on the 16th of Nisan, a sheaf of new corn was to be brought to the priest, and waved before the altar, in acknowledgment of the gift of fruitfulness (Lev. xxiii. 5, 6,

10-12, ii. 12). 3. At the expiration of seven weeks from this time, i. e. at the Feast of Pentecost, an oblation was to be made of two loaves of leavened bread made from the new flour, which were to be waved like the Passover sheaf (Ex. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 15-17; Num. xxviii. 26). 4. The feast of ingathering, i. e. the Feast of Tabernacles in the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Ex. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 39). These four sorts of offerings were national. Besides them, the two following were of an individual kind. 5. A cake of the first dough that was baked was to be offered as a heave-offering (Num. xv. 19-21). 6. The first-fruits of the land were to be brought in a basket to the holy place of God's choice, and there presented to the priest, who was to set the basket down before the altar (Deut. xxi. 2-11). (FESTIVALS.) The offerings, both public and private, resolve themselves into two classes, (a) produce in general, (b) offerings, prepared produce. (a) Of the public offerings of first-fruits, the Law defined no place from which the Passover sheaf should be chosen, but the Jewish custom, so far as represented by the Mishna, prescribed that the wave-sheaf or sheaves should be taken from the neighborhood of Jerusalem. (AGRICULTURE.) The offering made at the feast of the Pentecost was a thanksgiving for the conclusion of wheat harvest. It consisted of two loaves (according to Josephus one loaf) of new flour baked with leaven, which was waved by the priest as at the Passover. No private offerings of first-fruits were allowed before this public oblation of the two loaves. The private oblations of first-fruits may be classed in the same manner as the public. The Jews considered seven sorts of produce liable to oblation, viz. wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates. Though the Law laid down no rule as to quantity, the minimum fixed by custom was one-sixtieth. No offerings were to be made before Pentecost, nor after the feast of the Dedication (Ex. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 16, 17). The practice was for companies of twenty-four to assemble in the evening at a central station, and pass the night in the open air. In the morning they were summoned by the leader: "Let us arise and go up to Mount Zion, the House of the Lord our God." On the road to Jerusalem they recited portions of Psalms cxxii. and cl. Each party was preceded by a piper, and a sacrificial bullock having the tip of his horns gilt and crowned with olive. At their approach to the city they were met by priests appointed to inspect the offering, and welcomed by companies of citizens. On ascending the Temple mount, each took on his shoulders his basket, containing the first-fruits and an offering of turtle-doves, and proceeded to the court of the Temple, where they were met by Levites singing Psalm xxx. 1. The doves were sacrificed as a burnt-offering, and the first-fruits presented as appointed in Deut. xxi. After passing the night at Jerusalem, the pilgrims returned on the following day to their homes (Deut. xvi. 7). (b) The first-fruits prepared for use were not required to be taken to Jerusalem. They consisted of wine, wool, bread, oil, date-honey, onions, cucumbers (Num. xv. 19-21; Deut. xviii. 4). They were to be made, according to some, only by dwellers in Palestine; but according to others, by those also who dwell in the land of Moab, Ammon, or Egypt. The offerings were the perquisite of the priests (Num. xviii. 11; Deut. xxi. 4). Hezekiah, and afterward Nehemiah, restored the offerings of first-fruits of both kinds, and appointed places to receive them (2 Chr. xxxi. 5, 11; Neh. x. 35, 37, xii. 44; compare Ez. xx. 40, xlv. 30, xlviii. 14; Mal. iii. 8). An offering of first-fruits is mentioned as an acceptable one to the prophet Elisha (2 K. iv. 42). The Law directed that the fruit of all trees fresh planted should be regarded as uncircumcised, or profane, and not to be tasted by the owner for three years. The whole produce of the fourth year was devoted to God. The fifth year the owner might eat of the fruit (Lev. xix. 23-25). Offerings of first-fruits were sent to Jerusalem by Jews in foreign countries.

Fish (Heb. dāg, dāgāh; Gr. ichthus, opsarion), Fish'ing. The Hebrews recognized fish as one of the great divisions of the animal kingdom (Gen. i. 21, 28, ix. 2; Ex. xx. 4; Deut. iv. 18; 1 K. iv. 33). Fishes in modern zoology = "oviparous, vertebrated, cold-blooded animals, breathing water by means of gills or branchiae, and generally provided with fins;" but none of these are mentioned by name in the Scriptures. In the popular and inexact sense of aquatic animals, eleven sorts are mentioned (so Dr. P. Holmes in Kitto; BEHEMOTH; COLORS II. 1, 2; DRAGON 1-3; FROG; HORSE-LEECH; LEVIATHAN; WHALE). The Heb. pl. āniyōth, translated uniformly by the A. V. and most "ships," French and Skinner (Tr. of Ps.), Thrupp (Intro. to Ps.), and Dr. Holmes (in Kitto), apparently, would render "nautilus," from the resemblance of this little shell-fish to a ship. The fish of the Tigris which would have devoured Tobias (Tob. vi. 2 ff.) is supposed by Bochart, &c., to have been the Silurus glanis (allied to the American cat-fish or bull-head, Pimelodus of Cuvier), which is sometimes six feet long and weighs 300 pounds; but Col. C. H. Smith supposes it a species of crocodile. Dr. Holmes supposes in Ez. xxix. 4 an allusion to the remora, Echeneis Remora, which has on its head an adhesive or sucking disc enabling it to adhere to another fish. The Mosaic law (Lev. xi. 9, 10) pronounced unclean such fish as were devoid of fins and scales: these were and are regarded as unwholesome in Egypt. (CLEAN; FOON.) Of the various species found in the Sea of Galilee, the Silurus would be classed among the unclean, while the Sparus Galileus (a species of bream), and the Mugil (chub), would be deemed "clean." In Genesis i. 21 (compare verse 28), the great marine animals are distinguished from "every living creature that creepeth," a description applying to fish, along with other reptiles, as having no legs. The Hebrews doubtless became familiar with the remarkable fecundity of fish while in Egypt, where the abundance of fish in the Nile, and the lakes and canals, rendered it one of the staple commodities of food (Num. xi. 5). The destruction of the fish was on this account a most serious visitation to the Egyptians (Ex. vii. 21; Is. xix. 8). Among the Philistines, DAGON was represented by a figure, half man and half fish. On this account the worship of fish is expressly prohibited (Deut. iv. 18). In Palestine, the Sea of Galilee was and still is remarkably well stored with fish, and the value attached to the fishery by the Jews is shown by the traditional belief that one of the ten laws of Joshua enacted that it should be open to all comers. Jerusalem derived its supply chiefly from the Mediterranean (Neh. xiii. 16; compare Ez. xlvii. 10). (PALESTINE; ZOOLOGY) The existence of a regular fish-market is implied in the notice of the FISH-GATE, which was probably contiguous to it. Numerous allusions to the art of fishing occur in the Bible; in the O. T. metaphorical, descriptive of

iv. 2; Hab. i. 14) of God's enemies; in the N. T. mostly historical (Mat. iv. 18, 20, 21, &c.), metaphorical in Mat. iv. 19, xiii. 47 ff., &c. The most usual method of catching fish was by the use of the NET, either the casting net (Hab. i. 15; Ez. xxvi. 5, 14, &c.), probably resembling the one used in Egypt, or the draw or drag net (Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15; Mat. xiii. 47), which was larger and required the use of a boat: the latter was probably most used on the Sea of Galilee, as the number of boats kept on it was very considerable. Angling the conversion (Jer. xvi. 16; Ez. xlvii. 10), or of the destruction (Eccl. ix. 12; Ez. xxix. 3 ff.; Am.

was a favorite pursuit of the wealthy in Egypt, and was followed by the poor who could not afford a net; the requisites were a hook and a line (Job xli. 1; Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15); the rod was occasionally dispensed with, and is not mentioned in the Bible. The custom of drying fish is frequently represented in the Egyptian sculptures. A still more scientific method was with the trident or the spear, as practised in Egypt in taking the crocodile (Job xli. 7) or the hippopotamus.

* Fish-gate, a gate of JERUSALEM (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10); perhaps (so Gesenius) that now called St. Stephen's Gate, or (so Kitto) at the N. E. part of the city.

Nigella arvensis — "Fitches" in A. V.

Fitch'es (i. e. velches or TARES, leguminous plants allied to beans and peas), the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. cussemeth (Ez. iv. 9), elsewhere translated "Rye."—2. Heb. ketsah or ketsach (Is. xxviii. 25, 27), without doubt = the Nigella sativa, an herbaceous annual plant, sometimes called Nutmeg Flower, belonging to the natural order Ranunculaceae, which was formerly cultivated in Palestine for its black aromatic seeds, used in Eastern countries as a medicine and a condiment.

Flag, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. dhû or dchû ("Can the flag grow without water," Job viii. 11); translated "MEADOW" in Gen. xli. 2, 18, as that in which the well-favored kine fed. The Hebrew word, according to Jerome, is of Egyptian origin, = "any green and coarse herbage, such as rushes and reeds, which grows in marshy places." Gesenius says, "marsh-grass, reeds, bulrushes, sedge, any thing green which grows in wet grounds." Probably some specific plant is denoted in Job viii.

11. Dr. Royle (in Kitto) supposes it may be the Cyperus esculentus (= edible sedge), or a true grass, e. g. a species of Panicum. Kalisch makes it "unquestionably either the Cyperus esculentus or the Bulmus umbellatus" (= flowering rush).—2. Heb. sûph (Ex. ii. 3, 5; Is. xix. 6); translated "weeds" in Jon. ii. 5; used frequently in the O. T. with Heb. yam (= "sea") to denote the "RED SEA," i. e. the "sea of weeds." Gesenius makes sûph = a rush, reed, sedge; Stanley (p. 6, n.) observes, "though used commonly for flags or rushes, it would by an easy change be applied to any aqueous vegetation."

Flag'oon, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. âshishûh (2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Chr. xvi. 3; Cant. ii. 5; Hos. iii. 1) = a cake of pressed raisins (so Gesenius, &c.).—2. Heb. nebel (Is. xxii. 24), commonly = "BOTTLE" or "vessel," originally probably a skin, but in later times of pottery (Is. xxx. 14). PSALTERY; VIOL.

Flax, the A. V. translation of Heb. pishlûh (Ex. ix. 31; Is. xlii. 3), and peheth (Josh. ii. 6; Judg. xv. 14; Prov. xxxi. 13; Is. xix. 9; Ez. xl. 3; Hos. ii. 5, 9 [Heb. 7, 11]). The latter is often translated "LINEN;" the former is once (Is. xliii. 17) translated "row." The Gr. linon is translated "flax" in Mat. xii. 20 (quoted from Is. xlii. 3) and "linen" in Rev. xv. 6. The common flax, Linum usitatissimum, is a well-known annual plant. The strong fibres of its bark are manufactured into linen, &c. The seeds yield linseed oil, and are also used in medicine. The Hebrew and Greek words are used for the article manufactured in the thread, the piec, or the made-up garment, and for the plant. In Ex. ix. 31, the flax of the Egyptians is recorded to have been damaged by the plague of hail. (BOLLED.) Probably the cultivation of flax for the manufacture of linen was by no means confined to Egypt, but originating in India spread over the whole continent of Asia at a very early period of antiquity. That it was grown in Palestine even before the conquest of that country by the Israelites appears from Josh. ii. 6. The various processes employed in preparing the flax for manufacture into cloth are indicated:—1. The drying process. 2. The peeling of the stalks, and separation of the fibres. 3. The hackling (Is. xix. 9). That flax was anciently one of the most important crops in Palestine appears from Hos. ii. 6, 9.

Flea (Heb. par'ôsh), a well-known minute and troublesome insect (Pulex irritans) of great agility. David applies it to himself as a term of humility (1 Sam. xxiv. 14, xxvi. 20). Fleas are abundant in the East, and the subject of many proverbial expressions.

* Fleec. WOOL.

* Flesh, the general translation in the Scriptures of the Heb. bâsar and Gr. sarz = the muscles, fat, &c., on the bones of the living human or animal body (Ex. xvi. 12; Job xxxiii. 21; Lk. xxiv. 39, &c.); also the human body, as distinguished from the spirit (Job xiv. 22; Jn. vi. 52; Col. ii. 5, &c.); the human body, or human nature, especially as frail, prone to sin, opposed to what is spiritual or holy (Gen. vi. 3; Mat. xxvi. 41; Jn. iii. 6, &c.). &c. "All flesh" sometimes = all animate beings (Gen. vi. 12, 17, &c.), oftener all mankind (Gen. vi. 12; Lk. iii. 6, &c.). Christ "was made flesh" (Jn. i. 14; 1 Jn. iv. 2, &c.; compare Heb. iv. 15), i. e. became human, had the nature and attributes of a man. Flah-hooks; see ALTAR. FOOD.

* Flies. FLY.

Flint. The Heb. hallâmish or challâmish is translated "flint" in Deut. viii. 15; Ps. cxiv. 8; and Is. l. 7; "rock" in Job xxviii. 9, margin "flint;" "flinty," literally of flint in Deut. xxxii. 13. In Ez. iii. 9 "flint" = the Heb. tsôr, translated "sharp stone," margin "KNIFE," in Ex. iv. 25. Flint is properly a variety of quartz; but the Hebrew probably = any hard stone (Gesenius).

* Flocks. GOAT; LAMB; SHEEP; SHEPHERD.

Flood. NOAH.

Floor. AGRICULTURE; BARN; HOUSE; PAVEMENT.

Flour. BREAD; MEAT-OFFERING; MILL.

Flowers. PALESTINE, Eotany.

Flute, a musical instrument (Chal. mashrôkithâ) used with others at the worship of the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up (Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15). See also 1 K. i. 4 margin. PIPE.

Flux, Blood'y (Acts xxviii. 8) = the dysentery, which in the East is, though sometimes sporadic, generally epidemic and infectious, and then assumes its worst form. FEVER; MEDICINE.

Fly, Flies, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. zibûb (Ecl. x. 1; Is. vii. 18), probably = any winged insect or fly; perhaps in Isaiah = some very troublesome and injurious fly.—2. Heb. 'ârôb ("swarms of flies," "divers sorts of flies," A. V.) = the insect, or insects, which God sent to punish Pharaoh in the fourth plague (Ex. viii. 21–31; Ps. lxxviii. 45, cv. 31). (PLAGUES, THE TEN.) As they filled the houses of the Egyptians, not improbably common flies (Muscidae) are more especially intended.

Food. The diet of Eastern nations has been in all ages light and simple. As compared with our own habits, the chief points of contrast are the small amount of animal food consumed, the variety of articles used as accompaniments to bread, the substitution of milk in various forms for our liquors, and the combination of what we should deem heterogeneous elements in the same dish, or the same meal. The chief point of agreement is the large consumption of bread, the importance of which in the eyes of the Hebrew is testified by the use of the term lehem or lechem (originally food of any kind) specifically for BREAD, as well as by the expression "staff of bread" (Lev. xxvi. 26; Ps. cv. 16; Ez. iv. 16, xiv. 13). Simpler preparations of "corn" were, however, common; sometimes the fresh green ears were eaten in a natural state, the husks being rubbed off by the hand (Lev. xxiii. 14; Deut. xxiii. 25; 2 K. iv. 42; Mat. xii. 1; Lk. vi. 1); more frequently, however, the grains, after being carefully picked, were roasted in a pan over a fire (Lev. ii. 14), and eaten as "parched corn," in which form they were an ordinary article of diet, particularly among laborers, or others who had not the means of dressing food (Lev. xxiii. 14; Ru. ii. 14; 1 Sam. xvii. 17, xxv. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 28); this practice is still very usual in the East. Sometimes the grain was bruised (A. V. "beaten," Lev. ii. 14, 16), and then dried in the sun; it was eaten either mixed with oil (Lev. ii. 15), or made into a soft cake (A. V. "dough;" Num. xv. 20; Neh. x. 37; Ez. xlv. 30). The Hebrews used a great variety of articles to give a relish to bread. Sometimes salt was so used (Job vi. 6); sometimes the bread was dipped into the sour wine (A. V. "vinegar") which the laborers drank (Ru. ii. 14); or, where meat was eaten, into the gravy (BROTH), which was either served up separately for the purpose, as by Gideon (Judg. vi. 19), or placed in the middle of the meat-dish, as by the Arabs. MILK and its preparations hold a conspicuous place in Eastern diet, as affording substantial nourishment; sometimes it was produced in a fresh state (Gen. xviii. 8), but more generally in the form of the modern leben, i. e. sour milk (A. V. "BUTTER"). (CHEESE.) Fruit was another source of subsistence; figs (FIG) stand first in point of importance; they were generally dried and pressed into cakes. Grapes were generally eaten in a dried state as raisins. (VINE.) Fruit-cake forms a part of the daily food of the Arabians. (APPLE; MANNA; MULBERRY-TREES; PALM-TREE; POMEGRANATE; SUMMER FRUITS; SYCAMINE-TREE; SYCAMORE.) Of vegetables we have most frequent notice of LENTILS, which are still largely used by the Bedouins in travelling; BEANS, CUCUMBERS, GARLIC, LEEKS, MELONS, and ONIONS, which were and still are of a superior quality in Egypt (Num. xi. 5). The modern Arabians consume but few vegetables: radishes and leeks are most in use, and are eaten raw with bread. (AGRICULTURE; BITTER HERBS; GARDEN; GOURD.) The spices or condiments known to the Hebrews were numerous. (ALMOND; ANISE; CORIANDER; CUMMIN; MINT; MUSTARD; NUTS; RUE; SPICES.) An important article of food was HONEY, whether the natural product of the bee, or the other natural and artificial productions included under that head, especially the dihs of the Syrians and Arabians, i. e. grape-juice boiled down. OIL (OLIVE) does not appear to have been used to the extent we might have anticipated. Eggs are not often noticed, but were evidently known as articles of food (Is. x. 14, lix. 5; Lk. xi. 12). The Orientals have been at all times sparing in the use of animal food: not only does the excessive heat of the climate render it both unwholesome to eat much meat, and expensive from the necessity of immediately consuming a whole animal, but beyond this the ritual regulations of the Mosaic law in ancient, as of the Koran in modern times, have tended to the same result. (COOKING.) It has been inferred from Gen. ix. 3, 4 that animal food was not permitted before the flood; but the permission here may be only a more explicit declaration of a condition implied in the grant of universal dominion (i. 28, compare iv. 2, 20, vii. 2). The prohibition expressed against consuming the BLOOD of any animal (ix. 4) was more fully developed in the Levitical law, and enforced by the penalty of death (Lev. iii. 17, vii. 26, xix. 26; Deut. xii. 16; 1 Sam. xiv. 32 ff.; Ez. xlv. 7, 15). Gentile converts to Christianity were laid under similar restrictions (Acts xv. 20, 29, xxi. 25). Certain portions of the FAT of sacrifices were also forbidden, as being set apart for the altar (Lev. iii. 9, 10, 16, vii. 25; compare 1 Sam. ii. 16 ff.; 2 Chr. vii. 7). Christians were forbidden to eat the flesh of animals, portions of which had been offered to idols (Acts xv. 29, xxi. 25; 1 Cor. viii.). All beasts and birds classed as unclean (Lev. xi. 1 ff.; Deut. xiv. 4 ff.) were also prohibited. (CLEAN; UNCLEAR MEATS.) The Hebrews further abstained from eating the sinew of the hip (Gen. xxxii. 32, compare 25). Under these restrictions the Hebrews were permitted the free use of animal food: generally they only availed themselves of it in the exercise of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 7), or at FESTIVALS of a religious (Ex. xii. 8), public (1 K. i. 9; 1 Chr. xii. 40), or private character (Gen. xxvii. 4; Lk. xv. 23; BANQUETS): it was only in royal households that there was a daily consumption of meat (1 K. iv. 23; Neh. v. 18). The animals killed for meat were—calves (Gen. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxviii. 24; Am. vi. 4); lambs (2 Sam. xii. 4; Am. vi. 4); oxen, not above three years of age (1 K. i.

9; Prov. xv. 17; Is. xxii. 13; Mat. xxii. 4); kids (Gen. xxvii. 9; Judg. vi. 19; 1 Sam. xvi. 20); harts, roebucks, and fallow-deer (1 K. iv. 23); birds of various kinds; fish, except such as were without scales and fins (Lev. xi. 9; Deut. xiv. 9). Locusts, of which certain species only were esteemed clean (Lev. xi. 22), were occasionally eaten (Mat. iii. 4), but considered as poor fare. (See the various articles.) Meat does not appear ever to have been eaten by itself; various accompaniments are noticed in Scripture, as bread, milk, and sour milk (Gen. xviii. 8); bread and broth (Judg. vi. 19); and with fish either bread (Mat. xiv. 19, xv. 36; Jn. xxi. 9) or honeycomb (Lk. xxiv. 42). As beverages the Hebrews used MILK, and probably barley-water, and a mixture, resembling the modern sherbet, formed of fig-cake and water. It is almost needless to say that water was most generally drunk. In addition to these the Hebrews were acquainted with various intoxicating liquors. DRINK, STRONG; VINEGAR; WINE.

* Foot = one of the lower extremities, especially of the human body (Lev. xiii. 12, &c.); figuratively ascribed to God (Ex. xxiv. 10, &c.). To be "under one's feet" denotes subjection or conquest (Ps. viii. 6, &c.), probably from the eastern conqueror's practice of setting his feet on the body or neck of the conquered: to "fall at one's feet" is to pay homage (1 Sam. xxv. 24, &c.; ADORATION); to "sit," or to be "brought up at one's feet" is to be a disciple, or receive instruction (Lk. x. 39; Acts xxii. 8). "Feet" euphemistically = the secret parts; hence to "cover one's feet" = to ease one's self (Judg. iii. 24, &c.). Ornaments for, or about, the feet; see ANKLET; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL. AGRICULTURE; DUST; MEALS; SANDAL; WASHING THE HANDS AND FEET.

Foot-man, employed in the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. ragli = a foot-man, especially a foot-soldier, Ges. (Num. xi. 21; Judg. xx. 2, &c.). (ARMY.)—2. Heb. rits = a runner, courier, Ges. (1 Sam. xxii. 17 only; margin "runners" or "guard"). This passage affords the first mention of the existence of a body of swift runners in attendance on the king, though such a thing had been foretold by Samuel (viii. 11). This body appear to have been afterward kept up, and to have been distinct (so Mr. Grove) from the body-guard—the six hundred and the thirty—who were originated by DAVID. See 1 K. xiv. 27, 28; 2 Chr. xii. 10, 11; 2 K. x. 25, xi. 4, 6, 11, 13, 19. In each of these cases the word is the same as the above, and is rendered "GUARD;" but the translators have put the word "runners" in the margin in 1 K. xiv. 27. COMPEL; EPISTLE; POST II.

* Ford = a place of crossing a river, &c. FERRY-BOAT; JORDAN.

Fore-head [for'ed]. The practice of veiling the face in public for WOMEN of the higher classes, especially married women, in the E., sufficiently stigmatizes with reproach the unveiled face of women of bad character (Gen. xxiv. 66; Jer. iii. 3). (DRESS.) An especial force is thus given to the term "hard of forehead" as descriptive of audacity in general (Ez. iii. 7 [margin], 8, 9). The custom among many Oriental nations, both of coloring the face and forehead and of impressing on the body marks indicative of devotion to some special deity or religious sect, is mentioned elsewhere. (CUTTINGS.) The "jewels for the forehead" (Ez. xvi. 12; Gen. xxiv. 22) were probably nose-rings. EAR-RINGS; NOSE-JEWEL.

* For'aign-er [for'in-er] STRANGER.

* Fore'ship (Acts xxvii. 30) = forepart of a SHIP.

* Fore'skin = the prepuce, or projecting skin of the male organ of generation, which was cut off in CIRCUMCISION (Gen. xvii. 11 ff. &c.); figuratively = uncleanness, impurity (Deut. x. 16; Jer. iv. 4).

For'est, the A. V. translation of Heb. ya'ar, hōresh or chōresh, and pardēs. The first of these most truly = a forest, literally an abundance of trees (1 Sam. xxii. 5; 1 K. vii. 2, &c.); often translated "wood" (Deut. xix. 5; Josh. xvii. 15, 18, &c.). The second (= a thick wood, thicket, forest, Ges.) is translated "wood" in 1 Sam. xxiii. 15 ff., and in plural "forests" in 2 Chr. xxvii. 4. The third, pardēs (PARADISE), once = "forest" (Neh. ii. 8), elsewhere "orchard" (Eccl. ii. 5; Cant. iv. 13). Although PALESTINE has never been in historical times a woodland country, yet no doubt there was much more wood formerly than at present. (1.) The wood of Ephraim clothed the slopes of the hills that bordered the plain of Jezreel, and the plain itself near Beth-shan (Josh. xvii. 15 ff.). (EPHRAIM, WOOD OF.) (2.) The wood of BETH-EL (2 K. ii. 23, 24) was in the ravine which descends to the plain of Jericho. (3.) The forest of HARETH (1 Sam. xxii. 5) was somewhere on the border of the Philistine plain, in the southern part of Judah. (4.) The wood through which the Israelites passed in their pursuit of the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 25) was probably in a valley near Ajalon (compare 31). (5.) The "wood" (Ps. cxxxii. 6) implied in the name of KIRJATH-JEARIM (1 Sam. vii. 2) must have been near Kirjath-jearim. (6.) The "forests" in which Jotham placed his forts (2 Chr. xxvii. 4) were (so Bertheau) the wooded hills or mountain-summits of Judah, where cities could not be built. (7.) The plain of SHARON 1 was partly covered with wood (Is. lxxv. 10). (8.) The wood in the wilderness of ZIPH 2, in which David concealed himself (1 Sam. xxiii. 15 ff.), lay S. E. of Hebron. The house of the forest of Lebanon (1 K. vii. 2, x. 17, 21; 2 Chr. ix. 16, 20) was so called probably from being fitted up with CEDAR. (PALACE.) The forest supplied an image of pride and exaltation doomed to destruction (2 K. xix. 23; Is. x. 18, xxxii. 19, xxxvii. 24; Jer. xxi. 14, xxii. 7, xlv. 23; Zech. xi. 2), and of unfruitfulness as contrasted with a cultivated field or vineyard (Is. xxix. 17, xxxii. 15; Jer. xxvi. 18; Hos. ii. 12).

* Forks (1 Sam. xiii. 21) = three-pronged instruments for gathering up hay, straw, &c. (so Gesenius). AGRICULTURE

Fer-ti-li-ca-tions. FENCED CITY; TOWER; WAR.

* Fortress. FORTIFICATIONS, &c.

For-tu-na-tus (L. prospered, fortunate), a Corinthian Christian at Ephesus, with Stephanas and Achaicus, when St. Paul wrote 1 Corinthians; perhaps Fortunatus and Achaicus were members of Stephanas's household (1 Cor. xvi. 17). The Fortunatus mentioned at the end of Clement's first epistle to the Corinthians was possibly the same person.

* Found'er. HANDICRAFT; METALS.

Foun'tain, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. 'ayin (AIN; Gen. xvi. 7; Num. xxxiii. 9; Deut. viii. 7, xxxiii. 28; 1 Sam. xxix. 1; 2 Chr. xxxii. 3; Neh. ii. 14, iii. 15, xii. 37; Prov. viii. 28), also translated "well" (Gen. xxiv. 13 ff.; Ex. xv. 27; Judg. xv. 19 margin; Neh. ii. 13), often "EYE."—2. Heb. ma'yin (Gen. vii. 11, viii. 2; Lev. xi. 36; Josh. xv. 9; 1 K. xviii. 5; 2 Chr. xxxii. 4; Ps. lxxiv. 15, cxiv. 8; Prov. v. 16, viii. 24, xxv. 26; Cant. iv. 12, 15; Is. xli. 18; Hos. xiii. 15; Joel iii. 18 [iv. 18 Heb.]), "well" (Josh. xviii. 15; 2 K. iii. 19, 25; Ps. lxxxiv. 6 [Heb. 7]; Is. xii. 3), "spring" (Ps. lxxxvii. 7, civ. 10).—3. Heb. bōr or bayir once (Jer. vi. 7). (AIN; CISTERN.)—4. Heb. mabbūa' once (Eccl. xii. 6), elsewhere translated "spring" (Is. xxxv. 7, xlix. 10).—5. Heb. mākōr, usually figuratively (Lev. xx. 18; Ps. xxxvi. 9 [Heb. 10], lxxviii. 26 [Heb. 27]; Prov. v. 18, xiii. 14, xiv. 27; Jer. ii. 13, ix. 1 [viii. 23 Heb.], xvii. 13; Zech. xiii. 1), translated "issue" (Lev. xii. 7), "well" (Prov. x. 11), "well-spring" (Prov. xvi. 22; xviii. 4), "spring" (Prov. xxv. 26; Jer. li. 36; Hos. xiii. 15).—6. Gr. πηγή (in LXX. = No. 1, 2, 5) (Mk. v. 29; Jas. iii. 11, 12; Rev. vii. 17, viii. 10, xiv. 7, xvi. 4, xxi. 6), translated "well" (Jn. iv. 6, 14; 2 Pet. ii. 17). Among the attractive features presented by the Land of Promise to the nation migrating from beauty, especially those which fall into the Jordan and its lakes. The spring or fountain of living water is distinguished in all Oriental languages from the artificial WELL. The volcanic agency which has operated so powerfully in Palestine has, from very early times, given tokens of its working in the warm springs which are found near the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. (HAMMATH; PALESTINE, Geology § 10; SEA, THE SALT, II. § 4.) Jerusalem appears to have possessed either more than one perennial spring, or one issuing by more than one outlet. In Oriental cities generally public fountains are frequent. Traces of such fountains at Jerusalem may perhaps be found in the names EN-ROGEL, the "DRAGONWELL," and the "gate of the fountain" (Neh. ii. 13, 14). FOUNTAIN-GATE.

* Fountain-gate (Neh. xii. 37), or Gate of the Fountain (ii. 14, iii. 15), a gate of JERUSALEM, near the king's pool and gardens; probably at the S. E. part, near Siloam (so Gesenius).

Fowl. Several Hebrew and Greek words are thus rendered in the A. V.; but all of them, except one, are likewise translated "BIRD." The Heb. plural barburim occurs once only (1 K. iv. 23 [v. 3 Heb.]), and is translated "fowl," "fatted fowl" (= capons, Kimehi; geese, Ges., and the Jerusalem Targum), being included among the daily provisions for Solomon's table. CHICKENS; COCK; HEN.

Fowler. CAGE; GIN; HUNTING; NET; SPARROW.

FOX. the A. V. translation of the Heb. shū'āl (= jackal as well as fox), and Gr. alopex. Ps. lxiii. 10 evidently refers to jackals, which are ever ready to prey on the carcases of the slain. In Judg. xv. 4, "jackals," and not "foxes," are evidently meant, for the former animal is gregarious, the latter solitary in its habits, and it is improbable that Samson should have succeeded in catching 300 foxes, whereas he could readily have taken in snares (so the Heb.) so many jackals. He may have had men to help him; some of the animals might have been taken in one portion of the Philistines' territory, and some in another, and let loose in different parts, and 150 different centres of conflagration through the country of the Philistines must have burnt up nearly all their "CORN." Both the fox and the jackal are fond of grapes and very destructive to vineyards (Cant. ii. 15); both have holes and burrows among ruins (Neh. iv. 3; Lam. v. 18; Mat. viii. 20; Lk. ix. 58). The crafty rapacity of Herod might be represented by either (Lk. xiii. 32; compare Ez. xiii. 4). The jackal of Palestine is no doubt the Canis aureus, which may be heard every night in the villages. Hemprich and Ehrenberg speak of a vulpine animal, under the name of Canis Syriacus, as being found in Lebanon. The Egyptian Vulpes Niloticus (= fox of the Nile), and doubtless the common European red fox, V. vulgaris, are Palestine species.

Jackal, Canis aureus.—(Fhn.)

Frank'ln-cense (Heb. libōndh, in Is. and Jer. translated "incense;" Gr. libanos), a vegetable resin, brittle, glittering, and of a bitter taste, used for sacrificial fumigation (Ex. xxx. 34-36; Lev. ii. 1 ff., xxiv.; Mat. ii. 11, &c.). It is obtained by successive incisions in the bark of a tree, the first of which yields the purest and whitest kind; while the produce of the after-incisions is spotted with yellow, and as it becomes old loses its whiteness altogether. The Hebrews imported their frankincense from Arabia (A. V. "incense;" Is. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20), particularly from Sheba; but the Arabian frankincense, or olibanum, is now of a very inferior kind, and the finest frankincense imported into Turkey comes through Arabia from the islands of the Indian Archipelago. There can be little doubt that the tree which produces the Indian frankincense is the Boswellia serrata of Roxburgh, or Boswellia thurifera of Colebrooke, growing on the mountains of India. It is still extremely uncertain what tree produces the Arabian olibanum. Lamarck proposes the Amyris Gileadensis = balsam of Gilead (SPICE); but, as it would seem, upon inconclusive evidence. The Indian frankincense, imported from Bombay, is used in the rites of the Greek and Roman Catholic churches, and as a perfume in sick-rooms. The common frankincense of commerce is an exudation from the Norway spruce fir (Abies excelsa).

* Free'dom. CITIZEN; SLAVE.

* Free'-will-of'-fer-ing (Lev. xxii. 18 ff., &c.). SACRIFICE.

* Fringe. DRESS; HEM OF GARMENT.

Frog (Heb. tsiphardéa'; Gr. batrachos), a well-known reptile of the genus Rana, living mostly in or near water (Ex. viii. 2 ff.; Ps. lxxviii. 45, cv. 30; Rev. xvi. 13). (PLAGUES, THE TEN.) Frogs are abundant in the Nile. Mr. Houghton maintains that only one species is now found in Egypt, the Rana esculenta, or edible frog of Europe; but others (Gosse in Fairbairn, Duns, &c.) enumerate three or four species as found in Egypt.

Front'lets [frunt-] (= what are worn in front or on the forehead [Ex. xiii. 16; Deut. vi. 8, xi. 18]), or Phy-lac'te-ries (fr. Gr., literally = preservatives, guards, AMULETS [Mat. xxiii. 5]), were strips of parchment, on which were written four passages of Scripture (Ex. xiii. 2-10, 11-17; Deut. vi. 4-9, 13-23) in an ink prepared for the purpose. They were then rolled up in a case of black calfskin, attached to a stiffer piece of leather, having a thong one finger broad, and one and a half cubits long. They were placed at the bend of the left arm. Those worn on the forehead were written on four strips of parchment, and put into four little cells within a square case, on which the letter  $\omega$  (Heb. shin; Wai-TING) was written. The square had two thongs, on which Hebrew letters were inscribed. That phylacteries were used as amulets is certain, and was very natural. Scaliger even supposes that phylacteries were designed to supersede those amulets, the use of which had been already learned by the Israelites in Egypt. The expression "they make broad their phylacteries" (Mat. xxiii. 5) refers not so much to the phylactery itself, which seems to have been of a prescribed breadth, as to the case in which the parchment was kept, which the Pharisees, among their other pretentious customs Frontlets or Phylacteries.

(Mk. vii. 3, 4; Lk. v. 33, &c.), made as conspicuous as they could. It is said that the Pharisees wore them always, whereas the common people only used them at prayers. The Pharisees wore them above the elbow, but the Sadducees on the palm of the hand. The modern Jews only wear them at morning prayers, and sometimes at noon. In our Lord's time they were worn by all Jews, except the Karaites, women, and slaves. Boys, at the age of thirteen years and a day, were bound to wear them. The Karaites explained Deut. vi. 8, Ex. xiii. 9, &c., as a figurative command to remember the law, as is certainly the case in similar passages (Prov. iii. 3, vi. 21, vii. 3; Cant. viii. 6, &c.). It seems clear that the scope of these injunctions favors the Karaite interpretation. The Rabbis (Mishna) have many rules about their use. AMULETS; FOREHEAD.

* Frost, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. hānāmāl or chānāmāl (Ps. lxxviii. 47 only, margin "great hailstones"). The LXX, Vulg., J. A. Alexander, &c., translate frost; Fürst, hailstones, hail; Michaelis, favored by Gesenius, ante. (Locust 7.)—2. Heb. kerach or kerach = ice, Ges. (Gen. xxxi. 40; Job xxxvii. 10; Jer. xxxvi. 30), twice translated "ice" (Job vi. 16, xxxviii. 29), once "CRYSTAL" (Ez. i. 22). The kindred Heb. kōrah or kōrach (Korath) is also translated "ice" in Ps. cxlvii. 17 (poetically for hail, Ges.).—3. Heb. ciphôr or çphôr (Ex. xvi. 14; Ps. cxlvii. 16, "hoar-frost," in both; Job xxxviii. 29, A. V. "hoary frost"). Gesenius supposes the Hebrew name is given to hoar-frost, because it covers the ground, and to a cup or goblet (A. V. "BASIN") because this is covered by a lid.—Though on the coast of PALESTINE frost and snow are very rare, they are well known on Mount Lebanon, &c. (Rbn. Phys. Geog.). Throughout Western Asia there is much greater difference between the temperature of the day and night than in Europe generally. In many parts of Asia even frosty nights in winter may be succeeded by very warm days (Gen. xxxi. 40; Kit., Pict. Bible). DEW; SNOW; WINDS.

* Fruit = the produce of trees, and of plants in general; applied also in the Scriptures to the produce of animals, and figuratively to the product or result of labor, &c. FIRST-FRUITS; FOOD.

* Frying-Pan. BREAD.

* Fuel. AGRICULTURE; COAL; DUNG; FIRE; FOREST.

* Fuller (Heb. côbês; Gr. gnaphæus). The trade of the fullers, so far as mentioned in Scripture, appears to have consisted chiefly in cleansing garments and whitening them. (DRESS.) The process of fulling or cleansing cloth, as gathered from the practice of other nations, consisted in treading or stamping on the garments with the feet or with bats in tubs of water, in which some alkaline substance, answering the purpose of soap, had been dissolved. The substances used for this purpose which are mentioned in Scripture are nātrūm (A. V. "SALT"; Prov. xxv. 20; Jer. ii. 22) and "SOAP" (Mal. iii. 2). Other substances also, as urine and chalk, are mentioned (Mishna) as employed in cleansing, which, together with alkali, seem to identify the Jewish with the Roman process. The process of whitening garments was performed by rubbing into them chalk or earth of some kind. Creta Cimolia (Cimolite) was probably the earth most frequently used. The trade of the fullers, as causing offensive smells, and also as requiring space for drying clothes, appears to have been carried on at Jerusalem outside the city. FULLER'S FIELD; HANDICRAFT.

* Fuller's Field, the, a spot near Jerusalem (2 K. xviii. 17; Is. vii. 3, xxxvi. 2), so close to the walls, that a person speaking from there could be heard on them (2 K. xviii. 17, 26). It gave name to a "HIGHWAY" in which was "the CONDUIT of the upper pool." One resort of the fullers of Jerusalem would seem to have been below the city on the S. E. side. (EN-ROGEL.) But Rabshakch and his "great host" must have come from the N.; and Mr. Grove, with Rev. G. Williams, places the Fuller's Field on the table-land, on the N. side of the city. Robinson, Porter (in Kitto), &c., place it on the W. side of the city, near the great road to Joppa.

* Furnace. BURIAL.

* Fur'long. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

* Furnace, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. tannûr = furnace, oven, Ges. (Gen. xv. 17; Is. xxxi. 9; Neh. iii. 11, xii. 38), generally translated "OVEN."—2. Heb. cithân = a smelting or calcining furnace, especially a lime-kiln (Gen. xix. 28; Ex. ix. 8, 10, xix. 18).—3. Heb. cûr = a furnace for smelting metals, Ges. (Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; Ez. xxii. 18 ff.); metaphorically, a state of dreadful trial (Deut. iv. 20; 1 K. viii. 51; Is. xlvi. 10; Jer. xi. 4).—4. Chal. attûn = a furnace, Ges. (Dan. iii. 6 ff.). The Persians were in the habit of using the furnace as a means of inflicting capital punishment (Pan. l. c.; Jer. xxix. 22; Hos. vii. 7; 2 Mc. vii. 5).—5. Gr. kamînos = a furnace, for smelting metals, burning pottery, baking, &c., Rbn. A. T. Lex., L. & S. (Feculus. xxvii. 5, xxxviii. 28, 30; Mat. xiii. 42, 50; Rev. i. 15, ix. 2); in LXX. = No. 2-4. (BELOW; BREAD; GLASS; HANDICRAFT; IRON; MINES; POTTER.)

cell or di = literally any thing completed, prepared, made, viz. apparatus, implement, equipment, utensil, vessel, &c., Ges. (Ex. xxxi. 7 [margin "vessel"], 8, 9, xxxv. 14, xxxix. 33; Nah. ii. 9 [Heb. 10], margin "vessels"), elsewhere translated "vessel" (Ex. xxvii. 3, 19, &c.), "instrument" (Gen. xlix. 5, &c.), "weapon" (xxvii. 3, &c.), "artillery" (1 Sam. xx. 40), "jewel" (Gen. xxiv. 53, &c.), "thing" (Lev. xiii. 49 ff., &c.), "stuff" (Gen. xxxi. 37, &c.), "armor" (1 Sam. xiv. 1 ff., &c.), "carriage," "bag," &c. "Furniture" above = the utensils or vessels of the altar, &c.; "stuff" and some of the other words are applied to household furniture. The furniture of Eastern dwellings, especially in early ages, was very simple. The chamber prepared for Elisha by the rich and liberal Shunammite had apparently only "a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick" (2 K. iv. 10, compare 13). Many articles which Europeans and Americans would esteem not merely useful, but necessary, find no place among ancient or modern Orientals. (ALTAR; BASIN; BASKET; BATH; BED; BOTTLE; BOWL; BREAD; CANDLESTICK; CHARGER; CUP; DISH; HANDICRAFT; HOUSE; LAMP; MEALS; MILL; NAIL; OVEN; PITCHER; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.)—2. Heb. car (Gen. xxxi. 34) = a camel's litter or saddle, i. e. the small tent or canopy fastened on a camel's back, in which a female rides (Gesenius).

G

Gaal (Heb. loathing, Ges.), son of Ebed, aided the Shechemites in their rebellion against Abimelech, but was ejected from Shechem by Zebul, and defeated by Abimelech (Judg. ix.); probably not a native of Shechem, nor specially interested in the revolution, but one of a class of brigands, willing at such a period of anarchy to sell their services to the highest bidder.

Gaash (Heb. earthquake). On the N. side of "the hill of Gaash" was the city (TIMNATH-SERAH) which was given to Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 30; Judg. ii. 9; compare Josh. xix. 49, 50). Hiddai or Hurai was "of the brooks of Gaash" (2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chr. xi. 32).

Gaba (Heb.) = GEBÄ (Josh. xviii. 24; Ezr. ii. 26; Neh. vii. 30).

Gab'a-el or Gab'a-el (Gr. fr. Heb. = high one of God?) 1. An ancestor of Tobit (Tob. i. 1).—2. A poor Jew (Tob. i. 17, Vulg.) of "Rages in Media," to whom Tobit lent ten talents of silver (Tob. i. 14, iv. 1, 20, v. 6, ix., x. 2).

Gab'a-tha (Gr.) = BIGTHAN (Esth. xii. 1).

Gab'ba-l or Gab'bal (Heb. taz-gatherer, Ges.), apparently the head of an important family of Benjamin resident at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 8).

Gab'ba-tha, the Gr. form of the Heb. or Chal. appellation of a place, also called "Pavement," where the judgment-seat or bema was planted, from his place on which Pilate delivered our Lord to death (Jn. xix. 13). The place was outside the prætorium (PRÆTORIUM, A. V. "judgment-hall"), for Pilate brought Jesus forth from thence to it. It is suggested by Lightfoot that Gabbatha is a mere translation of "pavement." It is more probably from an ancient root signifying height or roundness. In this case Gabbatha = the elevated bema; and the "pavement" possibly = some mosaic or tessellated work, either forming the bema itself or the flooring of the court immediately round it.

Gab'des = GABA (1 Esd. v. 20).

Ga'brī-as (Gr. fr. Heb. = man of Jehovah), the brother, according to the present text of the LXX., of GABAEŁ 2 (Tob. i. 14), though in iv. 20 described as his father.

Ga'brī-el (Heb. man of God). The word, which is not in itself distinctive, but merely a description of the angelic office, is used as a proper name or title in Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21, and in Lk. i. 19, 26. In the ordinary traditions, Jewish and Christian, Gabriel is spoken of as one of the archangels. In Scripture he is set forth only as the representative of the angelic nature in its ministration of comfort and sympathy to man. ANGEL.

Gad (Heb., see below). 1. Jacob's seventh son, the first-born of Zilpah, Leah's maid, and whole-brother to Asher (Gen. xxx. 11–13, xlii. 16, 18). (a) The passage in which the bestowal of the name is preserved is more than usually obscure: "And Leah said, 'In fortune,' and she called his name Gad" (xxx. 11). Such is supposed (by Mr. Grove, Gesenius, &c.) to be the meaning of the old text of the passage. But in the marginal emendation of the Masorets the word is given, "Gad comes." (b) In the blessing of Jacob, "Gad" is taken as meaning a piratical band or troop (xlix. 19). (c) The force thus lent to the name has been by some partially transferred to the narrative of Gen. xxx., e. g. the Samaritan Version, the Veneto-Greek, and A. V.—"a troop (of children) cometh." Of the childhood and life of the patriarch Gad nothing is preserved. At the time of the descent into Egypt, seven sons are ascribed to him, remarkable from the fact that a majority of their names have plural terminations, as if those of families rather than persons (xlii. 16; compare Num. xxvi. 15–18). Gad's position during the march to the Promised Land was on the S. side of the Tabernacle with Reuben (Num. ii. 14, &c.). At the first census Gad had 45,650; at the last, 40,500. Of all the sons of Jacob, Reuben and Gad alone returned to the land which their forefathers had left five hundred years before, with their occupations unchanged. At the halt on the E. of Jordan, we find them coming forward to Moses with the representation that they "have cattle"—"a great multitude of cattle," and the land where they now are is a "place for cattle" (xxxii. 1–5). They did not, however, attempt to evade taking their proper share of the difficulties of subduing the land of Canaan, and after that task had been effected they were dismissed by Joshua "to their tents," to their "wives, their little ones, and their cattle," which they had left behind them in Gilead. The country allotted to Gad appears, speaking roughly, to have lain chiefly about the centre of the land E. of Jordan. The S. of that district—from the Arnon (Wady Mojeb) to Heshbon, nearly due E. of Jerusalem—was occupied by Reuben, and at or about Heshbon the possessions of Gad commenced. They embraced half Gilead (Deut. iii. 12), or half the land of the children of Ammon (Josh. xiii. 25), probably the mountainous district intersected by the torrent JABBOK—if Wady Zúrka = the Jabbok—including, as its most northern town, the ancient sanctuary of MAHANAIM. On the E. the furthest landmark given is "AROER 2, that faces Rabbah" (Josh. xiii. 25). West was the Jordan (27). Such was the territory allotted to the Gadites, but no doubt they soon extended themselves beyond these limits. The official records of the reign of Jotham of Judah (1 Chr. v. 11, 16) show them to have been at that time established over the whole of GILEAD, and in possession of Bashan as far as Saleah, and very far both to the N. and the E. of the border given them originally, while the Manassites were pushed still further N. to Mount Hermon (v. 23). The character of the tribe is throughout strongly marked—fierce and warlike—"strong men of might, men of war for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler, their faces the faces of lions, and like roes upon the mountains for swiftmess" (xii. 8). The history of Jephthah, who (so Mr. Grove) appears to have been a Gadite, develops elements of a different nature and a higher order than the mere fierceness necessary to repel the attacks of the plunderers of the desert. In the behavior of Jephthah throughout that affecting history, there are marks of a great nobility of character. If to this we add the loyalty, the generosity, and the delicacy of Barzillai (2 Sam. xix. 32-39), we obtain a very high idea of the tribe at whose head were such men as these. Nor must we, while enumerating the worthies of Gad, forget, that probably (so Mr. Grove) Elijah the Tishbite, "who was of the inhabitants of Gilead," was one of them. But while exhibiting these high personal qualities, Gad appears to have been wanting in the powers necessary to enable him to take any active or leading part in the confederacy of the nation. The territory of Gad was the battle-field on which the long and fierce struggles of Syria and Israel were fought out, and, as an agricultural and pastoral country, it must have suffered severely in consequence (2 K. xv. 33). Gad was carried into captivity by Tiglath-Pileser (1 Chr. v. 26), and in the time of Jeremiah the cities of the tribe seem to have been inhabited by the Ammonites (Jer.
